PREFACE.

THE HISTORY OF THE JEWS, as written by FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS, has been not only held in the greateſt eſtimation, ſince tranſlated, but has in a great meaſure contributed in promoting the Truths of Chriſtianity. Its authenticity has been univerſally acknowledged, and the ſacred Scriptures thereby fully corroborated. This learned and ancient Hiſtorian has frequently been the means of convincing many obſtinate diſbelievers, who, notwithſtanding their mockery of Religion, have been ſtruck ſo forcibly with the accounts herein given, and their correſpondence to the Holy Bible, that they have not only allowed its great merit, but afterwards, with penitential rapture, acknowledged themſelves converts to the WORD OF GOD.

The utility, therefore, of a Work, which conveys ſuch ſalutary inſtruction—ſuch agreeable conviction—muſt certainly be obvious to every ſerious thinker.—It is a work that ſhould never die as its tends to an examination of the Chriſtian ſyſtem. A laudable wiſh to preſerve ſo invaluable a treaſure, inclined us with peculiar attention to furniſh the Public with a New Edition—an Edition hitherto unequalled for correctneſs, and neceſſary additions—in order to render it convenient for every claſs of people, as every claſs of people ſhould read it, we have endeavoured to unite two Volumes in one; and inſtead of contracting or mutilating the former edition, which is too often the caſe with many a reprinted work, under pretence of making it an eaſy purchaſe, we have abſolutely improved and added thereto—though ſtrange as this may ſeem at firſt ſight, yet when we explain the means we have adopted, aſtoniſhment will not only ceaſe, but the truth of this aſſertion fully appear. In the firſt place, one of our pages contains very near double of any of the former editions, which affords ample room for many neceſſary Annotations.—We have alſo divided our books into fewer chapters, as, it muſt be acknowledged, there were ſeveral unmeaning diviſions in the books of former editions, and ſeveral of thoſe chapters, thus divided, ſcarcely exceeding, notwithſtanding a ſtrong connection both to the preceding and ſucceeding ones, a dozen lines, and yet bearing heads of contents, which promiſed a much larger portion of matter —We have kept within reaſonable bounds—made ſuch diviſions as the ſenſe allowed, and were abſolutely proper for the relief of our readers—given a brief ſummary of each chapter, and yet have peculiarized ſuch particular paſſages by marginal heads, that references may be made almoſt immediately.

The

The Life of Joſephus, which has hitherto preceded his Hiſtory, in this edition ſucceeds it—as it was preſumed, our Readers, when made acquainted with the writings of the man, and had entered fully into the ſpirit of his work, would be more deſirous then to read his life and character.—Among our ADDITIONS is, a Vindication of the Teſtimonies of Joſephus, concerning Our Bleſſed Saviour, John the Baptiſt, and James the Juſt. Alſo Remarks and Obſervations from theſe foregoing teſtimonies concerning Jeſus Chriſt. Reflections on the Accounts of Tacitus and Suetonius, concerning divers Events relative to the Jewiſh Nation, and above all, the Hiſtory of the Jews, continued from the time of Joſephus to the preſent Period, including a ſpace of many centuries.—Alſo the Predictions of the principal Prophets, whoſe names occur in the works of Flavius Joſephus.—A Liſt of the Jewiſh Meaſures, and a Geographical Index, deſcriptive of the principal Places mentioned in the Works of Flavius Joſephus, without which it is impoſſible to peruſe his works with due attention, or even the holy Scriptures as we ought.

In order to correct many errors which crept into former editions, through the inadvertency of compoſitors, we have conſulted books of Antiquity in various Languages, and the occaſional Comments of the moſt ingenious Tranſlators of this work: particularly Boyer, Sir Roger L'Eſtrange, &c. whoſe aſſiſtance had been formerly of ſo much uſe—thus we have not only been enabled to rectify ſeveral typographical miſtakes, but likewiſe to elucidate ſuch paſſages as were before doubtful and intricate: and thus have we enhanced the value of an invaluable undertaking, and, it is hoped, rendered the preſent edition far ſuperior to any of the former.

The acknowledged utility of this Work is a ſufficient plea for this republication, and we preſume when the ſeveral advantages of this Edition are conſidered, and above all, the elegant Embelliſhments with which it is accompanied, that it will become the happy inſtrument of extenſive knowledge, and agreeable inſtruction, and that in conſideration of thoſe peculiar Alterations and Additions already intimated, it will have the preference of all former Tranſlations, and reſpective Editions, and be admitted into every family as the bulwark of Religion and Inſtruction.

It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that hitherto the works of our celebrated Author have been promiſcuouſly printed, without any regularity or due order; the particular care which we have taken of the arrangement of the matter, will be ſufficient, we hope, to eſtabliſh the ſuperiority of this Edition—for inſtance, the Hiſtory of the Martyrdom of the Maccabees, which formerly preceded the Hiſtory of the Wars of the Jews againſt the Romans, in the preſent Edition ſucceeds it—it being abſolutely neceſſary, firſt of all, to be acquainted with theſe Wars, which were the moſt conſiderable that ever occurred, and more intereſting and important than any contentions now upon record—the propriety, therefore, of their immediately following the Jewiſh Antiquities, muſt certainly be obvious to every Reader.

We ſhall no longer obtrude upon the Public any further introductory Remarks,—The neceſſity, utility, and advantage of this Re-publication appear ſo evident, that words are entirely needleſs to expatiate thereon, nor can we ſpare room indeed for any unneceſſary preamble:—neither expence nor attention have been omitted to render this undertaking the moſt complete of the kind: we cannot, therefore, be accuſed of intereſted motives, but a laudable ambition to excel.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS's

PREFACE

HISTORY

OF THE

ANTIQUITIES OF THE JEWS.

I WILL not dwell on the motives by which hiſtorians are generally induced to tranſmit to poſterity their records of paſt events, but I will venture to aſſert, that the work which I have entered upon will appear worthy the attention of the world, as it comprehends an Hiſtory of the Antiquities, Policy, and Government of our Nation, faithfully tranſlated from the Hebrew writings.

It was my chief intention, when I began the Hiſtory of the WARS in that work, to explain the Origin and Antiquities of the Jews, the viciſſitudes of fortune they underwent, and to delineate the character of their Legiſlator; but, as I proceeded, I found the ANTIQUITIES a ſubject too copious to be treated in connection with any other: I therefore determined to detach it from the Hiſtory of the Wars, and direct my attention to the Antiquities, previous to the Wars, and other ſucceeding events. Yet (as is frequently the caſe with thoſe who engage in arduous purſuits) I was diſcouraged to perſevere, as the work proved laborious, and my progreſs ſeemed retarded in proportion to its prolixity. Some, however, from a laudable deſire of acquiring knowledge, encouraged me to proceed, and eſpecially EPAPHRODITUS *, a man who had a propenſity to literature in general, and to hiſtory in particular; and had himſelf held very conſiderable employments, experienced many changes of fortune, and manifeſted throughout the whole an integrity and magnanimity never excelled, and rarely equalled.

I was thus prevailed on by the perſuaſion of ſo zealous a patron, and diſdaining an ignominious ſloth to the proſecution of a laudable undertaking, I reſumed my taſk with a determination of completing it with all convenient ſpeed. Beſides, when I reflected that King PTOLEMY II.* (a ſovereign who greatly favoured learning, and was deſirous of obtaining literary information, even at immenſe charge) procured a Greek tranſlation of our code of laws, conſtitution, and government; and that ELEAZAR, our high prieſt, a man inferior to none of his predeceſſors in knowledge or virtue, could not deny to that prince the participation of the inſtruction and entertainment to be derived from ſuch a work, as he knew it was the cuſtom of our anceſtors not to conceal that which might be uſeful to mankind in general; I held it my incumbent duty to imitate the liberality of our high prieſt—and the more ſo, as I am perſuaded there are now many perſons as much attached to literature, and as anxiouſly deſirous of obtaining knowledge, as that prince was in his day.

We are aſſured that King Ptolemy did not obtain all our writings; thoſe which related to the Law only were preſented to him by the interpreters at Alexandria; whereas the ſubjects compriſed in the ſacred writings are innumerable, ſince they contain the hiſtory of near four thouſand years; a hiſtory replete with ſurpriſing events reſpecting the various fortunes of war, the glorious achievements of heroes, and the extraordinary revolutions of ſtates and kingdoms.

It is my earneſt wiſh that by the authenticity of the Moſaic writings my works may be proved; conſcious that nothing will be found therein derogatory to the dignity of the Supreme Being, or repugnant to his gracious deſigns towards men; but that, on the other hand, they will appear a diſplay of his perfections, and a comment on his benevolence; as well as demonſtrate, that all things are diſpoſed in exact conformity to the laws of univerſal nature, to principles of the ſublimeſt rectitude, and to the pureſt dictates of unerring truth.

Moſes has amply diſcuſſed theſe important points: where it is requiſite, his language is plain and explicit; in other parts, it abounds with allegorical figures, to inveſtigate which, requires the aid of philoſophical diſquiſition. But diſmiſſing this ſubject for the preſent, I ſhall apply myſelf to the work I have undertaken, and begin with the creation of the world; after making a few neceſſary obſervations, by way of introduction to the whole.

His HISTORY of the

OF THE

BOOK I.

Containing the TRANSACTIONS of 2230 YEARS, from the CREATION of the WORLD, to the DEATH of ISAAC the PATRIARCH.

INTRODUCTION. *

THOSE hiſtorians, who have borne an active part in the actions which they record, conſider themſelves as under peculiar obligations, from that very circumſtance, to bear evidence to all ſuch matters as fell within their cognizance: they are, moreover, induced to take up the pen from a generous deſire of tranſmitting to poſterity ſuch actions as, for the general good of mankind, ought to be univerſally publiſhed, and not be ſuffered to lie buried in a diſgraceful obſcurity or oblivion. Under the influence of the above conſiderations, I have undertaken my preſent taſk; for, as I was privy to every tranſaction in the war between our people the Jews, and the Romans, I deem it my duty to publiſh to the world a true ſtate of all that paſſed during the above period, and to expoſe the falſehoods and miſrepreſentations which have been introduced into the relations of other writers upon the ſubject.

The Author's deſign.

It has been part of my deſign to trace the origin of the Jews, and to treat of their various fortunes, and of their excellent legiſlator, by whom they were trained up in the practice of ſuch exemplary virtue and piety; and alſo to relate the incidents of the various wars in which they were engaged for ſo many ages, particularly of the laſt, which they were compelled, however averſe to it they were, to maintain againſt the Romans. I was led to this reſolution by the reflection that our anceſtors had always manifeſted the greateſt readineſs to communicate ſuch matters to the natives of the neighbouring countries; and that the Greeks themſelves had repeatedly expreſſed an affectionate inquiſitiveneſs relative to the hiſtory of our nation.

A ſuitable diſpoſition in the reader enjoined.

In the peruſal of this hiſtory, there is one circumſtance more particularly deſerving the reader's attention; which is, that they who reſign themſelves to the will, and obey the ordinances of the Almighty, proſper even beyond belief in all their undertakings, and enjoy, beſides, the promiſe of ecſtatic and eternal bliſs in a life to come; whereas the ungodly, on the other hand, are defeated in all their deſigns, how feaſible ſoever they may appear, and are plunged into endleſs miſery and woe. Let the reader, therefore, conform himſelf, in all things, to the divine will, and maturely reflect on what Moſes, our legiſlator, has ſaid reſpecting the nature of God, and the correſpondence which ſubſiſts among all the works of his hands; obſerving, at the ſame time, how free the narrative of our great lawgiver is from thoſe fictions which abound in the relations of other writers. Yet, when the diſtance of time in which he wrote is conſidered, it will appear plain, that he might have impoſed upon us whatever falſities he had pleaſed, without any danger of detection; as our hiſtory commences above two thouſand years prior to the fabulous narrations of the ancient poets: neither have the heathens themſelves the audacity to trace ſo far back the origin of their falſe gods, the boaſted actions of their heroes, or the codes of their legiſlators. But as the authenticity of the narrative depends, in a great degree, on the authority of what Moſes in his wiſdom thought fit to deliver, it will be neceſſary to premiſe ſomething concerning Moſes himſelf, in order to prevent all cavils; as my readers will naturally be ſurpriſed to find ſo many philoſophical digreſſions in a work which, in the title, promiſes nothing more than a plain narration of hiſtorical facts.

* The Editor, in arranging the introductory matters to the different parts of this Work, has carefully attended to the original Verſions in the Hebrew and Greek, for it was firſt written in the former language by order of Veſpaſian, and then tranſlated into the latter. He has therefore, in producing this Edition, endeavoured to diſpoſe of the diviſion of Books, Chapters, Contents, &c. according to the Author's original intention, and in the moſt œconomical manner, in order to bring the whole into the moſt moderate compaſs poſſible, carefully avoiding all interpolations of former Tranſlators and Editors, who have uſed ſuch means merely to extend their Editions to an unreaſonable length and unneceſſary expence.

Honourable teſtimony of Moſes.

It muſt be obſerved, that this excellent perſon contends, that every man, who would live virtuouſly himſelf, or promulge laws for the regulation of the lives of others, muſt, in the firſt place, ſedulouſly apply himſelf to obtain all poſſible intelligence as to the nature of the Divine Being, and, as far as the weakneſs of his condition will permit, to form himſelf on that perfect model. Without this application, no legiſlator can ſupport the character he aſſumes; neither can he profit others by his writings, unleſs he convinces them, in the firſt place, that God is the Father and Lord of every thing that has exiſtence; that nothing is concealed from his knowledge; and that he rewardeth the godly man, and ſeverely puniſheth thoſe who wander from the right path. Theſe were the doctrines which Moſes taught the people committed to his care. He did not, like other legiſlators, begin with enacting laws for the preſervation of their rights and properties, nor with regulating the forms of ſtipulations, contracts, and the like; but his firſt care was, to give them a juſt idea of the power of God in the creation of the world, and of the ſuperior excellence of man over all other earthly beings: and having poſſeſſed their minds with a due reverence of the Almighty, he found them likewiſe ſuſceptible of every other laudable impreſſion. But the lawgivers of the heathens, who were guided ſolely by the fabulous traditions handed down to them, have, with the utmoſt freedom, imputed to their gods ſuch lewdneſs as would diſgrace the moſt laſcivious of men, and thus, by theſe examples, have they authorized and incited mankind to the commiſſion of every ſpecies of wickedneſs imaginable. Our legiſlator, on the contrary, having, in the firſt place, repreſented to us that God is the very eſſence of holineſs and purity, proceeds to demonſtrate, that every man is bound to exert his utmoſt endeavours to render himſelf a partaker, in ſome degree at leaſt, of the ſanctity of that Divine Original; denouncing, finally, a rigid ſentence againſt the unbelievers, and ſuch as will not admit theſe truths.

I preſume that every reader, who examines this work by the foregoing ſtandard, will find each part thereof perfectly conſonant with reaſon, and with the goodneſs and majeſty of the Divine Being. It will be ſeen that I have varied my mode of treating on the different matters mentioned by our great legiſlator; ſlightly touching only upon ſome, illuſtrating others by apt illuſions, and, with reſpect to ſuch paſſages as were moſt wo[illegible] of a thorough inveſtigation, I have rendered the ſenſe of them as perſpicuous as language will admit.

The Garden of Eden planted, and inhabited. Of the forbidden Fruit. The Serpent tempts Eve. The Fall of Adam and Eve, and the Curſe pronounced in conſequence of that Event.

Creation of the world. Gen. i.

"IN the beginning God created the heaven and the earth;"* but the earth was overſpread with an impenetrable darkneſs. The Spirit of God, by his omnipotent Fiat, commanded that there ſhould be light, and, upon its appearance, having viewed the maſs, he divided the light from the darkneſs; ſtyling the darkneſs night, and the light day. The earlier hours of the day he called morning, and the concluſion of it, the time after the departure of the day, evening: and this was the diviſion of the firſt day. Moſes emphatically terms it one or a day, and not the firſt day.

The ſecond day was employed in the conſtruction of the firmament, or heaven, which was placed high above the reſt of the works of creation, being ſeparated from the groſſer particles of the earth, and ſurrounded with a chryſtalline atmoſphere; and the air was impregnated with that

* Though the Jews, by the heaven and earth, underſtood the univerſe, as appears from Acts xvii. 24. yet it is evident that Moſes, in the ſubſequent part of his account, confines himſelf to deſcribe only the creation of the ſolar ſyſtem, or this viſible world; and though he here aſſerts, that God is the creator of all things, yet it is uſed as a preface, not as an explanation of the remaining part.

due proportion of humidity, which produces thoſe refreſhing ſhowers by which the earth is enabled to "bring forth her fruits in due ſeaſon."

On the third day God fixed the earth, which had hitherto floated, and encompaſſed it with the ſea; and on the ſame day the various ſpecies of plants, with their ſeeds, were produced.

The ſun, the moon, and the other planets, with the ſtars, were formed on the fourth day; being intended both to embelliſh the firmament in which they were placed, and alſo, by the regularity of their motions and courſes, to mark out to the inhabitants of the world the progreſſion of time, and the revolving ſeaſons.

On the fifth day God created the fiſh, and feathered fowl; and ſent them forth in couples, having endowed them with the faculty of propagation; that every creature, according to its ſpecies, might increaſe and multiply upon the face of the earth.

The work of the ſixth day conſiſted in the formation of various ſpecies of quadrupeds, male and female*; and on this day God alſo created the moſt noble of all his works, MAN. Thus, in the words of Moſes, "In ſix days God made the world, and all that is therein."

The ſabbath appointed.

The Almighty, having thus accompliſhed the grand undertaking, ceaſed from his labours, and reſted† on the ſeventh day. Hence it is that we diſtinguiſh this day by the title of Sabbath, which, in the Hebrew language, ſignifies Reſt, and a prohibition of every kind of worldly occupation.

Origin of mankind.

After recounting theſe particulars, Moſes expatiates upon the works and offices of nature, beginning with the creation of man: "God," ſays he, formed man of the duſt of the ground, and breathed into him the breath of life; ſo that he became a living ſoul." He adds, that this man was named Adam, which, in the Hebrew language, ſignifies red; that pure and rich kind of earth, from which he was formed, being of that colour in its original ſtate.

By the command of God, all living creatures, male and female, paſſed in review before Adam, who gave to each a name, according to their reſpective ſpecies and natures, by which they have ever ſince been diſtinguiſhed.

Woman formed.

The ſolitude in which Adam had hitherto lived being conſidered as, in ſome meaſure, a diminution of his happineſs, God was pleaſed to provide a ſuitable companion for him in the perſon of Eve, who was formed from one of the ribs of Adam, taken from his ſide during a deep ſleep; and he no ſooner ſaw her, than he acknowledged the conſanguinity, and gratefully received her as an amiable partner, bountifully granted to him for his comfort and help, ſtyling her "bone of his bone, and fleſh of his fleſh". The common Hebrew term for a woman is Iſſa, but this woman, being the firſt, was ſtyled Eva, ſignifying the Mother of all living.

It is further related by Moſes, that God planted a garden, afterwards called Paradiſe, in the eaſtern part of the earth, filled with every ſpecies of ſalutary vegetables and fruit trees; the tree of life and the tree of knowledge of good and evil among the reſt.

Paradiſe.

The four rivers of Paradiſe.

The care of cultivating this garden was entruſted to Adam and Eve. A large river, which divided itſelf into four branches, ran through, and ſurrounded it. The firſt of theſe branches, ſtyled, in the Hebrew tongue, Piſon, ſignifying fulneſs or inundation, and by the Greeks, Ganges, directs its courſe through India, and loſes itſelf finally in the ſea: the ſecond, called, in our tongue, Phora, meaning diſperſion, or a flower; and the third, which we call Diglath, or narrow and rapid, are both called Euphrates by the Greeks, and they empty themſelves into the Red Sea‡: the fourth branch ſhapes its courſe through Egypt, and is called by us Gihon, which means, to come from the eaſt; but the Greeks term it the Nile.

The tree of knowledge.

The bountiful parent of univerſal nature permitted Adam and Eve to eat of every fruit in the garden, except that of the tree of knowledge, which they were prohibited from taſting, upon pain of death. Hitherto a perfect harmony had ſubſiſted among all the creatures; and the ſerpent appeared to be particularly familiar with Adam and Eve; but, being envious of the happineſs they enjoyed, while they continued in their obedience to the commands of God; and knowing the miſery they would bring upon themſelves by a diſregard of the divine injunction, tempted the woman to taſte of the fruit; by repreſenting to her, that, upon eating of it, ſhe would be endued with a miraculous power of diſtinguiſhing between good and evil, would attain to an equal portion of happineſs with her Creator; and by taſting the fruit, both herſelf and her huſband would immediately become more exalted and godlike beings. Thus was the woman prevailed upon to violate the command of God; and the flavour of the fruit proved ſo grateful to her, that ſhe ſolicited her huſband alſo to eat of it, who immediately yielded to her perſuaſion§. The virtue of the fruit beginning now to operate upon them, they perceived that they were naked*, and made themſelves coverings of fig-leaves, woven together, to conceal their ſhame; no doubt conſidering this diſcovery of their wants, the certain effect of diſobedience, as an increaſe of their happineſs.

Some time afterwards, Adam, perceiving the Almighty walking in the garden, was ſtruck with a conſciouſneſs of his guilt, and attempted, for the firſt time, to conceal himſelf. But God, ordering him to draw near, demanded, why he, who had hitherto ſo eagerly ſought all opportunities of preſenting himſelf before his Creator, ſhould now avoid him? Adam was incapable of replying; and the Almighty thus proceeded: "I had made every neceſſary proviſion for the eaſe and happineſs of your life, nor had I left you even a ſingle wiſh to be gratified; neither could your enjoyments have been interrupted by the infirmities of old age; but as you have dared to break through the reſtrictions I had laid on you, and are unable, through guilt, to offer any plea in defence of your conduct, I will ſhorten the number of your days."

Trial and conviction of the offenders.

Their defence.

Adam endeavoured to extenuate his offence in the beſt manner he could, and, after uſing ſome arguments to palliate his crime, caſt the whole blame upon his wife; but inſtantly became confounded, mute, and motionleſs.

The woman, on her part, ſought to exculpate herſelf, by alledging that the ſerpent had ſeduced her from the obedience which ſhe owed to the divine command. God, therefore, to puniſh Adam for liſtening to the inſinuations of his wife, pronounced a curſe on the ground; declaring that, in future, it ſhould produce nothing but what ſhould be extorted from it by labour and the ſweat of man's brow; neither ſhould its produce be always anſwerable to his expectation and aſſiduity. The ſentence denounced againſt Eve, in conſequence of her complying with the ſuggeſtions of the ſerpent, and afterwards drawing Adam into the ſame ſnare, was, "in ſorrow to bring forth children;" and, as the juſt puniſhment of the malice and wiles of the ſerpent, God deprived him of the gift of ſpeech, put poiſon under his tongue, condemned him to the loſs of his feet, and to crawl upon his belly in future; he alſo branded him as the avowed enemy of mankind; further predicting, that Eve ſhould tread upon his head, that being the ſource of all our miſeries, and the part in which he is moſt ſuſceptible of a mortal wound. Immediately after the denunciation, of theſe penalties, the Almighty diſmiſſed our firſt parents from the garden of Eden, as no longer worthy to inhabit that region of pure and uncorrupted bliſs, and appointed angels to prevent their return thither any more for ever.

Birth of Cain and Abel.

EVE bore two ſons, which were her firſt children: the eldeſt was named Cain, which means Poſſeſſion or Acquiſition; and the ſecond was called Abel, ſignifying Affliction, or Sorrow. The tempers and diſpoſitions of theſe brothers were as different as their occupations. Abel, whoſe profeſſion was that of a ſhepherd, led a virtuous and godly life: whereas Cain, who was a huſbandman, and the firſt inventor of tillage, abandoned himſelf to all kinds of wickedneſs. He was influenced by avaricious and intereſted motives alone; and proceeded ſo far in his wickedneſs as, on the following account, to put his own brother to death, and thereby became the perpetrator of the firſt murder. They had mutually agreed to offer a ſacrifice to God: Cain's oblation conſiſted of the fruits of the earth; but Abel offered up the milk and firſtlings of his flock. The latter ſacrifice was ſolely the production of nature, and gave the moſt ſatisfaction to the Almighty; whereas the other appeared to be rather an offering extorted by avarice, induſtry, and force, than a teſtimony of the good-will of the ſacrificer. The preference thus manifeſted for Abel, gave ſuch high offence to his brother, that he privately ſlew him, and concealed his body†. When God, who knew what had paſſed, inquired of Cain, where his brother was, he betrayed great confuſion, and replied, with much he-

to the clamours of affection than to the ſtill ſmall voice of reaſon, received it from her, chooſing rather to die with her than to live without her.

* Their eyes were opened, but alas! only to behold their folly and impiety: as they now perceived their nakedneſs, and the wretched degradation of their nature. By the expreſſion, they knew that they were naked, ſome interpreters underſtand their being ſtripped of that robe of glory with which God had adorned their bodies, as a badge of their innocence and immortality. But the term nakedneſs is often uſed in Scripture to ſignify the turpitude of vice; and this ſeems the true import of it here; for after Adam had made himſelf an apron to cover his body, he told his Maker that he was naked; that is, he was convinced that he was diveſted of his purity and innocence, the true ornament of his nature.

† St. John gives a much better reaſon for the murder of Abel by his brother Cain: "Becauſe his own works were evil and his brother's righteous." St. John iii. 12. Beſides, Cain did not look to the great Antitype, which Abel, by faith, did; ſee Heb. xi. 4.

ſitation, that he had not ſeen him for ſome time paſt, and was much ſurpriſed at the circumſtance. Being queſtioned more cloſely, he anſwered, with great inſolence, that he was "not his brother's keeper, nor was he of his council." God now charged him home with the murder of his brother, and he was compelled to acknowledge the fact. Upon his ſubmiſſion, however, God was pleaſed to remit the puniſhment of "blood for blood;" but pronounced a curſe on him and his deſcendents, to the ſeventh generation, and baniſhed him, together with his wife, to a diſtant part of the earth. This ſentence filled him with terror, leſt, in wandering through the world, in ſearch of a ſettlement, any accident ſhould befal him; but, to preſerve him from every danger to which he might chance to be expoſed, either from man or beaſt, God ſet a diſtinguiſhing mark on him, as a token of protection, and then diſmiſſed him from his preſence, to wander about the earth.

His puniſhment.

Cain accordingly departed with his wife; and, after travelling through various countries, they fixed their reſidence at Nais (by ſome called Naid, and by others Nod), and here they had many children; but, inſtead of being reformed and benefited by his afflictions, and the chaſtiſement of his Creator, he became more diſſolute than before, abandoning himſelf, without reſerve, to every ſpecies of luſt and violence. He enriched himſelf by continual depredations on the property of others, and, ſelecting for his aſſociates the moſt profligate of the human ſpecies, ſhewed himſelf capable of giving pernicious inſtructions and examples even to theſe adepts in villainy. By the introduction of weights and meaſures, he deſtroyed the honeſt ſimplicity and plain dealing of former times, and ſubſtituted policy, craft, and fraud, in the place of the ancient candour and generoſity. It was he who, influenced by ambition and avarice, firſt violated the general rights of mankind, by dividing and incloſing the land in ſeparate portions. And he alſo founded the firſt city, which having ſurrounded with walls, and fortified by a rampart, he called Enos, or Enoch, after the name of his eldeſt ſon, obliging his family and dependents to dwell therein.

Wickedneſs of Cain.

Enoch, the firſt city.

Theſe were the deſcendents of Cain: Enos begat Jared: Jared begat Mahalaleel; Mahalaleel begat Methuſelah; and Methuſelah begat Lamech, whoſe two wives, Zillah and Adah, bore him ſeventy-ſeven children. By the latter of theſe wives he had Jabal, who was the firſt man that dwelt in tents, and employed himſelf in the occupations of a paſtoral life. Another of his ſons, by the ſame wife, was named Jubal; a great proficient in the ſcience of muſic, and to whom we are indebted for the invention of the pſaltery and the harp.

Cain's progeny.

Jubal invents muſic.

His wife Zillah bore him Tubal-cain, a renowned warrior, and who firſt diſcovered the art of working in braſs and iron: he had a daughter, whoſe name was Naamah.

Lamech, who had always ſtrictly obſerved the progreſs of divine juſtice, conſcious that his own family was involved in that dreadful judgment, which had been denounced againſt the whole race of Cain, on account of the murder of Abel, made his wives acquainted with the particulars of that event. During the life of Adam the accurſed race of Cain increaſed daily in atrocious wickedneſs; not only imitating, but even ſurpaſſing the moſt peſtiferous examples of former times. War and rapine were their chief delight; and, if any of them chanced to be free from the guilt of homicide, they were equally addicted to avarice, pride, and other vices and outrages.

Adam, who had now attained his two hundred and thirtieth year, applied himſelf very aſſiduouſly to people the earth. He ſurvived this period ſeven hundred years, and left ſeveral children, one of whom was named Seth. It would take up too much time, and would anſwer no purpoſe, to particularize the offspring of Adam*; and I ſhall, therefore, confine myſelf to the mention of Seth alone. He was educated by his father with great care; and no ſooner became capable of diſtinguiſhing between good and evil, than he applied himſelf wholly to the practice of virtue. He became eminent for his qualifications; and his children cloſely copied the example of their excellent father. They lived in the utmoſt harmony and happineſs, both amongſt themſelves, and with the reſt of mankind. They contemplated the power of the Divine Being, as manifeſted in his various operations, and were the firſt perſons who ſtudied the motions and influences of the heavenly bodies. Having been forewarned by Adam of an univerſal deluge and conflagration, they erected two pillars, one of brick, and the other of ſtone, which they were of opinion would, one or the other of them, be proof againſt every attack either of fire or water. They engraved upon theſe pillars their diſcoveries and inventions, leſt, in a ſeries of ages, the knowledge of the ſcience itſelf ſhould become extinct. Their precaution was not vain; for, to this day, namely, of Joſephus, the ſtone pillar is to be ſeen in Syria†.

MANKIND lived for ſeven generations according to the principles of virtue, and in the love and fear of the Almighty; but they afterwards diſregarded the duties of religion and moral rectitude, and ſo far degenerated from the manners of their predeceſſors, as to ſtudy to excel in vice with double the avidity that they had before ſhewn to emulate each other in the practice of virtue. The abominable impiety which now prevailed, called down the wrath of heaven upon the human race; and the virtuous and pious part of the men (called by Moſes the ſons of God) intermarrying with profane women, a perverſe and diſobedient generation was produced; who, being confident of their ſtrength, and hardened by their crimes, may with ſome propriety be compared to the giants in the Greek fables, who are repreſented to have confounded and deſtroyed right and juſtice by an undue exertion of ſuperior ſtrength and power, and to have rendered themſelves odious by their repeated enormities.

Degeneracy of mankind.

Noah, who retained his integrity, was ſhocked to behold the general depravity, and laboured to effect a reformation by perſuaſion, argument, and by exerting his authority; but finding, at length, that his endeavours to reclaim this incorrigibly obſtinate race would not prevail, and apprehending violence and barbarity in return for his good-will, more eſpecially as they ſeemed devoted to the moſt impious courſes, he removed with his family and all his people, from this land of wickedneſs, and the exceſſes of its abandoned inhabitants. The virtue and integrity of this holy man gained him the favour of God; but the general corruption of the age had increaſed to ſuch a ſhocking pitch of extravagance, that the Lord determined to extirpate the preſent race of mankind, and in their ſtead to ſupply a more virtuous generation, limiting the term of their lives to one hundred and twenty years.

Duration of human life limited.

Lineage of Noah.

Noah was deſcended in a right line from Adam, and was the tenth in ſucceſſion, being the ſon of Lamech, Lamech of Methuſelah, Methuſelah of Enoch, Enoch of Jared, Jared of Mahalaleel (who had ſeveral brothers) Mahalaleel of Cain, Cain of Enos, Enos of Seth, Seth being the ſon of Adam. God ſignified to Noah his intention to deſtroy the world by a flood, and commanded him to form an ark of three hundred cubits in length, fifty in breadth, and thirty in height; and that this ark ſhould contain four ſtories, and be conſtructed ſufficiently firm and compact to reſiſt the wind, and alſo the attack of the moſt violent ſurge, or boiſterous ſtorm. In obedience to the command of the Almighty, Noah, having conſtructed the ark, entered it with his wife and ſons and their wives, taking with him male and female, in pairs, of every creature living; and ſeven couples of ſome kinds, for the preſervation of the ſeveral ſpecies, having previouſly ſupplied the ark with proper food, and every thing neceſſary for their accommodation. Noah having duly complied with the injunctions given him, the Almighty cauſed an univerſal deluge to overſpread the earth, which ſwallowed up and deſtroyed all living creatures, except thoſe appointed to be preſerved in the ark.

Noah's ark.

It was in the ſecond month when the deluge happened, which month the Macedonians called Dius, and the Hebrews Marſaune, according to the Egyptian manner of dividing the year. Niſan, which ſignifies Xanthicus, is called the firſt month by Moſes, on account of its being the month in which he brought the Iſraelites out of Egypt; and this computation he invariably obſerves in matters which relate to the divine worſhip: but in regard to fairs, trade, and other civil matters, he admits the calculation of time as it was delivered to him by tradition. At the time of the general inundation, Noah was aged ſix hundred years: according to Moſes, the firſt rain towards drowning the world, fell on the twenty-ſeventh day of the before-mentioned month, in the year of the world 2256*; and this correſponds with the holy ſcriptures, wherein the moſt particular accounts are given of the births and deceaſe of the moſt remarkable men of the early ages of the world.

Time of the flood.

Adam was two hundred and thirty years old when he begat Seth, and at the age of nine hundred and thirty he died. Our great progenitor, after living 930 years, reſigned his breath into the hands of his Creator, having ſeen his iſſue in the ninth generation. Beſides the griefs he bore for his own perſonal tranſgreſſion, he had the mortification to ſee an early rupture in his family, which ended in unnatural murder: he was witneſs to that univerſal corruption which provoked the Almighty to deſtroy mankind by a deluge. Seth begat Enoch at one hundred and five, and he died at nine hundred and five; leaving a ſon named Cainan, who lived to the age of nine hundred and ten years. Cainan was ſucceeded by a ſon, whom he begat at one hundred and ſeventy years old, named Mahalaleel, who died at eight hundred and ninety-five, leaving his ſon Jared to ſucceed him, whom he begat at one hundred and ſixty-two, and who died at nine hundred and ſixty-nine. When he was one hundred and ſixty-two, his ſon Enoch was born, and having attained his three hundred and ſixty-fifth year,

Age and Death of Adam.

Seth's deſcendents.

* At the time of the flood, the year commenced about the autumnal equinox.

"he

" he went to God, and was no more ſeen†." In the hundred and ſixty-fifth year of Enoch's age, he had a ſon born, called Methuſelah; and at one hundred and eighty-ſeven, he had another ſon, named Lamech, in whoſe favour he reſigned the government which he had poſſeſſed for the ſpace of nine hundred and ſixty-nine years. When Lamech had held his commiſſion ſeven hundred and ſeven years, he transferred it to his ſon Noah, who was born when his father was one hundred and eighty-two years old, and Noah continued in the adminiſtration nine hundred and fifty years. Admitting Noah's age to have been ſix hundred years at the time of the flood, and adding the ages of the ſeveral perſons above-mentioned, the amount will appear to correſpond exactly with the number of years above ſpecified, as the period when the deluge took place. But it is our buſineſs more particularly to conſider the birth, than the death of theſe men, who lived till they had propagated many generations.

Beginning of the general deluge.

The appointed time being arrived, God commanded the waters to pour from the clouds, and for the ſpace of forty days a very violent and inceſſant rain fell upon the earth, the moſt elevated parts of which were covered to the depth of fifteen cubits. At the end of the forty days the waters began to decreaſe, and in about one hundred and fifty days more, on the twenty-ſeventh of the ſeventh month, the ark ceaſed to float, being left aground upon a mountain in Armenia. When Noah diſcovered this circumſtance, he looked from a window, and perceiving that the water had ſunk beneath ſome parts of the earth, he congratulated himſelf in the pleaſing reflection, that the moſt melancholy part of the dreadful ſcene was paſt.

Raven and dove ſent out.

The water continuing gradually to decreaſe, Noah turned out a raven, which returned to the ark; whence he concluded that he could not ſafely venture abroad, and therefore deferred taking any meaſures towards a diſcovery for ſeven days longer, when he ſent out a dove, which ſoon afterwards came back, her feathers being diſcoloured with ſlime and dirt, bringing an olive branch in her mouth; and this he conſidered as a certain token that the flood had nearly ſubſided, and that no further danger was to be apprehended. In ſeven days after this, Noah turned all the creatures abroad, and then going forth himſelf, with his family, his firſt buſineſs was to offer ſacrifice to his Creator, after which he joined in rejoicing with his ſeveral relations. The ſpot on which the ark was left was called, by the Armenians, Apobaterion, or the place of a deſcent*.

Noah quits the ark, and offers ſacrifice to God.

Teſtimonies of heathen writers concerning the ark.

The authors of pagan hiſtory have ſeverally ſpoken of the deluge and the ark; and Beroſus, the Chaldæan, writes hereupon to the following purpoſe: " They ſay that there are ſome remains of this veſſel ſtill to be ſeen on the mountains of the Cordyæanes in Armenia, and that the inhabitants of the adjacent country ſcrape the pitch from the planks, prizing it as a rarity, and carrying it about them as an amulet, or charm againſt the accidents of life." Hieronymus, the Egyptian, ſpeaks of this matter in his Phœnician Antiquities, and it is alſo taken notice of by many other writers. Nicholaus of Damaſcus, writes to the following effect in his hiſtory: " In the province of Minyas, in Armenia, there is an high mountain, called Baris, whither, as tradition relates, great numbers of people fled for refuge at the time of the general deluge. There is alſo a tradition, that a veſſel, with a man in it, ſtuck upon the above mountain, and that part of the timber remained there a long time. Probably this is the man whom Moſes has mentioned."

Under the perſuaſion that God had pronounced a ſentence of deſtruction againſt the human race, Noah was dreadfully apprehenſive that the judgment would be repeated, and even that an inundation of the univerſe would take place annually; he therefore offered ſacrifices, and humbled himſelf in prayer, before the Lord, beſeeching the Almighty, " to continue the world in its original order; to chaſtiſe the wicked, and ſhew favour to the unoffending, and not to act in wrath againſt the whole race for the vices of ſome individuals, whereby thoſe who had ſurvived the devaſtation, would be involved in greater miſery than thoſe who had met their fate in the waters which had overwhelmed the world; and would beſides labour under the diſtreſſing idea of having been preſerved from one calamity to become ſharers in another diſmal event, ſimilar to that of which they had already been melancholy witneſſes." He fervently ſupplicated the Creator " to hear his prayers, receive his ſacrifice, and, removing his indignation from mankind, permit them again to cultivate and enjoy the fruits of the earth, and to reſtore to them thoſe bleſſings and comforts of life, which they had experienced before the flood." He moreover prayed for long life to himſelf and his deſcendents, and that ſuch children as ſhould be born to him in future, might not periſh, till they had numbered the days of their forefathers.

The righteouſneſs and piety of Noah was ſo acceptable to God, that his petition was not wholly rejected: the Almighty ſaid to him, that "he was not himſelf the author of the judgment, but that the atrocious and complicated vices of mankind had called down the vengeance of heaven; that he gave not life with an intention of taking it away again, for that it would have been better not to have created man, than to have given him exiſtence under that condition: "but (ſaid God) though my wrath has been provoked by the violation of the reverence due to me, I will prove to you that I am neither inexorable or too ſevere: your mediation has, in ſome degree, prevailed upon me not to inflict ſo heavy a puniſhment again upon future ſinners; therefore be not alarmed at the contention of the elements, for however ſtorms and tempeſts may prevail, be aſſured that the world will be in no danger of a ſecond inundation. I ſtrictly enjoin you, however, not to ſtain your hands with human blood, and to inflict the ſevereſt puniſhment upon the perpetrators of murder. Saving the human ſpecies, every creature, whether living upon the earth, ſwimming in the waters, or flying in the air, are now left to your diſpoſal, and under your command, excepting only the blood, wherein the life of the animal is placed: and as a token of my covenant, that the arrows of my wrath ſhall not ſtrike mankind again in the ſame terrible manner, and that the world ſhall be no more deſtroyed by water, I will fix my bow in the ſkies." The rainbow was conſidered as the emblem and token of the bow of the Creator*.

† This is beautifully expreſſed by St. Paul, who, ſpeaking of the happy tranſlation of Enoch, ſays, " Enoch was tranſlated that he ſhould not ſee death; and was not found, becauſe God had tranſlated him: for before his tranſlation he had this teſtimony, that he pleaſed God." Heb. xi. 5.

* This is the proper meaning of the Armenian name of this city. This place of deſcent is a laſting monument of Noah's preſervation; and in this place a city was built, that it might not be forgotten in future ages.

For three hundred and fifty years after the flood, Noah lived in the full enjoyment of eaſe and ſecurity, ſo that the whole of his life was compriſed in the ſpace of nine hundred and fifty years. To compare the time allotted to the exiſtence of the antediluvians, with the contracted limits to which the days of the preſ[illegible]generation are confined, will afford no reaſo[illegible]e arguments againſt the authenticity of the traditions before us; for it does not follow, becauſe the lives of the preſent inhabitants of the earth are confined to a ſhort period, that our forefathers muſt have been under the ſame predicament. In the early ages, man lived in the obſervance of duty and reverence to Almighty God, who was pleaſed to allow him a great length of days, to which the ſimplicity in their manner of living may be ſuppoſed to have conduced in a great meaſure. Providence alſo found it neceſſary, for the promotion of virtue, and for cultivating the ſtudy and improvement of aſtronomy and geometry, to give a long date to the life of man; for (agreeable to the computation of the great year) no leſs a ſpace of time than ſix hundred years was required for making accurate experiments in thoſe ſciences.

* There is no doubt but the rainbow appeared in the clouds long before the flood, as it ariſes from natural cauſes; and what is here meant by fixing a bow in the clouds, is the appointing it to anſwer a particular purpoſe. It was now pointed out to all future generations as a monument of God's covenant with Noah, and his engagement that the world ſhould no more undergo an univerſal deluge.

CHAP. IV.

Shem, Japhet, and Ham, the three Sons of Noah, ſettle in Sennaar. Tranſactions of Nimrod, Grandſon to Noah. Deſign of the Tower of Babel fruſtrated by the Confuſion of Tongues.

SHEM, Japhet, and Ham, the three ſons of Noah, were born about an hundred years previous to the general deluge; and they were the firſt who ventured to reſide in the plains; the dread of a ſecond flood having induced men hitherto to confine their abode to the mountains. They called the place, in which they firſt eſtabliſhed themſelves, Shinar. But, in order the more effectually to people the earth, to maintain peace and harmony among mankind, and that each man might have a more free and undiſturbed poſſeſſion of his property, and enjoy the fruits of the earth in greater plenty, God was pleaſed to command them to ſeparate themſelves, and to ſettle in different parts. But ſuch was the ignorance and obſtinacy of theſe people, that they totally diſregarded the divine injunction, and remained in the ſame place where they at firſt planted themſelves, till God made them ſenſible of their fault in the puniſhment which he inflicted on them. In a courſe of time they became numerous and powerful, and the Almighty once more admoniſhed them to diſperſe; but they nevertheleſs perſiſted in their contumacy, not only forgetting from whom they derived all the bleſſings they enjoyed, but arrogating to themſelves the credit of their ſucceſſes; and, what was ſtill worſe, impiouſly conſtruing the advice which had been given them, to ſeparate themſelves, into a latent deſign, firſt to divide and weaken their force, and then to reduce them to a ſtate of ignominious ſubjection, for the more eaſily exterminating them in a diſunited than in a conjunctive ſituation.

The settlement of Noah's ſons.

The perſon who chiefly inſtigated the people to this audacious contempt of the command of God, was Nimrod, the nephew of Ham, one of the ſons of Noah; a very brave man, but ſo extravagantly vain, that he would frequently boaſt that he owed his preſent dignity to his own courage and conduct alone, independent of any providential bleſſing from the Almighty. Thus he endeavoured to obtain an unlimited power over the people; being fully perſuaded that they might eaſily be induced to apoſtatize from their duty to God, if they ſhould previouſly confer on him the chief command. And leſt their dread of a ſecond deluge ſhould deter them from entering into his views, he informed them, that he had discovered an expedient to prevent any danger of a similar accident in future. This expedient was, to erect a tower of such a height, that the waters might not be able to reach the top of it: and this project he was further induced to try, from motives of revenge for the loss of those who perished in the general inundation.

The tower of Babel.

This haughty boast of Nimrod flattered the vanity of the multitude to that degree, that they began to consider a continuance in their duty to God as derogatory to their newly assumed consequence. They, therefore, applied themselves to the work with the utmost alacrity. Immense as the undertaking was, yet, from the prodigious number of hands employed therein, the work was carried on with an expedition scarcely to be conceived. The circumference of the edifice, from the vast thickness of the walls, appeared, to a person near at hand, to take off considerably from the height of it. It was constructed with burnt brick, and cemented with a substance resembling pitch, that might resist the waters. The extreme folly of these people was highly deserving of punishment; particularly when we consider the example they had before their eyes of the late destruction of their ancestors, in one universal deluge. But God chose rather to confound the language of mankind, as a punishment for their transgressions, than to extinguish the whole race a second time. The spot on which this tower was erected, is, to this day, styled Babylon; the word Babel, in the Hebrew language, signifies *confusion.

The Sibyl's account of it.

The Sibyl mentions the erection of this tower, and the consequent confusion of tongues, in the following terms: "When all mankind spake the same language, the people assembled, and raised a tower of such an amazing height, that they seemed to have formed the design of scaling heaven from the top thereof. But the gods letting loose the winds thereon, threw it to the ground; and, as a further mark of their displeasure, inflicted on the builders an utter oblivion of their native tongue; substituting in the stead thereof a new, and unknown language, wherein no one of them could understand another." With respect to Sennaar, Hestiæus makes this observation: "The priests of Jupiter the conqueror, who survived the general destruction, having preserved the holy vessels and ornaments, repaired with them to Babylon."

Dispersion of the nations.

In consequence of this confusion of languages, mankind were obliged to disperse themselves throughout the earth, some fixing their residence on the sea-coasts, others in parts more inland: all according to the lot which God, in his wisdom and goodness, had been pleased to assign them. Men acquired, in process of time, some knowledge of the science of Navigation, so much, at least, as enabled them to construct boats, and to transport themselves to places separated from the continent, by which means every place was stocked with inhabitants, who gave titles to the places in which they settled, many of which still retain the names of their founders: but some have lost their original appellations, while those of others are disguised, under Greek derivations, to render them more familiar and intelligible to the neighbouring people. In succeeding ages, when the Greeks became possessed of those countries, they claimed to themselves the credit of being the first founders and possessors thereof; imposing upon them, at their pleasure, not only names, but new laws, customs, and manners.

* It is asserted by Moses Choronensis, a famous historian of Armenia, that the tower of Babel was overthrown by a terrible storm, and the language of the builders was confounded in a miraculous manner by that same Divine Being, against whose providence Nimrod exalted himself.

CHAP. V.

The Names of Nations derived from their respective founders. List of the Descendents of Noah, ending with Jacob, and of the places inhabited by them.

THE children of the sons of Noah, in order to perpetuate their memory, gave their own names to whatever places they either founded, or acquired the possession of. Thus Japhet, the son of Noah, had seven sons, who settled in that part of Asia which extends from the mountains Taurus and Amanus to the river Tanais in Europe, and Gades. Gomer was the founder of the Gomerites, styled at this time, by the Greeks, Galatians, or Gauls. The Magogians, called by the Greeks Scythians, derive their origin from Magog. From Madæus came the Madæans, or Medes; and from Javan the Ionians, and the whole race of the Greeks. Thobel founded the nation of the Thobelians, now termed Iberians, or Spaniards. The Meschinians, or Cappadocians, as they were afterwards styled, were founded by Meshes; yet there is some reason to think that they originally inhabited the town of Mazaca, from the resemblance of the ancient name, by which they were distinguished, to that of the town in question. Thires was the founder of the Thiræans, styled afterwards by the Greeks, Thracians. These are the nations of which the seven sons of Japhet were the founders, and to which they gave their names.

Europe peopled by the posterity of Japhet.

Gomer had three sons; Aschanaxes, Riphates, and Thygrammes. From the first came the Aschanaxians, or Rheginians of the Greeks; the second was the founder of the Riphatæans, now styled Paphlagonians; and the Thygrammæans, whom the Greeks have named Phrygians, derive their origin from the last.

Gomer.

Javan also had three sons: Alisas, the founder of

Deſcendents of Javan.

the Aliſmans; now called Æolians; Tharſus, from whom came the Tharſians, ſince named Cilicians, as appears by the preference given to the city of Tarſus beyond all others, changing only the firſt letter Θ into a T. The third ſon of Javan was Cethimos, from whom the iſland, which we now call Cyprus, was originally named Cethyma. For this reaſon the Jews give the title of Cethim to iſlands and all places on the ſea coaſt; and in the iſland of Cyprus there is a town, which thoſe whom a fondneſs for ſound has blindly attached to the Greek tongue, ſtyle Citium; between which and Chethim there is ſome degree of reſemblance.

Progeny of Ham.

The poſterity of Ham fixed their reſidence in Syria, near the mountains of Amanus and Libanus, extending their poſſeſſions as far as the ſea coaſt; and they gave whatever names they thought proper to the various places under their government; but moſt of thoſe names are loſt to us at this day, through the corruptions and alterations which they have undergone. The Æthiopians, however, ſtill retain the name which they derive from Chus, one of the ſons of Ham, and are to this preſent time ſtyled Chuſians, throughout Aſia. The ſame has happened with reſpect to the Meſreans, alſo; the whole kingdom of Egypt ſtill preſerving the name of Meſrim, and the natives that of Meſreans. The Libyans were originally denominated Phutians, from Phutes, who governed in that country; and ſeveral Greek hiſtorians make mention of a river in Mauritania of this name, and of a country which is ſituated on its banks, named Phute; but the name of Libya is derived from Lybys, one of the ſons of Meſraim.

The kingdom of the Canaanites was founded by Canaan, the fourth ſon of Ham: the land which they inhabited now bears the name of Judæa. All the ſons of Ham had children; Chus, the eldeſt, had ſix ſons: Sabas, who founded the Sabæans; Evilus, the founder of the Evilæans, or Getulians, as they are at this day termed; Sabathes, from whom came the Sabathænians, or Aſtabanians of the Greeks; Ramus, who founded the Ramæans; and Nimrod, who remained with the Babylonians, uſurped the government, and rendered his authority abſolute.

Philiſtines.

The whole tract of land between Gaza and Egypt, was peopled by the eight ſons of Meſraim. Philiſtin, one of the eight, gave his name to the country which he peopled, or to that diviſion of it, at leaſt, which is called Paleſtine by the Greeks. Labin, alſo founded a colony, which he named Libya. Of the ſix remaining ſons of Meſraim, viz. Ludim, Ananim, Nedem, Phetroſim, Cheſlem, and Chepthorim, ſcarce any particulars have been tranſmitted to us, ſave their names; the cities and colonies founded by them, having been deſtroyed in the Æthiopic war †.

Canaanites.

Canaan was the father of eleven ſons. Of theſe, Sidon built a city in Phœnicia, to which the Greeks have given his name; Amath founded Amathe, a place ſtill exiſting, and called Amathine by the inhabitants: but the Macedonians, in compliment to one of their kings, changed the name of it to Epiphania; Aradæus poſſeſſed the iſland of Aradus; and Arucæus built the town of Arce, on mount Libanus. The ſcripture mentions nothing relative to the other ſeven, Euæus, Chetæus, Jebuſæus, Edæus, Siræus, Samaræus, and Gargaſæus, except their names; the Hebrews having utterly deſtroyed all their poſſeſſions, on the following account.

When the earth had in part recovered itſelf from the effects of the flood, Noah re-applied himſelf to the cultivation of the ground, the planting of vines, and gathering and preſſing the grapes when ripe; and thus he revived the uſe of wine. On a certain day, after having offered ſacrifice to God of the firſt-fruits of his vineyard, he drank to that exceſs of the liquor, that he became totally inſenſible, and lay upon the ground faſt aſleep; expoſing his nakedneſs, in the moſt ſhameleſs manner, to the view of every one paſſing by. His youngeſt ſon, having diſcovered him in this ſituation, brought his brothers to the ſpot, to deride their father; but they, being impreſſed with a due ſenſe of filial duty, concealed his ſhame, by throwing a covering over him. When Noah became ſenſible of what had paſſed, he bleſſed Shem and Japhet for their pious conduct, but vented a bitter imprecation on the poſterity of Ham; nor did the malediction fail of its effect; but it is to be obſerved, that Noah exempted Ham, in his own perſon, from his curſe, in conſideration of his near relationſhip.

Noah's intoxication.

Shem.

Shem, the eldeſt of Noah's children, had five ſons, who inhabited the whole tract of Aſia, extending from the Euphrates to the Indian ſea. From Elam were derived the Elamites, from whom came the Perſians. Aſſur was the founder of Nineveh, where the Aſſyrians, as a rich and powerful people, firſt ſettled. From Arphaxad the Arphaxadeans, or modern Chaldæans, derive their origin. Aram was the founder of the Aramæans, or Syrians of the Greeks; and from Lud came the Luddians, or Lydians.

Aram.

Aram had four ſons, of whom Uz founded Trachonitis and Damaſcus, ſituated between Paleſtine and Cælo-Syria; Hull peopled Armenia; Gether was the leader of the Bactrians; and Meſas of the Meſaneans, whoſe country is ſtyled, at this time, after the name of the camp of Spaſinus. Having now given an account of the progeny of Shem, we ſhall next advert to that of the Jews, or Hebrews.

† It appears from hence, that the Ethiopic war, here mentioned, was ſo dreadful in its conſequences, as to occaſion the removal or ſubjugation of ſix or ſeven nations of the poſterity of Meſraim, together with the cities they inhabited. We may reaſonably ſuppoſe that Joſephus would not have recorded this circumſtance, had he not been poſſeſſed of antient records to juſtify what he advanced; though thoſe records are now loſt, by ſome means or other, the particulars of which we are not informed of.

The Origin of the Hebrews.

The Jews derive the name of Hebrews from Heber*, the ſon of Salas, who was the ſon of Arphaxad. Heber had two ſons, Jucta and Phalec. The latter was born at that period when the diviſion of the land took place; Phalec ſignifying, in the Hebrew tongue, Partition. Jucta, the eldeſt ſon of Heber, had thirteen children, whoſe names were Elmodad, Saleph, Azermoth, Eiraes, Adoram, Uzal, Declas, Ebal, Abimael, Sabeus, Ophir, Euilath, and Jobab. Theſe inhabited all the extent of land lying between the river Cophene, in India, and the neighbouring part of Syria.

Phalec was the ſon of Heber, and Ragaus the ſon of Phalec. Ragaus begat Serug; Serug begat Nahor; and Nahor begat Thares, the father of Abram, the tenth generation from Noah. Abram was born two hundred and ninety-two years after the flood. Thares was ſeventy years old when he begat Abram; Nahor one hundred and twenty when he had Thares; Serug was about one hundred and thirty-two at the birth of Nahor; Ragaus had attained his one hundred and thirty-fourth year when Serug was born, and Phalec was much about the ſame age when he had Ragaus; Heber had reached his one hundred and thirty-fourth year, when he begat Phalec; Salas was one hundred and thirty at the birth of Heber; and Arphaxad was one hundred and thirty-five years old when he had Salas; and Arphaxad, who was the ſon of Shem, and the grandſon of Noah, was born in the ſecond year † after the deluge.

Genealogy of Abram.

Nahor and Haran were the two brothers of Abram; of whom the latter died at Ur, in Chaldæa; at which place a ſepulchral monument, erected to his memory, is yet to be ſeen. He left a ſon, named Lot, and two daughters, Sarah and Melcha: Nahor eſpouſed the latter, and Abram took Sarah.

Nahor and Haran.

Thares, the father of Abram, was ſo much affected by the loſs of his ſon Haran, that he quitted his reſidence in Chaldæa, and repaired, with his whole family, to Charran, in Meſopotamia, where he died, and was interred in the one hundred and fifth year of his age. The term of man's life was now abbreviated, and God was pleaſed, ſoon afterwards, to reduce it to the narrow compaſs of one hundred and twenty years, which was the exact age of Moſes.

Melcha, the wife of Nahor, bore him eight ſons, whoſe names were Uz, Baux, Camuel, Chazad, Azaus, Pheldas, Jadelphas, and Bethuel. Theſe were the only legitimate ſons of Nahor; but, by his concubine, Ruma, he had four others, named Tubæus, Gabam, Tavaus, and Machas. Bethuel had a ſon and a daughter, whoſe names were Laban and Rebecca.

* Joſephus here poſitively decides as to the name of the founder of the Jewiſh nation, or rather the perſon from whom they derived the title of Hebrews.

CHAP. VI.

Abram, the Founder of the Jewiſh Nation, having no legitimate Iſſue, adopts Lot, his Brother's Son; departs from Chaldæa, and ſettles in Canaan, where he inſtructs the People in the Nature and Attributes of the Supreme Being.

History of Abram.

AS Abram had no legitimate offſpring, he adopted Lot, his brother Haran's ſon, and the brother of his wife Sarah. He departed from Chaldæa, in the ſeventy-fifth year of his age, and, taking with him his family, and the whole of his effects, journeyed into the land of Canaan, according to the divine command, where he fixed his reſidence, and there died. He was equally famed for wiſdom and eloquence; and as he poſſeſſed, in an eminent degree, the abilities, ſo neither did he want the reſolution, to attack the unbridled licentiouſneſs of the times; and, by dint of authority, as well as argument, he was enabled to eradicate the falſe notions which men had fallen into reſpecting religion, and to reduce unbelievers to a proper ſenſe of their duty to God. Abram was the firſt perſon who ventured to enforce the doctrine, that all things in heaven and earth had been formed by one Almighty Creator, to whom alone we are indebted for all the enjoyments of this life. He maintained that theſe truths were apparent, from the marvellous regularity which is obſervable throughout all the works of creation; inſomuch that, did not an over-ruling providence interpoſe, to keep the wheel conſtantly in motion, the whole frame of the univerſe would inevitably fall into irreparable diſorder; and, conſequently, that our ſole dependence, in all matters either of profit or pleaſure, muſt reſt on the benevolence of the firſt Mover, to whom alone, without arrogating any merit to ourſelves, we are bound to render all honour and praiſe.

His endeavours to eſtabliſh this doctrine in Chaldæa and Meſopotamia, incenſed the people ſo highly againſt him, that he retired, by the command of God, from Chaldæa, and ſettled in Canaan, where he erected an altar, and ſacrificed thereon. There is a paſſage in Beroſus, in which the Patriarch Abram is mentioned, though not by name. "In the tenth generation," ſays he, "ſubſequent to the deluge, there dwelt in Chaldæa, a man renowned for his wiſdom and juſtice, and for his obſervations of the heavenly bodies." Hecatæus has been ſtill more explicit, in an hiſtorical treatiſe written expreſsly on the ſubject of his tranſactions. Mention is alſo made of him by Nicolaus of Damaſcus, in the fourth book of his hiſtory. "Abraham," ſays he, "held the ſupreme command in Damaſcus, though he was not a native of the place; and he came thither, with a numerous train, from a country named Chaldæa, which lies beyond Babylon. In a ſhort time, the people riſing in rebellion againſt him, he retired with his family, to Canaan, now called Judæa, where he fixed his reſidence, and had many children, of whom there will be occaſion to ſpeak farther in a ſubſequent part of the work." The name of Abram is ſtill held in great reverence at Damaſcus; and there is a village in the neighbourhood of that city, which, to this day, is called the dwelling place of Abram.

CHAP. VII.

On occaſion of a Famine, which ariſes in Canaan, Abram, accompanied by Sarai, departs into Egypt, where he remains for a Time, and then returns to Canaan.

Abram, preſſed by famine, retires to Egypt.

DURING this period a dreadful famine aroſe in Canaan; and Abram, having learnt that Egypt * enjoyed great plenty at the time, determined to go thither; being partly induced thereto by this report of the fruitful ſtate of the country, and partly by a deſire of converſing with the Egyptian prieſts on the ſubject of their religious tenets, which appeared to be founded on the invariable principles of nature and reaſon: he was likewiſe ardently deſirous to diſcover the truth, and well diſpoſed to coincide in whatever arguments might tend to elucidate and eſtabliſh it.

As Abram had been previouſly acquainted with the unbounded laſciviouſneſs of the Egyptians, he was apprehenſive of the conſequences of taking Sarai with him, who was very beautiful, and therefore propoſed to her that ſhe ſhould paſs for his ſiſter, with which, perceiving the neceſſity of the caſe, ſhe complied. Upon his arrival in Egypt, matters fell out juſt in the manner he had foreſeen; for the fame of Sarai's beauty being ſpread abroad, Pharaoh was inflamed with a violent deſire of ſeeing and poſſeſſing this miracle of a woman. But God was pleaſed to puniſh his lewd deſigns, by a plague and a revolt of his ſubjects, both which broke out at the ſame time. In this emergency Pharaoh applied to the prieſts, to know what ſin had involved him in the preſent calamity, and in what manner he might expiate his offence. When the prieſts had ſacrificed, they returned him anſwer, that his preſent misfortunes aroſe from the baſeneſs of his intentions againſt the wife of a ſtranger.

Pharaoh puniſhed on account of Sarai.

The king, being greatly alarmed at this reply, immediately requeſted Sarai to inform him of the circumſtances of the hiſtory of herſelf and Abram, without diſguiſe; and ſhe accordingly acknowledged the deception. Pharaoh, therefore, apologized to Abram for his conduct; declaring, that he had conſidered the woman as his ſiſter, and not as his wife, and had ſought an alliance with her, without the leaſt intention of offering her any perſonal injury or affront. He afterwards preſented Abram with a conſiderable ſum of money, and granted him a permiſſion to aſſociate himſelf with the moſt learned men reſiding in the land of Egypt; by which indulgence, his abilities and virtues became daily more conſpicuous, and, conſequently, more eſteemed. From this freedom of intercourſe, Abram was enabled to diſcover the ceaſeleſs differences which ſubſiſted among them, reſpecting rites, ceremonies, and tenets; their factions and animoſities; and their mutual contempt and hatred of one another. From this view of their conduct, he heſitated not to characterize them as a people acting in contradiction to themſelves, as well as to each other; and whoſe notions and opinions were deſtitute of every kind of foundation or truth. During his reſidence in this country, he became equally famed for the ſolidity of his judgment, and for the powers of his elocution. He alſo initiated them in the ſtudy of aſtronomy and arithmetic, with which ſciences the people of Egypt were totally unacquainted, till Abram tranſplanted them thither from Chaldæa, and from Egypt they paſſed into Greece.

Returns to Canaan, and divides the land with Lot.

When Abram returned to Canaan, having learnt that his ſhepherds and thoſe of Lot had diſagreed, relative to the boundaries of the lands of their reſpective maſters, he propoſed a diviſion of them. Abram permitted Lot to make choice of whatever part of them he beſt approved, contenting himſelf with the remainder, and fixed his abode in the city of Hebron, which had been founded ſeven years before that of Tanais, in Egypt. The ſpot which Lot choſe for his reſidence, was ſituated on the banks of the river Jordan, a ſmall diſtance only from Sodom, which was at that period a flouriſhing city; but was afterwards ſo utterly deſtroyed, in conſequence of the wickedneſs of the inhabitants, that there is not, at the preſent time, the leaſt trace of it to be perceived. The particulars of this extraordinary event ſhall be related in their proper place.

The Aſſyrians conquer the people of Sodom, and take Lot priſoner.

During the time in which the Aſſyrians held the whole empire of Aſia in ſubjection, Sodom and its dependencies were governed by five kings, viz. Ballas, Barſas, Senabar, Symobar, and the king of the Balinians; and each of theſe was inveſted with abſolute power in his own diſtrict. In thoſe days the Aſſyrians marched a numerous and well diſciplined army, divided into four bodies,

* The beſt hiſtorians repreſent this country as exceedingly fertile in grain, and, on that account capable of furniſhing other kingdoms with abundance of that uſeful article, and likewiſe with various other neceſſaries of life: it may be therefore preſumed, that agriculture was improved there by art; ſince no country can be a plentiful one, where this beneficial art is not promoted and encouraged.

againſt the people of Sodom, whom, after a ſevere and bloody conteſt, they utterly defeated; and from this time the kings of Sodom became tributaries to the Aſſyrians, and ſo continued for the ſpace of twelve years. In the thirteenth year, they refuſed to pay the tribute impoſed upon them; in conſequence of which, the Aſſyrians, under the command of Amraphel, Arioch, Chodollomor and Thabel, advanced againſt them a ſecond time; ravaged Syria, ſubdued the race of the giants, and, entering the land of Sodom, pitched their camp in the valley among the brimſtone-pits, many of which were then to be ſeen in that neighbourhood; but the valley, ſince the deſtruction of the city of Sodom, has been converted into a lake, called Aſphaltitis. A great ſlaughter of the Sodomites enſued, and numbers were taken priſoners; among the latter was Lot, who had come to the aſſiſtance of his countrymen, in repelling the invaſion of the Aſſyrians.

Abram defeats the Aſſyrians.

IMMEDIATELY upon intelligence being communicated to Abram, that the Sodomites had been defeated, and great numbers of his friends and neighbours killed and made priſoners, and that his nephew Lot was among the latter; he haſted in purſuit of the Aſſyrians, and on the fifth night of his journey he ſurprized them near Dan, which is one of the heads of the river Jordan, and finding them in a ſtate of the utmoſt confuſion, ſome being intoxicated, others aſleep, or unprovided with arms, and the whole incapable of making either a timely retreat or ſucceſsful reſiſtance, he availed himſelf of the general conſternation, and falling upon them in their quarters, put a great number to death by the ſword, and the next day purſued the reſt as far as Choba of Damaſcus. Abram had barely three hundred and eighteen of his own domeſtics, beſides three auxiliary friends, when he ſo effectually routed this numerous army: and this may ſerve to prove, that victory does not ſo much depend on the number, as on the reſolution and valour of the combatants. The ſew who eſcaped, retreated from the obſervation of the public, from a ſenſe of ſhame at their own daſtardly behaviour. Thus was liberty reſtored to Lot and the other priſoners, while Abram returned to his people with the tidings of victory and peace.

In his way home, Abram was met, at a place called the Valley Royal, by the king of Sodom, who congratulated him on his victory: and he was there received by Melchiſedech, king of Solyma, which is now called Jeruſalem. Melchiſedech ſignifies a righteous king, which appellation was worthily applied to this prince, who by the voice of the public had been elected to ſerve at the altar, in the character of a prieſt to the Moſt High God.

Melchiſedech entertains Abram.

Melchiſedech accommodated Abram and his followers with various refreſhments, and otherwiſe behaved towards them with ſingular benevolence: while they ſat at table, he greatly extolled Abram for his noble atchievements, and, with thankſgivings worthy his ſacred character, glorified the Almighty for the bleſſing of the victory. On the other hand, Abram preſented Melchiſedech * with one tenth part of the ſpoils he had obtained, which the king graciouſly accepted.

Abram's liberality.

Abram alſo offered a portion of the booty to the king of Sodom, but he excuſed himſelf from complying with the generous propoſal, ſaying, a return of his ſubjects, who had been made priſoners by the Aſſyrians, and afterwards reſcued by Abram, was all he could reaſonably expect, deſiring him to diſpoſe of every thing elſe as his judgment might direct. Abram, however, declared, that he would make no private advantage of the ſpoil, ſuch a portion of which he only required, as would be ſufficient to ſupply his ſoldiers and followers with proviſions, and afford a proper recompence to Enner, Mambres, and Eſhcol, the three friends who had ſupported him in, and ſhared the hazard of the battle.

Iſaac is promiſed.

The ſincerity and diſintereſted conduct of Abram were ſo much approved by the Lord, that he informed him they ſhould be properly rewarded. "Almighty God," ſaid the righteous Abram, "how will thy rewards avail me, ſince I have no heir to inherit the bounties you may beſtow?" Now the Lord aſſured him, that he ſhould have a ſon, and be bleſſed likewiſe with a poſterity as numerous as the ſtars of the heavens. Upon theſe words a ſacrifice was offered by Abram, agreeable to the direction of the Creator. This ſacrifice conſiſted of an heifer, a goat, and a ram, being each three years old, beſides a turtle dove and a pigeon; the birds remained intire, but the other animals were divided † in halves, according to the command of God. While preparations were making at the altar, for the performance of the ſacrifice, and the

Heb. vii. 1. and ſeq. Theſe tythes were applied to pious uſes, ſuch as the maintenance of religion, the relief of the poor, &c.

† The antient mode of forming alliances in marriage was, by ſeparating the devoted animals into two parts, and placing them upon two altars; after which, the contracting parties walked between the two altars, thereby ſignifying, that if either of them violated the covenant, he or ſhe ſhould, like the victims, be cut aſunder.

birds of prey were hovering about, in expectation of the blood of the creatures, a voice from heaven foretold, that the poſterity of Abram ſhould fall into bondage in Ægypt, and remain in ſubjection to their oppreſſive enemies for the ſpace of four hundred years; at the expiration of which period they ſhould ſpread themſelves over the whole country of the Canaanites, extending from Ægypt to Sodom, and ſubject the cities, and whole extent of territory, to their dominion.

At this time, Abram dwelt not far from Hebron, at a place called the Oak of Ogye, where he lamented the circumſtance of his wife's barrenneſs, and the conſequent failure of iſſue, but ſtill offering up daily ſupplications that a male child might be born to him. Theſe entreaties induced the Lord to repeat his promiſe, reſpecting a ſon, and the other bleſſings decreed to him on removing from Meſopotamia.

By the immediate direction of heaven, Sarai cauſed an Ægyptian ſervant in the family, named Hagar, to go to her huſband's bed, hoping that, by this expedient, he might have a male child by her, which ſhe intended to adopt as her own: this circumſtance occurred accordingly; whereupon Hagar, under the ſuppoſition that the child would ſurely ſucceed to the government, became extremely preſuming and arrogant to her miſtreſs. This ingratitude determined Abram to reſign her up to the management of his wife Sarai, whom he authorized to chaſtiſe her at diſcretion; which mortified Hagar to that degree, that ſhe quitted Abram's houſe, and ſet out in ſearch of ſome other ſettlement, earneſtly ſupplicating the protection of heaven in her miſerable condition. As ſhe paſſed through a deſert, ſhe was accoſted in her flight by an angel, who ordered her to return from whence ſhe came; telling her, that this affliction had befallen her in conſequence of her pride and ingratitude, and that upon a reformation of conduct, ſhe would experience kinder uſage for the future; enjoining her, moreover, in the ſtricteſt manner, not to neglect this admonition, but to return inſtantly; and aſſuring her, in caſe ſhe obeyed, that ſhe ſhould live to be the mother of a child, who, in proceſs of time, ſhould obtain the dominion of that country. She accordingly returned to her miſtreſs, and, having humbled herſelf, obtained her pardon, ſoon after which ſhe was delivered of a ſon, who was named Iſhmael, ſignifying, in Hebrew, prevailed upon; God having attended to, and granted the prayers of the mother.

Birth of Iſhmael.

Abram had attained his eighty-ſixth year when Iſhmael was born; and, at the age of ninety-nine, God appeared to him, and acquainted him, that his wife Sarai ſhould be delivered of a ſon, whom he ſhould name Iſaac; foretelling, alſo, that many powerful monarchs and nations ſhould derive their origin from him, and ſhould conquer the whole land of Canaan, extending from Sidon to Ægypt. God commanded, in order to make a diſtinction between the race of Abraham, and the people of other nations, with whom all cohabitation was ſtrictly prohibited, that all his poſterity ſhould be circumciſed on the eighth day after their birth. Abram having inquired of God the future condition of Iſhmael, received for anſwer, that he ſhould live to a great age, and ſhould be the founder of many mighty nations *; whereupon Abram returned thanks to the Almighty, and, in compliance with the divine injunction, was immediately circumciſed, together with Iſhmael, who was then in his thirteenth year, and the reſt of the males of his family.

Circumciſion inſtituted.

CHAP. IX.

The execrable Crimes of the Sodomites puniſhed by the Judgment of God in the Deſtruction of their City.

Wickedneſs of Sodom.

AT this time the people of Sodom became ſo extravagantly vain by the great wealth and plenty which they enjoyed, as totally to fail in reverence to God, and reſpect to their fellow-creatures. Inhoſpitality to ſtrangers, ingratitude towards thoſe who had beſtowed benefits upon them, and unnatural luſts towards each other, incenſed the Almighty againſt them to ſo high a degree, that he determined to puniſh their abominable crimes by laying waſte their whole country, and pronouncing that the parts inhabited by them ſhould no longer produce fruit or plants for the uſe and benefit of mankind.

Three angels viſit Abram under an oak.

The ſentence againſt the Sodomites being paſſed, while Abram was ſitting under an oak of Mambres near the entrance of his tent, he perceived three angels coming towards him, and from their appearance, he judged them to be travellers. He roſe to meet them, and, after the cuſtomary ſalutes, invited them to partake of the beſt refreſhment and entertainment his habitation would afford. His proffered civility was accepted, and directions were given for dreſſing a calf and baking a cake; which being made ready, were placed before the ſtrangers under the oak, and they gave thanks to their hoſt, and appeared to feed upon what had been provided for them. While the meat remained before them, they inquired of Abram reſpecting Sarai his wife, and were anſwered, that ſhe was in the tent. They now aroſe as preparing to depart, obſerving that they

* This gracious promiſe is thus expreſſed in Geneſis xvii. 6. "And I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make nations of thee, and kings ſhall come out of thee." The kings here alluded to are thoſe of the Jews, Iſhmaelites, Midianites, Saracens, Arabians, Babylonians, Egyptians, Africans, Spaniards, and laſtly, the great King of the Chriſtian world, in whom all the families of the earth, or great numbers out of them, were to be bleſſed.

ſhould in a ſhort time ſee Abraham again, and that in the interim his wife would become a mother. Sarah was now called in, and ſhe ſmiled at hearing it ſaid, that ſhe ſhould have a child, ſhe being ninety, and her huſband an hundred years of age. The angels now threw off their diſguiſe, confeſſed whom they were, and mentioned the commiſſions with which they were charged; ſaying, two of them were employed to execute the deſtruction of Sodom, and that the third was intruſted with the tidings that a ſon ſhould be born unto Abraham. The judgment pronounced againſt the people, occaſioned Abraham to offer up earneſt prayers to God, that he would be pleaſed to ſpare the innocent from becoming partakers of the puniſhment denounced againſt the guilty: and the Almighty ſaid, in reply, that if ten righteous men could be found amongſt the citizens, for the ſake of thoſe ten he would ſpare all the others*. Upon this declaration, Abraham declined offering any thing farther in behalf of the people.

Abraham intercedes for the Sodomites.

The two angels went to Sodom, and being obſerved by Lot, he invited them to take up their reſidence in his houſe. Lot was naturally benevolent towards ſtrangers, and equal to Abraham for piety and good-nature. Some abandoned ruffians obſerved the angels to go into Lot's houſe, and as they were of graceful appearance, they conceived a deſign of attempting ſome violence upon their perſons, and endeavoured to force into the houſe, in order to gratify their brutal appetites. Every argument that could be ſuggeſted in recommendation of continence and hoſpitality, was enforced by Lot, who even offered to give up his own daughters inſtead of the ſtrangers; but this propoſal they would not liſten to. Highly incenſed at their outrageous conduct, and the horrid complexion of their guilt, the Lord ſtruck them with inſtant and total blindneſs on the ſpot, ſo that they could not diſcover the way to enter Lot's houſe, and the ſentence of exemplary perdition was, at the ſame time, pronounced againſt the whole people, for their abominable wickedneſs.

Hoſpitality of Lot.

Lot, being forewarned, eſcaped the calamity by a timely retreat from the town, taking with him his wife, and two maiden daughters. The two perſons with whom theſe maidens were contracted to be joined in marriage, were intreated to accompany the family of Lot, but they ridiculed the threatened vengeance of heaven, and remained in the city. The wrath of God was now diſcharged againſt this impious race in a general conflagration, which conſumed the city and the whole number of its inhabitants, as well as thoſe of the ſurrounding country, laying the whole in a ſtate of irreparable devaſtation. The wife of Lot went out of the town with her huſband, but, either from a motive of tenderneſs or curioſity, ſhe violated the ſtrict command of God in looking behind her, and ſhe was in conſequence turned into a pillar of ſalt. I have ſeen the pillar, and can ſafely aſſert that it ſtill remains‡.

Lot's eſcape.

Deſtruction of Sodom, by fire from Heaven.

After this judgment, Lot and his daughters ſought refuge in the country called Zoar (which in the Hebrew language ſignifies ſmall), this being the only place which eſcaped the fury of the devouring flames; but while they remained here, their lives were rendered uneaſy and irkſome from a deficiency of proviſions, and the want of ſocial intercourſe. In their ſolitude, the daughters conſidered their ſmall family as the only ſurviving part of the human ſpecies, and therefore imagined themſelves, in ſo preſſing an exigency, to be juſtifiable in any means they ſhould adopt for the conſervation of the human race. On this conſideration, they went privately to bed to their father, when he was inſenſible of their being his children; and the conſequence was, that they both proved with child by him, and each bringing forth a ſon, that of the eldeſt was called Moab (which ſignifies, in Hebrew, of my father) and that of the younger, Ammon (or, of my race, or kin). One of theſe was the father of the Moabites, a powerful nation yet exiſting; as the other was of the Ammonites, both of which were inhabitants of Cælo-Syria. Thus have we given a full account of the manner of Lot's eſcape from the dreadful conflagration of Sodom, and of what afterwards came to paſs.

Lot retires to Zoar.

CHAP. X.

Particulars of the Tranſactions between Abraham and Abimelech. An Account of Iſhmael, the Son of Abraham; his Diſmiſſion, and Succour from an Angel. His Poſterity, called Arabians.

* There is hardly any inſtance in hiſtory of fervent and importunate ſupplication equal to this recorded of the Father of the Faithful, in the book of Geneſis. It affords a wonderful proof of the condeſcenſion of the Almighty, in hearkening to the petitions of his people; and is an encouragement for all men to pray, and not to faint.

‡ Clement of Rome, cotemporary with Joſephus, likewiſe reports, that he had ſeen this pillar; and Irenæus, in the next century, declares the ſame. I will not attempt a philoſophical demonſtration of this miraculous event, which has been, and continues to be, a ſubject of much profane wit and ridicule to thoſe who would be thought wiſe above that which is written. Though I will not attempt an explicit demonſtration of the fact, I will yet aſſert, that it is with in the line of probability, and may be proved from natural cauſes. Is it at all improbable that Lot's wife, by her lingering and looking back, might be overtaken by that nitro-ſulphureous ſhower which laid waſte the city of Sodom? and as the lake remains to this day, and is called Aſphaltitis, why might not her body be incruſted with the particles which compoſed the tempeſt, and ſhe be preſerved in that ſhape, as a monument of almighty vengeance to all ſucceeding generations, of the danger of neglecting God's commands? But, after all, could not the Almighty as eaſily effect this tranſformation, as ſtrike the Sodomites with blindneſs, or deſtroy their city with fire and brimſtone?

ABRAHAM withdrew to Gerar, in Paleſtine, accompanied by Sarah, who ſtill paſſed for his ſiſter, for he entertained the ſame apprehenſions of danger from Abimelech, who reigned over the country, as he had ſome time ſince had of Pharoah, king of Egypt. It afterwards happened, that Abimelech conceived a paſſion for her, and endeavoured to ſeduce her, but was prevented from purſuing his deſign, by a violent fit of ſickneſs, with which God was pleaſed to afflict him, as a puniſhment for his laſciviouſneſs. The diſorder roſe to that height, that his life was deſpaired of; and God warned him, in a dream, to offer no violence to Sarah, ſhe being the wife, and not the ſiſter, of the ſtranger. Hereupon he communicated to his friends all the circumſtances of his paſſion for Sarah, his dream, and every thing that had paſſed; declaring, that he conſidered his preſent ſickneſs as a juſt mark of God's diſpleaſure on this occaſion.

He therefore, by advice of his friends, ſent for Abraham, to whom he gave the moſt poſitive aſſurances, that the honour of his wife was ſtill unviolated; appealing to God and her own conſcience for the truth of his declaration; and moreover proteſting, that, had he imagined Sarah to have been his wife, he would not have offered her the leaſt inſult: and conjuring him to overlook what had paſſed, and to intercede with the Almighty in his behalf. He farther acquainted him, that ſhould he be inclined to continue in Paleſtine, he ſhould be amply provided for: or, if he rather choſe to depart, that he ſhould be furniſhed with guides, carriages, and every other convenience for his journey homewards.

Abraham, in ſome meaſure, juſtified his conduct in ſtyling Sarah his ſiſter, ſhe being the daughter of his brother, and, therefore, of the ſame blood with himſelf; alledging, moreover, that he looked upon this deception as neceſſary [illegible] is ſafety in his travels. He alſo obſerved, that he could not conſider himſelf as the cauſe of Abimelech's ſickneſs: and, finally, expreſſing a ſincere regard and affection for him, declared his willingneſs to continue in his dominions. The king, thereupon, generouſly preſented Abraham with a large tract of land, and a conſiderable ſum of money; and concluded a ſolemn league and covenant with him, which was ratified at the well of Berſabe, or the Well or Pit of ſwearing a Covenant, which name it continued to bear at the time of writing this account.

Birth of Iſaac. Sarah, ſoon afterwards, bore to Abraham a ſon, as the angel had foretold, and they named him Iſaac, which, in the Hebrew tongue, ſignifies Laughter; alluding to the circumſtance of Sarah's ſmiling, when the angel announced to her the purpoſe of God to grant her a ſon; ſhe judging it an improbability to bear a child at ſo advanced a period of life, herſelf being then ninety, and Abraham one hundred years old. The child was circumciſed on the eighth day, which is the time ſtill obſerved by the Jews for the celebration of that ceremony. But as Iſhmael, the ſon of Abraham by his concubine Hagar, was not circumciſed till the thirteenth year, the Arabians, who are deſcended from him, defer performing the rite till the child attains that age.

During the infancy of Iſhmael, Sarah manifeſted as much tenderneſs for him as if he had been her own child; and he was brought up and educated with all poſſible care, as the preſumptive heir of the family; but, after the birth of Iſaac, Sarah became apprehenſive of the conſequences of bringing up the two children together; as Iſhmael, who was ſo much older than his brother, might be tempted to deprive him of the inheritance, in caſe of the death of Abahram. She, therefore, uſed all her influence with Abraham, to prevail upon him to ſend away both the mother and the child to ſome diſtant country. Abraham at firſt rejected the propoſal with horror; but, at length, being warned of God to comply with what his wife required of him, he diſmiſſed Hagar and her ſon, who was ſtill of too tender an age to provide for himſelf, to ſeek a ſettlement elſewhere; giving them, at their departure, a portion of bread and water for their ſubſiſtence*. Hagar and Iſhmael baniſhed.

Their ſmall ſtock of proviſions was ſoon conſumed, and the child's ſtrength was ſo much exhauſted, that Hagar laid him down at the foot of a fir tree, and retired to a diſtance, in order to avoid the ſight of his laſt agonies. In this diſtreſſing emergency, ſhe was accoſted by an angel, who directed her to a neighbouring fountain, and ſtrictly enjoined her to pay the utmoſt attention to her charge, with whoſe ſafety and happineſs her own was connected in the higheſt degree. This animating declaration reviving her courage, ſhe purſued her journey, and, at length, fortunately met with a company of ſhepherds, from whom ſhe experienced great kindneſs in her neceſſity, and an ample ſupply of all her wants. Viſited by an angel.

When Iſhmael had attained to man's eſtate, he married a woman of Egypt, of which country his mother was alſo a native. This woman bore him twelve ſons, who inhabited the whole extent of country lying between the Euphrates and the Red Sea; and which is called Nabathæa. From theſe perſons are derived the different tribes of the Arabians, who are greatly celebrated in hiſtory for their valour, and the dignity of their deſcent from Abraham.

* The behaviour of Abraham towards his ſon Iſhmael has, by the contemners of revelation, been repreſented as cruel to the laſt degree; but it ſhould be conſidered, that as Sarah had obſerved Iſhmael inſulting her ſon Iſaac, ſhe was therefore deſirous that Iſhmael and his mother ſhould no longer continue in the family; there was, beſides, a particular deſign of Providence in cauſing this ſeparation to be made.

ABRAHAM's FAITH.

By Faith. Abraham offered up his only Son Isaac.

HEBREWS. XI. 17.

CHAP. XI.

God commands Abraham to offer up his beloved Son Iſaac. The exemplary Faith and Obedience of Abraham and Iſaac, with the Bleſſing conſequent thereon.

ISAAC was the only legitimate ſon of Abraham, born to him in an advanced period of his life, and, on both theſe accounts, particularly dear to him. But the tenderneſs of the parent was amply repaid and juſtified by the excellent qualities of the child. Abraham was now therefore no longer ſolicitous for life, or the enjoyments of this world, but was cheerfully diſpoſed to reſign his pretenſions to his heir, and his very being into the hands of God, from whom he derived it. The Almighty, however, was pleaſed to make a farther trial of his faith and obedience; and therefore, after recapitulating the various bleſſings which he had conferred upon him, commanded him, as a proof of his gratitude, to offer up his ſon Iſaac, upon a mountain of Moriah. Abraham, who had always paid the moſt explicit obedience to the will of God, did not heſitate one moment to promiſe an exact conformity to the preſent injunction *.

God requires Abraham to ſacrifice Iſaac.

Without communicating his intention, either to his wife, or to any of his family, leſt they ſhould oppoſe it, he departed from his own dwelling, with his ſon Iſaac and two ſervants, taking with him an aſs laden with articles for the ſacrifice. On the third day they arrived within ſight of the deſtined place; and Abraham, leaving his ſervants below in the valley, aſcended the mountain, accompanied only by Iſaac, who was now in the twenty-fifth year of his age. It was on this mountain that David afterwards erected a temple. Iſaac, obſerving that his father had made all the neceſſary preparations for a ſacrifice, yet perceiving no victim near at hand, he queſtioned him on the ſubject. Abraham anſwered, "That God, in whoſe power it was to relieve the wants of the neceſſitous, and to deprive the opulent of their ſtore, as he found it moſt conducive to the happineſs of thoſe who put their truſt in him, would, doubtleſs, provide a victim, in caſe he ſhould vouchſafe to accept of an oblation."

The wood being laid, and all things in readineſs, Abraham addreſſed Iſaac in theſe terms: "My beloved ſon, thou art the child of my prayers, and, from the time of thy birth, I have ſpared neither coſt nor pains in thy nurture and education. My utmoſt wiſh has been, that you might attain a maturity of manhood and reaſon, and that, whenever it ſhould pleaſe God to take me to himſelf, I might leave thee in poſſeſſion of my authority and dominions; but, ſince the Almighty, who firſt beſtowed thee on me, has thought proper to recall the gift, ſubmit thyſelf, I pray thee, my dear ſon, with a pious firmneſs, to the fate which awaits thee. It is to God that thou art to be offered up; to that God who now commands me to relinquiſh thee to him, in proof of my gratitude for the numerous bleſſings he hath ſhowered upon us, throughout the courſe of our lives. Death is the common portion of all mankind; and, certainly, thou canſt not fall more gloriouſly, than by the hand of thine own father, an oblation to the God and Father of the univerſe, who prefers rather to receive thy ſoul into endleſs bliſs, on the wing of prayer and ejaculation, than ſuffer thee to become the victim of diſeaſe, war, paſſion, or any other of the various caſualties to which mankind are hourly expoſed. Reflect maturely on what I have ſaid, and thou wilt perceive, that, in the heavenly ſtation to which thou art now ſummoned, thou may'ſt afford thy aged father unfailing ſupport, and that, in the room of thee, my ſon, I ſhall have God himſelf for my protector."

Abraham's pathetic addreſs to his ſon.

Iſaac manifeſted a firmneſs and reſignation, on the occaſion, worthy of his birth; declaring that, if he ſhould heſitate to ſurrender up his life, at the requiſition of God and his father, from whom he derived it, he ſhould be undeſerving of that exiſtence which he had hitherto enjoyed; nay, that he would readily have yielded it up, at the command even of his father alone.

Iſaac's meek ſubmiſſion.

He then advanced to the altar, and, uncovering his throat, waited in patient expectation of the event; but, at the very inſtant that Abraham raiſed his arm to ſtrike the blow, the Almighty called aloud to him from heaven, and prevented his deſign. God commanded him to ſtay his hand, and to ſpare the life of his ſon; declaring that it was not from any pleaſure that he took in human ſacrifices, nor from an intention of conſtituting a father the murderer of that very child which he himſelf beſtowed on him, that he had enjoined him to this action; but ſolely to try how far a ſenſe of his duty to the Almighty might operate upon him, in oppoſition to the dictates of affection and nature; that, finding his piety ſuperior to all temptations, he confirmed to him his ſeveral former promiſes, accepted of his intended ſacrifice, and engaged that his providence ſhould never forſake either him or his poſterity; that he would bleſs his ſon, Iſaac, with length of days, and a numerous and illuſtrious offſpring, who ſhould eſtabliſh their authority over many nations, and ſhould ſubdue the land of Canaan

Exemplary faith and obedience of Abraham.

* Some have objected, relative to this event, how Abraham could be ſatisfied that this command came from God, when it appears inconſiſtent with the very nature of the Divine Being, and ſubverſive of moral rectitude. But this objection will vaniſh, if we reflect that Abraham did really know that the command came from God, who, having given life, may take it away whenever he pleaſes, either by a natural diſeaſe, or any other inſtrument he thinks proper. Abraham alſo knew that God could again reſtore Iſaac in a more extraordinary manner.

by the ſword; rendering themſelves the envy and admiration of ſurrounding nations by the abundance of their wealth, and the fame of their glorious deeds.

Iſaac being ſpared, a ram is ſacrificed.

When God had finiſhed ſpeaking, a ram moſt unexpectedly appeared, at a ſmall diſtance from the ſpot, and ſeemed to preſent itſelf as a voluntary victim and ſubſtitute. The father and ſon, in a tranſport of ſurprize and rapture, now exchanged their mutual endearments; fervently praiſing God for his gracious promiſes and unbounded goodneſs: and thereupon offered up a ſacrifice on the ſpot. When they had performed this duty, they returned home, where they paſſed a life of eaſe and happineſs, with all the complacency of an applauding conſcience, and an approving God, who, according to his promiſe, proſpered them in all their undertakings.

Death of Sarah.

Soon after this event Sarah died, in the hundred and twenty-ſeventh year of her age, and was buried in Hebron. The Canaanites preſſed Abraham to accept of a ſepulchre for her interment; but he declined the offer, chuſing rather to purchaſe a field, belonging to an inhabitant of Hebron, named Ephraim, for which he paid four hundred ſhekels of ſilver, and applied it to the above-mentioned purpoſe; and ſeveral monuments, erected in honour of himſelf and his poſterity, remained there during many centuries.

CHAP. XII.

Progeny of Abraham, by his Wife Keturah. The Marriage of Iſaac and Rebecca.

SOME time after the death of Sarah, Abraham married a ſecond wife named Keturah, by whom he had ſix ſons. Theſe perſons ſettled in different parts, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the country of the Troglodytes, beyond Egypt, and that part of Arabia Felix bordering upon the Red Sea.

Iſaac being now about forty years of age, his father formed the deſign of marrying him to Rebecca, the daughter of Bethuel, who was the ſon of his brother Nahor. On this buſineſs he diſpatched one of his moſt truſty ſervants; firſt binding him, by an oath, to a faithful diſcharge of his commiſſion; which ceremony he performed, by putting his hand under his maſter's thigh, according to the form uſed in that country on ſimilar occaſions*. The meſſenger then departed, being inveſted with full powers to conclude the buſineſs in queſtion, furniſhed alſo with rare and coſtly preſents, and all neceſſaries for his journey. Meſopotamia, through which his route lay, is, on account of the badneſs of the roads in winter, and the great ſcarcity of water in the ſummer, a moſt inconvenient country for travellers. Having ſurmounted theſe difficulties, he arrived, at length, at Charran; upon entering the ſuburbs of which city, he met a number of virgins, who were going to the well for water.

Prayer of Eleazar, Abraham's ſervant, & his ſucceſs.

He, thereupon, offered up a prayer, requeſting that, if God approved of the propoſed alliance, he might meet with Rebecca in that company; and that he might be enabled to diſcover her, by the circumſtance of her giving him water to drink, when all the others ſhould deny his requeſt. On his arrival at the well, he addreſſed himſelf to each of the virgins ſeparately, and begged them to oblige him with a draught of water. One replied, that ſhe had taken too much trouble to get it, to part with it ſo eaſily; another, that ſhe did not draw water for every one who might apply to her for it; ſome making one excuſe, and ſome another, but all refuſed to comply with his requeſt, ſave one ſingle virgin, who ſharply reproved her companions for their incivility to a ſtranger, and courteouſly offered him her pitcher to allay his thirſt. This was ſo auſpicious a commencement, that the meſſenger, after ſome general compliments on her perſon and benevolence of temper, deſired to be informed to what family ſhe belonged, wiſhing that her parents might live to ſee her happily ſettled in the marriage ſtate, with an affectionate and virtuous huſband, and a numerous and obedient progeny.

To this, without the leaſt heſitation, Rebecca replied: "The name of my father was Bethuel; but he died long ago, and left my mother and me, together with all his ſubſtance, to the care of my brother, whoſe name is Laban; and I am called Rebecca." The meſſenger was delighted with what he had heard and ſeen; being fully convinced that God favoured the deſign on which he came thither. He, therefore, preſented Rebecca with a ſmall chain, and ſome other ornaments for her perſon, ſuch as commonly attract, in a conſiderable degree, the attention of women of her age; requeſting her acceptance of them as a mark of his eſteem for her ſingular excellencies, and of his gratitude for the particular obligation ſhe had conferred on him. He then deſired that, as it grew late, and would be unſafe travelling further, he might be permitted, for that night, to reſide at the houſe of her relations; hoping that they would receive a gueſt, who would not put them to any manner of charge for his entertainment. The virgin replied, "That he appeared to have conceived a proper idea of the humanity of her relations,

* From this circumſtance it appears plain, as far as we can judge without the aſſiſtance of records, that the only ſecurity for the performance of a contract, was a ſolemn oath and a ſacrifice; for at that time they could have no written conveyances: it is proper, however, to mention here, that a conſcientious regard was in ancient times paid to oaths; and they who broke them were conſidered not only as unworthy of a place in human ſociety, but as infamous perſons.

but that she wished him to have a better opinion of their generosity, as he should be lodged at their dwelling without any expence; but that she would first ask her brother's permission to introduce him." This was immediately granted, and the servants of Laban were ordered to take care of the stranger's camels, while he sat down to table with the master of the house. When supper was ended, the guest addressed himself to the mother and son in these terms: "I am sent to you," said he, "by Abraham the son of Thares, and your kinsman; for Nahor," directing his discourse to the woman, "the father of your late husband, was the brother of Abraham, by the same father and mother. I am a domestic servant of Abraham, who has commissioned me to propose a marriage between this virgin, and his only legitimate son and heir. From a predilection for those of his own blood, he has rejected offers of alliance with many of the most powerful families in the country where he resides. Do not, I conjure you, with-hold your consent to my proposal, since God himself evidently interposes in behalf of it, and has directed me, in a miraculous manner, both to this virgin and your dwelling. When I entered a town, I saw a number of maidens, who were going to the well for water, and I offered up a secret prayer to heaven, that I might find the virgin whom I sought among them, which happened according to my prayer: thus you may perceive, that a proposed match has already obtained the approbation of heaven, and wants but the sanction of your authority to confirm it." This marriage was so eligible in itself, and so plainly conformable to the will of God, that Rebecca was delivered into the care of the messenger, who conducted her to the house of Isaac, to whom the whole possessions of Abraham had now devolved; the children that Keturah bore to Abraham having taken up their residence in other countries.

Marriage of Isaac and Rebecca.

Death of Abraham.

Not long after the marriage of Isaac, Abraham departed this life, in the hundred and seventy-fifth year of his age. This man was equally renowned for his piety and virtue, and had rendered himself acceptable both to God and man. He was interred at Hebron, in the same sepulchre with his wife Sarah, Isaac and Ishmael taking upon themselves the care of his funeral.

CHAP. XIII.

The Birth of Esau and Jacob. A Famine in the Land of Canaan obliges Isaac to retire to Egypt. His Death drawing nigh, he sends Esau into the Fields, to procure him some Venison. Jacob personates Esau, and he surreptitiously obtains from his Father the Blessing intended for his Brother.

IN a short time after the death of Abraham, the wife of Isaac became pregnant, and increased so much in size, that her husband, being greatly alarmed at the circumstance, besought the Almighty to reveal to him the cause thereof. The purport of the answer he received, was, that she should be delivered of twins, from whom two mighty nations should proceed; and that the younger of the two should, in process of time, eclipse the glory of the elder. This prediction was in due time verified; for Rebecca brought forth twins, the elder of whom was covered with hair from head to foot and as they came into the world, the younger was observed to be holding the other by the heel. The first-born was the favourite of his father, and was named Esau, or Seir, which signifies in the Hebrew language Hair; but Jacob, the younger, became the darling child of his mother.

Esau and Jacob born.

The land of Canaan was at this time afflicted with a terrible famine, and Egypt then enjoyed the greatest abundance; Isaac was inclined to go thither; but God diverted him from his design, and he repaired to Gerar. Upon his first arrival at that place, he was received by king Abimelech with every appearance of respect and friendship, in remembrance of the ancient alliance which had subsisted between him and Abraham. But this kindness could not be expected to be of long continuance with a man who sacrificed every consideration to his envy. He perceived that Isaac enjoyed a larger portion of God's favour than himself, and therefore dismissed him from his court. Isaac, penetrating into the cause of this change of disposition in Abimelech, withdrew to a place called the Valley, at a small distance from Gerar. As his men were employed in digging for water at this place, the king's shepherds came to the spot, and prevented them from proceeding. They then repaired to another part, where they once more began to dig, but were interrupted as before. At length, he obtained the king's permission to dig, and the place where he first found water he named Rooboth, which signifies large or spacious. Of the other two places, where he had been disappointed, he called one Escon, signifying contention; and the other Sitenna, which being interpreted, means enmity.

Abimelech, conscious of his own insincerity, observed, with a jealous eye, the increasing power and reputation of Isaac, who, he was apprehensive, might, on a comparison of his late unkind conduct with the favourable reception he had at first given him, be induced to revenge the insult; he was, moreover, unwilling to provoke the enmity of a man of Isaac's temper and character. He, accordingly, taking with him one of the chief officers of his court, repaired to the spot where Isaac resided, and proposed to him a renewal of the former league which had subsisted between them; with which Isaac, recollecting the ancient friendship which his father and the king had mutually entertained, readily complied; and thus all disagreement between them ceased.

Isaac renews the treaty with Abimelech.

At the age of forty, Esau, who was the favourite of his father, married two wives; Adah, the daughter of Elon, and Alibama, the daughter of Esbion; both persons of distinguished rank and high reputation in the land of Canaan. He contracted these marriages, without consulting his father Isaac on the subject; nor would he have been able to procure his consent thereto, thereto, Iſaac being fully determined not to form any alliance whatever with the Canaanites. As the matter, however, was irremediable, Iſaac judged it better to paſs the whole over in ſilence, than to proceed to the extremity of compelling his ſon to diſmiſs the women.

Eſau ſent to get veniſon for his father.

Iſaac, being now arrived at a very advanced age, and having, in part, at leaſt, if not totally, loſt his ſight, called to him his ſon Eſau; and, after premiſing what he was about to ſay, with ſome reflections on his age and infirmities; grievouſly lamenting his incapacity to ſerve God, as he had formerly been accuſtomed to do; and ordering Eſau to go into the fields, and endeavour to procure him ſome ſavoury food for his ſupper; he promiſed, at his return, to beſtow his bleſſing on him, and to recommend him to the protection of Almighty* God. "The period of my own exiſtence," ſays he, "draws near; and, as the hour is uncertain, I cannot employ the ſhort time I have to live, in a more proper manner, than in offering up prayers to God for thy welfare and happineſs."

Rebecca inſtructs Jacob to procure the bleſſing.

Eſau having retired, to execute his father's commands, Rebecca, who had overheard the converſation between them, contrived to transfer to Jacob, for whom ſhe had more affection than for his brother, the bleſſing which was intended for Eſau. She, therefore, ordered Jacob to kill a kid, and have it prepared for ſupper. Jacob obeyed, being conſtantly obſervant of the orders of his mother; and, when ſupper was ready, he ſet it before his father, having taken the precaution to ſpread the ſkin of the kid over his hands and arms, that he might appear to his father to be hairy, the brothers reſembling each other, in other reſpects, ſo ſtrongly, that it was impoſſible to diſtinguiſh one from the other: he was, however, in great agitation, leſt he ſhould be detected in th[illegible] poſture, and thereby draw upon himſelf a curſe, in[illegible]ad of a bleſſing.

Jacob deceives both Iſaac and Eſau.

Iſaac, noting ſome particularity in his ſon's voice, bade him draw near, and finding his hands to be covered with hair, he obſerved, that "the voice was Jacob's voice, but the hands were the hands of Eſau;" and without farther heſitation, began to eat of the victuals ſet before him. The repaſt being finiſhed, he offered up a prayer to heaven in theſe words: "Eternal God, from whom all created beings derive their origin! Thou haſt ſhowered down on my father, myſelf, and our offſpring, a profuſion of the comforts of this life, and haſt promiſed us the enjoyment of ſtill greater bleſſings to come: make good, O Lord, thy gracious promiſes, and diſdain not the application of thy ſervant on account of his infirmities, which render him ſtill more ſenſible of his dependence on thee for his ſupport: Preſerve, I pray thee, this child from all evil; grant him length of days and all happineſs: bleſs him with the poſſeſſion of every worldly enjoyment which thou, in thy wiſdom, ſhall deem conducive to his welfare; render him the dread of his enemies, and an honour and comfort to his family and friends‡."

No ſooner had Iſaac concluded his prayer, than Eſau entered the room, being juſt returned from the chace; which circumſtance diſcovered to Iſaac the deception: but he thought proper to be ſilent on the matter. When the particulars of what had paſſed came to the knowledge of Eſau, he requeſted of his father to beſtow a bleſſing on him, as he had already conferred one on his brother. But Iſaac excuſed himſelf; declaring, that he was reſtricted both from withdrawing and from making a ſecond grant of the benediction he had conferred on Jacob. Eſau was ſo much affected with the diſappointment, that he could not refrain from tears; and his father, to comfort him as far as lay in his power, aſſured him, that he and his poſterity ſhould excel in hunting, and in the profeſſion of arms: concluding, nevertheleſs, that he muſt be ſubject to his younger brother†.

Flies to avoid Eſau's reſentment.

Jacob, conſcious of the injury his brother had ſuſtained from him, was violently apprehenſive of his reſentment; and Rebecca, who was actuated by the ſame fears, in order to avert the danger, prevailed on Iſaac to ſend Jacob into Meſopotamia, to take a wife from among her kindred, reſiding in that country.

Eſau, perceiving that he had highly diſobliged his father by forming an alliance with a Canaanitiſh family, which people were his profeſſed enemies, now took to wife Baſſemath, the daughter of Iſhmael, for whom he entertained a ſtronger affection, than for any of his other wives.

CHAP. XIV.

Jacob is ſent into Meſopotamia, to contract a Marriage with Rachel, the Daughter of Laban. His Viſion. He engages to ſerve Laban, on certain Conditions, and is deceived by him.

* It appears that this was no common bleſſing that Iſaac meant for Eſau, but a ſolemn dying benediction, ſuch as pious parents in thoſe days were wont to beſtow upon their children, and which were held ſacred, and indeed were often prophetic of their future fortunes in the world, as in the caſe of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 1. But the difference between him and Jacob was, that God had given Jacob a prophetic view of his intended diſpenſations to his deſcendants and their children; but it is plain that Iſaac, in this place before us, had called Eſau without having received any particular revelation about him, for he deſigned to tell him what God never intended ſhould belong to him.

‡ The ſupper caught by hunters was deſigned as a feſtival which was always uſual on a ſacrifice; and Iſaac hoped and believed that the prayers uſed on thoſe occaſions would obtain bleſſings from the Almighty on the head of his ſon.

† Both Jacob and his mother Rebecca were highly blameable for practiſing this deception, nor can it eaſily be determined which was moſt ſo. The providence of God muſt be taken into the account; but never can be alledged as an excuſe for the double dealing of either the mother or the ſon; but, though he diſapproved of the act, he over-ruled it to bring about his own deſigns.

AT

Jacob ſent into Meſopotamia.

AT the ſolicitation of Rebecca, Iſaac ſent Jacob into Meſopotamia, to treat of a match with the daughter of Laban, Rebecca's brother. It happened that a mortal enmity ſubſiſted at this time between that family and the Canaanites; and, as the route which Jacob was to purſue lay through the land of Canaan, he durſt not truſt himſelf in any of their houſes, but repoſed, during the night, in the open air; a ſtone, or a hillock ſerving him for a pillow. On a certain night, as he lay thus at reſt, he had the following viſion.

His viſion.

He imagined that he ſaw a ladder placed on the earth, the top of which reached to the ſkies; and that a number of figures, reſembling, in form, the human race, but far exceeding them in ſize, and in the luſtre of their appearance, were continually paſſing and repaſſing up and down the rounds thereof; the Almighty appearing in perſon at the top, and ſpeaking to him in theſe words: "You, Jacob, who are deſcended from Iſaac and Abraham, men deſervedly famous for their faith and virtue, inſtead of deſponding of my care and protection, under any degree of affliction whatever, ought rather to ſubmit cheerfully to your preſent troubles, with a firm reliance on me to extricate you from your difficulties. Place your truſt in me, and be aſſured that you ſhall experience happier days. It was I who brought Abraham out of Meſopotamia hither, when he was driven from his poſſeſſions by thoſe of his own family; it was I who ſhowered down bleſſings on your father, through the whole courſe of his life; and I am determined, if you will render yourſelf deſerving of my favour, to transfer to you thoſe bleſſings which I formerly conferred on your anceſtors. The buſineſs which is the object of your preſent journey ſhall ſucceed to your wiſh; you ſhall become the father of dutiful children, and your progeny ſhall be without number. To them and their poſterity will I give this land, as an inheritance; and they ſhall plant colonies throughout the whole earth, and the iſlands, as far as the ſun extends its influence. Let nothing, therefore, diſcourage you; but place an implicit confidence in my protection, not only on the preſent occaſion, but in all caſes in future."

This viſion filled Jacob with rapture; and he anointed the ſtone on which he had repoſed; vowing, at the ſame time, if God ſhould ever permit him to return home, to erect an altar on the ſpot, and to offer ſacrifice thereon. This vow he afterwards performed; dedicating to God the tenth of all his ſubſtance, for an oblation. And as a farther memorial of what had befallen him there, he named the place Bethel, or the Houſe of God.

He then continued his journey, and, after a tedious paſſage, arrived at Charran, where he found ſeveral ſhepherds, and other young perſons, of both ſexes, aſſembled about a well, and drawing water. He accoſted them, and begged a draught of water, to quench his thirſt; and thus, by degrees, entered into diſcourſe with them; inquiring whether they knew Laban, and whether he lived in the neighbourhood? They all anſwered in the affirmative, adding, that his daughter and they were accuſtomed to feed their ſheep together, and that they were ſurpriſed ſhe had not joined them yet. The virgin herſelf came to the ſpot, in the midſt of this converſation, and was acquainted by her companions with the inquiries which Jacob had made, concerning her father. She immediately, with an eager ſimplicity, began to queſtion him relative to the place from whence he came, and the buſineſs which had brought him thither; making him an offer, at the ſame time, of her ſervices.

Jacob meets Rachel, who courteouſly receives him.

Jacob, charmed with her courteous behaviour, but much more ſo with the beauties of her perſon, inſtantly conceived a violent paſſion for her, and addreſſed himſelf to her in theſe terms: "A firm friendſhip," ſaid he, "has ſubſiſted between our families, if you, fair virgin, are actually the daughter of Laban, a long time previous to the birth of either of us; Abraham, Haran, and Nahor, being the ſons of Tharés, and Bethuel, your grandfather, the ſon of Nahor. Iſaac, my father, was born to Abraham by Sarah, the daughter of Haran. Moreover, my mother, Rebecca, is the ſiſter of your father, Laban, by the ſame parents: thus you ſee, that we ſtand related to each other in the degree of couſin-germans; and the object of my preſent journey is, to renew the antient family league and compact."

The virgin now recollected with how much affection ſhe had often heard her father ſpeak of Rebecca, and ſhe was ſo overjoyed with the idea of the pleaſure which he would derive from the circumſtance of Jacob's arrival, with tidings of that excellent woman, that ſhe burſt into tears of joy and affection, and, after having ſaluted the youth, ſaid, "Thou bringeſt the moſt welcome news imaginable both to my father and to the whole family. He, good man, was never ſo happy as when expatiating on the virtues of thy mother; and I am poſitive, he would not exchange the felicity which thy tidings will give him, for any other bleſſing under the ſun. Therefore, let us haſten to him without any farther delay." She then introduced him to Laban, who, as well as the reſt of the family, expreſſed the utmoſt joy on his unexpected arrival.

Rachel conducts Jacob to her father, and his family, who behave kindly to him.

He had been with the family but a few days, when Laban thought proper to compliment him upon the pleaſure he profeſſed that he enjoyed in his converſation; at the ſame time expreſſing ſome ſurprize, that he ſhould have quitted his father and mother at a period when, from their extreme age, his preſence muſt have been moſt neceſſary to them; concluding with an aſſurance, that he would render him every ſervice in his power. Jacob, to ſatisfy his curioſity, gave him the following ſhort abſtract of the hiſtory of his family. "My mother, Rebecca," ſaid he, "bore twin ſons, Eſau and myſelf. My father, being blind, was led, by the contrivance of my mother, to confer on me the bleſſing he had meant for my brother. Eſau, therefore, conſiders me as a perſon who has ſupplanted him in his juſt claim, both to his father's bleſſing, and the inheritance which God had aſſigned him, and he determined, in conſequence, to take away my life.

To avoid the danger which threatened me, and in compliance with the injunction of my mother, I have fled to thee for protection, as to the nearest relation she has living; and it is on thee, next under God, that I depend for my safety." Laban gave him the stronger assurances of his favour, not only in consideration of his own good qualities, but also, as being the son of his sister: saying, he should ever entertain the sincerest affection for her, whatever the distance might be that should separate them; adding, that, for the present, he would give him the superintendency of his flocks and shepherds, and that, whenever he should think proper to return home, he might depend on a gratification suitable to his merit.

Jacob agrees to serve Laban seven years for Rachel.

Jacob, who was desirous of continuing in the family on any terms, consented to Laban's proposal, on condition that he might have Rachel in marriage, as the reward of his services; declaring that he loved her to excess, not only on account of her own rare merit, but also, as having been the providential instrument of his introduction to the family. Laban instantly ratified the condition, with earnest expressions of joy; protesting that he should prefer him before all men living for a son-in-law; but gave him to understand, at the same time, that he must wait awhile for the execution of the agreement, as it would not be without great unwillingness that he should suffer his daughter to go so far from him, as to the land of Canaan; having, to say the truth, almost repented, at times, the sending his sister thither. To prove the disinterestedness of his views, Jacob engaged to wait, and contracted to serve his intended father-in-law for the term of seven years*.

Laban's deceit.

Precisely on the concluding day of the above term, Laban prepared the nuptial feast, and, having previously intoxicated Jacob, late at night, and in the dark, [illegible]tly conducted to his bed the blear-eyed eldest si[illegible], instead of the younger. Jacob having discovered the imposition, expostulated with him on this breach of faith: but Laban attempted to vindicate his conduct, on the plea of necessity; alledging, that the custom of the country would not permit the younger sister to be married before the elder, and solemnly protesting that he was totally uninfluenced by any malicious motive on this occasion: "But, the disappointment you have now experienced," said he, "need not be any obstacle to your marrying Rachel at a future time; for, if you will engage yourself to me for another term of seven years, at the expiration thereof she shall be delivered to you, unveiled, and in the face of day; and thus you will be guarded against every danger of a second deception." Jacob, who was guided solely by the dictates of his passion, yielded to this proposition also: and, having completed the term of his contract, received Rachel for his wife.

Rachel given in marriage to Jacob.

Laban had given to his daughters two maidens, who were to attend them, not altogether in the capacity of menial servants, though they were, nevertheless, to be subservient to their commands: Zilpah attended on Leah, and Bilhah on Rachel. As Rachel evidently possessed a greater share of Jacob's affection than her sister Leah ‡, the latter was greatly afflicted on that account, yet she still entertained hopes that, by bringing him children, she might, at length, win him to herself. This, accordingly, happened: for having borne to him a son, whom she named Reuben, or divine mercy, this circumstance influenced him to favour her, and she had afterwards three other sons, who were called Simeon, signifying God is favourable; Levi, or the support of society; and Judah, or thanksgiving.

Rachel was very apprehensive, lest the fruitfulness of her sister should, in part, abate Jacob's attachment to herself, and, therefore, contrived to deceive him, by substituting her woman, Bilhah, in her place; and by her Jacob had a son, named Dan, or the judgment of God; and she was some time afterwards delivered of Naphtali, signifying artificial; alluding to the circumstances of Rachel's craft, in her contention with her sister for children. Leah afterwards adopted her sister's arts, and introduced Zilpah to Jacob, who bore him two sons, one of which was named Gad, signifying by chance; and the other Aser, or beautifying, because they obtained honour by the transaction.

On a certain day, as the two sisters were sitting together, Reuben, Leah's eldest son, brought some mandrake apples to his mother. Rachel was eagerly desirous to partake of them, but was refused by the other, who peevishly told her, that it was unreasonable to think of depriving her of her husband and her apples also; but Rachel, to soothe her, offered to relinquish Jacob to her for that night. The proposal was accepted; and Leah, afterwards, bore other children; as Issachar, which signified born for hire; Zebulon, or a pledge of love; and a daughter, named Dinah. A considerable time elapsed before Rachel became pregnant, but, at length, she was delivered of a son, who was named Joseph, signifying an addition.

Jacob had now served his father-in-law, in the station of a superintendent over his shepherds and herdsmen, full twenty years: he, therefore, began to entertain thoughts of returning home, and of conducting his wives thither with him. But, it was necessary to act with caution; as he was conscious that Laban would throw every obstacle in the way of his design. He determined, however,

Jacob resolves to return home.

* It was not the custom of those countries for fathers to give dowry with their daughters, but to receive it from their sons-in-law, Gen. xxxiv. 12. 1 Sam. xviii. 23, 25, 27. Thus as Jacob had no money to purchase a wife, he offers his service for seven years instead of it.

‡ In the text, Gen. xxx. 31. we read, "Leah was hated," i. e. less beloved, according to the Hebrew idiom, Mal. i. 2, 3. Luke xiv. 26. And this instance furnishes a good argument against bigamy in general; for it is morally impossible for a man to share his affections so equally between his wives, but that he must love the one better than the other. Hence says Andromache in Euripides: 'Tis not right for one man to possess two wives; but if they would live well, they should love but one.

to adopt no reſolution, till he ſhould firſt have conſulted his wives on the ſubject, and have learned how they were diſpoſed to the meaſure. Finding them well inclined to accompany him, he departed immediately, with his two wives, their attendants and children; and taking with him one half of the flocks. Rachel ſecreted the idols which her father had been accuſtomed to worſhip: not from any reſpect ſhe bore them, for her huſband had convinced her of the folly of ſuch adoration; but ſhe imagined that, in caſe her father ſhould overtake them in their flight, theſe images might prove the means of effecting a reconciliation between Laban and her huſband.

Laban purſues and overtakes him: No ſooner did Laban become acquainted, on the following day, with Jacob's ſecret departure, and all the attendant circumſtances, than he aſſembled a ſtrong party of able followers, and went in purſuit of him. In the evening of the ſeventh day, he overtook Jacob and his company, as they were ſitting on a hillock, to reſt themſelves after the fatigue of the day's journey: but, it being late, Laban and his party laid themſelves down to repoſe. During the night, God appeared to Laban in a dream, and ſtrictly enjoined him rather to accommodate matters than offer the leaſt violence to his fugitive children; cautioning him, moreover, not to deſpiſe them on the inferiority of their numbers, as, in that caſe, he would himſelf fight on their ſide.

Reproves Jacob; Early the next morning, Laban ſent for Jacob, who came to him with the confidence of a man who is ſenſible of no crime. Having firſt related to him his dream, Laban began to reproach him, for leaving him in a clandeſtine manner, and for taking away his effects after the great intimacy which had ſubſiſted between them.

Who vindicates himſelf. Jacob replied, in vindication of himſelf, "That it was natural for a man, who had been ſo long abſent from his native country, to wiſh to return thither; that, with reſpect to the charge of robbery and injuſtice, he was diſpoſed to appeal to the deciſion of any other perſon rather than Laban himſelf; that he thought himſelf intitled rather to his acknowledgments for the care he had taken to improve his eſtate, than to his reproaches for having reſerved to himſelf ſo ſmall a pittance out of it; and that, in the caſe of his taking his wives with him at his departure, both he and they had acted ſolely in conformity to their conjugal duty." Thus much he ſaid in vindication of himſelf; and then adverted to the conduct of Laban, on whom he retorted his own reproaches; complaining, and expreſſing great ſurprize, that having ſerved his father-in-law with unimpeached fidelity, for the long term of twenty years, he ſhould now be treated as the worſt of foes.

Jacob certainly had ſufficient cauſe to complain of the uſage he had received from Laban, who, obſerving that God manifeſted a ſtrong predilection for Jacob, repeatedly impoſed upon his credulity by fair ſpeeches and promiſes; engaging, at one time, to beſtow on him all the white cattle which ſhould be produced in the courſe of the year; and at another, all the black; and when, at the expiration of the twelve-month, he found that the ſhare promiſed to Jacob amounted to the greater part of the cattle produced in the time, he refuſed to fulfil his engagement till the following year; being pre-determined to pay no more regard to his ſtipulation, at the end of that period, than he had done on former occaſions, if his intereſt ſhould require it. But to return:

Rachel had ſecreted the idols in her ſaddle, and pretended to have a diſorder incidental to her ſex upon her. Laban, therefore, to whom Jacob had given free permiſſion to make a thorough ſearch for the images, paſſed her by, not imagining that, in her condition, ſhe would ſuffer any thing ſacred to be ſo near her perſon. Laban, thereupon, entered into a covenant with Jacob; forgave his daughters all that had paſſed, and promiſed that, for the future, they ſhould hold the ſame place in his affection they had ever poſſeſſed; all which he confirmed with the ſolemnity of an oath. This ceremony was performed on a mountain, on which they erected a pillar, reſembling an altar, and they ſtyled it, and all the adjacent country, Galaud, or the Hill of Witneſs. After the ratification of the league between them, they feaſted together, and then ſeparated; Laban returning to his home, and Jacob continuing his way to the land of Canaan.

Reconciliation between Laban and Jacob, confirmed by a covenant of friendſhip.

CHAP. XV.

Interview between Jacob and Eſau, which terminates amicably.

AS Jacob purſued his journey to the land of Canaan, he had ſeveral viſions, all tending to give him hopes of future ſucceſs; and the place where the Almighty was pleaſed to grant him theſe revelations, he named the Field of God. But he ſtill bore in mind the ancient reſentment of Eſau; and, therefore, privately exerted all his endeavours to diſcover how his brother ſtood diſpoſed to him; ſending, moreover, ſeveral meſſengers* to find out his reſidence, and to addreſs him, in his name, to the following effect: "That perceiving he had drawn upon himſelf the reſentment of his brother, he retired from his own country; but, confident that his long abſence muſt have obliterated all remembrance of paſt diſagreements, he was now on his return home, with his wives, children, and treaſures; propoſing to himſelf, as the firſt wiſh of his heart, to ſhare the wealth God had ſo profuſely beſtowed on him, in common with his brother."

* It was not only in order to reconcile Eſau to him that he ſent theſe meſſengers to his brother, but alſo to apprize him that he brought his ſubſtance with him from Haran, and that he was not going into Canaan to do him any injury: whereas had he returned home without Eſau's knowledge, Eſau might have thought that Jacob had got the greateſt part of his ſubſtance from his father; and when he came at Iſaac's death to take away with him to Edom what his father had to leave him, he might have looked upon Jacob as having defrauded him of his right.

This meaſure afforded Eſau ſuch heart-felt ſatisfaction, that he inſtantly began his journey, at the head of four hundred men, to meet him on the road. When Jacob learnt that Eſau was approaching at the head of ſo numerous a party, he was ſomewhat confounded; but, quickly recovering himſelf, determined, with the divine aſſiſtance, to repel any attack that might be made on him. He formed his men into two bodies; ordering the firſt to advance, and the other to keep at ſuch a diſtance, as to be able to ſecond the firſt, in any advantage which they might obtain, or to ſupport them, in caſe they ſhould be repulſed. Having made theſe preparations, he ſent ſome of his people before, with preſents to his brother, of different ſpecies of animals, ſome for uſe, others for curioſity. Theſe he ordered to march at a diſtance from each other, that they might appear more numerous than they in reality were; and he particularly enjoined the perſons who conducted them, to ſhew the utmoſt deference and reſpect to Eſau; truſting hereby to diſpel any rancour which might yet remain in his brother's mind. The whole day was ſpent in adjuſting the diſpoſition of the troops, and at night they marched.

Meeting of the two brothers.

After they had croſſed the torrent of Jabac, Jacob being at a ſmall diſtance behind, an angel laid his hands on him; and Jacob wreſtling with the angel*, overcame him; whereupon he heard a voice, ſpeaking to him in theſe words: "Thou mayeſt with reaſon boaſt of the advantage thou haſt obtained over me; for it is not a common adverſary, but an angel of the Lord whom thou haſt foiled. This ſhall ſerve thee for a token, that thy poſterity ſhall never become extinct, and that in all thy conteſts thou ſhalt prove victorious." The angel, thereupon, gave him the title of Iſrael, which in the Hebrew ſignifies ſtruggling. Jacob had prayed for a revelation of his future fortune. when he perceived that it was an angel who ſpoke to him, he urged him to be explicit; and this being complied with, the angel diſappeared. The joy which Jacob felt on this occaſion was ſuch, that he named the ſpot, whereon the incident happened, Phanuel, ſignifying the face of God. In this conteſt, one of the ſinews of his thigh was ſtrained, upon which account he would never afterwards eat of that part of any animal; in which the Jews follow his example to this day.

Jacob wreſtles with an angel.

Jacob being informed that Eſau was approaching, ordered his wives and their attendants to walk at a diſtance from his troops, that, in caſe his brother ſhould think proper to attack him, they might ſee the engagement without ſharing the danger. But when Jacob perceived that Eſau drew near with looks of complacency and peace, he ran towards him, and threw himſelf at his feet. Eſau raiſed him up, embraced him, and with many queſtions reſpecting the women and children, earneſtly preſſed him to accompany him to his father's houſe. Jacob, however, declined the invitation; alledging, that his horſes and cattle were too much tired to continue the journey; and Eſau thereupon departed to his habitation at Seir; which was ſo named on account of the hairineſs of his perſon.

Jacob's fears diſpelled by an affectionate ſalutation with Eſau.

* An angel in the form of a man; the ſame that he had ſeen at Bethel, as we are told in Hoſea xii. 4. It was an angel who repreſented the Almighty, and is therefore called God, Gen. xxxii. 28, 30. Hence ſome have taken him for the eternal Logos, or Son of God. This angel laid hold on him, and entered with him into a wreſtling match, according to the cuſtom of thoſe countries, in order to teach him, by this ſymbolical repreſentation, how eaſy it is for God to make the weakeſt an over-match for the moſt mighty.

CHAP. XVI.

The Rape of Dinah. Slaughter of the Sichemites.

JACOB repaired to the place called the Tabernacles, and from thence went to Sichem, in the land of Canaan. It chanced that the inhabitants were engaged in the celebration of a feſtival; and Dinah, the only daughter of Jacob, went thither, to gratify her curioſity, and obſerve the cuſtoms of the women of the country. Sichem, the ſon of king Emmor, conceiving a paſſion for her, carried her off, and violated her. Being ſtill greatly enamoured of the damſel, he aſked the conſent of his father to marry her; and he not only readily yielded thereto, but went in perſon to Jacob, to obtain his compliance. Jacob was greatly perplexed what anſwer to give the king; ſeeing that his conſcience forbad him to marry his daughter to a perſon of a different religion from himſelf; yet neither could he, with propriety, reject the application of a perſon of the petitioner's diſtinguiſhed rank. After ſome deliberation, however, he determined to requeſt a ſhort time to conſider of the matter; and the king quitted him, in full confidence of ſucceeding in his views.

Hiſtory of Dinah, the daughter of Jacob.

When the ſons of Jacob became acquainted with the indignity that had been offered to their ſiſter, and the propoſal made by Emmor, they were ſo much confounded, that they could not determine what meaſures to adopt; but Simeon and Levi, the brothers of Dinah by the ſame mother, concerted a deſign, which, without the privity of their father, they executed in the following manner.

Embracing the opportunity of the next feſtival at Sichem, they, at a late hour of the night, entered the city, overpowered the guards, whom drowſineſs and ebriety had rendered an eaſy conqueſt, and killed all the males they could find, among whom were the king and his ſon; ſparing the women alone: after the completion of this enterprize, they conducted Dinah back to their father's houſe. The barbarity of this action ſtruck Jacob with the utmoſt horror, and highly incenſed him againſt his ſons; but God comforted him in a dream, bidding him take courage and cleanſe his tents, and to perform the ſacrifice which he vowed, in consequence of the vision while on his journey into Mesopotamia.

While Jacob was employed in the execution of this command, he accidentally discovered the gods of Laban, which Rachel, unknown to him, had buried under an oak. He then went to Beth-el, where he had the vision, and there performed sacrifice. From thence he repaired to Ephrata, at which place Rachel died in child-birth, and was buried; being the only person of the family who was not interred at Hebron. He was greatly affected by this incident; but, the child surviving, he named him Benjamin, from the great *grief he gave his mother.

Death of Rachel.

Jacob had twelve sons and one daughter. Of these, eight were legitimate; six being by Leah; and two by Rachel; of the four illegitimate children, two were born to him by Zilpah, and the same number by Bilhah. Their names have been already given in a preceding chapter.

From Ephrata Jacob went to Hebron, in the land of Canaan, at which place Isaac then dwelt; but they resided together for a short time only. Rebecca died some time previous to Jacob's arrival, and Isaac did not long survive her. He was interred by Esau and Jacob in the family sepulchre in Hebron, where his wife also had been laid. Isaac, by his virtuous conduct, rendered himself acceptable in the sight of God, and, next to Abraham, appeared to be the peculiar favourite of heaven. He passed through life in the uniform and exemplary practice of piety and virtue, and died in the hundred and eighty-fifth year of his age.

Death and burial of Isaac.

After the death of Isaac, the two brothers, Esau and Jacob, shared their possessions between them; and Esau, having yielded to his brother the city of Hebron, withdrew himself to Seir, where he fixed his residence. The whole country of Idumæa belonged to him, and he named it, after himself, Edom.

Esau and Jacob divide their possessions.

* This is an error. In Gen. xxxv. 18. the reading is, "She called his name Ben-oni (son of sorrow); but Jacob called him Benjamin" (son of my right hand, or strength). And it is observed, that both names were verified in the fates of his posterity, no tribe being more valorous, yet none so subject to sorrowful disasters, as the tribe of Benjamin.

CHAP. I.

Joseph's Dreams. He becomes the Envy of his Brethren, who conspire against his Life.

JACOB was one of the happiest of mankind: being particularly favoured by the divine providence and protection, he not only surpassed all his neighbours in wealth and power, but was also blessed with a numerous progeny, who were equally renowned for their industry, valour, and prudence; and whose very sufferings and afflictions it pleased God to render advantageous to them, by making them the happy instruments of extricating our ancestors from the bondage of the Egyptians.

Joseph, whom Rachel bore to Jacob, was the favourite of his father, as well on account of his mental, as personal qualifications*. The predilection, which his father constantly manifested for him, excited the jealousy and ill-will of the rest of his brethren; and these disgusts received additional force, from the circumstance of certain dreams, which Joseph communicated to his brethren, at different times, all appearing to prognosticate his future felicity, power, and pre-eminence.

Having been sent, by his father, to assist his brethren in reaping, he had a dream, which differed widely from those fantastic creations of the brain, to which the appellation of Dreams is usually given. He made his brothers acquainted with the particulars of this vision, and desired them to solve it. "I dreamt," said he, "that I saw my own sheaf of wheat standing erect, and those of all my brethren hastening, and prostrating themselves before it." This dream might have been expounded without much difficulty, as it plainly portended the great power which Joseph was to acquire over the rest of his brethren. But they pretended an incapacity to explain the meaning of it; praying earnestly, however, for heaven to avert the omen, and conceiving a still greater hatred against Joseph, than before.

A second vision, which he had, was of a still more extraordinary kind than the former. He imagined that he saw the sun, moon, and eleven stars, descend-

* We read, Gen. xxxvii. 2. that "the lad was with the sons of Bilhah, and with the sons of Zilpah, his father's wives." His mother being dead, he was brought up amongst the sons of the handmaids: probably because they were thought less likely to use him ill.

ing from the ſkies, and doing him reverence. Still unconſcious of the evil deſigns of his brethren, Joſeph alſo communicated this viſion to his father, in their hearing, and expreſſed an earneſt deſire to be acquainted with the tendency of it. Jacob was greatly pleaſed with this dream †; conſidering it as a preſage of the future happineſs and glory of his ſon Joſeph, and of the honour which, in proceſs of time, he ſhould receive both from his father and brothers. The ſun and moon he expounded to mean the father and mother; it being the office of the one to increaſe and nouriſh, and of the other to give form and ſtrength; and he ſuppoſed the eleven ſtars to ſignify the eleven brethren, who alſo derived their knowledge and virtue from above.

Envy and wicked plot of Joſeph's brethren againſt him.

This was, doubtleſs, a rational interpretation of the dream in queſtion, but it gave great offence to the brethren of Joſeph, who, on the contrary, ought to have rejoiced in the proſpect of their brother's promiſed happineſs, inſtead of envying ſo near a relation thoſe advantages and benefits which they would not have regretted the poſſeſſion of to a ſtranger. But to that height had their inveteracy againſt him now ariſen, that nothing leſs than his life would ſatisfy them: and this was the method they took to effect their purpoſe. No ſooner was the harveſt over, than they removed, with their flocks, to Sichem, which place is remarkable for the excellency of its paſture; but without giving their father the leaſt intimation of their departure. When they had been gone ſome time, and no intelligence being received by Jacob of the place to which they had retired, he diſpatched Joſeph to obtain all poſſible information concerning them, and bring him an account immediately of their ſituation, and the ſtate of the flocks.

CHAP. II.

The Conſpiracy of Joſeph's Brethren: his Life is preſerved through the Interceſſion and Propoſal of Reuben, and he is ſold to Arabian Merchants.

Joſeph's brethren conſpire againſt him.

JOSEPH, in obedience to his father's commands, went in ſearch of his brethren, and upon his arrival among them, they rejoiced exceedingly; and, conſidering him as an enemy whom God had delivered into their power, were deſirous of putting thair ſanguinary purpoſe into immediate execution. But Reuben exerted his utmoſt powers of perſuaſion, by endeavouring to prevail upon them to ſhew favour to Joſeph,; repreſenting to them how hateful they would render themſelves both in the ſight of God and man, by ſacrificing their brother to the deſperate and unnatural enmity they had conceived againſt him. He uſed many arguments to diſcourage the aſſaſſination; but finding that neither religion, reaſon, nor humanity would prevail with his brethren, and that they were inflexibly determined againſt Joſeph, he ſuggeſted a way to mitigate the rigour of the ſentence they had pronounced. Addreſſing himſelf to them, he ſaid, "Since you are inexorably determined upon the deſtruction of the youth, do not aggravate your crime by ſhedding his blood: caſt him into ſome adjacent pit, and leave him there to periſh; by which means the crime itſelf will be leſſened in ſome degree, and you will evade the ſeverity of reproach." This qualifying propoſal being aſſented to, Reuben tied a cord round the body of Joſeph, and having carefully lowered him into a dry well, departed in ſearch of his ſheep.

Joſeph ſold to the Iſhmaelites.

Soon after this, a company of Arabian merchants* appeared, who were Iſhmaelites, and were on their way from Galaad, conveying ſpices and other articles, the produce of Syria, into Egypt. In order to diſpoſe of Joſeph ſo that they might never ſee him again, and yet not ſtain their hands with his blood, Judas propoſed ſelling him to theſe merchants; which being agreed to, he was taken up from the well, and the merchants paid twenty pieces of ſilver for him, and took him away. He was at this time ſeventeen years old.

The care of Reuben now was, to form ſuch excuſes to his father, as might prevent the ſuſpicion of unfair practices in his brethren. Some time was employed in debates upon this matter; and it was, at length, reſolved to take the travelling coat which had been ſtripped from Joſeph, and, after tearing it and ſtaining it with goat's blood, to produce it to Jacob, as an evidence that his child had been deſtroyed by ſome voracious animal. With this pretence, they went to their father, and ſhewed him the coat, in a torn and bloody condition; ſaid they had not ſeen him, and were apprehenſive he had fallen a prey to ſome wild beaſt. Jacob, who had before received ſome ſlight intimation of his ſon's misfortune, entertained a hope that he might have been taken priſoner, or, that he was detained by a ſtill more favourable accident: but upon ſeeing the bloody coat, he inſtantly knew it to be Joſeph's, and concluding him to have been devoured, clothed himſelf in ſackcloth, and gave way to the moſt paſſionate lamentations and inconſolable ſorrow for his ſuppoſed death.

† Dreaming has by many been conſidered as the living active ſtate of the ſoul during ſleep; and we find from many paſſages in the ſacred ſcripture, that while people were aſleep, God often revealed future events to them, either in a way of mercy, or upon ſome extraordinary occaſion. A viſible repreſentation was here made to Joſeph, that one day he would be ſuperior to his brethren; but all the effect it had on them was, to procure and increaſe their hatred to him, as appears by the ſequel.

* In the language of the preſent times, it is called a caravan; merchants not daring, even to this day, to travel alone, or in ſmall numbers, in thoſe eaſtern countries, through the deſerts, for fear of robbery or of wild beaſts.

CHAP. III.

Joseph is sold into Egypt. His exemplary Continence, when tempted to Lewdness by the Wife of Potiphar, who, at her Instigation, throws him into Prison.

Joseph in Egypt.

THE merchants who had purchased Joseph, proceeded to Egypt, and there sold him to Potiphar, an officer of distinguished rank in the service of king Pharaoh, by whom he was not treated as a menial servant, but, on the contrary, with every instance of liberality and kindness: he was allowed opportunities for cultivating the study of literature, and, in a short time, was advanced to be superintendent of Potiphar's house. This change of fortune had no effect upon the steady integrity of Joseph, the propriety and prudence of whose conduct afforded an instance that true virtue will not yield to the temptations and circumstances of life.

His mistress tempts him to commit lewdness.

He was remarkable for personal attractions; and the wife of his master soon distinguished his superior qualifications, and became violently enamoured of him. Presuming on the inferiority of Joseph's situation, she imagined that a motive of ambition would incite him to a ready acceptance of her offer, but entertained not the least idea of the inflexible dignity of his mind. She signified her intention to prostitute herself, by intimations too palpable to be misconceived: but upon the first hint, he rejected her invitation, and advised her utterly to suppress her unruly desires of what she could not possibly obtain; urging, that he could not return affront and treachery for the kindness and generosity he had experienced from his master. He said, he would chearfully obey her lawful commands, and should think himself highly honoured by them; but that he could not condescend to perform a guilty action. She was greatly disappointed by this refusal, which, however, served but more to inflame the passion she had conceived, and was determined to gratify; and for effecting this, she suggested the following stratagem: A festival was holden, whereon it was usual for the women of rank to assemble; she counterfeited indisposition, and remained in her chamber, where she procured Joseph to be introduced to her, and behaved to him with singular complacency and tenderness.

Joseph flies from the adulteress.

She accompanied her lascivious conversation with tears, prayers, and menaces; but all were ineffectual to seduce him from his duty; and, conscious that no punishment could be adequate to his demerits, should he yield to the solicitations of this base woman, he resolved to brave every danger, rather than to comply therewith. Neither did he omit to represent to her the duties she owed to herself, her husband, and the world*. He urged many arguments, to bring her back to a sense of decency and reason: but this was only adding fuel to flame; for, perceiving that she could effect nothing by intreaty, she had recourse to violence, and, seizing hold of his garment, endeavoured to force him to a compliance with her libidinous desires. But his indignation against this shameless woman rose to such a height, that, breaking from her, he hastily quitted the chamber, and left his garment in her hand. For a short interval, her mind was violently agitated, between the indignity of the repulse, and the apprehension of a discovery; but she quickly determined to shelter herself from every dangerous consequence, by accusing Joseph: thus, at once providing for her own security, and gratifying her malice. She, accordingly, confined herself closely to her chamber, affecting to be in great trouble and affliction. Just at this juncture, her husband came into the chamber, and, observing the disorder and confusion which was visible in her face, earnestly requested her to acquaint him with the cause thereof.

She made a most plausible speech accusing this innocent young man, which, together with the tears and passionate gestures with which it was accompanied, so effectually imposed on the credulity of Potiphar, that, without making any manner of inquiry into the foundation of the charge against Joseph, he ordered him to be confined in the common prison, which was appropriated to the reception of the most notorious criminals.

CHAP. IV.

In consequence of a groundless Accusation, Joseph is lodged in Prison. Circumstances attending him during his Confinement. His Interpretation of several Dreams.

Pious Conduct of Joseph in prison.

JOSEPH patiently submitted to his severe treatment, appearing neither solicitous to vindicate his own conduct, nor to destroy the credibility of the charge alledged against him; but, satisfied with his innocence, cherished the comfortable hope that the power of the supreme Being would enable him to rise superior to the rage of his malicious enemies; and the providence of God was shewn towards him in the following instance: the gaoler became so prejudiced in his favour, by the gracefulness of his person, his pleasing address, candour, diligence, and integrity, that he freed him of his irons, and shewed him other marks of favour and reſpect, which his fellow-priſoners were not indulged with*.

* Joseph does not reproach this shameless woman (as he justly might have done) with want of modesty, with indelicacy, and adultery; but nobly and piously urges the heinousness of the crime, calling it "a great wickedness, and sin against God;" and, in his expostulation with her, collects together all the aggravating circumstances that would attend his complying with her unlawful desires.

Times were allowed for the priſoners to converſe together; and Pharaoh's butler, who formerly held a high place in the eſtimation of the king, being under confinement, on account of ſome diſpleaſure his maſter had conceived againſt him, an intimacy was contracted between him and Joſeph. This man, diſtinguiſhing Joſeph for the ſuperiority of his underſtanding, communicated to him a dream, and requeſted him to give an interpretation of it; ſaying, that his unhappineſs, conſequent on the king's diſpleaſure, was aggravated by the perplexity occaſioned by ſeveral extraordinary dreams and viſions. "I imagined," ſaid he, "that I beheld three bunches of ripe grapes, depending on three ſeveral branches of a vine: and that the king held a veſſel, into which I preſſed the fruit, and then preſenting the liquor to his majeſty, he pronounced it to be wine of a delicious flavour." Upon this relation, Joſeph informed him, that the king, having occaſion for his ſervices, would reſtore him to liberty, and re-eſtabliſh him in his office within the ſpace of three days. The butler was, as it may naturally be ſuppoſed, highly delighted with this interpretation, and waited with confidence for the event.

The butler's dream.

It happened that the chief baker of Pharaoh was confined in the ſame priſon. He alſo communicated a dream to Joſeph; hoping that it would bear an interpretation equally favourable with that of the chief butler. "I dreamt, laſt night," ſaid he, "that I had upon my head three baſkets, one containing meats of ſundry ſorts, and the other two containing bread for ſupplying the king's table. As I paſſed along, the birds, in ſpite of all my endeavours to drive them away, fell upon the proviſions with great eagerneſs, and intirely devoured them." Joſeph told him that his dream would not bear ſo favourable an explanation as he could wiſh. "The baſkets," ſaid he, "denote, that at the expiration of two days, you will infallibly be hanged on a tree†, and that your body will be expoſed, to be devoured by the fowls of the air."

The baker's dream.

Theſe explanations were verified in every particular; for, preciſely on the third day, as Joſeph had predicted, which was on the anniverſary of Pharaoh's birth, the king commanded the chief baker to be hanged, and re-inſtated the chief butler in his poſt. Two years had now elapſed, and Joſeph ſtill remained in priſon, utterly forſaken by the ungrateful butler: but he ſuddenly obtained his liberty, by the following extraordinary means:

Pharaoh's two dreams.

The king had two dreams in the ſame night, and the interpretation of them was revealed to him, during his ſleep. The viſion he recollected, but had totally forgotten every particular of the meaning, ſave that, in general, it betokened him no good. Pharaoh, early the next morning, convened an aſſembly of the moſt learned men of the realm, and deſired them to expound the viſions. They conſulted together on the ſubject, but were unable to ſolve the difficulty; and the king's chagrin was greatly increaſed by this diſappointment. The chief butler now recollected the proof which Joſeph had formerly given him of his ſkill in the art of interpretation. He, therefore, waited on the king, and related to him the circumſtances of the viſions which he himſelf, and the chief baker, formerly had in priſon, and of Joſeph's explanation thereof; which was, in every reſpect, confirmed by the events; adding, that Joſeph paſſed for an Hebrew, and was ſuppoſed to be of no mean extraction. Pharaoh, thereupon, ſent for Joſeph in haſte, received him with great courteſy, and, familiarly taking hold of his right-hand, addreſſed him in theſe words: "One of my domeſtics has repreſented you to me as a perſon of great learning and wiſdom; of which, he ſays, he has himſelf had frequent proofs, and that you particularly excel in a certain faculty, in which I chance at this time to have urgent occaſion to employ you. He informs me, that you are well verſed in the interpreting of dreams, and that you formerly explained a viſion which he had. I ſhall eſteem it as a favour, if you will do the like for me: but I muſt caution you, not to diſguiſe the truth, in the ſmalleſt degree, but to impart to me minutely the circumſtances, whether they may be propitious or otherwiſe. I imagined that, walking by the river's ſide‡, I ſaw ſeven large and well-fed oxen riſe from the water, and direct their courſe towards an adjacent paſture: after which, I ſaw ſeven lean oxen, and they paſſing from the paſture towards the river, encountered the firſt-mentioned ſeven, and devoured them; yet without appearing to have increaſed in bulk. Waking, I began to make ſome reflections on the nature of dreams, and, inſenſibly falling aſleep again, I had a ſecond viſion, of a ſtill more extraordinary and fearful kind than the former. I dreamt that I ſaw ſeven ears of corn growing upon one ſtem. They appeared to be ready to cut, and the ſtalks to bend

* As there is no doubt that the place of Joſeph's confinement was a ſtate priſon, allotted for the moſt dignified criminals, therefore his being intruſted with the care of it was a ſtrong proof of his upright conduct.

† The expreſſion in Gen. xl. 19. 20. "Pharaoh ſhall lift up thy head from off thee", &c. intimating, that his head ſhould be ſtruck off from his body; after which his carcaſe ſhould be hanged on a tree; it having been cuſtomary, in that country, firſt to behead the criminal and then to hang him up. That paſſage in Jeremiah, Lam. v. 12. "Princes were hanged up by their hand," alſo implies, that their heads were cut off before.

‡ This river was the famous Egyptian Nilus, or Nile, ſo frequently alluded to in profane hiſtory. It takes its riſe in Numidia, and runs northward through a country ſcorched with almoſt inſufferable heat. It continues its courſe as far as Grand Cairo, after which it divides itſelf into three branches, in form of a triangle, and finally empties itſelf into the Mediterranean. It overflows the greater part of Lower Egypt once a year, and from thence the plenty or ſcarcity of the ſeaſons are determined. If it riſes exceeding high, the water lies too long on the ground, and ſcarcity is the conſequence; and if it does not riſe to a certain height, the ſoil is not ſufficiently fertilized; ſo that the inhabitants are always very anxious with reſpect to the proportion of the annual overflow.

under the weight of their burden. At a ſmall diſtance from theſe, I remarked ſeven other ears, which were very bare of grain; and, to my great amazement, theſe thin ears totally ſwallowed up the others."

Interpretation of the king's dreams.

Hereupon Joſeph informed the king, that but one interpretation could be given to both dreams. "The ſeven fat and ſeven lean oxen," ſaid he, "and the ſeven full and ſeven withered ears of corn, were meant to predict ſeven years of abundance, to be followed by ſeven years famine in Egypt; and by the lean cattle devouring the fat, and the blighted devouring the full ears of grain, an emblem was afforded, to ſhew that the plenty of the firſt ſeven years would be inſufficient to provide againſt the extremities of the ſeven to follow: and this appears to be demonſtrated by the lean oxen not being ſatisfied, when they had devoured the fat ones. The famine will, doubtleſs, be extreme. The purpoſes of heaven are not revealed ſolely to alarm and diſtreſs mankind, but are intimated with a view of inducing them to provide againſt future extremities: therefore, the calamities of the ſeven years of ſcarcity will be greatly alleviated, if it ſhall pleaſe your majeſty to iſſue your royal command for providing a ſupply againſt the time of need, by a neceſſary reſerve of ſtores during the years of plenty."

Joſeph the preſerver of Egypt, &c.

The penetration of Joſeph ſtruck the king with admiration, and he requeſted his advice to the moſt ſucceſsful method of guarding againſt the threatened diſtreſs. He adviſed a reduction of all ſuperfluous expences, and that quantities of corn ſhould be ſtored in magazines, and delivered out only in ſuch portions as ſhould be indiſpenſably required for the preſent ſubſiſtence, with a ſmall reſerve for ſeed at the end of the famine.

The credit Joſeph had obtained with Pharaoh, on account of his ſkill in the ſolution of dreams, was greatly improved by the above inſtance of his expert and ready turn for œconomy; and he, beſides, entertained ſo great a deference for the ſolidity of his judgment and the importance of his counſel, that he appointed him ſuperintendent of the ſtores, giving him full commiſſion and authority to adopt the meaſures he had ſuggeſted, and to execute them according as he ſhould himſelf judge moſt expedient. At the ſame time, the king conferred on him the office of keeper of his ſignet, and inveſted him with certain diſtinguiſhed privileges; ſuch as wearing a purple habit, and riding publicly in a chariot.

Joſeph made chief director of the affairs of Egypt.

Joſeph now began his progreſs through the kingdom, ſtoring up the corn in all parts where he came, and diſtributing among the farmers and huſbandmen ſuch a quantity only as would be barely ſufficient for the ſuſtenance of themſelves and their families; without making any perſon privy to the cauſe of his conduct on this occaſion.

CHAP. V.

Joſeph becomes the Favourite of the King. Particulars of what paſſed between himſelf and his Brethren, on their Arrival in Egypt.

JOSEPH had now attained his thirtieth year, and was ſo highly eſteemed for his wiſdom, that the king gave him the title of Pſonthomphanec, which, in the Egyptian language, ſignifies the Diſcoverer of hidden things.

Joſeph marries Aſenath.

He married Aſaneth, the daughter of Potiphera*, the high-prieſt of Heliopolis; and this match was effected by the mediation of the king himſelf. By her he had two children, previous to the famine, the eldeſt of whom he named Manaſſes, which ſignifies Oblivion, becauſe the preſent proſperity of Joſeph had cauſed him to forget his former misfortunes; and the younger was called Ephraim, or Reſtitution, on account of his being reſtored to the liberty enjoyed by his forefathers.

Beginning of the famine.

The ſeven predicted years of plenty were now expired, and in the eighth the ſcarcity began. This calamity ſpread an univerſal conſternation throughout the kingdom, and the people came in great bodies to the palace, ſoliciting relief. Joſeph took ſuch prudent meaſures, to alleviate the public diſtreſs, that the people unanimouſly hailed him as their deliverer. Not only the natives, but foreigners alſo, were ſupplied from the public granaries; it being the opinion of Joſeph, that all mankind were of the ſame family, and that the diſtreſs of the unfortunate gave them an indubitable claim to the aſſiſtance of thoſe in more proſperous circumſtances.

Joſeph's brethren come to Egypt to buy corn; and are ſeverely treated by him.

The famine was not confined to Egypt, ſeveral other countries, and particularly Canaan, being under the ſame predicament: and Jacob, having learnt that ſtrangers were permitted to purchaſe corn in Egypt, ſent all his children thither, for that purpoſe, ſave Benjamin, the brother of Joſeph by the ſame mother, whom he detained at home with him. Such was the influence which Joſeph poſſeſſed at court, that no favour could be obtained from the king, but through his intervention. The ten brethren, therefore, applied themſelves to him, on their arrival, for leave only to buy the quantity of grain they wanted. Joſeph immediately recollected his brethren, though they did not know him; neither

* This marriage of Joſeph was not with the daughter of Potiphar above, who was Joſeph's maſter; for this was a prieſt, the other captain of the guard; this was of On or Heliopolis, the other reſided at Memphis with the king; beſides, their names are ſomewhat different. Moſt of the Jewiſh writers however take them to be the ſame, and are followed by Origen and others. They tell us, that this daughter of Potiphar informed her father of the true ſtate of the caſe between Joſeph and his miſtreſs, that ſhe had ſolicited Joſeph, and not Joſeph her: And thus, by turning informer againſt her own mother, ſhe recommended herſelf to Joſeph's good graces.

was it at all probable that they ſhould, he being very young at the time of their ſeparation, and now greatly altered in his perſon*. Perceiving that he was in no danger of being diſcovered by his brethren, Joſeph determined to make trial of them. He therefore, not only refuſed to ſupply them with corn, but alſo accuſed them of being ſpies. "My friends," ſaid he, "inſtead of brothers, as you pretend to be, you are no other than a band of conſpirators, of different countries. It is not probable that you, who plainly appear to be poſſeſſed of ſuch extraordinary qualifications, ſhould all be the ſons of a private individual, when ſcarcely any ſovereign on earth can boaſt of ſuch a progeny." The motive which influenced Joſeph to this conduct was, that he might thereby draw from his brethren ſome information of what had paſſed in the family ſince his departure, and whether his brother Benjamin was ſtill at home; being very apprehenſive leſt they ſhould have treated him in a manner ſimilar to what he experienced from them in his own perſon.

Their fearful apprehenſions; and Reuben's eloquent ſpeech.

The brethren were greatly alarmed with the proſpect of their danger, and clearly perceived, that the deſign of their long journey was effectually defeated. Reuben, however, took courage, and in the name of the reſt, addreſſed Joſeph in theſe words: "We do not come hither," ſaid he, "either with the view of penetrating into myſteries of ſtate, or of attempting any thing againſt the ſafety of the king, or the tranquillity of his government. It was merely the ſcarcity of bread which compelled us to reſort hither; or, ſhould I rather ſay, that your humanity, in throwing open your market to ſtrangers, as well as natives, has invited us. The very reſemblance which we bear to each other in our countenances, beſpeaks us, as we in reality are, the ſons of one man. Our father is, by birth, an Hebrew, and he is named Jacob. He had twelve ſons by four wives, and, whilſt they all lived, every thing proſpered with us; but from the time that one of the number, named Joſeph, was taken away from us, our misfortunes have continually accumulated. Our father ſtill repines at that loſs, and his inconſolable ſorrows afflict us equally with the untimely fate of our beloved brother. Our deſign in coming hither was, with your permiſſion, to buy corn; and, during our abſence from home, the care of our reverend father is intruſted to our younger brother, Benjamin. Should you have any doubts of the truth of what I have now advanced, you have only to diſpatch a meſſenger to our father, to be ſatisfied that I have not uttered a falſehood."

Joſeph, perceiving by this diſcourſe that his father and Benjamin were ſafe and in health, ordered his brethren into cloſe confinement, till he ſhould be at leiſure to examine them with greater ſtrictneſs. At the expiration of three days, he commanded them to be again brought before him; and, upon their entrance, addreſſed them thus: "You have aſſured me," ſaid he, "that you entertain no deſigns againſt the ſtate, and that you are all brethren, and the ſons of Jacob? In confirmation of the truth of what you have aſſerted, you ſhall leave one of your brethren with me, as an hoſtage, and the reſt ſhall carry home to your father the corn you purchaſe; after which you ſhall return hither, with your youngeſt brother, whom, you ſay, you have left at home; and this ſhall be the indiſpenſable teſt of the rectitude of your intentions. In the mean time, give yourſelves no concern about the hoſtage you leave with me, as he ſhall experience every indulgence during your abſence." This ſpeech afflicted them in the higheſt degree, and, conſidering themſelves to be on the very verge of ruin, they lamented their misfortune, and repeatedly obſerved to each other, that it was an effect of the divine vengeance, which purſued them for the barbarity of their conduct towards their unhappy brother. Reuben reproached them with the folly and inefficacy of their late repentance; frankly telling them, that they had no other remedy than patience, under the judgment which they had drawn upon themſelves by their wickedneſs. Thus they converſed together, in the perſuaſion that no one preſent underſtood their language. The bitter reflections which Reuben caſt on them ſo powerfully awakened their feelings, that Joſeph, who obſerved the violent agitation of their minds, was obliged to retire, leſt his emotions ſhould diſcover him. After a ſhort abſence, he returned to them, took Simeon‡ for an hoſtage, and gave the reſt a licence to purchaſe whatever corn they might want; but he ſecretly inſtructed one of his ſervants to put the money they ſhould pay for it into each man's baggage; which order was accordingly executed.

Joſeph requires Benjamin to be ſent, and retains Simeon as a pledge.

On their return into Canaan, they acquainted Jacob with all the particulars of their adventures in Egypt; concluding with an urgent requeſt to their father, to permit Benjamin to go with them at their return to that kingdom, in order to vouch for the truth of their former declarations, and to procure the releaſement of Simeon. Jacob was not at all ſatisfied with their conduct in leaving Simeon behind them; but he would not give the leaſt ear to the propoſal of ſending Benjamin thither with them, although Reuben offered to pledge the lives of his own children for the ſafe return of his brother. They were reduced, by this refuſal, to a terrible dilemma; to which the diſcovery of their money in their ſacks

* The dreſs and manners of the Egyptian court were undoubtedly adopted by Joſeph the favourite of Pharaoh; ſo that, in addition to his years, (twenty years having now elapſed ſince they ſold him to the Iſhmaelites,) there were ſufficient circumſtances to diſguiſe him from the knowledge of his brethren, who appeared in the dreſs, and ſpoke the language of Canaan.

greatly contributed. But, their proviſions being nearly exhauſted, Jacob, at times, ſeemed to be partly inclined to permit his ſon, Benjamin, to accompany the reſt of his brethren, being convinced that they muſt never think of returning to Egypt, unleſs they complied with the terms which had been preſcribed to them, at their departure from thence. Their wants ſtill increaſing, the brothers were very urgent upon their father to comply with what had been propoſed to him; but Jacob ſtill refuſed to liſten to them, till at length, Judas, a man of a reſolute temper, and great freedom of ſpeech, adopted another method to engage his father to yield his conſent to what they required of him. "In my opinion," ſaid he to Jacob, "you expreſs too great a degree of ſolicitude for the ſafety of Benjamin. Whether he goes with us, or continues at home, he muſt ſtill ſubmit to whatever God ſhall ordain. Yet you ſeem inclined to ſuffer us all to periſh, for want of food, which muſt inevitably happen, if we ſhould forfeit the favour of Pharaoh, through an ill-founded fear of what may happen to our brother. But would you not blame yourſelf ſeverely, ſhould the Egyptians put Simeon to death in the mean time? Place an intire confidence in the power of the Almighty, and reſt aſſured, that I will either conduct our brother back in ſafety, or periſh in the attempt."

Joſeph's brethren, with Benjamin, ſent again into Egypt.

Jacob, at length, ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded, and delivered the child into their care; furniſhing them with a double portion of money, that they might pay for the corn they had purchaſed in the former journey, and with preſents of balm, myrrh, turpentine, honey, and other productions of the land of Canaan, for the uſe of the officer with whom they were to treat for the grain they intended to buy. Thus provided, they began their journey; leaving Jacob in the utmoſt anxiety for the ſafe return of his beloved children, and being themſelves very apprehenſive leſt this ſeparation ſhould ſo far affect their father, as to be the cauſe of his death.

They are favourably received.

Immediately on their arrival in Egypt, they waited on Joſeph; not without ſome fear, that the circumſtance of their diſcovering the money in their ſacks would be imputed to them as a fraud. When they mentioned the matter, however, to Joſeph's ſteward, he utterly diſavowed all knowledge of the tranſaction. They now, therefore, began to take courage, more eſpecially when they ſaw their brother Simeon had obtained his liberty. Joſeph inquired after the health of his father, and other particulars: and his apprehenſions for Benjamin being now removed, he aſked him whether he was the younger brother, whom they had before mentioned to him; to which they replied in the affirmative. He thereupon exclaimed, "God's providence is conſtantly over all his works;" and withdrew, with tears in his eyes, to indulge the impulſe of nature. The ſame evening he invited them to ſup with him, and placed them at the table in the ſame order in which they were accuſtomed to ſit at their father's houſe, conducting himſelf towards them with all imaginable courteſy; but the portion allotted to Benjamin was double that of either of his brethren*.

Stratagem to detain Benjamin.

Joſeph gave orders, after the repaſt was finiſhed, that their corn ſhould be meaſured, and that each man's money ſhould be put into his ſack, as before; ſecretly inſtructing his ſteward, to convey a certain ſilver cup, which he uſed at his meals, into that particular ſack which belonged to Benjamin. His intention in this was, to try whether, in caſe Benjamin ſhould be detained for the pretended theft, the reſt would remain with him, for the purpoſe of obtaining his releaſement; or whether they would not rather abandon him to his fate, and return to their father. The orders given on this occaſion were punctually executed.

The brethren ſtopt on their journey, and accuſed of theft.

The next morning, by break of day, they began their journey, totally unconſcious of the deſign which was in agitation againſt them, and pleaſing themſelves with the reflection, that they had both Simeon and Benjamin in their company, whom, they truſted, they ſhould deliver up ſafe to their father, according to their promiſe. They had not proceeded far, before they found themſelves ſuddenly ſurrounded by a party of horſe, accompanied by the ſervant who had been commiſſioned to ſecrete the cup in Benjamin's baggage. This unexpected event incenſed them to a high degree, and they exclaimed bitterly againſt the people who had ſo recently treated them with the moſt remarkable honour and hoſpitality. The Egyptians, on the other hand, reproached them, in terms equally ſevere, with the baſeneſs of returning injuries for the numerous civilities and benefits they had received, and threatened them with a ſpeedy puniſhment, adequate to their demerits; telling them, that howſoever ſecretly they might imagine they had perpetrated this crime, there was an all-ſeeing eye above, from which it was not poſſible to conceal their iniquity. In this manner the Egyptians continued to reproach them, but the ſervant was more vociferous and inſulting than the reſt; inſomuch that the unfortunate brethren concluded that he was little leſs than inſane. They urged the improbability of their committing a crime of that nature, ſince, uninfluenced by any conſiderations but thoſe of honour and juſtice, they had, with the ſtricteſt fidelity, reſtored the money which they had paid for the corn, and afterwards found put into their ſacks. "But," ſaid they, "the moſt effectual way to evince our innocence or guilt, will be to ſearch our baggage, to which we are ready to ſubmit with the utmoſt confidence; and ſhould any of us be found to have committed this action, we are all willing to ſuffer whatever puniſhment he may be deemed to have deſerved."

* This has been laughed at by Deiſts and Infidels; but they do not conſider that it was the cuſtom of the ancients to diſtinguiſh thoſe whom they meant to honour, by an increaſe of proviſion, and many changes of raiment. If theſe gentlemen will give themſelves the trouble to read Homer in the original, or, what perhaps may be more eaſy to them, Mr. Pope's Verſification of it, they will find this circumſtance frequently alluded to, particularly in Agamemnon's Addreſs to Idomenæus.

The Egyptians, accordingly, began to examine each man's baggage; declaring, however, that no one but the perſon in whoſe cuſtody the cup ſhould actually be found, ſhould meet with the leaſt moleſtation†. They had now examined all the baggages, ſave that of Benjamin, without effect, and the brethren were felicitating themſelves on the proſpect of being quickly rid of theſe troubleſome people, when, upon opening his ſack, the cup inſtantly appeared. This unexpected diſcovery plunged them into inconceivable anguiſh; they burſt into tears, tore their garments, and uſed the moſt extravagant geſtures, declaring that themſelves and their brother were inevitably ruined by this accident; and, with the moſt poignant lamentations, deplored their incapacity to fulfil the promiſe they had made to their father, on leaving him, to convey Benjamin home in ſafety.

Their diſtreſs, and return to Egypt.

Benjamin was conducted in chains before Joſeph, his brethren accompanying him. Joſeph received them with an aſſumed ſternneſs, and reproached them in terms ſimilar to theſe: "Is it thus, ye baſeſt of men, that, regardleſs of the hoſpitable treatment you have received, and contemning the anger of an offended Deity, you give the moſt ſenſible affront to your patron and benefactor?" The reſt of the brethren earneſtly requeſted that their lives might be accepted, in lieu of that of the unfortunate Benjamin. They repeatedly obſerved to each other, how much the ſituation of Joſeph, if actually dead, was to be envi[illegible] in compariſon with theirs; or, if he was ſtill li[illegible]g, how much it redounded to his honour, that the vengeance of God ſhould thus be exerted againſt them, in conſequence of their cruelty to him. They alſo reproached themſelves with being the authors both of the preſent as well as the former ſorrows of their unhappy father; Reuben continually recalling to their minds the guilt of their brother's murder. Joſeph, pretending to deliberate for ſome time on the courſe he ſhould take, told them, at length, that, as he neither thought himſelf juſtified in puniſhing the innocent indiſcriminately with the guilty, nor in releaſing the culpable at the inſtance of thoſe who bore no part in the perpetration of the crime, they were at liberty to return home when they pleaſed, and that he ſhould content himſelf with detaining Benjamin, to receive the puniſhment due to his offence.

This ſpeech threw them into the utmoſt conſternation; but Judas, a man of courage and abilities, and who alone had been able to prevail on his father to part with Benjamin, reſolved to defy every danger in the attempt to ſave him, and, accordingly, addreſſed himſelf to Joſeph in theſe words: "We do not pretend to deny, moſt excellent governor, that the crime charged upon our brother is of a heinous nature, and merits a ſevere puniſhment. It is certain that the guilt of the action can be imputed to one only of our number, and he chances to be the youngeſt; yet we are all willing to yield up our lives for the preſervation of his."

The ſpeech of Judas.

Judas, and the reſt of his brethren, then threw themſelves at Joſeph's feet, to ſolicit him in behalf of their brother Benjamin. The paſſions of tenderneſs and brotherly affection now became ſo powerful in the breaſt of Joſeph, that he could no longer ſupport the character he had aſſumed *, but ordered his attendants to retire, that he might diſcover himſelf to his brethren without witneſſes; and being alone with them, he addreſſed them in theſe words: "I am infinitely happy," ſaid he, "to ſee you thus tenderly affected towards your brother; as, I muſt confeſs, I could not refrain from entertaining ſome doubts of your regard for him, when I reflected on certain circumſtances of your former conduct, with reſpect to myſelf. In the whole of my late behaviour towards you, I propoſed only to put your affection to the teſt; and, from the event, I am convinced that, by whatever motives you were actuated in all your proceedings relative to me, yet the providence of God has wonderfully interpoſed therein, making thoſe actions the means of procuring for us the happineſs which we at this time enjoy, and the proſpect of greater bleſſings in future.

Joſeph makes himſelf known to his brethren.

"But, as I now find my father to be in ſuch a ſituation as I could rather have wiſhed, than expected; and that you have all that affection in your tempers, which is the true characteriſtic of brethren; all paſt injuries are forgotten, and I ſhould rather return you my thanks, as the agents of Divine Providence, for our common benefit, than recall to your remembrance any tranſactions of ancient date, which might, perhaps, at the time, appear to have an evil tendency. I deſire that you will forget all theſe matters, and not render yourſelves uneaſy by † Various reaſons are given by commentators for Joſeph's making uſe of this ſtratagem to detain his brethren; but perhaps he intended no more than to find a judicious pretence for ſtopping Benjamin, being ignorant of the peremptory charge which Jacob had given with regard to this favourite child.

* We are told in the former part of the narration, that Joſeph found great difficulty to conceal himſelf ſo long; that he was obliged now and then to withdraw, in order to give vent to his tears; and after that, compoſing himſelf, he returned. But now his tender paſſions are wrought up to ſuch a pitch, by this laſt ſcene, eſpecially by the moving ſpeech which Judah makes him, that he can contain himſelf no longer; nature burſts through all reſtraint, and forces the diſcovery, even in ſpite of himſelf, and the regard he had to thoſe who were preſent: for it is obſerved, he could not refrain himſelf, before all them that ſtood by him. Gen. xlv. 1.

the recollection of former ill deſigns, which never took effect; ſince it has pleaſed the Almighty thus to bring good out of evil.

"Return, therefore, to your father, with the happy tidings of the unexpected bleſſings which God hath conferred on you. Haſten your departure, leſt his very ſorrows and fears ſhould bring any ill accident upon him; which would utterly deſtroy all the comfort I propoſe to myſelf in ſeeing him once again, and in participating with him the bleſſings which I now enjoy. Begone, therefore, and return with all poſſible diſpatch; and do not neglect to bring with you, your wives, children, and all your kindred: as, at this time in particular, when there are yet five years of the famine unexpired, I ſhould be very unwilling that my deareſt friends ſhould remain at ſo great a diſtance from me." Joſeph then tenderly embraced his brethren, who, with many tears, acknowledged and lamented their baſe practices againſt ſo worthy a brother. He afterwards entertained them at ſupper.

On their departure homewards, the king ordered ſeveral waggons laden with corn, gold, and ſilver, and various other preſents to be ſent to their father; to which Joſeph added many others from himſelf; ſome being intended for the father, others for the brothers themſelves, but the moſt valuable portion was deſtined for Benjamin.

CHAP. VI.

Jacob, having learnt the ſplendid Condition of his Son Joſeph, in Egypt, repairs thither, accompanied by his whole Family.

Jacob repairs to Egypt.

WHEN the ſons of Jacob returned to their father, they acquainted him that Joſeph was ſtill living, and enjoying great authority and magnificence, and holding, next to Pharaoh, the moſt diſtinguiſhed rank in the Egyptian dominions. Jacob readily credited what was told; and theſe extraordinary incidents furniſhed him with many reflections on the infinity of God's grace and kindneſs to him; and without any further delay, he began his journey to Egypt*.

Jacob, ſeeking the divine direction, is favoured with a viſion.

When Jacob arrived at the Well of the Oath, he offered an oblation to God; yet fearing, leſt the plenteous ſtate of Egypt ſhould ſeduce his ſons to ſettle there, and thus divert them from returning again to Canaan, the country which God had promiſed him for an inheritance. He was alſo partly apprehenſive, leſt God ſhould inflict ſome calamity on him and his followers, as a puniſhment for undertaking the preſent journey, without firſt imploring his advice and direction; or, leſt he ſhould die before his arrival in Egypt†. In the midſt of theſe reflections, he fell into a profound ſleep, during which the Almighty appeared to him in a viſion, and called him twice by his name. Jacob demanded, who it was that called him? and the Lord anſwered him thus: "Haſt thou, then, forgotten thy God, Jacob? the God of thy forefathers, who never rejected the prayer either of them or their poſterity, in the time of their need; that God who placed thee at the head of thy family, contrary to the inclination of thy father; and, when thou didſt retire into Meſopotamia, being at that time unmarried, bleſſed thee with an advantageous match, and brought thee back to thine own country, full of riches, and with a numerous progeny; that God, who hath been the perpetual protector and guardian of thy family, and hath preferred thy ſon Joſeph to a ſtation in Egypt next in honour to that of the king? I am now come to be thy guide on the way, and to intimate to thee that thou ſhalt finiſh thy life in the arms of thy ſon Joſeph; that thy deſcendents ſhall be powerful and renowned for many ages, and ſhall, at length, poſſeſs the land which I have promiſed them." This viſion gave Jacob freſh courage, and he continued his journey with his family, conſiſting of ſeventy perſons.

Affecting interview between Jacob and Joſeph.

When Jacob and his company had travelled a part of the way, Judas was diſpatched to give notice of their approach to Joſeph, who immediately ſet out to meet his father, and they accordingly met at a place called Heliopolis. The joy of this interview was ſuch, that both father and ſon almoſt ſunk under mutual tranſport. Joſeph afterwards, accompanied by five of his brethren, haſted away to acquaint the king with his father's arrival, deſiring the reſt of the company to continue their journey at a moderate pace.

Pharaoh's kindneſs to them.

Pharaoh expreſſed great ſatisfaction on receiving the news, and inquired of Joſeph what profeſſion his kindred chiefly followed; who replied, that they had been wholly accuſtomed to a paſtoral life. He anſwered thus for two reaſons: firſt, that they might, by this means, be kept together, and thereby be enabled to give the neceſſary attendance to their father; and, ſecondly, to obviate all cauſe of jealouſy between them and the Egyptians, by any interference of the former in the employments to which the latter devoted their time. Jacob was introduced to the king, and met with a very gracious reception. Pharaoh, aſking him his age, and receiving for anſwer, that he was in his hundred and thirtieth year, manifeſted ſome ſurprize at the circumſtance; which being noticed by Jacob, he acquainted the king, that his anceſtors uſually lived to a much later period. Jacob and

* This narrative of Joſephus is beautiful; but cannot be compared with the inexpreſſible elegance and native ſimplicity we meet with in that of the ſacred Hiſtorian, recorded in Geneſis.

† Upon ſeveral accounts, Jacob might be afraid to go into Egypt, eſpecially with his whole family: Abraham had been injured there, Gen. xii. 15. It had been foretold, that his ſeed ſhould be afflicted by the Egyptians, xv. 13. and Iſaac had been warned not to go into Egypt, xxvi. 2. his family had a reſidence aſſigned them by the king, at Heliopolis, where the royal flocks were conſtantly kept.

Dreadful increaſe of the famine.

At this time, the famine in Egypt became daily more grievous. The waters of the Nile, that ſource of fertility to the country, were dried up; nor had they any rain, to ſupply the defect. The bulk of the people were, in conſequence, involved in the utmoſt miſery imaginable; being, through want of foreſight, totally deſtitute of ſuſtenance, which could not be obtained but for ready money; and, when that failed, they were obliged to barter their lands, cattle, ſlaves, and what other effects they had, in exchange for corn. Thus the poſſeſſions of the whole community came, by degrees, into the hands of the king; and the wretched people ſubmitted to every inconvenience and miſery, to preſerve themſelves from ſtarving. The prieſts were the only claſs of people, throughout the kingdom, who, in the general calamity, retained the poſſeſſion of their property and freedom*.

Joſeph's happy policy.

In conſequence of the Nile's having reſumed its ancient ſtate, and the refreſhing ſhowers again deſcending, to fertilize the ſoil, the famine began gradually to abate, and the face of the country once more put on its wonted appearance. Joſeph, hereupon, made a progreſs through all the principal towns and cities of the kingdom, and, ſummoning the inhabitants together, re-inſtated them in the poſſeſſion of their lands, which they had ſold to the king, on a condition that they ſhould pay a fifth part of the produce thereof for the uſe of their ſovereign; ſtrictly enjoining them to be equally ſedulous in the improvement of the ground, and, of courſe, in promoting his majeſty's intereſt, as if the whole of the land was their own property. This unexpected reſtitution rejoiced the people to that degree, that they with the utmoſt alacrity ſet about repairing the damage which their lands had ſo lately ſuſtained. This truly magnanimous act of juſtice, which had been ſuggeſted to the king by Joſeph, greatly increaſed his reputation and influence, both with the ſovereign and the people: and, from this time, the above fifth part was, by an act of the ſtate, ſettled upon the crown in perpetuity.

Jacob dies in the Arms of his Children. The Death of Joſeph.

Death of Jacob.

JACOB having reſided ſeventeen years in Egypt, and arrived to the age of an hundred and forty-ſeven years, reſigned his breath while in the embraces of his children, invoking heaven to beſtow health and plenty upon them, and to proſper them in all their undertakings. Before his deceaſe, he predicted that their iſſue ſhould acquire the dominion of a part of the land of Canaan, and this was verified by the events which will be related hereafter. He highly applauded the virtuous conduct of Joſeph, in generouſly returning offices of friendſhip for the iniquity which had been manifeſted towards him; and, in fine, he expreſſed a more tender conſideration even for his enemies, than was uſual for moſt others to entertain for their deareſt friends. He particularly enjoined them to admit Joſeph's ſons, Ephraim and Manaſſes, as ſharers with them in the diviſion of the land of Canaan. Jacob experienced the particular bleſſings of heaven, which were beſtowed upon him as a reward for his uniform practice of virtue, and a due reverence to his Creator, whereby he rendered himſelf equally eminent with the moſt diſtinguiſhed of his anceſtors. Having expreſſed a deſire that his remains might be depoſited in Hebron, Joſeph obtained the king's permiſſion, and cauſed the body to be removed to that place, where the funeral was ſolemnized with great magnificence.

Joſeph comforts his brethren.

The ceremony being over, the brothers were greatly alarmed, dreading that, as they had been deprived of their only mediator in their deceaſed father, Joſeph might execute a juſt and ſevere revenge for the injuries he had ſuſtained, and on this conſideration, for their perſonal ſafety, they judged it improper to return; but Joſeph removed all their ſcruples, and beſtowed upon them valuable and large poſſeſſions, and in every inſtance behaved to them with generous reſpect and brotherly affection. Joſeph departed this life at the age of one hundred and ten years †. He was a man of rigid virtue and great prudence, and he exerciſed the power intruſted to him with ſuch judgment, modeſty, and forbearance, as to acquire the veneration of all ranks of people; and his character was ſo perfectly eſtabliſhed, and free from every injurious imputation, that even the aſperſions of Potiphar's wife were diſcredited. He was advanced to the moſt exalted offices in the government; and the ſuperiority of his qualifications and unimpeached integrity ſecured him from envy and reproach, while his penetration and addreſs in buſineſs gave him the ſingular advantage of eaſily conquering

His death and excellent character.

* The prieſts of Egypt were compoſed of the nobles; they were the king's counſellors and principal agents. They were well ſkilled in aſtronomy, and occupied the chief offices in the ſtate. Joſeph did not purchaſe their eſtates, becauſe of the greatneſs of their authority, and the ſacredneſs of their perſon and property: they were conſequently under no neceſſity of diſpoſing of their lands during the famine, eſpecially as the king diſtributed among them a ſufficiency of proviſions for the uſe of themſelves and families.

† The bones of Joſeph were not carried out of Egypt till the miraculous departure of the Iſraelites from thence, though the remains of the other Patriarchs were interred in Hebron.

ſuch difficulties as others would not have attempted to overcome. The reſt of the brethren remained in Egypt, enjoying the greateſt happineſs; and after their deceaſe, their bodies were conveyed to Hebron, and there buried. The remains of Joſeph were the laſt removed; as he had directed, they were conveyed into Canaan, at the period when the Hebrews evacuated the country.

We ſhall firſt ſhew the occaſion and manner of theſe people quitting Egypt, and then proceed to the relation of their hiſtory and adventures.

CHAP. VIII.

The wretched Condition of the Hebrews in Egypt, for the Term of four hundred Years. Moſes is born. The wonderful Interpoſition of Providence in his Preſervation, by the means of Pharaoh's Daughter.

Envious conduct of the Egyptians towards the Hebrews.

THE Egyptians are habitually a peeviſh, indolent nation, equally addicted to the indulgence of pleaſure and the accumulation of wealth, by whatever baſe means it could be obtained. It is not at all ſurpriſing, therefore, that they ſhould caſt an eye of envy on the Hebrews, who, they perceived, were in direct contradiction to their genius, an active and laborious people, abounding in numbers and wealth: a people, in ſhort, whoſe proſperity they could not behold without regret; being apprehenſive, moreover, that they might in time, from the increaſe of their riches and numbers, become dangerous neighbours *. The government of the kingdom having paſſed into other hands, and the ancient ſervices which Joſeph had rendered the ſtate being totally forgotten, the Iſraelites were no longer conſidered in the light of friends, but of ſlaves; the Egyptians racking their inventions to diſcover new modes of harraſſing and oppreſſing them.

Severe bondage of the Iſraelites.

In the proſecution of this deſign, they employed them in draining rivers, and directing their courſe into new channels; walling of towns, throwing up banks to repel inundations, and forming dykes; nay, even in erecting uſeleſs and fantaſtic pyramids; forcing them to acquire the knowledge of various painful and pernicious occupations, and condemning them to a life of continual labour. Such was the bondage to which they were ſubjected for nearly four hundred years; the Egyptians endeavouring, by the hardſhips which they cauſed them to endure, totally to extirpate them; while the Hebrews, on the other hand, ſubmitted to their misfortunes with a reſignation truly exemplary.

* It is very likely that Joſephus here uſes the liberty of other hiſtorians, and diſcovers an unwarrantable partiality to his countrymen, and unjuſt ſentiments of the Egyptians: Moſes, on the contrary, pays them no compliments, but ſays, that the Iſraelites were a perverſe and ſtubborn generation.

Prediction concerning Moſes.

While matters were in this ſtate, a report was ſpread, which raiſed the rancour of the Egyptians againſt them to a greater height than before; inſomuch that they now determined utterly to deſtroy them from the face of the earth. A certain ſcribe, a man particularly famous for his knowledge in future events, predicted to the king that a Hebrew child would be born nearly about that period, who, if he lived to attain the age of manhood, would be a ſcourge to the people of Egypt, highly advance the glory of his own nation, and would acquire immortal fame by his virtue and bravery. This intelligence gave ſuch an alarm to the king, that, by the advice of the ſcribe, he commanded the Egyptian midwives diligently to attend the delivery of every Hebrew woman; preſerving each female infant, and caſting every male into the river. He intruſted the execution of this order to the Egyptian women, as being leaſt likely to neglect the ſtrict performance of it from any motive of pity; and enjoined them, upon pain of death to themſelves and their families, not to ſecrete any child, or, in the leaſt reſpect, to deviate from this command †. This decree was inhuman to an extreme: firſt, as it deprived ſo many parents of their children; ſecondly, as it rendered the parents themſelves acceſſories to the deſtruction of their own offſpring; and, laſtly, as it tended to the utter extinction of the whole race of Hebrews. Their ſituation now ſeemed deſperate; but the providence of God will ever be ſuperior to all human cunning and violence; for this child, of whom the ſcribe had foretold, was born, and ſecretly and ſafely nurtured, in ſpite of all the methods put in practice to deſtroy him, and lived to verify the predictions concerning him. All this was effected in the following manner.

Pharaoh's cruel decree.

Amram's prayer anſwered by a viſion.

There was an Hebrew, named Amram, a man of high rank, and great reputation, whom this decree affected in a particular manner; both as it tended to the extermination of the Jewiſh people, and alſo as it particularly regarded his own family, his wife being at that time pregnant. In this emergency he prayed to God, that he would commiſerate the preſent wretched condition of a people who had never deviated from his worſhip: that he would be their director and preſerver; and that he would, at a proper ſeaſon, extricate them from a calamity which threatened nothing leſs than the utter extirpation of the whole race. The Almighty liſtened to his prayer, and appearing to him in a dream, told him, that as he had not forgotten the piety of his anceſtors, neither would he neglect to reward him alſo according to his merits; encouraging him to hope for a favourable change. When Amram awaked, he communicated his dream to his wife Jochabel, and they were greatly embarraſſed, not knowing what conſtruction to put upon this extraordinary viſion. Soon after this the time of Jochabel's pregnancy expired, and ſhe was delivered with little pain, and in ſo ſhort a time, that the child came into the world before the Egyptian midwives could be called to her aſſiſtance: this circumſtance occaſioned them to put more confidence in what had been foretold to Amram in his dream.

† Had this inhuman edict been intruſted to the hands of the Hebrew midwives, it certainly had failed of its effect; Pharaoh, therefore, in this inſtance, added the wiſdom of the ſerpent to his own malignity, in the iſſuing this barbarous decree.

The birth of Moſes,

The child having been kept for three months in the moſt ſecret manner, Amram became apprehenſive leſt a diſappointment of the prediction, and the deſtruction of father, mother, and infant, ſhould be the conſequence of a diſcovery, and therefore reſolved to leave the diſpoſal of events intirely to the direction of Providence. He revolved in his mind the difficulty and danger of a longer concealment, ſuggeſting that if the child ſhould be ſecreted from obſervation, yet many difficulties and infinite hazard muſt attend himſelf and his family; but he entertained not the leaſt doubt of the veracity of the Almighty, nor of his power to preſerve them from the dangers which appeared to hang over them at that period. They accordingly determined to expoſe the child. For this purpoſe they framed a kind of baſket of bulruſhes* twiſted together, and having pitched the joints, to keep out the water, put the child into it, and ſet it afloat; offering up, at the ſame time, the moſt fervent prayers to God to interpoſe his providence for the preſervation of the infant. The daughter of Jochabel, named Mariam, was ordered by her mother to walk on the oppoſite bank of the river, and to obſerve what became of the child. The following inſtance may ſerve to convince mankind, that it is in vain for human wiſdom to oppoſe the will and pleaſure of ſupreme Being; and that ſuch perſons as, from motives either of advantage or ſecurity, contrive the ruin of others, with whatever ſubtilty their deſigns may be concerted, will find their malicious intentions finally defeated: while thoſe, on the other hand, who calmly and patiently ſubmit to the divine will, ſhall be extricated from their troubles, and ſometimes by ſupernatural means.

Who is expoſed on the water;

It chanced that Thermuthis, the king's daughter, was, at this juncture, taking the air by the river's ſide, and perceiving ſomething floating at a diſtance, ſhe ordered a ſwimmer to go into the water and bring it on ſhore; when the princeſs found it was a child which her attendant was bringing to her, ſhe was highly delighted with the circumſtance. She inſtantly directed that ſome women ſhould be immediately ſought for, to ſuckle the infant. Several were accordingly brought and tried, but without effect, as the babe ſhewed the utmoſt averſion to take the breaſt. Mariam, who came to the ſpot at the time, apparently from mere curioſity, obſerved to the princeſs, that the method then taken would anſwer no purpoſe; "For," ſaid ſhe, "the child being of one country and the nurſe of another, it is not likely that the milk of the ſtranger ſhould be either wholeſome or palatable to him; but, if any Hebrew woman could be procured, he may, perhaps, receive her milk with readineſs and ſatisfaction." This propoſal appeared ſo reaſonable to the princeſs, that ſhe ordered Mariam to endeavour to find ſuch a nurſe without delay. She returned, in a ſhort time, with the mother of the child, who was totally unknown to the princeſs and all preſent; and no ſooner did Jochabel offer the infant the breaſt, than he began to ſuck with the utmoſt eagerneſs; which being remarked by the king's daughter, ſhe deſired her to take charge of the infant. Thus, as a ſpecial inſtance of God's favour to Moſes, he was ſaved from impending death; and was nurtured and educated by thoſe very perſons who had devoted the whole race of the Hebrews to deſtruction on his account alone †.

And afterwards preſerved by Pharaoh's daughter.

The child was named Mo-Yſes, with reference to the circumſtance of his preſervation; Mo, in the Egyptian language, denoting water, and Yſes ſignifying preſerved ‡. This child became, in proceſs of time, beyond diſpute, the moſt accompliſhed perſon throughout the kingdom, as the Almighty had predicted to Amram. He was deſcended, in the ſixth generation, from Abraham; his father Amram being the ſon of Caath, the ſon of Levi, the ſon of Jacob, the ſon of Iſaac, who was the ſon of Abraham. As he grew up, he manifeſted a maturity of underſtanding far ſuperior to his years. His childiſh amuſements partook of ſeriouſneſs, and were of ſuch a nature as even to convey inſtruction, all his actions being accompanied with ſuch a grace, as gave the world a ſpecimen of what might be expected from him in future. At three years of age, the beauty of his perſon created univerſal admiration, and rendered him pleaſing to men of the moſt cynical and moroſe diſpoſition.

Extraordinary endowments of Moſes.

Thermuthis, from a principle of pure affection to the child, and being herſelf unmarried, determined to adopt him. She introduced him to her father, whom ſhe addreſſed, on the occaſion, in theſe words: "This infant is of the ſweeteſt and moſt tractable diſpoſition that can be imagined. I have brought him up myſelf, and am indebted to the bounty of the Nile for the precious gift. It is my intention to adopt him; and I now preſent him to you as a ſucceſſor to your

Who is adopted by Thermuthis.

* It is moſt probable that what is here rendered bulruſhes, were the flags of the tree papyrus, of which the Egyptians made their paper; and Clemens Alexandrinus confirms this aſſertion.

† Profane writers aſſert, that Thermuthis being married, and having no iſſue, ſhe pretended pregnancy, and that ſhe was delivered of a male child, who was this Moſes.

throne." The king received the child from her hands with an affectionate tenderneſs, and fondling him, to gratify his daughter's humour, took the crown from his own head, and placed it on that of the child, who, handling it in a wanton, careleſs manner, let it fall to the ground, after which he trampled on it.

Prediction concerning Moſes.

This incident was conſidered, by thoſe preſent, as a bad omen, both to the king and the ſtate; inſomuch that the ſcribe, formerly mentioned, declared aloud, that the boy ought to be deſtroyed; for this, ſaid he, addreſſing himſelf to the king, "is the child, who, I predicted to you, would bring deſtruction upon Egypt; and he has, in the preſent inſtance, partly verified the prophecy, by the contempt he has manifeſted for your government, in thus treading your crown under his feet. This is he, in ſhort, from whoſe death alone you can hope for the peaceful enjoyment of your authority; and, by adopting my advice, you will deprive the Hebrews of all hope, and will remove every future cauſe of apprehenſion in the Egyptians." The king, however, gave no heed to this warning, but ſuffered his daughter to remove the child, without the leaſt oppoſition: a further inſtance of the eminent favour with which the Almighty conſtantly diſtinguiſhed Moſes. The liberal education which the princeſs beſtowed on him, created an expectation in the Hebrews that he would, in the courſe of time, effect their deliverance; while the Egyptians, on the other hand, were equally apprehenſive of miſchief from the ſame cauſe: but, as they had no proſpect of a ſucceſſor to the throne worthy of that dignity, the barbarous deſign, which had been concerted againſt Moſes, was ſuffered to drop.

CHAP. IX.

The Exploits of Moſes in the War againſt the Ethiopians.*

The Ethiopian war.

SUCH was the education which Moſes received; and as he approached to manhood, he gave repeated proofs of his conduct and courage, and of the eminence which it might be expected he would acquire in future by his military atchievements. He particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf for his ſkill in the ſcience of war on the following occaſion.

The Ethiopians had made an incurſion upon the territories of Egypt, and laid waſte a conſiderable tract of the country. This action highly incenſed the Egyptians, who raiſed a numerous army, with the view of taking ample vengeance for the inſult and injury. A battle enſued, and the Egyptians were defeated; a certain number were killed in the action, and the reſt ſhamefully repulſed, and driven back to their own home. The Ethiopians purſued their advantage ſo cloſely, that they over-ran the whole country as far as Memphis, and from thence to the ſea; burning and deſtroying every thing whereever they came, without oppoſition on the part of the inhabitants. In this dilemma, the Egyptians applied themſelves to their prieſts and oracles for advice. The anſwer they received was, that they muſt ſolicit the aſſiſtance of a certain Hebrew to extricate them from their difficulties. The king thereupon acquainted his daughter, that he propoſed to ſend another army againſt the Ethiopians, and that he was very deſirous that Moſes ſhould take upon himſelf the command of his forces. The princeſs readily engaged to exert all her influence to induce him to comply with the king's deſire; but ſhe previouſly bound her father, by a ſolemn oath, ſtrictly to prohibit every attempt againſt his perſonal ſafety; at the ſame time reproaching the prieſts with the baſeneſs of imploring the aid of a perſon whoſe deſtruction they had ſo lately meditated and adviſed.

Moſes appointed commander of the Egyptian forces.

Thermuthis and the king found little difficulty in prevailing on Moſes to accept of this commiſſion, and his compliance gave infinite ſatisfaction to thoſe inveſted with the ſacred function of both nations. The joy of the Egyptians aroſe, firſt, from the hopes of ſubduing their enemies under his conduct; and, next, from the proſpect of being able, after having obtained the ends for which he was advanced to the above poſt, to effect the deſtruction of Moſes. The Hebrews, on the other hand, were happy in the idea, that, under the direction of ſo expert a leader, they might probably, in a courſe of time, be enabled to throw off the yoke of the Egyptians. Moſes deliberated on the propereſt method to attack the enemy unexpectedly in their quarters. The paſſage through the interior part of the country was much infeſted with ſerpents, both of the flying and creeping kinds, and all remarkably fierce and venomous. This route was generally conſidered as being too dangerous to riſque the march of an army through it. Moſes, for this very reaſon, preferred it to the other road along the banks of the Nile, and the event juſtified his choice. To provide againſt the dangers of this perilous paſſage, he adopted the following ſtratagem. The Ibis† is a mortal enemy to all kinds of ſerpents, who conſtantly fly from its preſence with the utmoſt precipitation. Though this bird is deſtructive of thoſe reptiles, it is gentle and

* We do not find, in the ſacred records, this part of the hiſtory of Moſes, which makes him general of the Egyptians againſt the Ethiopians; it is, however, cited by Irenæus, who writes, that "When Moſes was nouriſhed in the king's palace, he was appointed general of the army againſt the Ethiopians, whom he conquered; and that he married the king's daughter, becauſe, out of affection for him, ſhe delivered up the city into his hands."

† This bird approaches to the ſtork kind, and is by ſome confounded very erroneouſly with the hæmatopus or red-legged heron. It is all over of a fine ſhining black; its beak is long, ſomewhat hooked, and all over of a fine red, as are alſo its legs, which are as long as thoſe of the bittern; its neck is as long as that of the common heron.

inoffenſive to all other creatures. The method which Moſes adopted, to preſerve his troops from the attacks of theſe venomous animals, was, to carry with him a number of the above mentioned birds, confined in cages made of bulruſhes, or of the flags of papyrus before mentioned.

He obtains a complete victory over the Ethiopians.

When Moſes had arrived at that part of the country which is infeſted by the above-mentioned noxious animals, he turned the birds looſe, and the ſerpents diſperſed, as from a natural enemy. He now haſted in purſuit of the Ethiopians, whom he ſurpriſed and defeated; and having effectually cut off a retreat into Egypt, ſuch as eſcaped the fury of the battle were under a neceſſity of returning home. After this he beſieged and laid waſte ſeveral towns and cities, and committed great ſlaughter upon the people.

This victory revived the drooping courage of the Egyptians; while the Ethiopians, on the other hand, were reduced to deſpair, having no proſpect but death or ſlavery. They were at length compelled to retire to Saba, the capital of Ethiopia, to which city Cambyſes afterwards gave the name of Meroe, in compliment to his ſiſter. Moſes laid ſiege to this place, although nature and art ſeemed to have combined to render it impregnable: it being ſituated at the conflux of the rivers Aſtaphus and Aſtabora with the Nile: it is likewiſe ſeated on an iſland, encompaſſed with a ſtrong wall, and defended by ramparts and other works, from the attacks of an enemy and the inundations of the Nile.

Moſes was much diſſatisfied with his preſent ſtate of inactivity, the enemy keeping cloſe within their walls: but, in the interim, an incident happened of a very extraordinary nature. On a certain day, Tharbis, the daughter of the king of Ethiopia, obſerving Moſes, ſword in hand, conducting himſelf with great bravery under the walls of [illegible] town, was ſo charmed with his behaviour, that ſhe fell paſſionately in love with him. Her affection increaſing, ſhe opened her mind on the ſubject to ſome of her moſt intimate friends, and commiſſioned them to make an offer to Moſes of her hand. He accepted the propoſal, on condition that the city ſhould be ſurrendered previous to the celebration of the nuptials; this agreement was ratified with an oath, and, almoſt in the ſame inſtant, carried into execution. A great ſlaughter was made of the Ethiopians; and, after the ſolemnization of the marriage, the Egyptians returned home crowned with victory.

Moſes marries an Ethiopian princeſs. See Numb. xii. 1.

CHAP. X.

The Ingratitude of the Egyptians towards Moſes, who flies to Midian.

The Egyptians ſeek to deſtroy Moſes.

THE only return which thoſe ungrateful people made for all the benefits they had received from the preſerver of their nation was, to carry their envy and hatred of him to ſuch extremity as to lay ſnares for his life. They were apprehenſive leſt the great reputation he had acquired by his military atchievements, might inſpire him with the deſign of rendering himſelf independent, and therefore accuſed him to the king of having murdered a native of the realm *. The king was but too well inclined to liſten to the calumny, from a jealouſy of his fame for valour and wiſdom, and from the inſinuations of the prieſts and ſcribes, who never ceaſed their importunities till they had prevailed on that prince to become a party in the combination againſt him. In ſhort, Moſes was doomed to death; and it was by a particular interpoſition of Providence that he was enabled to eſcape, in the very moment that his enemies had fixed on for the execution of their deſign.

Being accuſed of murder, he flees from Egypt, and comes to Midian.

Having learnt that the roads were way-laid, he directed his flight through a deſert, naturally concluding that no one would think of tracing him thither. Throughout his whole journey he could not procure any kind of food. About noon he arrived within a ſmall diſtance of Midian, a city on the coaſt of the Red Sea, which was ſo named from one of the ſons of Abraham by Keturah. Being come within ſight of the city, he ſat himſelf down by the ſide of a fountain. As he ſat there, an incident happened, which took its riſe, in ſome meaſure, from a cuſtom of the country; and it afforded him an opportunity, not only of ſignaliſing his courage and regard for juſtice, but alſo of advancing his fortune. Such is the ſcarcity of water in that country, that each ſhepherd ſtrives to be firſt at the fountain in the morning, before it be drawn dry. At this time there came to the fountain ſeven virgin ſiſters, the daughters of Raguel, a prieſt, held in much eſtimation in that part of the country.

In the country of the Troglodytes, the women are employed in attending the flocks; and the daughters of Raguel, or Jethro, having brought their father's ſheep to the well, and drawn a ſufficiency of water, emptied it into troughs, the better to divide it amongſt them †. In the interim, certain ſhepherds

* We are told in ſcripture (Exod. ii. 11, 12.) that "Moſes ſpied an Egyptian ſmiting an Hebrew, one of his brethren—and he ſlew the Egyptian, and hid him in the ſand." So ſtrongly was Moſes animated with an abhorrence of oppreſſion, and ſuch ardent love he breathed to his country, that he could not ſuffer this outrage to paſs unpuniſhed. The ſcripture intimates, that he intended by this action to rouſe the dormant ſpirit of liberty in his countrymen, and prepare them for accepting that general deliverance from thraldom he was about to offer them in the name of God. Refer to Acts vii. for a full account of him.

† As in thoſe countries there is a great ſcarcity of water, and but few wells, the ſhepherds were apt to ſtrive who ſhould get firſt poſſeſſion of the wells, leſt others coming before ſhould not leave water enough for their cattle. And therefore to prevent quarrels, it was a law in ſome places, that the ſhepherds ſhould wait for one another, and water their flocks all together. See Gen. xxix. 8.

came to the ſpot, and obliged the virgins to retire, intending themſelves to make uſe of the water which had been drawn. The brutality of this behaviour enraged Moſes, who eſpouſed the cauſe of the virgins, and compelled the ſhepherds to relinquiſh their deſign. The daughters of Raguel expreſſed a due ſenſe of the obligation which the ſtranger had conferred upon them; and, on their return to their father's houſe, acquainted him with all the particulars which had paſſed: unanimouſly requeſting, that he would make ſome return for the kindneſs which had been ſhewn them. Raguel was charmed with the grateful diſpoſition of his daughters, and ordered them to bring the ſtranger to his houſe, that he might reward him according to his merit. Moſes being introduced to him, he aſſured him, that he would give him ſpeedy conviction, that he had not conferred an obligation on a perſon deſtitute of gratitude. He afterwards received him into his family, adopted him, beſtowing one of his daughters on him in marriage; and appointed him to the ſuperintendency of all his cattle, which in thoſe days, when paſturage was the general ſource of wealth, was eſteemed an honourable ſtation.

Raguel adopts Moſes, and ſets him over his flocks.

CHAP. XI.

God appears to Moſes in the burning Buſh. The Rod of Moſes converted into a Serpent.

Divine appearance to Moſes.

MOSES was now eſtabliſhed in the houſe of his father-in-law, Jethro, or Raguel, and had the intire management of his flocks. Mount Sinai was famous for its excellent paſture, and exceeded all the mountains of the country in height. A tradition prevailed among the neighbouring people, that this mountain was the reſidence of the Almighty; and, in this perſuaſion, they conſtantly forbore either to feed their ſheep, or even to walk thereon. It chanced that Moſes drove his ſheep hither on a certain day, and, while he was employed in attending them, a phænomenon * of a very extraordinary nature appeared to him: he perceived a fire burning in a buſh, the flames of which were remarkably fierce, yet neither the leaves, flowers, nor branches received the leaſt damage. This ſight greatly ſurpriſed Moſes; but his aſtoniſhment was raiſed to the higheſt pitch, when he heard a voice from the midſt of the buſh, calling him by name, and addreſſing him in theſe words: "How durſt thou preſume to ſet foot on this ſpot, where no mortal ever trod before, ſolely on account of the univerſal reverence in which this place has ever been held? Retire; and be contented with the privilege you have enjoyed, in conſequence of your own virtues, and of thoſe of your anceſtors; nor dare to purſue your curioſity any farther." The voice alſo predicted to him, that he ſhould acquire great reputation; and ordered him to return to Egypt, where he ſhould obtain an unlimited command over the nation of the Hebrews, and ſhould finally deliver them from their preſent bondage; "For," ſaid the voice, "they ſhall inherit the lands which Abraham poſſeſſed: and to your wiſdom they ſhall be indebted for the acquiſition of all thoſe bleſſings. But do not fail, when you ſhall have conducted the Hebrews out of Egypt, immediately to offer up a ſacrifice on this very ſpot."

The burning buſh.

When the voice had done ſpeaking, Moſes, in the utmoſt amazement, replied in the following terms: "I know thee, Lord, and, after the example of all my anceſtors, have conſtantly adored thy power. It were madneſs, therefore, in the extreme, to heſitate to obey thy mandates. Yet how ſhall I, without abilities, and in an obſcure ſtation, be enabled to prevail on ſuch a multitude, firſt, to abandon their preſent ſettlement; and, ſecondly, to follow me, intirely, under an uncertainty, whitherſoever I ſhall be pleaſed to conduct them? Nay, admitting that my intereſt with them ſhould be ſufficient to induce them to conſtitute me their leader, who ſhall compel Pharaoh to permit them to depart; ſeeing that the revenues of Egypt would be ſo much diminiſhed by the loſs of their labour?" The voice again ordered him to make himſelf eaſy, promiſing that he ſhould want for no aſſiſtance of which he ſhould ſtand in need. But effectually to remove every doubt which he might ſtill entertain, the voice commanded him to caſt the rod which he held in his hand on the ground. This being done, the rod was inſtantly converted into a ſerpent, twining itſelf in folds, and threatening an attack: and in a ſhort time it returned to its former ſhape. Moſes was then ordered to put his hand into his boſom, which he did, and, upon drawing it out again, it appeared to be as white as chalk, preſently reſuming its native colour. He was further commanded to throw a ſmall quantity of fair water on the ground, where it appeared to have acquired the quality of blood. As Moſes expreſſed the utmoſt aſtoniſhment at the ſight of theſe ſupernatural operations, God aſſured him that he would confer on him the power of working the like miracles, in order to evince to the Hebrews, that he was inveſted with a commiſſion from the Deity, to take upon him the office of their leader.

Moſes pleads his inſufficiency.

The Lord then commanded Moſes to return immediately to Egypt, and, for the greater diſpatch, to continue his journey night and day. Moſes could no longer, after what he had heard and ſeen, have any doubts remaining of God's power and juſtice; he, nevertheleſs, requeſted that he might retain the faculty of working miracles, when he ſhould arrive in Egypt; and that God would condeſcend to communicate to him the name of that awful Being, of whoſe infinite power he had ſo lately received ſuch convincing proofs; in order that he might be enabled, on all occaſions, to invoke him by his proper appellation. The Almighty was pleaſed to grant this requeſt: but the name was, till then, never heard by any man, and I am with-held from mentioning it by a reverential awe*. The gift of performing miracles, at all times, was alſo conferred on Moſes, who was now convinced that he ſhould live to be an eye-witneſs of the happy deliverance of the Hebrews, and of the confuſion of their enemies the Egyptians.

CHAP. XII.

Upon the News of Pharaoh's Death, Moſes and Aaron return to Egypt.

Departure of Moſes from Midian to Egypt.

MOSES having received intelligence of the death of the king of Egypt†, who had compelled him to abandon that country, requeſted permiſſion of Raguel to return thither to his friends and relations. His requeſt being complied with, he began his journey, accompanied by his wife Zipporah, the daughter of Raguel, and the two children he had by her, Gerſhom and Eleazar. Gerſhom, being interpreted, ſignifies a Foreigner; and by Eleazar is ſignified, the Help of God; becauſe it was through the intervention of Providence that Moſes was preſerved from the ſnares laid for him by the Egyptians.

When he had approached nearly to the borders of Egypt, he was met by his brother Aaron, to whom he communicated the wonderful occurrences upon the mount, and the revelations, inſtructions, and ordinances which God had delivered to him. Having made ſome farther progreſs in his journey, great numbers of the moſt conſiderable among the Hebrews came forth to give him welcome. After ſome converſation, Moſes was convinced that the power of words was not alone ſufficient to obtain his point; and therefore, in ſupport of his commiſſion and authority, he had recourſe to miracles, appealing to the evidence of their ſenſes in regard to the wonders he performed; which they beheld with aſtoniſhment, and conſidered as an indiſputable token that God would relieve and provide for the ſafety of his people.

Moſes recounts his ſervices in the Ethiopian war.

Moſes having ſo far prevailed upon the Hebrews, as to obtain a promiſe of obedience to him, repaired to the new king, mentioned the toils he had ſuſtained, and the dangers he had encountered in conducting the war of the Egyptians againſt the Ethiopians; in the proſecution of which he had conſtantly obſerved as unremitting an attention for the advantage of the party to which he was attached, as he could have manifeſted in behalf of his own countrymen; and he remarked, that the rewards he had received were inadequate to his ſervices. He circumſtantially related what the Almighty had communicated to him in his viſion upon Mount Sinai; adding that, to induce a confidence in his promiſes, the Deity had given him tokens by miracles and revelations; finally, importuning Pharaoh not to betray a diſbelief of God by oppoſing his divine pleaſure.

His relation deſpiſed by Pharaoh.

Pharaoh treated the above relation with contempt, ſcorn, and ridicule; whereupon Moſes endeavoured to force conviction upon him by repeating, in his ſight, thoſe miracles which he had performed upon Mount Sinai: but this provoked Pharaoh to a violence of anger and opprobrious language. "Contemptible runagate," ſaid he, "for the ſafety of your perſon you made a ſcandalous retreat from Egypt, and now return to delude the people by the exhibition of your magical ſleights; and have the effrontery to aſſume as much conſequence, as if you were the only man converſant in the divine myſtery; ſo extravagant is your vanity, that you imagine yourſelf an object worthy public adoration: but, notwithſtanding this oſtentation, be informed, that my prieſts can rival your utmoſt dexterity." The prieſts being now called, were directed to throw down their rods, which were inſtantly changed into ſerpents. "I am not unacquainted with the addreſs of the Egyptians," ſaid Moſes, "nor do I hold them in contempt, therefore this circumſtance does not affect me: but I may with confidence declare, that their magic is as much inferior to the works I perform, as human things are to thoſe of divine origin: and I ſhall immediately convince you that I mean not, under the ſemblance of truth, to impoſe illuſions upon the populace; but that I act under the authority of an omnipotent Being, who will puniſh the obſtinacy of thoſe who ſhall wilfully ſhut their eyes againſt ſuch demonſtrative evidence." Thus ſaying, he threw his rod alſo upon the ground, which inſtantly aſſumed the appearance of a ſerpent, and ſwallowed up thoſe of the magicians, one after another; after which it returned to its former ſhape‡.

Moſes's rod devours the ſerpents of the magicians.

This miracle, inſtead of convincing the king, ſerved only to incenſe him ſtill more. He, accordingly, reproved Moſes, and iſſued freſh orders to the officers appointed to overlook the Hebrews at their work, not only to keep them conſtantly em-

* The Jews, to this day, ſeldom or ever mention the name JEHOVAH, or, I AM, even upon the moſt ſolemn occaſions. Would to God that Chriſtians refrained from taking this name in vain; as there is a dreadful curſe denounced againſt all thoſe who wantonly and lightly profane it.

† That is, within the ſpace of forty years, during which Moſes abode in the land of Midian, Acts vii. 23. Exod. vii. 7. Biſhop Uſher takes this king to have been Rameſes, and places his death in the year of the world 2494. His ſucceſſor was Amenophis, who was drowned in the Red ſea about nineteen years after.

‡ This was a ſufficient demonſtration, that the power, by which Moſes was influenced, greatly exceeded that of the Egyptian prieſts. By this Pharaoh would have been convinced, had it not been for the artful inſinuations of the magicians; and a promiſe from them, that they would ſhortly perform greater miracles than Moſes.

ployed, but alſo to make an addition to their ordinary taſks; they were, in conſequence, deprived of their former indulgence, in having the ſtraw they uſed in making bricks brought to them, and were compelled to fetch it during the night, that their day-labour might not be interrupted. But neither the king's diſpleaſure, nor the murmurings of his own people, who were very urgent with him to deſiſt from all further application in their behalf, could prevail on Moſes to recede from the plan he had adopted, to effect their deliverance. He, therefore, again waited on Pharaoh, to requeſt that he would permit the Hebrews to go to mount Sinai, there to offer up an oblation to the Almighty, as they had been commanded.

CHAP. XIII.

The ten Plagues inflicted on the Egyptians, in conſequence of the Obſtinacy of Pharaoh.

THE king did not pay the leaſt regard to the interceſſion of Moſes, and this obduracy proved the ſource of many miſeries to the Egyptians.

Plagues of Egypt.

The firſt miracle which Moſes wrought for the puniſhment of the Egyptians was, by converting the waters of the Nile, which were their only drink, into blood; and this alteration was not in point of colour only, but all thoſe of the natives who were neceſſitated to drink of it were afflicted with a violent cholic, while to the Hebrews it was perfectly wholeſome. The king, being apprehenſive of the total deſtruction of his ſubjects, conſented, at length, that the Hebrews ſhould depart: but, no ſooner was this plague removed, than he immediately recalled his promiſe.

1. The Nile waters turned to blood.

2. Of frogs.

This ingratitude and duplicity ſo highly provoked the Almighty, that he quickly viſited the land with a ſecond judgment: cauſing frogs to be produced in every quarter, in ſuch numbers, that the whole earth was covered with them, and the waters of the river became ſtagnant and corrupted *. The bed-chambers and tables were infeſted by theſe animals; no place was free from them; and the inconvenience was heightened by the noiſome ſtench which they occaſioned. Pharaoh, hereupon, again ſent for Moſes, and acquainted him that he might retire, with the Hebrews, whenever he ſhould think proper. This permiſſion was no ſooner granted, than the frogs totally diſappeared, and all things returned to their former ſtate.

But Pharaoh again refuſed to fulfil his promiſe, on the plea of its having been extorted from him by fear, and, conſequently, that he was under no obligation to comply with the terms thereof. This breach of faith, ſo derogatory to the character of a monarch, was ſucceeded by a farther manifeſtation of the vengeance of the Almighty. The natives were infected with a terrible and uncommon diſeaſe: being covered with lice, which ate into their bodies, and gave them the moſt excruciating pain: neither could any remedy be found for this diſorder, baths, ointments, and all other applications proving equally inefficacious. Pharaoh, therefore, once more conſented that the Hebrews ſhould retire; but, when he perceived that God had freed his ſubjects from the above calamity, he declared that they muſt leave their wives and children in his hands, as pledges for their return.

This circumſtance diſpleaſed the Almighty more than all the reſt of that prince's conduct: as it ſeemed to denote a deſign of deceiving Providence, and an opinion that it was not God, but his ſervant Moſes, who had inflicted theſe puniſhments on the Egyptians, for their injurious and oppreſſive treatment of the Hebrews. The whole country was therefore filled with numberleſs ſwarms of flies and inſects, many of them of ſuch ſpecies as the inhabitants were totally unacquainted with. They lay on the ground in ſuch abundance as to put a ſtop to all tillage; and ſo venomous were they, that multitudes of the people were deſtroyed by them; ſome being ſuddenly taken off, while others fell a prey to lingering diſeaſes, which were generated from the putrefaction of theſe inſects; which for a time alſo ſuſpended the purſuit of agriculture, for what they did not deſtroy was killed by a diſtemper that was baneful to the cattle. But even this was not ſufficient to induce Pharaoh to deſiſt from his oppoſition to the will of God; he would not ſuffer the Iſraelites to go but on the terms of their leaving ſome of their women, and all the children behind them.

The next judgment which the Lord in-

* This plague was well adapted to ſubvert the ſuperſtitions of Egypt; frogs being the inſtruments of their abominations, and the repreſentatives of thoſe impious demons whom they invoked by their incantations.

† Many countries have been partially viſited with locuſts, ſuppoſed to reſemble thoſe in the eaſt. Different parts of England were plagued with them, in 1748; but happily their ſtay was ſhort; ſome of theſe were from two inches and a half to four inches in length. They totally deſtroyed all the vegetables wherever they came; and the deſtruction cauſed by them was ſo great, that they almoſt put a ſtop to vegetation itſelf.

he was wicked, these judgments would have awakened him to a due sense of his danger; but the truth is, that Pharaoh had impiously determined to contest the matter with the Almighty, even at the risk of the destruction of himself and his people. He, at length, yielded that the Hebrews should be at liberty to depart with their wives and children, leaving only their effects behind them, to compensate the Egyptians for the losses they had sustained. But Moses objected to this proposal, as being unreasonable, as, in that case, they should be totally unprovided with sacrifices.

9. Of darkness. This point was debated so long between the king and Moses, that in the interval, a thick darkness was spread over the land, during the continuance of which many persons perished; whilst not a few were apprehensive of being swallowed up in one general abyss. At the expiration of three days and nights, light re-appeared; and Pharaoh still continuing obstinate, Moses once more presented himself before him, and addressed him in these terms: "How long will you set your will in competition with that of the Almighty; he enjoins you, by me, to dismiss his people, the Hebrews; and nothing but a compliance with his pleasure in this respect, can preserve you from the impending destruction." The freedom of this expostulation so incensed the king, that he ordered Moses, at the peril of his life, never to mention another syllable to him on the subject. Moses replied, that he had now fully executed his commission; but that he was perfectly convinced that, in a very short time, both the king and his nobles would, of their own accord, urge the Israelites to hasten their departure: and with these words, he retired.

The Almighty retained still one plague in store, to punish the impious obstinacy of Pharaoh. He commanded Moses to give notice to the Hebrews to make ready on the thirteenth, the sacrifice which they were accustomed to offer on the fourteenth day of the month Xanticus. This month, which the Macedonians term Xanticus, is called, by the Hebrews, Nisan; and Pharmuthi by the Egyptians. Moses, in obedience to the command, convened all the Hebrews in one place; dividing them into tribes and companies. The assigned day being arrived, and all the necessary preparations made, early in the morning they offered up a sacrifice, sprinkling their houses with the blood of the victims for the purpose of purifying them. The flesh which was not eaten, they burnt; being upon the point of entering upon their journey. Such are the ceremonies, which we observe to this day, in the celebration of the Pascha, which signifies passing over; because God passed over the Hebrews without doing them the least hurt, when the Egyptians were struck dead by the pestilence;

10. Death of the first-born, by pestilence. which, in the course of one night, made such devastation among the first-born* of Egypt, that multitudes of people of all ranks beset the palace, loudly importuning the king to dismiss the Hebrews without any further delay. That prince, thereupon, sent for Moses, and ordered him to assemble his countrymen, and to retire with them out of the land; being strongly prepossessed, that the deliverance of Egypt could never be effected while they should remain in the country. At their departure, many of the Egyptians presented them with valuable gifts; some merely with the view of hastening them away, others from motives of friendship; nor could they refrain from tears at parting from the Hebrews; many feeling a sincere compunction for the barbarities they had been guilty of towards them.

* Calmet writes, that the term First-born in scripture often signifies the chief ones, the most distinguished, Exod. iv. 22. Psal. lxxxix. 27. Mic. vi. 7. So it may signify here the princes or chief ones of Egypt, as it seems to have been understood, Wisdom xviii. 12. The Jewish doctors tell us, that all the idols of Egypt were destroyed this night; and Artapanus, in Eusebius, says that most of their temples were overthrown by an earthquake; to which some add, that God also destroyed their sacred animals.

CHAP. XIV.

The Hebrews depart from Egypt, under the Conduct of Moses.

THE route which the Israelites took was by Letopolis, a city at that time uninhabited; and on the site of which Cambyses, in his expedition against Egypt, built the city of Babylon. They marched with great expedition, and, on the third day after their departure, arrived at Beelzephon, on the borders of the Red Sea. As they could obtain no provisions in their passage through the wilderness, they subsisted, for the space of thirty days, on no other food than meal kneaded with water, and made into cakes. They had now exhausted all the food they had brought out of Egypt, although they had used it with all possible parsimony. It is in commemoration of that scarcity, that the festival of eight days is held, which we call that of Unleavened Bread. But the number of the Hebrews was prodigious: there being sixty thousand men capable of bearing arms, exclusive of the women and children.

Departure of the Hebrews from Egypt. On the fifteenth day of the month Xanticus, the Hebrews departed out of Egypt; Moses being, at that time, in the eightieth year of his age, and Aaron, his brother, in the eighty-third. A period of two hundred and fifty years had elapsed from the time of Jacob's arrival in Egypt; and of four hundred and fifteen years from the æra of the entrance of Abraham into Canaan. They carried with them the bones of Joseph, as he had enjoined his sons, some time previous to his death.

They are pursued by the Egyptians. The Egyptians quickly repented of the permission they had granted the Hebrews to withdraw themselves; the king in particular, who imputed all the misfortunes which had befallen the nation, to the enchantments of Moses.

They

They determined, therefore, to purſue them*; believing that they ſhould eaſily ſubdue and compel them to return in their wearied and defenceleſs ſituation, if they ſhould but be able to overtake them; but this they doubted, the road which they had taken being replete with difficulties even to a ſingle traveller, but much more ſo to ſo large a number of perſons marching in one body.

Their route near the Red Sea.

But the motives which induced Moſes to prefer this road to any other, were various: firſt, he hoped, that the very length of the way would deter the Egyptians from purſuing him, even if they ſhould incline to that meaſure. Another reaſon was, that he wiſhed to avoid paſſing near Paleſtine, leſt the people of that place, between whom and the Hebrews an enmity ſubſiſted of ancient date, ſhould gain intelligence of their march, and take that opportunity to fall upon and deſtroy them. He was further induced to paſs by the way of the wilderneſs, though inconvenient and round about, from a deſire of performing the vow, which he had formerly made, to ſacrifice on Mount Sinai, as God had commanded him; intending from thence to direct his courſe to Canaan.

Pharaoh overtakes the Iſraelites:

When they arrived on the coaſt of the Red Sea, they were overtaken and ſurrounded by the Egyptian army, which conſiſted of ſix hundred chariots, fifty thouſand horſe, and two hundred thouſand foot †; the main body being drawn up in battle array. The Egyptians had ſecured all the paſſes, and ſo effectually ſhut up the Hebrews between impaſſable mountains, and the ſea, that they had not the leaſt proſpect whatever of eſcaping. To fly or fight with ſucceſs was equally impracticable; and thus they were reduced to the wretched alternative either to ſtarve, or yield themſelves ſlaves to the Egyptians. In this deſperate ſituation, they imputed the blame of all their misfortunes to Moſes. The many wonders which God had wrought for their deliverance, and for the confirmation of their faith, were now obliterated. The clamours and cries of the women and children, who conſidered themſelves as being utterly loſt, incenſed the people ſo much, that they were on the point of ſtoning Moſes, whom they now conſidered as a falſe prophet, and of reſigning themſelves once more to the abject ſlavery from which they had ſo lately been delivered.

Who are encouraged to return to God.

Moſes, however, was not to be moved, either by the threats or outrages of this headſtrong multitude: he placed the firmeſt confidence in the power of God, who, he was convinced, after having afforded them ſo fair a proſpect of obtaining their liberty, would not ſuffer his people to return under the yoke of their enemies.

CHAP. XV.

The Red Sea dividing, affords a Paſſage for Moſes and his Followers: the whole Egyptian Army, being in Purſuit, is drowned by a ſudden Return of the Waters.

The Iſraelites at the Red Sea.

MOSES led the Hebrews towards the ſea, in ſight of the Egyptians, who, being fatigued with the purſuit, had reſolved to take ſome refreſhment, and defer giving battle till the next day. Having arrived at the ſea-ſide, Moſes, taking out his rod, addreſſed himſelf in prayer to the Almighty; which being concluded, he ſtruck the ſea with his rod (which was the enſign of his commiſſion for performing miracles), and the waters inſtantly divided; upon which, putting himſelf at the head of his men, he inſtructed them to offer thankſgivings to heaven for the remarkable providence manifeſted in their favour, and, in the name of the Almighty, called upon them to follow him. The Egyptians, obſerving them to proceed on the way which had been formed for their eſcape by the miraculous retreat of the waters, conſidered them as poſſeſſed of infanity, and judged that they were on the verge of inevitable deſtruction; but ſeeing them continue their courſe without impediment, they prepared to purſue them, flattering themſelves in the vain imagination, that they might paſs the ſame road with as little danger and interruption. While the Egyptians were arming themſelves, and making other preparations for the attempt, the Hebrews reached the oppoſite ſhore. The Egyptians did not apprehend, that the paſſage had been opened ſolely for the preſervation of the people of God, and ruin of their perſecutors, but upon being witneſs to the ſucceſs of Moſes and his followers, they became more eagerly determined upon a purſuit, and more confident of ſucceſs in their intended enterprize. They proceeded on their deſign; and when they had got within the bed of the river, the waters returned to their former courſe, and the whole army periſhed. This ſignal judgment was attended with ſtorms of thunder, lightning, rain, and other violent contentions of the elements, ſo that nothing can be conceived more dreadful than the calamity of theſe infatuated people, who fell victims to the diſpleaſure of an offended God ‡.

Safe paſſage of the Iſraelites:

And deſtruction of the Egyptian army.

* Beſides their duty to the king, the proſpect of recovering their veſſels of gold and ſilver, and precious veſtments, tempted them to the purſuit. Of all the infatuations that ever poſſeſſed the Egyptians, this was the ſtrongeſt, that they ſhould adventure to purſue the Iſraelites, when they ſaw, or might have ſeen, the ſea opening her boſom to give them a paſſage.

† The Egyptian army conſiſted only of chariots and horſemen, for they were in haſte to overtake the Iſraelites.

‡ This diviſion of the Red Sea has given riſe to the profane laughter of thoſe deſcribed by the Apoſtle as "Scoffers, walking after their own luſts."—Their great leader and guide, Voltaire, has ſhewn them the way, and he has had many willing diſciples: but his impious aſſertions have met with ſuch ample refutation, that I need not trouble the reader with a detection of them here. Moreover, when we conſider that this great work was effected by the arm of Omnipotence, to whom univerſal nature is ſubſervient, the wonder and difficulty vaniſh at once.

It is not in the power of language to deſcribe the joy of the Hebrews for this unexpected deliverance. Seeing their cruel enemies utterly deſtroyed, and themſelves in the ſecure poſſeſſion of liberty, they abounded in expreſſions of the moſt ſincere gratitude towards the Divine Being, whoſe providence had indiſputably directed theſe ſingular events; and they employed the whole night in hymns, thankſgivings, and prayer; and, on the occaſion, Moſes compoſed a ſong in hexameter verſe, which he dedicated to the honour of God.

The dividing of the ſea for the preſervation of the Hebrews, is not to be diſputed; by reference to ancient records, it will be found, that a previous circumſtance of the ſame wonderful kind has occurred. The ſeveral hiſtorians who have given the life of Alexander, atteſt, that when the Macedonians, under the command of that prince, were at a loſs for a paſſage, the Pamphylian ſea divided; Alexander being appointed the inſtrument of God's providence, for the deſtruction of the Perſian empire.

Moſes leads the Hebrews, now armed, to Mount Sinai.

On the day following that of the above-mentioned judgment, the arms of the Egyptians were driven on ſhore, near to the ſpot where the Hebrews had pitched their tents; and this was conſidered by Moſes as an additional inſtance of God's providence, the people being greatly diſtreſſed for want of arms, which were thus provided for their uſe. In obedience to the will of God, Moſes now led his followers to Mount Sinai, there to offer ſacrifice and oblations to God, for their ſignal deliverance, according to his own ſpecial command.

Journey of the Iſraelites from Egypt to Mount Sinai. The Difficulties they encounter on the Way. They murmur againſt Moſes, and are relieved by a Miracle.

Diſtreſs of the Hebrews.

THE extreme hardſhips which the Hebrews ſuffered on their journey through the wilderneſs of Mount Sinai, did not a little abate the joy they felt, on occaſion of their late miraculous and unexpected deliverance. They could procure no food; and the water they chanced to meet with, was in ſmall quantities, and of ſo bad a taſte, that the very cattle would not drink of it. At the inſtigation of their guides, they carried with them a ſupply of water when they firſt entered into the wilderneſs; and, that being exhauſted, they were under the neceſſity of ſinking pits; which, on account of the rocky quality of the ground, was not effected without great labour and fatigue.

In the evening they arrived at a place called Marah, which ſignifies, in the Hebrew, Bitterneſs; this name it acquired from the taſte of its waters. They were much wearied; and, their proviſions having fallen ſhort, they now began to feel the cravings of hunger. But they agreed to make a ſhort ſtay at this place, having fortunately diſcovered a pit of water on the ſpot. This pit, it is true, could not afford a ſufficient ſupply for ſo numerous a company; yet, when they conſidered the general ſtate of the country, and that this was the laſt place where they could expect to find any water till they ſhould arrive at Mount Sinai, the above diſcovery gave them no ſmall ſatisfaction. But this water was equally bitter with the reſt, and was utterly unwholſome, both for the people and their cattle.

Moſes ſaw that the ſpirits of the Iſraelites were much depreſſed; and he was incapable of affording them the leaſt comfort, as their preſent foes were not to be vanquiſhed either by ſkill or valour. The whole community partook of the danger, and unanimouſly importuned Moſes for relief in their diſtreſs. He again had recourſe to ſupplications, praying that God would be pleaſed to correct the bitterneſs of the water, and to render it fit for uſe. The Almighty inſtantly complied; and Moſes took from the ground a piece of wood*, which chanced to lay near at hand, and

The bitter waters of Marah made ſweet.

* In the text, Exod. xv. 25. we read, "The Lord ſhewed him a tree," &c. What tree it was, is quite uncertain: the Jeruſalem Targum calls it ardiphne, a tree which is ſaid to bear flowers like lilies, but exceeding bitter. So that the divine power appeared the more in making it produce a contrary effect. Others think it was ſome tree which had a natural virtue to correct the bitter taſte of the water, which ſeems to have been the opinion of the author of Eccleſiaſticus, ch. xxxviii. 4, 5. But to whatever ſecond cauſe it be aſcribed, the effect appears miraculous, ſince it was produced immediately, and to ſuch a degree, as to correct the taſte of the water for many thouſands.

cleaving it in the middle, threw it into the water; acquainting the Hebrews that God had liſtened to their prayers, and had engaged to provide them with ſuch water as ſhould be fit for drinking; conditionally, that they ſhould yield the moſt implicit obedience to all his commands. This they promiſed; and Moſes ordered them to empty the well of half the water which it contained; aſſuring them that the remainder would, in that caſe, be pure and agreeable. This was accordingly done; and the effect was exactly as Moſes had predicted.

The wants of the Iſraelites increaſing, they threaten Moſes.

The ſtock of proviſions, with which the people had furniſhed themſelves for their ſuſtenance, for the ſpace of thirty days, was now exhauſted, and no means appeared of obtaining a further ſupply. The reflections ſuggeſted by theſe various calamities, plunged them in abſolute deſpondency; and the impulſe of their preſent wants and miſeries obliterated from their minds the remembrance of all the former mercies of God towards them; whether proceeding directly from him, or whether communicated to them through the medium of his ſervant Moſes, whom they accuſed as the cauſe of all their misfortunes, and threatened with immediate death. In the midſt of this furious tumult, while the people, with ſtones in their hands, were preparing to put their threats in execution, Moſes appeared among them, with that firmneſs and confidence which faith in God, and conſcious integrity, will ever inſpire; and, with a force of elocution peculiar to himſelf, reproved them for their ingratitude and impatience. He reminded them of various inſtances ot God's kindneſs to them: ſuch as their redemption from the bondage of Egypt, with the attendant circumſtances; their ſafe paſſage through the Red Sea; the deſtruction of the Egyptians, who were drowned in the attempt to follow them; and the miraculous manner in which it pleaſed God to furniſh them with arms, of which they were before utterly deſtitute; with many other particulars of a like kind.

Theſe gentle chidings reſtored the moſt violent among the multitude to a degree of reaſon; Moſes himſelf palliating their late unruly conduct, which he modeſtly imputed to the peculiarity of their ſituation. He then withdrew to an adjacent rock, where he offered up ſupplications to God, humbly petitioning him to commiſerate the condition of this unfortunate people; to pardon their intemperate paſſions, and to charge the whole blame of their conduct on the weakneſs of their nature. To this prayer God returned for anſwer, that he would ſpeedily relieve the neceſſities of the people.

Moſes, having obtained this promiſe, returned to the people with a joyful countenance, which they conſtrued into a good omen; and, forgetting their late ſadneſs, began to aſſume an air of chearfulneſs. He communicated to them the declaration of the Almighty, that he would quickly take compaſſion on them; which was ſoon afterwards fully verified: for a numerous flight of quails, being over-wearied in their paſſage acroſs the Arabian Gulph, in the neighbourhood of which they are found in great abundance, dropt into the camp of the Hebrews, their ſtrength being totally exhauſted. The people conſidered this circumſtance as an evident interpoſition of Providence in their behalf; and each man eagerly exerted himſelf to procure as large a ſhare as poſſible of this unexpected bounty.

Quails ſent.

The Almighty, in a ſhort time afterwards, furniſhed them with a ſecond ſupply of food, of a different kind: for it chanced, as Moſes was at his devotions, with his hands ſtretched out towards heaven, a ſort of dew fell on them, and ſticking thereto, quickly acquired a conſiderable degree of conſiſtence: Moſes immediately conceived an opinion that this was intended as food for the people, and, taſting it, found to his infinite ſatisfaction, that he had not formed a wrong judgment. The populace entertained a notion that, it being now the winter ſeaſon of the year, this dew was nothing more than a kind of ſnow. Moſes ſoon convinced them of their error; and firſt taſting it himſelf, and then giving it to them to make an experiment, proved to them that it would be found to be a certain preſervative againſt famine: it had ſomething of the flavour of honey, was nearly the ſize of a coriander ſeed, and in its appearance was not unlike bdellium.

And manna.

The gathering of it cauſed, at firſt, much confuſion and ſtrife among the people, till the matter was regulated by an edict; enjoining all perſons to gather each day an equal quantity, which was limited to the meaſure of an omer; Moſes, at the ſame time, giving them the ſtrongeſt aſſurances that they ſhould have a conſtant ſupply of that food. This regulation was made, to prevent the ſtronger from gathering a larger portion than ſhould fall to their ſhare, to the prejudice of the weaker part of the community. To enſure obedience to the edict in queſtion, God ordained, that whatever ſhould be gathered by any perſon, over and above the ſpecified quantity, ſhould, on the next day, become putrid and unfit for food. This dew poſſeſſed one incredible and miraculous property, which was, that all who ate of it preferred it to every other kind of ſuſtenance. To the preſent time, certain dews and rains are common in that country, which nearly reſemble this which Moſes procured by his interceſſion with God. It is ſtyled, by the Hebrews, Manna*: the term Man ſignifying an interrogation: as if we ſhould ſay, What is this? The people expreſſed the utmoſt joy on the occaſion; conſidering this relief as coming immediately from heaven; and this was their ſole ſubſiſtence for the term of forty years, during which they remained in the wilderneſs.

* In ſeveral parts of ſcripture, manna is called angel's food. Pſal. xxviii. 25. &c. This proviſion fell but ſix days in the week; but ſo prodigious was the quantity, that it ſuſtained near three millions of people; every Friday there fell a double quantity, the next day being the ſabbath: it ceaſed as ſoon as the Iſraelites had the corn of Canaan for their bread.

They departed from hence to Rephidim, where they were again greatly diſtreſſed for want of water, not having been able to procure any for the ſpace of ſeveral days. They once more began to reproach Moſes, but he withdrew to a diſtance from them, and offered up prayers to God; beſeeching him that, as he had ſo lately preſerved them from periſhing by hunger, he would now be pleaſed to avert the danger which threatened them, through the want of water. The anſwer which he received was, that God would grant them a ſupply of water where they ſhould leaſt expect it; and ordered him with his rod to ſtrike an adjacent rock, which, in conſequence, ſhould produce a ſufficiency to ſerve their purpoſe. Moſes hereupon, returned to the people, who were become impatient of his ſtay, and intently gazing on his countenance, to try if they could diſcover the ſucceſs of his ſupplications. He acquainted them, that God would relieve them from this calamity alſo, by cauſing a river to flow from that rock. They imagined that they were to have dug a channel for the water through the rock; which to perſons in their exhauſted condition, would have been a work of infinite labour and toil. But they were preſently undeceived: for Moſes ſtriking his rod upon the rock, a conſiderable ſtream of water guſhed forth, which was equal to cryſtal in clearneſs*. It would have been difficult to have decided, whether the people were more aſtoniſhed at the performance of this miracle, or overjoyed at the unexpected relief, the water being perfectly ſweet and palatable. Perceiving by this event that Moſes ſtood highly in favour with the Almighty, the people were now extravagant in their praiſes of him, and offered ſacrifices to God, in token of their gratitude.

Water from a rock.

There is a paſſage in the holy ſcripture, which is preſerved in the temple at Jeruſalem, mentioning that God had predicted to Moſes all the circumſtances of this miracle, ſome time before it was carried into execution.

CHAP. II.

Five Kings enter into a Confederacy againſt the Hebrews. Joſhua defeats the Amalekites. The Hebrews arrive at Mount Sinai.

THE whole adjacent country now rang with the fame of the Hebrews; and the rulers of the various provinces entertained ſo ſtrong a dread of their proweſs, that they formed a confederacy among themſelves, the object of which was, either to compel them to retire to a greater diſtance, or otherwiſe utterly deſtroy them: and, with this view, they ſent embaſſadors to each other, to concert the neceſſary meaſures.

Five kings embarked in this enterprize againſt the Hebrews; and as many of their neighbours, as they could prevail upon, they engaged to favour their deſign.

They determined to engage in a war which might drive the Hebrews from their territories; which gave no ſmall alarm to Moſes, and the people were thrown into the utmoſt confuſion, by the proſpect of ſo unexpected a war with an enemy who were amply provided with every neceſſary, of which themſelves were totally deſtitute. Moſes, to remove their deſpondency, reminded them of the many proofs they had received of God's favour, and encouraged them to confide in his omnipotence and mercy for an aſſured victory over their enemies.

The drooping ſpirits of the people, were revived by the interference of their leader, who, convening the chief perſons of the ſeveral tribes, exhorted the younger part of the aſſembly to pay due attention to the advice of thoſe whom age had rendered more experienced than themſelves, and recommended to the reſt an implicit obedience to the orders of their commander. Their late apprehenſions were now totally diſpelled, inſomuch that they expreſſed the utmoſt contempt of every kind of danger, and manifeſted a vehement deſire of coming to action, in full confidence of obtaining ſuch a victory, as ſhould at once deliver them from all their troubles. They, therefore, earneſtly ſolicited Moſes to lead them inſtantly againſt the enemy†, whilſt the ſoldiers continued in ſo favourable a diſpoſition towards an engagement. Moſes thereupon ſelected from the multitude a number of men, whom he deemed the beſt qualified for the ſervice they were to go upon; and forming them into one body, appointed Joſhua, the ſon of Nun, and of the tribe of Ephraim, to be their leader, who was equally famous for his valour and prudence; he was of exemplary piety, a diſciple of Moſes, and one who did honour to the inſtructions of ſo great a maſter. He detached ſeveral parties; ſome to ſecure their water, others to guard their camp, and others to defend the women and children. All the neceſſary preparations were now made for an engagement: the troops lay upon Joſhua choſen general againſt the Amalekites.

* Dr. Shaw, in his travels, particularly mentions this rock, and he ſays, "After we had deſcended with no ſmall difficulty down the other weſtern ſide of Mount Sinai, we came into the plain or wilderneſs of Rephidim, where we ſaw the rock of Meribah, which has continued to the preſent day, without any injury from time, or accident. The waters which guſhed out, and the ſtream which flowed, have made acroſs one corner of this rock a hollow channel, which is incruſted like the inſide of a tea kettle. The Arabs, who were our guides, were ready to ſtone me for attempting to break off a corner of it."

† Theſe were the Amalekites, who inhabited ſome part of Arabia Petrea, near Rephidim, where the Iſraelites had juſt been encamped, and lay between them and Canaan. They are ſuppoſed to have hated the Iſraelites, becauſe of the birth-right Jacob had taken from Eſau; and to have made war upon Iſrael, to hinder their ſettlement in Canaan, to which, perhaps, they imagined their own pretenſions to be as good as theirs, for they were the deſcendents of Eſau, Jacob's elder brother, Gen. xxxvi. 12. where it is ſaid, that Timna, the concubine of Eliphaz, bare to him Amalek, their arms during the night, whilſt Moſes, Joſhua, and the other principal officers of the army, ſat in council, regulating the operations of the enſuing day. When the dawn began to appear, Moſes recommended to Joſhua and the other commanders of the Hebrews, and alſo to the ſoldiers in general, to fulfil, by their conduct on that day, the expectations which the world had conceived of them, and thereby to acquire immortal fame.

Having thus impreſſed their minds with a due ſenſe of piety, and an eager deſire of glory, Moſes recommended them to the divine protection, and retired to the top of the mountain. The two armies immediately joined battle, and the conteſt was carried on with great obſtinacy on both ſides. Whilſt Moſes held up his hands, the battle went in favour of the Iſraelites; but when, through fatigue, he was incapable of holding them up any longer, the Amalekites had the advantage. When Moſes noticed this circumſtance, he deſired Aaron and Hur, the huſband of his ſiſter Miriam, to place themſelves by his ſide, and ſupport his hands; with a ſtrict caution not to ſuffer them to drop again. The Amalekites were utterly routed, and not a man would have eſcaped, had not the darkneſs of the night favoured the flight of the wretched remains of their army. This victory ſtands unparalleled in the whole hiſtory of our anceſtors, both for the glory of the action, and for the beneficial conſequences with which it was attended; it being a deciſive conqueſt obtained over an invading enemy, the fame of which ſpread terror throughout all the adjacent provinces; and which was, likewiſe, attended with an immenſe booty. The plunder conſiſted of gold and ſilver plate, veſſels of braſs curiouſly wrought, money, ſplendid arms and habits, horſes, baggage, and other valuable articles. Such was the event of this battle.

The Amalekites totally routed.

On the next day, Moſes gave orders to ſtrip the bodies of the dead, and to collect their ſcattered arms: he alſo conferred rewards on thoſe who had particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their valour. Nor did he neglect to aſcribe due praiſe to the merit of the general; giving him public thanks for his conduct on the occaſion, which were confirmed by the ſhouts and acclamations of the whole army. The number of the ſlain of the Amalekites was ſo great, as to baffle all computation, whilſt the Hebrews loſt not a ſingle man in the action. Moſes erected an altar on the ſpot, which he dedicated and inſcribed to God the Conqueror, and ſacrificed thereon; predicting, at the ſame time, the total deſtruction of the Amalekites, in conſequence of their treacherous conduct towards the Hebrews, when they were on the verge of periſhing in the wilderneſs. The ſolemnity concluded with feaſtings and rejoicings; Joſhua and the other officers, with the whole army, being entertained by Moſes in a manner ſuitable to the occaſion.

Moſes diſtributes rewards to the army, and, in token gratitude, erects an altar God.

This was the firſt action in which the Hebrews were engaged, from the time of their departure from Egypt. After having refreſhed themſelves for a few days, they proceeded forwards with a better regulated and more numerous army than before; the plunder which they took from the Amalekites having enabled them to ſupply a great number of the people with arms. Continuing their progreſs thus, by ſhort marches, they arrived at Mount Sinai, where, as we have already obſerved, God appeared to Moſes in the burning buſh *. This was the third month from the time of their leaving Egypt.

CHAP. III.

Jethro repairs to Mount Sinai, to felicitate his Son-in-law Moſes on his late Succeſſes.

WHEN the news of the miraculous ſucceſs which Moſes had experienced was communicated to Jethro, he immediately determined to pay his ſon-in-law a viſit, with the view of congratulating him on the occaſion, and of meeting with his daughter Zipporah and their children. Moſes received him with the greateſt joy imaginable; and, offering up a ſacrifice to God, feaſted all the people, diſtinguiſhing them according to their tribes and families, on a ſpot not far diſtant from the burning buſh already mentioned. In the midſt of their feſtivity, Aaron, Raguel, and the reſt, ſung hymns in honour of the Omnipotent Author of their late deliverance: nor did they omit to pay the due tribute of praiſe to the army, and to their preſerver, by whoſe authority and guidance ſo many wiſe and brave men were directed in their proceedings, which were attended with ſuch aſtoniſhing ſucceſs.

Jethro's prudent counſel to Moſes accepted.

While Moſes was attending to the judicial appeals of the public, his father-in-law obſerved, that he muſt be greatly embarraſſed by the diverſity of buſineſs in which he was engaged; but, conſcious that the people held his authority in ſo high a reverence as to ſubmit more chearfully to the moſt ſevere ſentence from him, than obtain a partial deciſion in their favour from another tribunal, he judged it not prudent to interrupt the courſe of public juſtice: but when the buſineſs of the day was concluded, he delivered his ſentiments, and adviſed that other perſons ſhould be united with Moſes in the adminiſtration of juſtice, and in the government of ſo conſiderable a number of people.

This propoſal was highly agreeable to Moſes; and

* There is a convent at Mount Sinai, dedicated to St. Catherine, where the ſhrine and relics of that ſaint are depoſited in a marble cheſt. Adjoining the church is the chapel of the Holy Buſh. Here are two wells: one is called the Well of Moſes, and the other, the Well of the Holy Buſh. The Turks deſtroyed the pavement of the church, expecting to find treaſures; but Athanaſius afterwards repaired it in an elegant manner.

he gave directions for immediately adopting the ſeveral regulations which Jethro had ſuggeſted; and before an aſſembly of the people, acknowledged them to be the production of his father-in-law.

CHAP. IV.

The Law of God is communicated to Moſes upon the Mount Sinai. The Ten Commandments.

Moſes aſcends Mount Sinai.

MOSES called an aſſembly of the people, and informed them of his intention of repairing to the mount for the purpoſe of addreſſing himſelf to the Lord; adding, that he entertained the hope of returning with comfortable aſſurances. Having directed them to pitch their tents at the foot of the mount, he aſcended.

As Moſes had directed, the Hebrews ſtationed themſelves at the foot of the mountain, where they humbled themſelves before the Lord, and ruminated on the agreeable information promiſed them on the return of their leader. During his abſence they obſerved the appointed feſtivals, frequently purified themſelves, and lived in the moſt rigid continence, in obedience to the command impoſed upon them, ſupplicating God to extend his gracious favour to Moſes, and through him to beſtow upon them what might be deemed expedient towards their happineſs. They feaſted on this occaſion, and their wives and children were dreſſed with more than ordinary pomp. Before ſun-riſe, on the third day, a thick cloud* appeared, covering the whole camp of the Hebrews, every other part of the hemiſphere being remarkably clear; this was the firſt prodigy known of the kind. A violent ſtorm of thunder, lightning, wind, and rain enſued, intimating that God was preſent. So greatly alarme[illegible]re the Hebrews by this circumſtance, that, wi[illegible]marks of the greateſt conſternation, they cloſely confined themſelves to their tents, admitting the belief that God, in his diſpleaſure, had taken away Moſes, and that they ſhould experience a ſimilar fate. While they were under this terrible apprehenſion Moſes returned, but with ſuch expreſſions of joy and dignity in his countenance, that their fears were removed: the air now recovered its former ſerenity.

Moſes led the people to a ſpot where they diſtinctly heard the immediate voice of God giving them inſtructions concerning the performance of their duty. To this he was induced by the conſideration, that theſe inſtructions would come with far greater weight from God himſelf than from the lips of any mortal. The voice was diſtinctly heard and underſtood by every one preſent; but with regard to the commandments, which were compriſed in the two tables left by Moſes, we are reſtricted from giving the identical words thereof, but the purport of them is as follows:

1. We are taught that there is but one God, and that he alone is intitled to our adoration.
2. That we are not to worſhip the image or repreſentation of any living creature.
3. That every man is bound to abſtain from ſwearing raſhly.
4. The ſeventh day is to be kept holy, and not to be profaned by labour.
5. That our parents have the ſtrongeſt claim to our obedience and reſpect.
6. That we muſt do no murder.
7. That we are prohibited from committing adultery.
8. That we are not to ſteal the property of another.
9. That we muſt not, in any manner, calumniate the character of others.
10. That no man muſt covet any thing that belongs to his neighbour.

The people expreſſed great ſatisfaction in hearing from the mouth of the Almighty thoſe particulars which had been before communicated to them by Moſes. A few days only had elapſed, however, when they began to importune Moſes to obtain for them a code of laws† for the regulation of their civil concerns, with which he complied.

Moſes re-aſcends the mountain, and remains there forty days.

Nearly about this period Moſes again repaired to the mount, having previouſly acquainted the people with his deſign, that a ſufficient number might be preſent at the time of his retiring thither. As he continued there longer than they had expected, forty days being elapſed before his return, the people began to be apprehenſive for his ſafety; and, in the midſt of their fears, they dreaded nothing ſo much as the being deprived of him by any ſiniſter accident. They were much divided in their ſentiments on the occaſion: ſome, who were not very favourably diſpoſed towards him, inſiſted that he had certainly been devoured by wild beaſts; others, more charitably inclined, fancied that the Almighty had taken him to himſelf; but thoſe of moſt prudence among them, conſidered the matter in both points of view.

He returns to the army.

At the expiration of forty days, during which he taſted neither food nor drink,

* The miraculous cloud of glory indicated ſome inviſible and majeſtic preſence; and the extraordinary commotion and perturbation in the courſe of nature, manifeſtly diſcovered his immediate interpoſition; and the heavenly miniſters, who were attendants upon the divine Majeſty, ſummoned the people by a ſound reſembling that of a trumpet.

† Though it be true that theſe judicial laws were given by Moſes to the Hebrews only, and that other nations muſt be governed by the laws of their ſeveral countries; yet ſuch is the juſtice and equity on which they are founded, as to render them worthy the imitation of other ſtates and kingdoms. And it is not without reaſon alledged, that many of the laws of Sparta, Athens, Rome, and other commonwealths, were borrowed from the Moſaic inſtitution.

Moſes

Moſes returned to the army, by whom he was received with inconceivable joy. He acquainted them, that, as a proof of the divine favour to them, the Almighty had communicated to him, for their uſe, a ſet of inſtructions which would render their lives virtuous and happy. He further informed them, that it was God's pleaſure that they ſhould build a tabernacle *, for his occaſional reſidence among them; whereby the neceſſity of any future journies to Mount Sinai would be precluded, as this tabernacle was ſtill to accompany the army wherever it went. With reſpect to the form and dimenſions of the building, he told them, that he was already provided with full inſtructions; and concluded with producing to them the two tables, on which were inſcribed, by the hand of God himſelf, the ten commandments, five on each table.

CHAP. V.

By the Appointment of God, Moſes erects a ſuperb Tabernacle for the divine Worſhip.

The people contribute largely towards building the tabernacle.

THE return of Moſes, and the diſcourſe he held, greatly elevated the affections of the people, who became emulous to ſurpaſs each other in contributions towards the intended ſtructure. Gold, ſilver, copper, ſcarce and valuable wood, that was not ſubject to injury from the worm; precious ſtones ſet in gold; rich perfumes of various kinds; ſcarlet, purple, white and blue ſheep-ſkins, wool of the ſame colours, and cattle for ſacrifices, were preſented in great abundance. Some of the people gave in proportion to their poſſeſſions, and others conſiderably more than they could afford without inconvenience. The public contribution being made, Moſes ſelected ſkilful architects, and ordered them to forward the building with all poſſible diſpatch, according to the commands he had received from the Almighty. Theſe architects are mentioned in the ſacred ſcriptures; one was named Bezaleel, and he was the ſon of Uri, of the tribe of Judah; and the other was Aholiab, the ſon of Aheſamath, of the tribe of Dan; and of ſo high a reputation were they for proficiency in the art they profeſſed, that they would have been appointed to the employment, had the election depended on the voice of the public.

Particulars concerning it.

Moſes judging it expedient to put a check upon the extenſive liberality of the people, iſſued a proclamation, ſetting forth, that what had been collected was fully ſufficient for the uſe and ſervice of the tabernacle, which was to be ſo contrived as to admit of removal as occaſion might require. In due obſervance of the commands he received from God upon the mount, Moſes gave inſtructions concerning the magnitude and proportion of the building, and the conſtruction of the ſacrificing and other veſſels and utenſils neceſſary for divine worſhip. In forming the ſacerdotal veſtments, the women diſplayed great zeal in the pompous ornaments they provided; and in other reſpects they employed their attention in contributing to the magnificence of the ſtructure, and ſupporting the dignity of the ſacred function. The materials being prepared, Moſes appointed a feſtival, enjoining every man to attend and offer ſacrifice according to his ability; and when this ceremony was performed, he began to conſtruct the tabernacle, which we ſhall endeavour to deſcribe with all poſſible accuracy.

Model of it.

In the outward court, which was an hundred cubits in length, and fifty in breadth, were twenty pillars of braſs, placed at equal diſtances, ten pillars being ranged along, and ten acroſs the building; each pillar was five cubits high, and decorated with borders and rings of ſilver: the baſes of theſe were of braſs curiouſly wrought and gilt, and were affixed to the earth by means of pins, each of a cubit in length. Cords being paſſed through the rings, bound the ſeveral parts together in ſo compact a manner, as to give it ſufficient firmneſs to withſtand the moſt violent guſts of wind: and, from the cornices, a veil of the fineſt linen wrought with great ingenuity, depended to the very baſes of the ſtructure.

The front of this edifice was fifty cubits in width. The entrance was twenty cubits wide, with two pillars of wood on each ſide the paſſage. The baſes of theſe were overlaid with braſs, and all the remaining part with ſilver. There were ſix other pillars, three on each ſide, which, for the ſake of ſtrength, were let into each other, and concealed from view by a curtain of exquiſite workmanſhip. The entrance, which, as it has been already obſerved, was twenty cubits wide, was alſo five cubits in depth; and before it hung a veil of fine linen, curiouſly wrought with flowers and figures, in colours of violet, ſcarlet, and purple; but the repreſentation of animated crea-

* God having now ſolemnly ratified his covenant with Iſrael, to be their God and king, and they his peculiar ſervants and people, gives orders next about a place for his ſolemn worſhip, where, by viſible ſymbols of his divine preſence, he ſhould reſide among them as their governor and protector, and the great object of their adoration. This was to be the tabernacle with the ark in it, which, agreeable to their travelling condition while in the wilderneſs, was to be a kind of portable temple to move along with them. Its frame, faſhion, utenſils, miniſters, and ſervices, to be ſuch as would be a model of that more magnificent temple ſervice in the land of Canaan, even as that temple itſelf was to be but a figurative reſemblance of a more complete and ſpiritual diſpenſation of religion under the Meſſiah. See Heb. viii. 5.

The myſtery of the tabernacle was fully underſtood by the learned Nachmanides, who, in few words, but pregnant, expreſſed himſelf to this purpoſe; "The myſtery of the tabernacle was this, that it was to be a place for the Shechinah, or habitation of Divinity, to be fixed in;" and this, no doubt, as a ſpecial type of God's future dwelling in Chriſt's human nature, which was the TRUE SHECHINAH.

The laver. tures was avoided. A laver, being a large veſſel of braſs, with a foot of the ſame metal, was placed within the gate of the court, for the prieſts to waſh their hands and feet therein *.

The tabernacle ſtood in the midſt of the court, with its front to the eaſt, for the benefit of receiving the rays of the ſun at its riſing. Its length was thirty cubits, its breadth twelve, and its height equal to the breadth. Of its two ſides, one faced the ſouth, and the other the north; and the proſpect from the back front was towards the weſt. Each of theſe ſides was formed of twenty planks, of a quadrangular ſhape, a cubit and a half in breadth, and of the thickneſs of four fingers; theſe planks were overlaid with gold; with two tenons, let into as many mortiſes, to each plank, and two baſes of ſilver. The weſt-front was compoſed of ſix planks, of the ſame kind with the foregoing, which were alſo covered with gold, and were inſerted into each other with ſo much art, that they appeared to be one intire piece. Theſe ſix planks meaſured but nine cubits; but two others, of the ſame dimenſions with reſpect to length and breadth, but much thicker than the reſt, were added to them, and placed in the ſame poſition, one at each end, for the purpoſe of connecting more firmly the two ends, and the weſt-front of the tabernacle together.

Rings. Golden rings, or ſtaples, were faſtened to all theſe planks, and they were placed in regular order, anſwering in a direct line to each other. Several bars, plated with gold, and of the length of five cubits, were paſſed through theſe rings, and, extending from one end to the other, were deſigned to ſtrengthen that diviſion of the building, by compacting its various parts as cloſely as poſſible. The back part of this edifice was furniſhed, in like manner, with bars and rings; the bars being diſpoſed in ſuch order as to anſwer to each other. Bolts and ſtaples were alſo fixed at the corners; and theſe, with the aſſiſtance of mortiſes, to bind the different parts together, ſerved to ſecure the tabernacle from the injuries of the weather.

Diviſions of the tabernacle. The inner part of this tabernacle conſiſted of three diviſions, each of the length of ten cubits. At the above diſtance from the bottom ſtood four pillars, with equal ſpaces between them, reaching from one ſide of the tabernacle to the other: theſe pillars, and their baſes, were conſtructed on the ſame plan, and with the like materials, as thoſe mentioned before. Beyond theſe pillars, was the Sanctum Sanctorum, or Holy of Holies, into which even the prieſts, to whom all the other parts of the tabernacle were open, were prohibited entrance.

The tabernacle, being thus divided into three parts, appears to bear ſome analogy to the plan of the univerſe. The firſt diviſion, to which the very prieſts were denied acceſs, may be admitted, in ſome meaſure, to reſemble the heavens, as being the reſidence of the Deity: and the two other diviſions, which were free to the prieſts alone, may be conſidered as no unapt emblems of the earth and ſea. Five gilded columns, the baſes of which were braſs, ſtood at the entrance of this tabernacle, with curtains or veils of fine yarn, which were dyed blue, purple, and ſcarlet, and interwoven with each other.

Curtains. The firſt curtain, which ſerved to ſeparate the Holy of Holies, or the ſpace within the four pillars mentioned above, from the Holy, was ten cubits ſquare, and richly ornamented with flowers, and various other figures, except thoſe of living creatures. A ſecond curtain, of equal ſize and workmanſhip, overſpread the five columns at the entrance of the building, being faſtened with hooks and eyes to the top, and hanging down as low as the middle of the columns; the remaining part being left open for the entrance of the prieſts. This curtain was commonly concealed from view by another of the ſame ſize, placed at a ſmall diſtance from it, but leſs coſtly in its materials and workmanſhip. A number of rings were tacked to the outer curtain, with ſtrings paſſed through them, to draw it up at pleaſure; and, on particular occaſions, to expoſe the inner one to the view of the people. The outer one ſerved at ordinary times, and in bad weather eſpecially, as a kind of fence to that within, from the rain or any other injury. To this day, the ſame ſort of curtain is uſed at the door of the temple.

Hangings. The tabernacle was covered, both at the top and ſides, with ten pieces of hanging, which reached within a foot of the floor. Theſe hangings † were each twenty-eight cubits in length, and of the breadth of four cubits, and were joined together with golden loops, in ſo artificial a manner, that they ſeemed to form one whole piece. Eleven other pieces of the ſame breadth, but longer by two cubits each, than the former; and which were made of goat's hair, inſtead of wool, of which the others were compoſed, ſerved as coverings to the ten above mentioned: and the eleventh was hung againſt the door of the tabernacle, to which office it was particularly deſtined on account of its being the odd number. Over theſe coverings of goat's hair was another of ſkins, to preſerve them from the bad effects of the heat and the rain. This ſpectacle, at a diſtance, from its ſky-coloured appearance, ſeemed to many to be an exact repreſentation of the heavens.

* Ablution was an ancient right obſerved in all acts of worſhip as a proper emblem of that moral and internal purity which renders every oblation acceptable to God. See Gen. xxxv. 2. be clean. This was the firſt thing that was done for hallowing the prieſts, as we read Lev. viii. 6. And therefore 'tis probable, that their whole bodies were now waſhed, in token of their obligation to ſtudy univerſal purity, and to cleanſe themſelves from all unrighteouſneſs in general; but afterwards they were appointed to waſh only their hands and feet before they entered into the tabernacle (ch. xxx. 19, &c.), to remind them of that particular reverence, and pious recollection which becomes men in their immediate approaches to God, and of thoſe partial blemiſhes, and daily imperfections, from which even thoſe had need to be cleanſed who are habitually pure and holy.

† The Hebrew word ſignifies "ſlings;" the Chaldee renders it "curtains:" they were, as Grotius aſſerts, pinked or perforated with holes, ſo as not to exclude the ſight, though they hindered the approach.

The ark. The tabernacle being thus completed, they next began to conſtruct the ark, for which purpoſe they made uſe of a certain wood, which is called Heron by the Hebrews, the extreme hardneſs of which enables it, in a particular manner, to reſiſt either rottenneſs or the worm. The figure and dimenſions of the ark were as follow: The length of it was two cubits and a half, and the breadth and depth one and a half; the whole being overlaid with the fineſt gold, and contrived with ſuch ſkill, both within and without, that not the leaſt part of the wood could be ſeen. A number of golden hooks were employed to cramp together the different parts of the cover, all of which were highly poliſhed, and ſo firm as to preclude all danger of their grating againſt each other.

Four golden rings were faſtened to the frame, one at each corner: and through theſe were paſſed two bars of gilt iron, one on either ſide, for the purpoſe of removing the ark from place to place; for the ſole mode of conveyance uſed was that of carrying it on men's ſhoulders, which office was performed by the prieſts and Levites alone. On this cover were placed two winged figures, called by the Hebrews Cherubims *; and which correſponded with the deſcription given by Moſes of thoſe beings which he ſaw ſurrounding the throne of God; the like of which no mortal had ever ſeen before. The two tables of the decalogue were depoſited in the ark, which was appointed to be placed in the ſanctuary.

Cherubims.

Table of ſhewbread. A table, to which that at Delphos bore no ſmall reſemblance, was fixed in this tabernacle; the length being two cubits, the breadth one, and the height a cubit and a half. The feet of this table were round, from the bottom upwards to the middle, but ſquare from thence to the top; with a border projecting from them, of the thickneſs of four fingers, and a crown of gold encompaſſing it on every ſide: theſe feet, in ſhort, exactly reſembled thoſe which the Dorians make uſe of for their beds. Four rings of gold were faſtened beneath this border, into the upper parts of the feet, one to each corner; with gilt bars made of the moſt ſolid wood, to ſerve as handles for removing it as occaſion ſhould require. This table was placed on the north ſide of the temple, at a ſmall diſtance only from the ſanctuary. Twelve loaves of unleavened bread, ſix on each ſide, continually ſtood on the table, piled regularly one above another. Each loaf contained the quantity of two aſſars, or ſeven attic cotylas, equal to two omers, according to the Hebrew meaſure, of the fineſt flour: and above each pile of loaves was placed a golden diſh filled with incenſe. Theſe loaves were removed at the end of every ſeven days, and the table ſupplied with freſh ones. The ſeventh day is that which we term our ſabbath. But of this we ſhall ſpeak more at large in the ſubſequent part of the work.

Golden candleſtick. On the ſouth ſide, directly oppoſite to the tabernable, ſtood a candleſtick, caſt in gold, and hollowed throughout; the weight thereof being one hundred minas, called by the Hebrews, cinchares, and by the Greeks, a talent. The ornaments of this candleſtick conſiſted of bowls, lilies, pomegranates, and ſmall cups, amounting to ſeventy pieces, and were ſpread over the ſeven branches, anſwering to the number of the planets, of which the candleſtick was compoſed. Each branch was ſurmounted with a lamp; and, as the candleſtick ſtood in an oblique poſition, all theſe lamps fronted toward the eaſt and ſouth.

Altar of incenſe. In the ſpace between the aforeſaid candleſtick and table, a ſmall altar of incenſe was placed, which was conſtructed with the ſame impenetrable kind of wood ‡ with the ark. The length and breadth of this altar were each one ſquare cubit, and the height two cubits; with a golden fire-hearth, encompaſſed with a border of the ſame metal, and rings and ſtaves, for the convenience of removing it.

In the front of the tabernacle, another altar was erected, of the ſame kind of wood with the former; being five cubits ſquare, and three in height. It was framed upon the ſame model with that beforementioned, with this diſtinction only, that every part of it was overlaid with braſs, and that a grate, formed of a kind of net-work, was fixed in a middle ſpace between the top and bottom, to admit the paſſage of the aſhes. A number of phials, cenſers, cups, pans, and other inſtruments, were alſo provided for the ſervice of the altar, all which were made of fine gold.

* Theſe did not contradict the ſecond commandment, becauſe they were not made as ſymbols of any deity, or as objects of adoration; they were only to repreſent to the Jews, by their proſtrate attitude, the neceſſity of adoring the God of Iſrael, who reſided in his glory between them. Their form approached that of oxen more than that of any other animal, not but that they were a kind of chimera, reſembling no particular animal, according to the aſſertion of hiſtorians; and as their faces probably reſembled that of an ox, the ſymbol of the Egyptian deity, the Iſraelites might from hence be led to ſuppoſe them the ſymbols of the preſence of the true God.

‡ This altar was to be of wood rather than of ſolid braſs, that it might not be too heavy: but notwithſtanding its being overlaid with braſs, ver. 2. had it been common wood, it muſt have been ſoon conſumed to aſhes by the continual heat; wherefore Le Clerc conjectures, that this ſhittim-wood might be the larch-tree, which bears the fire like ſtone. Pliny ſays of it; Nec ardet, nec carbonem facit, nec alio modo ignis vi conſumitur, quam lapides, Nat. Hiſt. l. xvi. c. 10. Calmet ſuppoſes this altar to have been a kind of coffer or wooden frame of about five feet and a half high, and the one half of its height to have been occupied by feet on which it ſtood. Thus, he thinks it would both be more portable than as we commonly ſuppoſe it, and the fire having vent from below, would be leſs apt to melt the braſs or burn the wood. To which he adds, that all the altars of the Egyptian Iſis are repreſented in this faſhion, i. e. as frames ſupported by feet.

CHAP. VI.

The Garments of the Prieſts, High-Prieſts; the Purifications, and Feſtivals.

The prieſts' garments.

EVERY prieſt was prohibited from exerciſing the ſacerdotal office, till he had firſt been purified, in the uſual forms preſcribed by our law. The under garment, which he wore, was made of fine linen, twined in folds, and is called a manachaſe, or binder, by the Hebrews, and in ſhape much reſembles our trowſers, or drawers. The prieſt, in putting it on, drew it over his feet, and it was open from the top downwards, and cloſely tied upon the hips. Over this was a coat of very fine linen, called chethemene, ſignifying a linen cloth; chethon being the term uſed for flax, of which linen is made. It ſat very cloſe to the body, having narrow ſleeves reaching to the ground. This garment was faſtened about the waiſt with a linen girdle, of the breadth of four fingers, and ornamented with needle-work of divers colours, ſo ingeniouſly executed, as to reſemble, in a conſiderable degree, the ſkin of a ſnake. Various flowers and figures, in blue, purple, and ſcarlet, were embroidered on this girdle, which paſſed twice round the body of the prieſt, and, for ornament ſake, was ſuffered to hang down to his feet, except on thoſe occaſions when he was engaged in the duties of his office, at which times he threw it back over his left ſhoulder, that he might have his hands the more at liberty. This girdle was called abaneth by Moſes; but we now term it emian; a word which we have borrowed from the Babyloniaſis. There was neither plait nor fold in this garment, which was made wide at the neck, and was held together with a buckle, both before and behind; the Hebrews have given it the name of maſſabaanzes.

The maſnaemphthes, or cap.

The prieſts alſo wore a ſort of mitre or cap, called maſnaemphthes, which reſembled a ſmall helmet, and covered little more than one half of the head. This cap was made of linen, and being bound about the head with a fillet, covered with another of finer texture; and this came ſo low, as totally to conceal the under one, and to ſecure it from all danger of falling off, while the prieſt was performing ſacrifice.

Excluſive of the habits and ornaments abovementioned, the high-prieſt was accuſtomed to wear certain others, to which he was entitled by his office: ſuch as the methir, which is a purple robe reaching to his ancles, and is faſtened round him with a girdle, nearly reſembling that already deſcribed, except that the ornaments were variegated with gold. A fringe went round the bottom of this veſt, which was alſo ornamented with curious pomgranates and bells of gold, placed interchangeably, and at equal diſtances. This robe was without ſeam, and had two openings in it, both lengthways; the one reaching a little below the ſhoulders, and the other to the middle of the breaſt, with a border to conceal thoſe openings, and another to cover the parts through which the arms were to paſs into the ſleeves.

The prieſt wore over this garment another, which greatly reſembled the epomis of the Greeks, according to the deſcription which has been given us of the latter, and was named the ephod*. The length of it was a cubit, and it was embroidered in every part with gold and a great variety of the moſt beautiful colours: it had alſo ſleeves to it; and thus was in reality nothing more than a ſhort coat. Upon the middle of the breaſt of this robe was left a vacancy for receiving the eſſen, which by the Greeks is called logion, ſignifying the Oracle, or in the Latin, Rationale. To the corners of the eſſen were affixed rings of gold, through which purple ribbons were paſſed for the purpoſe of faſtening the eſſen and the ephod together. The ſeams and ſpaces were concealed by ſtrings of a colour correſpondent to the veſtment, being wrought over them. On each ſhoulder, the high-prieſt wore a ſardonyx ſet in gold; and theſe ſtones anſwered the purpoſe of claſps, by cloſing the parts of the ephod. The names of Jacob's twelve ſons were engraven upon the abovementioned ſtones in Hebrew characters; that worn on the right ſhoulder bearing the names of the ſix elder, and the other thoſe of the younger brethren. The eſſen was enriched by twelve ſtones of beautiful appearance and ineſtimable value; on theſe twelve ſtones the names of Jacob's twelve ſons were reſpectively engraven, according to the order of their births; and this diſtinction was given on account of their being eſteemed the ſuperiors of our ſeveral tribes. They were made faſt by ſmall partitions of gold, and diſpoſed into four rows; the firſt conſiſting of a ſardonyx, a topaz and an emerald; the ſecond a ruby, a jaſper and a ſapphire; the third a lygryus, an amethyſt, and an agat; and the fourth a chryſolite, an onyx, and a beryl. As a farther ſupport to the weight of theſe precious ſtones, two other faſtenings were conveyed to the upper part of the eſſen, and to them were joined two gold chains, worked in wreaths, and reaching to the ſhoulder-piece; the upper ends of the chains were carried about the back and hooked behind the border of the ephod. A girdle of the colour of the robe was alſo joined to the eſſen, and this paſſing twice round the body, was formed in a knot before, where the ends, depending from the waiſt, were terminated by taſſels of gold fringe, curiouſly wrought.

The oracle.

The high-prieſt's mitre.

The tiara, or mitre of the high-prieſt, differed no otherwiſe from that of the in-

And it was partly owing to the effect of this dreſs, that Alexander was ſo ſtruck with the appearance of the high-prieſt, that he proſtrated himſelf, and ſaluted him. See Book XI. c. 8.

ferior prieſts, than in being covered with another, of a purple or violet colour, and ſurmounted with a triple crown of gold. A kind of cup, much reſembling the bud of a plant which is called, by the Hebrews, ſaccharus, and hyoſceamos by the Greeks, was placed over this crown. But, for the information of thoſe to whom this plant is utterly unknown, or known by name only, it may not be amiſs to ſubjoin a ſhort deſcription of it. The plant in queſtion, grows uſually to the height of ſomething more than two ſpans; the root of it bearing ſome reſemblance to that of a turnip, and its leaf to mint. The bud is ſhaped like a round knob, and is incloſed in a coat, which cracks and falls off, in proportion as the fruit grows ripe. This cup, which, as I before obſerved, was placed over the golden crown, was much about the ſize of the joint of a man's little finger, and round and hollow, like the inſide of a goblet; but, for the benefit of the reader, I will explain myſelf a little more fully on the ſubject. It was partly of a hemiſpherical figure, narrow towards the top, and widening itſelf towards the brims, like a pomgranate cut in two: nature had furniſhed it with a cover, ſo curiouſly rounded, that it ſeemed to have been turned for the purpoſe, and from this there aroſe a number of ſharp points, reſembling the prickles of a pomgranate: and within this cup was the fruit contained. Its ſeed was ſhaped like that of the plant ſideritis, or wall-ſage, and it bore a flower which differed very little in its appearance from that of plantane. Such was the figure of the ornaments on that part of the mitre which reached from the neck round to the temples; but on that part which covered the forehead, was fixed a golden plate, on which was inſcribed the holy name of God. It is unneceſſary to add any thing further, reſpecting the habits of the high-prieſt.

CHAP. VII.

Aaron conſtituted High-Prieſt by the Command of God.

THE Almighty appeared to Moſes, and commanded him to appoint his brother Aaron to the high-prieſt-hood. Hereupon Moſes aſſembled the people, and in a moſt pathetic manner repreſented to them the great virtues of his brother Aaron, mentioning that he had repeatedly expoſed his life to imminent danger for the public welfare, for which he entertained the moſt zealous attachment.

Aaron made high-prieſt.

The people unanimouſly coincided in the appointment of Aaron; than whom no man had a better claim to the prieſthood, either with regard to the high rank of his family, or the gift of prophecy with which he was endued. Superadded to theſe conſiderations, the public were greatly influenced in his favour on account of his relationſhip to Moſes, whoſe extraordinary qualities had procured him a high degree of veneration.

The ſurplus of what had been collected towards building the tabernacle Moſes ordered to be expended in veils and coverings for the edifice in queſtion, the golden candleſtick, the altar of incenſe, and the other ſacred veſſels, in order to ſecure them from damage, in caſe of removal. He afterwards aſſembled the people, and laid a tax on them of half a ſhekel each perſon, to defray the expences of the work; computing four Attic drachmas to the Hebrew ſhekel: and to this they ſubmitted with all imaginable chearfulneſs. The number of thoſe upon whom this tax was levied was 605,550; who were all denizens, and from twenty to fifty years of age. The money thus raiſed was wholly appropriated to the ſervice of the tabernacle.

Moſes purified the tabernacle, and the prieſts who were ordained to offer ſacrifice, in the following manner: he mixed five hundred ſhekels-worth of the fineſt myrrh with an equal quantity of iris, to which he added half that quantity of cinnamon and balſam, both articles remarkable for their fragrancy. Theſe ingredients, being firſt pounded together, and ſteeped in a hin, equal to two Attic choas, of the beſt olive oil, were ſet over the fire, and melted down into an ointment of the moſt pleaſing odour conceivable. The ceremony of purification conſiſted in anointing the prieſts and the tabernacle with this ointment, and in offering up certain ſacrifices, of different kinds, in the tabernacle.

The tabernacle conſecrated.

The dedication of the tabernacle, and of all the veſſels belonging thereto, took place in the year following, on the new moon of the month Xanticus, or Niſan. The Almighty, on this occaſion, gave the Hebrews a convincing proof of his gracious acceptance of their zeal for his ſervice, by deſcending to take poſſeſſion of the building which they had erected for his reſidence. The circumſtances attending this miraculous event were as follow: The ſky was totally clear, ſave juſt over the tabernacle, which was covered as well as partly environed, with a cloud*, neither ſo thick as to indicate the approach of bad weather, yet ſufficiently opaque to intercept the ſight. From this cloud iſſued ſo gentle and refreſhing a dew, as convinced all true believers that God himſelf had deigned to viſit them in perſon on the occaſion.

* This cloud had for ſome time reſted on the tent of Moſes; but when the tabernacle was finiſhed, it ſettled upon the tabernacle, where it continued in the form of a cloud by day, and a glorious light by night, till they entered the land of Canaan, which had long before been promiſed to their fathers. The tabernacle was a type of our bleſſed Redeemer's dwelling in our nature, "The word was made fleſh, and dwelt amongſt us." The altar of burnt-offering pointed out the death and ſacrifice of our Lord. The altar of incenſe denoted our Lord's powerful interceſſion for us. And the ark of the covenant was an eminent emblem of him, from whoſe mouth we receive a law, founded upon better promiſes; by whoſe interceſſion we have acceſs to the throne of grace with all boldneſs, and whoſe ſatisfaction to the Divine Juſtice is our true propitiatory, or mercy-ſeat.

Moſes,

Offerings for sin.

Moſes, after having rewarded the various artizans who had been employed in erecting and ornamenting the edifice, according to their reſpective merits, offered up, in the door-way of the tabernacle, a bullock, a ram, and a kid, as an atonement for the ſins of the people, in obedience to the orders which he had received from the Almighty on that ſubject. When the beaſts were killed, Moſes took a part of the blood of each animal, and ſprinkled Aaron and his ſons therewith; after this, he purified them with water of the fountain, and anointed them with oil; and thus were they conſecrated prieſts of the Lord. This ceremony was performed for ſeven ſucceſſive days, on each day an oblation or ſacrifice being made to heaven. Moſes appointed the celebration of a feſtival on the eighth day, and on this occaſion enjoined the people to provide ſuch ſacrifices as their circumſtances would permit. They not only acquieſced in this order with chearfulneſs, but with an emulative piety ſtrove to excel each other in the value of their offerings. No fire had been carried to the altar; but when the ſacrifices were prepared and laid thereon, a flame, reſembling a flaſh of lightning, burſt forth and conſumed them, to the amazement of the ſpectators.

Nadab and Abihu conſumed by fire from heaven.

Had not Aaron been perfectly reſigned to the will of the Almighty, his ſorrow muſt have been extreme and inconſolable on account of the judgment of heaven upon Nadab and Abihu, the two eldeſt of his four ſons. Diſregarding the injunction of Moſes, they were preparing to ſacrifice, according to the ancient manner, when they were ſtruck to death by a judicial fire from heaven. Moſes directed their father and brothers to convey their remains out of the camp, and cauſe them to be interred in a proper manner. The people gave way to the moſt immoderate grief for the loſs of theſe brothers: but Moſes exhorted Aaron and his remaining [illegible] to bear the ſhock of this dreadful circumſtance with a becoming fortitude, obſerving that it was not conſiſtent with the dignity of the prieſt-hood to indulge the weakneſſes and private paſſions of humanity, in prejudice to the glory of the univerſal Creator.

Moſes paid no regard to the acclamations of the multitude, but intirely reſigned himſelf to the worſhip and ſervice of God, conducting himſelf as a private individual, excepting only that he continued to perform the duties of his holy function. Inſtead of repairing to Mount Sinai, he now retired to the tabernacle for inſtructions to regulate his conduct for the public advantage. He delivered to the people written laws and precepts for rendering them acceptable in the ſight of the Almighty, and for the preſervation of peace and unanimity.

The conſecration of the tabernacle, and of all thoſe things which were deſtined to its ſervice, being now completed, the people gave an unbounded looſe to their joy, which they expreſſed in continual hymns and ſacrifices; flattering themſelves that, as the Almighty had now condeſcended to take up his reſidence among them, all their difficulties would be at an end, and that they ſhould for the reſt of their lives enjoy an uninterrupted courſe of proſperity. All the tribes offered ſacrifice, both jointly, and ſeparately; and the leaders and princes of the different tribes brought each ſix waggons, drawn by two horſes, to aſſiſt in removing the tabernacle, in caſe of need: to theſe they added a charger weighing one hundred and thirty ſhekels, and a ſilver bowl of ſeventy ſhekels, both filled with fine flour mixed with olive-oil, and intended for the oblations; with an incenſe-cup, filled with perfumes, and eſtimated at the value of ten daricks. Their burnt-offering conſiſted of a young bullock, a ram, and a lamb of a year old; and, for their ſin offering, they ſacrificed a he-goat. They alſo ſacrificed each day two bullocks, five rams, as many lambs of the firſt year, and a like number of he-goats, for their peace-offerings: and theſe ſacrifices were continued at the rate of one each day, for the term of twelve days.

Moſes now conſtantly repaired to the tabernacle inſtead of Mount Sinai, to receive inſtructions from the Deity, relative to the laws which were to be eſtabliſhed for the government of the Hebrews; which, being of divine origin, and far above all human comprehenſion, were intitled to an implicit and perpetual obedience from thoſe for whoſe benefit they were promulgated.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Sacrifices and Purifications, with their Forms and Ceremonies.

Deſcription of ſacrifices.

SACRIFICES are either public or private, and there are two modes of celebration. One is called a burnt-offering, or holocauſt, ſignifying that "the whole ſacrifice is to be burnt." The burnt-offering of a private man conſiſts of a bullock, a lamb, and a goat*; they muſt be males, and the two latter not more than a Burnt-offering.

* By reſtraining the ſacrifice to bullocks, goats, and ſheep, God might poſſibly have had a reference to the rites made uſe of in this age, and by claiming theſe animals have vindicated his peculiar right to them in oppoſition to the idols to whom they were reſpectively offered. The Jewiſh ſacrifices might be conſidered as fines, and therefore limited to ſuch animals as were moſt uſeful, and the gratitude of the ſacrificer was ſhewn more manifeſtly, than if the uſeleſs ſpecies had been required, which may be one reaſon why ſwine were not offered, for the Jews never uſed them for food. As theſe animals were ſuch as were offered by the patriarchs, the enjoining them now was recalling the ſimplicity of thoſe early ages. Theſe animals were always at hand, and could for that reaſon be offered on any preſſing and ſudden emergence. Beſides this, we may conſider, that the ſacrifices were followed by a feaſt on the victim, which was eſteemed a federal rite, and therefore ſuch animals as were allowed for food, muſt neceſſarily be offered in ſacrifice. Herod. Lib. ii.

year old, though the first may somewhat exceed that age. Being killed, the priest sprinkles the blood of the animal about the altar, and, after being divided, salt is thrown upon the parts, and they are laid upon the wood, which is previously kindled to consume them. The entrails and feet being washed by the priest, he casts them into the flames, to be intirely consumed with the other parts of the offering. The skins are the property of the priest.

Peace-offering. For peace-offerings, or offerings of thanksgivings, the same species of creatures being male and female, upwards of a year old, and free from blemish, are sacrificed. The priest sprinkles the altar with blood, and lays thereon the kidneys, caul, fillets of the liver, and the rump of the lamb. The breast and right shoulder belong to the priest. The persons who offer the sacrifices are allowed to eat of what remains for the space of two days; but what is not consumed in that time, must be burnt.

Sin-offering. The sin-offering is performed in the same manner; but such as cannot provide the above sacrifices are allowed to substitute two young pigeons, or two turtles; one as a burnt-offering, and the other as a due to the priest.

For sins of ignorance. A lamb, or young she-goat, is the offering for the sin of ignorance; and in this ceremony the priest only sprinkles the corners of the altar with blood; after which he places upon the altar the kidneys, the caul, and the fibres of the livers of the sacrifices. The flesh and the skin belong to the priests in virtue of their office, and our law expresly orders that the whole of the flesh shall be eaten on the day of sacrifice.

For wilful sins. If a man is guilty of a wilful sin, of which no legal evidence can be adduced against him, he shall offer a ram as an atonement; the flesh of which shall be given to the priests; conditionally, that it be eaten in the tabernacle, and on the same day. The sole difference between the sin-offering of a private person and that of one of the heads of the tribes was, that the oblation of the latter consisted of a bull and a he-goat, instead of a ram, which was required from the former.

Laws for sacrifices, It was also ordained that in all sacrifices, whether private or public, a certain quantity of fine flour should be brought with each victim: the proportion being one assar to a lamb, two for a ram, and three to a bullock; and this was to be mixed with oil previous to its consecration. The proportion of oil used on these occasions was, half a hin to a bullock; a third part of one of those measures to a ram, and a fourth part to a lamb. A like quantity of wine was also provided for the same purpose, and was by the law ordered to be poured upon the altar. The method of offering fine flour, without sacrificing, for the performance of a vow, was, to spread a handful of it upon the altar, and to deliver the rest to the priest, to be eaten either boiled, or being kneaded with oil, or made into cakes; the person sacrificing, at the same time, reserving such a quantity as he deemed requisite for burnt-offerings. It is prohibited by the law to sacrifice the young with the dam, unless the former be at least eight days old. Divers sacrifices are appointed for the recovery of health, and in other cases; on all such occasions, cakes are eaten with the flesh of the victims, and the priests are admitted to take their share; but no part of it is allowed to be left till the next day.

CHAP. IX.

Laws relating to the Priests, the Sacrifices, solemn Days, and other religious and civil Matters.

IT is strictly ordained by the law, that a lamb of the first year shall be sacrificed every morning and evening, the charge to be defrayed out of the public treasury; an on the seventh day, or sabbath, two are to be offered up in like manner. At the beginning also of every month*, exclusive of the customary oblations, seven lambs, each one year old, and a ram were sacrificed; likewise a he-goat, as a propitiation for sin, lest any offence should, perchance, remain unexpiated. Numb. xxviii. xxix.

At the commencement of the seventh month, called Hyperberetæus, the offering consisted of a bullock, a ram, seven lambs, and a he-goat, for a sin-offering.

The tenth day of the same month was observed as a fast till night: and the offerings were a young bullock, two rams, seven lambs, and a he-goat for a propitiation, exclusive of two other goats; one of which was presented alive at the altar, and afterwards suffered to go loose into the wilderness, as a scape-goat, to atone for the sins of the people; the other goat and the bullock were conveyed to a clean spot, at a small distance from the camp, and there totally consumed to ashes. The high-priest afterwards returned to the temple, with the blood of the two animals, which he sprinkled with his finger, seven times, on the cover of the tabernacle, the golden altar, the great altar which stands before the door, the floor, and in general, the whole edifice: the bullock was provided on the occasion by the high-priest. The extremities, together with the kidneys, the fat, and part of the liver, were placed on the altar: and, with a ram, which was also furnished by the high-priest, were all sacrificed to the Almighty, as a burnt-offering.

The people received orders to put their tents in such a condition, by the fifteenth day of the same month, as to resist the rigour of the approaching winter: and they were further enjoined, immediately upon their entrance into the promised land, to repair to the capital, as being the place destined for the seat of the holy temple, and there to solemnize a festival of eight days, with burnt-offerings, oblations, and peace-offerings; carrying in their hands branches of myrtle, willow, and palms, with ſprigs of peach-tree.

* The Greeks also, probably in imitation of the monthly sacrifices of the Hebrews, appointed a person to observe, from an eminence, and give notice to the people, when the new moon first appeared, in order to their keeping, at the return of every month, or new moon, their feast of Neomenia. See the plate facing this page.

The firſt of the eight days was ſet apart for the burnt-offering, which was to conſiſt of thirteen young bullocks, fourteen lambs, two rams, and a goat, for a propitiatory ſacrifice. A like number of the lambs and rams were daily offered up for the ſpace of ſix days: but of the bullocks, one was abated in the ſacrifice of each day, till they amounted to no more than ſeven. The eighth was to be kept as a day of reſt and relaxation: and the people offered up, as I have already obſerved, a calf, a ram, ſeven lambs, and a goat, for an atonement. In commemoration of the incident of the Hebrews erecting their tents, was the feaſt of tabernacles * inſtituted; and it is to this day obſerved by our people with all imaginable ſtrictneſs. On the fourteenth of the moon, of the month Xanticus, or Niſan, which is conſidered as the beginning of the year, we celebrate the feaſt of the paſſover †, as did our anceſtors at the time of their deliverance from the yoke of the Egyptians: in the celebration of this feſtival, we are enjoined by our laws to take eſpecial care not to leave any part of the oblation till the next day.

Feaſt of tabernacles.

The paſſover.

Feaſt of unleavened bread.

The feaſt of unleavened bread, which continues ſeven days, commences on the fifteenth of the ſame month, and is next in ſucceſſion to that of the paſſover. The oblations directed to be made on this occaſion are, two bullocks, one ram, and ſeven lambs, for a burnt-offering, and a goat each day, for a ſin offering, for the benefit of the prieſts. The people, on the ſecond day of the feaſt, and the ſixteenth of the month, offer up an oblation to God of the firſt fruits of their grain, before they preſume to taſte of it themſelves. The mode of the oblation is as follows; they parch a quantity of corn in the ear upon a clean hearth, and having bruiſed it well, they take the c ity of an aſſar, and place it upon the altar, whe one handful is ſuffered to remain, and the reſt falls to the ſhare of the prieſt. The people are then permitted to reap their corn as they pleaſe; and the oblation uſual in this caſe, is a lamb for a holocauſt, or burnt-offering.

Pentecoſt.

The feaſt of Pentecoſt was celebrated on the fiftieth day, that is, at the concluſion of ſeven weeks, or forty-nine days, ſubſequent to that of the paſſover: the term Pentecoſt ſignifies in the Greek tongue, fifty; which number is denoted in the Hebrew, by the term aſſartha, by which title the above feaſt is diſtinguiſhed by the Jews. The ſacrifice appointed for this day was two wheaten loaves of leavened-bread, containing two aſſars of flour, and the ſame number of lambs, which were to be eaten in the evening by the prieſts: but no part thereof was to be reſerved till the next day. The burnt-offerings were three calves, two ſheep, fourteen lambs, and two goats, for an atonement for ſin. There were alſo various other ordinances, regulating the number and quality of the burnt offerings, and the times in which they were allowed a relaxation from labour, in their ſeveral feaſts; together with certain rules, preſcribing which of the ſacrifices might be eaten.

It was further ordered that this bread ſhould be baked on the eve of the ſabbath, and placed the next morning on the holy table, forming two piles, each conſiſting of ſix loaves, which were to be placed oppoſite each other, with a golden cup of incenſe on the top of each pile: and theſe loaves were to remain till the next ſabbath-day, when they were to be given to the prieſt, and their places ſupplied with others. The incenſe was to be renewed in the like manner; and that which was taken away was ordered to be thrown into the holy fire, in which the burnt-offerings were conſumed. The quantity of an aſſar of fine flour ſteeped in oil, and ſlightly baked, was offered by the high-prieſt twice a day; the one half in the morning, and the remainder in the evening.

CHAP. X.

The Levites ſet apart. Laws and Ceremonies reſpecting Purifications.

MOSES, having ſeparated the tribe of Levi from the reſt of the people, to officiate at the altar, purified them with water from the ſpring; and after they had ſacrificed in the manner preſcribed by our law, committed to their care the tabernacle, the holy

* The tabernacles or walks for the celebration of this feaſt, were anciently made with the boughs of ſuch beautiful trees as abound with oil, fat, or reſin; becauſe the boughs of thoſe trees, by means of their oleaginous or reſinous nature, long retain their verdure. Nehemiah, ch. viii. 15. thus deſcribes them: "Go forth unto the mount, and fetch olive-branches and pine-branches, and myrtle-branches, and palm-branches, and branches of thick trees, to make booths, as it is written." But the practice now-a-days is a quite different thing.

† This feaſt is a ſolemn and religious duty, from which none, who are of age, are exempted, but the female ſex. It is ſolemnized twice every ſeaſon, on two ſucceſſive days; the ſame rites and ſervices being performed on each. The doubling of the feſtival is owing to the pretended uncertainty of the Jews in the matter of computing the time. The book of the law is brought out twice: five men read ſuch portions of it as relate to the offerings which were made on this feſtival, and likewiſe a haphtara out of the prophets. About noon there is ſometimes a ſermon in praiſe of the law. The book of Ruth is likewiſe read on this feaſt, becauſe Ruth's adventure happened in the time of the wheat harveſt.

In memory of the promulgation of the law, they ſtrew the ſynagogue, their houſes, and ſometimes the ſtreets they dwell in, with graſs and green herbs, and adorn all their windows with green boughs, and with roſes and other flowers, and ſometimes wear upon their heads chaplets of green herbs, becauſe all was green about mount Sinai when the law was delivered. With this view likewiſe, on this venerable anniverſary, they eat a great deal of that ſort of food which is produced from milk, as curds, cheeſecakes, cuſtards, &c. becauſe, ſay they, the law is white and pure, and ſweet as milk.

veſſels, and all things elſe thereunto appertaining, under the controul of the prieſts; and they were from this time conſidered as being conſecrated to the ſervice of the Deity.

At the ſame time, Moſes inſtructed the people in thoſe points which conſtituted the difference between meats clean and unclean; or thoſe which were allowed and thoſe which were prohibited from being eaten: but we ſhall ſpeak further with reſpect to this matter as opportunity ſhall offer. They were ſtrictly enjoined to abſtain from the blood of every kind of creature whatever, upon a perſuaſion that the very being of the animal was inherent therein: nor is the fleſh of any creature that hath died of itſelf; or the fat either of goats, ſheep, or oxen, to be eaten under any pretext whatever.

Unclean perſons. All lepers, and ſuch as were infected with a gonorrhœa, were obliged to retire from the city; and, in like manner, women, during the time of their courſes, were enjoined to withdraw themſelves from all communication with the other ſex for the ſpace of ſeven days, at the expiration of which they were conſidered as being purified, and were allowed to return to their families. They who had aſſiſted at the interment of a corpſe, were alſo deemed unclean for the ſeven ſucceeding days: but when the term of the pollution extends beyond ſeven days, the party muſt offer two lambs; one of which muſt be ſacrificed, and the other given to the prieſts. Leprous perſons are totally baniſhed the city, and excluded from all human converſation. But if it ſo happens that God is graciouſly pleaſed to free any perſon from this dreadful diſtemper, and to re-inſtate him in his former health, the party on whom ſuch bleſſing is conferred, is bound to offer various ſacrifices, in gratitude for the benefit beſtowed.

Laws for women in child-bed. A woman, who has lately brought forth a child, is reſtricted, if it be a male, both from entering the temple, and from attending on public worſhip, for the ſpace of forty days †; or, if it be a female, for double that term. But, at the expiration of that time, ſhe is admitted to make the oblations preſcribed in ſuch caſes; part of which are offered up to the Almighty, and the remainder falls to the ſhare of the prieſts.

For adultery, or jealouſy. If a man entertains a ſuſpicion of his wife's chaſtity, he muſt bring with him an oblation of an aſſar of barley-meal; ſpreading a handful of it on the altar, and delivering the reſt to the prieſt to be eaten. One of them, having placed the woman at the gate of the temple, which faces the tabernacle, takes off her veil, and, having inſcribed the ſacred name of God on a piece of parchment, orders her to declare upon her oath, whether ſhe had ever defiled her huſband's bed. To this ſhe replies with the following imprecation: "If I am guilty of the crime laid to my charge, may my thigh rot from my body, may my belly burſt, and let the laſt hours of my life be ſpent in torture: but if, on the other hand, it ſhall appear that the accuſation againſt me is founded ſolely on the unreaſonable jealouſy of my huſband, I beſeech thee, Lord, to grant me a ſon within the ſpace of ten months from the preſent day." The prieſt then waſhed the writing out of the parchment with fair water, into which, after having ſtrained it into an earthen veſſel, he caſt ſome of the duſt from the floor and walls of the temple, and preſented it to the woman to drink. In caſe ſhe proved innocent of the crime alledged againſt her, ſhe quickly afterwards conceived, and was, in due time, ſafely and happily delivered of her burthen; but if to the crime of incontinence ſhe added that alſo of perjury, her death was attended with all the circumſtances of horror and ignominy already mentioned.

† During the firſt ſeven, ſhe was denied the converſation of her friends, but, for the three days which ſucceeded, was permitted that liberty, being only excluded from the ſanctuary, and from partaking of the ſacrifices, which ſhe might otherwiſe have eaten. Maimonides imagines that this liberty was given to the Jews in oppoſition to the cuſtom of the Zabeans, who were religiouſly ſcrupulous,

CHAP. XI.

Laws prohibiting Adultery and Inceſt, and for regulating the Marriages of Prieſts. The Sabbath of the ſeventh Year, and the Year of Jubilee. Laws and Ordinances of War.

Divers laws and ordinances. MUTUAL confidence between man and wife was conſidered by Moſes as indiſpenſably neceſſary towards connubial happineſs; and he was convinced, that the intereſt of the government, as well as of private families, materially depended on the propagation of mankind under the ſanction of the marriage inſtitutes. Inceſt, either with the mother, mother-in-law, aunt, either on the ſide of father or mother, ſiſter, or daughter-in-law, he pronounced to be an abominable ſin. He forbad the cohabitation of man and wife during the periodical ſtate of purgation; and all unnatural intercourſe was ſtrictly forbidden, and ſeverely puniſhed.

Marriage of Prieſts. Beſides an obſervance of the general laws of matrimony, particular ordinations were made in reſpect to the prieſts. They were prohibited contracting marriage with maid-ſervants, ſlaves, women being divorced, or ſuch as came under the denomination of public hoſteſſes. A prieſt was permitted to marry a widow, but that liberty was not granted to a high-prieſt, who was enjoined to marry only a virgin. The high-prieſt was not allowed to approach the dead, but the inferior and laid their women under great reſtraints in theſe caſes. The general idea, which all polite nations had of the uncleanneſs of women for the firſt month after child-birth, ſeems to have been originally derived from the Egyptians, from whom Pythagoras borrowed moſt of his doctrines, and eſpecially that relating to women in theſe circumſtances.

Perſons inveſted with the ſacerdotal function were permitted to ſhew the uſual forms of reſpect towards their deceaſed fathers, mothers, brothers, or children. A prieſt having any diſeaſe or bodily imperfection, was excluded from performing ceremonies at the altar, and even denied admiſſion to the temple, but he was allowed his full proportion of the oblations. Moſes judged that the exerciſe of the ſacred function required a purity of manners in the common concerns of life, and therefore deemed thoſe unworthy the ſacerdotal robe, who were not free from imputation on the ſcore of moral rectitude. The prieſts were not allowed the uſe of wine at the time of wearing the veſtments of their office; and the ſacrifices they made were appointed to be perfect in form, undivided, and free from impurity.

Year of Jubilee. At the approach of the year of jubilee*, which, being interpreted, ſignifies Liberty, all lands having been alienated, returned to the original proprietors: and the reſtitution was made in the following manner. An exact computation was formed of the produce of the land, from the time of the ſale thereof, and alſo of the charges which had accrued upon it, and, if the former were found to exceed the latter, the ground was reſtored to the ſeller, without any kind of condition whatever: but, if the expences amounted to more than the produce, the purchaſer received the difference, and relinquiſhed the poſſeſſion to the firſt owner: if the produce and the expences chanced to be equal, the land in that caſe alſo, again became the property of the ſeller. The ſame rule was alſo obſerved with reſpect to the ſale of houſes ſituated in villages; but a different mode was adopted in regard to thoſe in towns incloſed with walls. In this latter inſtance, if the ſeller refunded the purchaſe-money before the expiration of the twelve months, he was intitled to reſume the poſſeſſion; but, if he ſuffered that period to elapſe, he was deprived [illegible] by of all claim to this privilege till the year of jul[illegible].

Cuſtoms of war. Theſe neceſſary regulations being made for the religious and civil government of the ſtate, Moſes now directed his attention to the forming of certain ordinances relating to the military department. He, accordingly, iſſued orders to the heads of the ſeveral tribes (that of Levi only excepted) to form exact liſts of thoſe perſons in each tribe who were qualified to bear arms: the Levites, being conſecrated to the ſervice of God, were conſequently exempted from every other kind of duty. The number of thoſe thus qualified was found, upon the review, to be 603,650, from the age of twenty years to fifty. And Moſes advanced Manaſſeh and Ephraim, the ſons of Joſeph, to the rank of princes of the tribes; the firſt in the room of Levi, and the other in that of Joſeph, his father, in compliance with the requeſt which Jacob made to Joſeph, when he adopted the ſons of the latter, as we have already obſerved.

When the Hebrews, at any time, pitched their tents, the tabernacle was erected in the centre of the camp, three tribes being ſtationed on each ſide thereof, with wide ſtreets and intervals between; and with a market-place, in which were ſhops of various trades, arranged with ſuch regularity, as to reſemble a well-conſtructed city. The quarter next the tabernacle was aſſigned to the prieſts and Levites; the latter of whom were numbered apart from the reſt of the people, and were found to amount to 23,880 males, from the age of thirty days and upwards. While the cloud, before-mentioned, continued to hover over the tabernacle, the people, conſidering it as an intimation of the preſence of the Almighty amongſt them, remained in camp; but ſtruck their tents, and proceeded on their march, whenever it was removed. Moſes alſo directed two ſilver trumpets to be made: theſe were uſed for convening the people, at the removal of the tabernacle, marching of the army, &c.

The removal of the tabernacle from place to place was performed in the following manner: on the firſt ſounding of the trumpets, the three tribes which were ſtationed on the eaſt-ſide thereof began to put themſelves in motion, as did thoſe on the ſouth-ſide upon the ſecond ſounding of it. The tabernacle was then taken to pieces, and the ſeveral parts of it were laid upon the carriages; ſix of the tribes preceding, and the remaining ſix following it; while the Levites cloſely environed, to prevent the approach of all unqualified perſons. The three tribes which were poſted on the weſt-ſide of the camp began their march on the third ſounding of the trumpets; and the fourth ſounding was the ſignal for thoſe to move which were placed on the north-ſide. At this period Moſes and the Hebrews celebrated the paſchal-ſacrifice, being the ſecond return of that ſolemnity from the time of its inſtitution previous to their departure from Egypt.

A Mutiny againſt Moſes, in conſequence of a Deficiency of Proviſions. Miracle of the Quails.

Sedition againſt Moſes. THE army now departed from Mount Sinai, and after ſojourning at different places, repaired to Jeremoth, where an inſurrection took place, the people violently upbraiding Moſes with having prevailed upon them to eva-

* Among the variety of reaſons aſſigned for its inſtitution, we may add the following: By this means God fixed the Jews to the land of Canaan, preſerved a diſtinct knowledge of their ſeveral tribes and families, aſcertained the very tribe and family from which the Meſſiah ſprung, and thereby enabled him to prove the validity of his claim to that character, from the correſpondence between his birth and the characteriſtics recorded in the ancient prophecies; and, as it has been obſerved, Providence prevented any confuſion in their genealogies, by limiting their captivity in Babylon to ſeventy years, in which ſpace they neither could have been corrupted nor loſt.

cuate one of the moſt eligible parts of the globe, and under pretence of procuring the bleſſings of plenty and happineſs for them, deluding them into a ſtate of the moſt preſſing neceſſity; alledging, that they already were in the greateſt extremity from a deficiency of water, and if they ſhould be no longer ſupplied with manna, inevitable ruin muſt enſue. The popular clamour againſt Moſes being arrived at a great height, one of the people addreſſed himſelf to the deſperate multitude, reminding them of the hazards, fatigue, and toil which he had encountered in the cauſe of the public, and adviſed them to depend upon the Almighty for relieving their neceſſities: but this, inſtead of appeaſing, aggravated the mutiny to a more violent degree of deſperation. Notwithſtanding the inſult and indignity which had been caſt upon Moſes, he appealed to them in terms of the moſt gentle perſuaſion; and aſſured them, that they ſhould be ſpeedily ſupplied with meat ſufficient for their ſuſtenance for ſeveral days. They paid no regard to what Moſes ſaid, but gave vent to inſulting and opprobrious language, ſcornfully aſking him by what means he could provide maintenance for ſo many thouſand people. He replied, that the Lord and his ſervant would ſpeedily ſupply them. Upon his pronouncing theſe words, an immenſe number of quails fell into the camp, and were taken up by the people: but ſoon after this circumſtance, God judged it proper to execute vengeance upon the Hebrews for the iniquity of their conduct, and afflicted them with a terrible plague, to which great numbers fell a ſacrifice*. The place where this puniſhment was inflicted upon the Hebrews was called Cabrothaba, or the "graves of luſt."

CHAP. XIII.

MOSES ſends Spies into CANAAN. They are delighted and alarmed at the Account they receive of the State of the Country, and its Inhabitants. A Conſpiracy is formed againſt MOSES, which is defeated by JOSHUA and CALEB.

Addreſs of Moſes to the people.

WHEN the Hebrews had arrived at a place called the Streights, which lies on the borders of Canaan, and is remarkable for the inconveniences of its ſituation, Moſes addreſſed himſelf to the people in theſe words: "It pleaſed the Almighty to promiſe us two ſignal bleſſings; liberty, and the poſſeſſion of a fruitful land. The firſt of theſe his bounty hath already beſtowed on us, and you will, ere long, be eſtabliſhed in the enjoyment of the other. We are now upon the borders of Canaan, and it will be in vain for the princes of the country, even with their united force, to oppoſe our progreſs. Yet muſt we not expect to effect a conqueſt over this country without great difficulty and danger. Let us, therefore, ſend proper perſons ſecretly to examine into the ſtate of the country, and of it's inhabitants: but, principally, let us act in concert, and let us aſcribe the glory of all our actions to God alone, who will be conſtantly preſent amongſt us, and in all our battles will be our guard and defender."

Spies ſent to Canaan.

This propoſal was highly approved by the people, who, at the advice of Moſes, immediately made choice of twelve of the moſt eminent perſons for courage and prudence, one out of each tribe, to be diſpatched before, in queſt of intelligence. They travelled through the whole country from Egypt and the parts adjacent, as far as the city of Amathe, and to mount Libanus. Having made ſtrict obſervations on the nature of the ſoil, the condition of the country, and the manners of the natives, they returned; having completed the undertaking in forty days. The account they gave of the extraordinary fecundity of the land, together with the ſight of the fruits which they had brought with them, in confirmation of their aſſertions, inſpired the people with the moſt eager deſire of rendering themſelves maſters of ſo deſireable a country.

The people diſmayed at the report of the ſpies.

But when the ſpies had repreſented to them the difficulties and dangers of the enterprize, the rapid and impaſſable rivers, the inacceſſible mountains, the numerous ſtrong holds, and impregnable cities; and a gigantic race of men, dwelling in Hebron, of ſuch enormous ſtature and ſtrength, that, from the time of their leaving Egypt to that day, they had never ſeen any thing ſimilar;—all theſe conſiderations, I ſay, which had already filled their minds with fears and apprehenſions, through their inſinuations, produced the ſame effect upon the multitude. Theſe ſuggeſtions diſcouraged the people to ſuch a degree, that they quitted the aſſembly in the utmoſt confuſion, and gave themſelves up, during the whole night, to deſpondency and lamentations; loudly venting their complaints againſt the Almighty and againſt Moſes. "God," ſaid they, "gives us the moſt flattering promiſes, but he performs nothing which he has promiſed." They next directed their reſentment againſt Moſes and Aaron; and having thus ſpent the night in imprecations on their leader and blaſphemy againſt God, they early in the morning entered into a combination to put

* Though the people expreſſed only a muttering which did not reach the ears of Moſes, yet the Lord, "who is about our habitations, and about our beds, who underſtandeth all our thoughts afar off," took notice of their diſcontent; and when he had heard it, then conſumed them by fire: whether it was only a "great fire, as the mountains of the Lord ſignifies great mountains," or it was lightning, which is termed "the fire of God," 2 Kings, i. 12. Job i. 16. or a "blaſting wind," common in theſe countries, we ſhall not determine. Yet it muſt be obſerved, that it ſpread throughout the camp, as the word tranſlated the uttermoſt parts generally ſignifies.

Moſes and Aaron to death without delay, and to return to Egypt*.

Caleb and Joſhua interpoſe their good offices to appeaſe the mutinous people.

In the midſt of this dangerous tumult, Joſhua, the ſon of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, and Caleb, of the tribe of Judah (who diſſented in opinion from their aſſociates in the late expedition to the land of Canaan) fearing the conſequences which might attend the tumult, addreſſed the people to this effect: "Can you poſſibly, entertain the leaſt doubt of the veracity and goodneſs of the Almighty, yet, at the ſame time, give ear to idle ſtories concerning the land of Canaan, which are calculated and propagated merely to impoſe on your credulity? Ought you not rather to confide in thoſe, who have exerted themſelves to the utmoſt to eſtabliſh you in the poſſeſſion of theſe bleſſings? The height of mountains, and the depth of rivers, are feeble obſtacles to check the progreſs of men of unſhaken reſolution, engaged in a glorious cauſe; eſpecially when God himſelf has promiſed to be their protector and defender. Let us advance, therefore, to the attack, without heſitation, nor harbour the leaſt doubt of ſucceſs. You have only to follow us where we ſhall lead you, and truſt to the power of the Almighty for the event." This was the method they took to allay the fury of the people: but Moſes and Aaron proſtrated themſelves before the Lord, and beſought him, not for their own ſakes, but for the ſake of thoſe who were committed to their guidance and care, to calm the troubled minds of the multitude, and to deliver them from the effects of their impotent rage. Their ſupplications were attended with ſucceſs; and the cloud appeared as uſual, over the tabernacle, denoting the preſence of the Deity.

A ſevere threatening denounced.

A confidence in the above viſion induced Moſes to inform the populace that God would ſubject them to a heavy judgment; ſaying, that it was not intended as a puniſhment adequate to their guilt, but as a ſalutary correction of a father to his refractory offſpring. "Upon my entering the tabernacle of the Lord," ſaid he, "to avert the vengeance of heaven by tears and ſupplications, and to implore that, in his infinite mercy, God would not extirpate you from the earth, the Almighty condeſcended to repreſent, that you had betrayed ſhocking inſtances of ingratitude for the bleſſings he had beſtowed, in rejecting the confidence due to the promiſes he had made, and depending on the falſities and miſrepreſentations which had been propagated by the ſpies. Be aſſured that God will not utterly deſtroy his choſen people; but the land of Canaan you muſt not expect to obtain; for you are irrevocably doomed, for the term of forty years, to wander in the wilderneſs. This ſentence, however, is not meant to extend to your children, to whom God, in his own good time, will beſtow the ſovereignty of that very fertile country, which the obſtinate infidelity of their progenitors has rendered them unworthy to poſſeſs."

The people now in amazement and terror applied to Moſes, imploring him to intercede with God in their favour, and obtain a remiſſion of the puniſhment denounced againſt them for their iniquities, and a deliverance from the wilderneſs. He gave them to underſtand, that the proceedings of the Almighty being founded in wiſdom and equity, it was folly to imagine that the puniſhments he was pleaſed to denounce againſt mankind might be averted by their importunate and unjuſtifiable ſolicitations.

* The unwillingneſs of the Iſraelites to leave Egypt, and their impatience to return thither, are convincing proofs of an overfondneſs for its cuſtoms and ſuperſtitions. When we conſider this, we ſeem more inclined than the generality of critics, to excuſe the falſe accounts of the pagan writers concerning the Exodus, or departure of the Iſraelites, who concur to repreſent the Jews as expelled or forcibly driven out of Egypt; for ſo indeed they were. Their miſtake was only about their driver. The pagans ſuppoſed him to be the king of Egypt; when indeed it was the God of Iſrael himſelf, by the miniſtry of Moſes.

BOOK IV.

Containing TRANSACTIONS from the YEAR of the WORLD 2454, to 2495.

CHAP. I.

The HEBREWS, contrary to the Advice of MOSES, attack the CANAANITES, and are defeated.

AMONG all the troubles and mortifications which the Hebrews experienced in the wilderneſs, nothing affected them more ſenſibly than the reſtriction by which God had forbidden them to attempt the conqueſt of the land of Canaan. This meaſure, however, they were determined, at all events, to carry into execution; and as Moſes from time to time earneſtly diſſuaded them from it, they acquainted him, in plain terms, that they would no longer ſubmit to be directed by him, but would follow the dictates of their own judgment: adding, that they were convinced he had no other motive in withholding his conſent, than to make himſelf neceſſary to them, them, by detaining them as long as poſſible in their preſent diſtreſſed ſituation. Under this notion, they raſhly entered upon the war, in a full perſuaſion that God would afford them his aſſiſtance; not ſo much from any peculiar regard for Moſes, as from the fatherly affection which he had conſtantly expreſſed for their nation. They doubted not, if they conducted themſelves courageouſly, that he who had formerly conferred on them the bleſſings of liberty, would now grant them victory: and even admitting that Moſes ſhould exert all his endeavours to render the Almighty unfavourable to their cauſe, they imagined they ſhould ſtill be an over-match for the Canaanites. "Where is the difference," ſaid they, "whether we are ſubjected to the tyranny of Pharaoh or Moſes? We change our maſter, it is true, but our condition muſt ſtill continue the ſame, as long as we ſubmit to be deluded by the artifices of this vain, ambitious man. Unwilling to be longer deluded with the idle pretence of ſeeking God, or to yield to the arrogance and inſolence of an individual, we have no means left to extricate ourſelves from the inconveniencies of our preſent ſituation, and to avert thoſe with which we are threatened, than, depending on the guidance of the Almighty, to march immediately againſt the Canaanites, without waiting any longer for the concurrence of our legiſlator."

Such were the ſentiments of the people in general; and, under the influence of this impetuoſity, they marched with the utmoſt reſolution and confidence to the attack. But the Canaanites, though inferior in force to the Hebrews, received their ſhock with firmneſs, and put the aſſailants to the rout, killing a conſiderable number of them on the ſpot, and purſuing the reſt even to their camp. The Hebrews were totally diſpirited by this defeat, which they apprehended might prove ſtill more fatal to them in its conſequences; and they were ſo conſcious of the imprudence of having joined in battle with the enemy before they had received God's direction on the ſubject, that they readily imputed this ſhameful repulſe to their raſhneſs and diſobedience*.

The Canaanites were ſo elated with this ſucceſs, that Moſes, fearing leſt they ſhould attempt to puſh their advantage further, conſidered it as the moſt adviſeable ſtep he could take, in the preſent dilemma, to withdraw again into the wilderneſs. Having propoſed this meaſure to the people, who were now convinced of their abſolute dependence on him, they willingly aſſented thereto, with a full determination to attempt nothing further againſt the Canaanites, till they ſhould be duly authoriſed by the commands of the Almighty.

CHAP. II.

CORAH and his Aſſociates raiſe a Faction againſt MOSES and AARON, relative to the Appointment of the latter to the Office of High-Prieſt.

Rebellion of Corah, &c.

CORAH, a man of conſiderable reputation among the Hebrews, both on account of his rank and wealth, and thoroughly verſed in the arts of acquiring popularity, entertained a ſtrong jealouſy of the extenſive power which Moſes had obtained over the people. This man, being of the ſame tribe and family with Moſes, and his poſſeſſions being more ample than thoſe of the other, loudly exclaimed againſt the injuſtice which had been done to himſelf by the advancement of Moſes to the ſupreme authority; and his complaints made a ſtrong impreſſion on the Levites and thoſe of his own family.

Although Corah's pretext implied a regard for the public welfare, yet the real deſign he had in view was, to diſpoſſeſs Aaron of his dignity, and to eſtabliſh himſelf in his room. The plauſibility of theſe ſuggeſtions won ſo much on the minds of the people, that no leſs than two hundred and fifty of the chief men among them united in a plot, to deprive Aaron of the high-prieſthood, and to beſtow it on Corah.

The people were now thrown into a great ferment, and ran in the moſt tumultuous manner to the tabernacle, crying out, "Stone him! ſtone him!" (meaning Moſes.) "Take away this tyrant, and relieve us from the inſupportable burdens with which he has loaded us."

Moſes was well informed of the proceedings of Corah, and of the effects which they had produced on the multitude. But, depending on his integrity, and conſcious that the advancement of his brother to the prieſthood had been ordained expreſsly by God himſelf, and had not been effected through any ſiniſter views of his own, he made no ſcruple, being ſkilled in the arts of ingratiating himſelf with the people, to appear before the whole multitude aſſembled: and he addreſſed himſelf to Corah in theſe words:

"I conſider you, Corah, and the ſeveral perſons who have eſpouſed your cauſe, as thoſe who deſerve an honourable diſtinction: but ſtill ſome conſideration is due to the reſt of the people, notwithſtanding their inferiority in wealth and other qualities. Had I acted from a ſelf-intereſted motive, I ſhould have taken poſſeſſion of the place myſelf; but I was guided by principles of honour and juſtice. The Almighty himſelf appointed Aaron to the prieſthood, and that act of the Divinity diſcharges me of every criminal imputation. Suppoſing Aaron to be inveſted with the ſacred function in conformity to the divine pleaſure, excluding the idea of my partial interference in the cauſe, he ſhall ſtill depend upon a repetition of your ſuffrages, without availing himſelf of any advantage on the ſcore of his former election.

"Your preſumption, Corah, in contending againſt the liberty of the Almighty to ſelect a prieſt to ſerve at his altar, is an inſtance of impiety which muſt be looked upon with aſtoniſhment and horror. But another day will put a period to this controverſy. Let the candidates for this holy office aſſemble to-morrow in the morning, with fire and incenſe in their cenſers. And, Corah, I enjoin you in particular, to curb your ambitious views, and not to attempt exalting your own power and authority above that of the Deity. In the diſcharge of his ſacred office, the conduct of Aaron having been unexceptionable, to his preſence on this occaſion no reaſonable objection can be formed. Being aſſembled, let the candidates offer up incenſe in the preſence of the multitude, and the ſacrifice proving moſt acceptable to the Lord ſhall diſtinguiſh the man to be conſtituted high-prieſt; and the poſſeſſion of the ſacred office ſhall be ratified and confirmed to him, by the authority with which I am inveſted. Thus will all contentions ſubſide, and I ſhall be no longer ſubject to the accuſation of ſhewing partiality to my brother Aaron."

The multitude were appeaſed by the above addreſs, which removed the unfavourable impreſſions they had entertained againſt Moſes, whom they acknowledged to be a man of ſagacity and virtue: and the council was now diſſolved.

CHAP. III.

The Judgment of God upon CORAH, DATHAN, and ABIRAM. The Prieſthood given to AARON and his Poſterity.

THE people attended the ſacrifice on the following morning, and were divided in the intereſts of the contending parties, ſome being deſirous of expoſing Moſes, as a man acting on partial and intereſted motives, and the more moderate endeavouring to preſerve tranquillity, from a conſideration that government and the public welfare would be greatly endangered if the commonalty were ſuffered to obtain the aſcendency.

Dathan and Abiram were ſummoned to attend in ſupport of their pretenſions, but upon the return of the meſſengers, Moſes was informed, that they poſitively determined not to abide by the propoſed deciſion, on the plea that by means of ſiniſter and indirect practices he had obtained an unwarrantable power: and that they had reſolved no longer to ſubmit to the authority he had uſurped*. Moſes now called to certain elders, and commanding them to follow him, repaired towards the ſpot where the mal-contents had aſſembled. Upon receiving intelligence of his approach, Dathan and his adherents, with their women and children quitted their tents, and attended by the guards, to reſiſt any attack which might be made, waited the event of this unexpected proceeding. Moſes deliberately approached Dathan, and then with up-liſted hands thus appealed to heaven in a voice ſufficiently audible to be underſtood by the ſurrounding multitude.

"Do thou, O Lord, who didſt condeſcend to appear from the fire upon Mount Sinai, permitting thy ſervant to hear thy voice, and making him a witneſs to thy wonderful prodigies; thou who didſt confer on him the honour of an ambaſſy into Egypt, lowering the arrogance and pride of the people of that country, and redeeming the Hebrews from their oppreſſion; thou who reduced the powerful Pharaoh and humbled him at my feet; who formed a dry paſſage through the ſea, and changed that paſſage into ſea again, for the preſervation of thy people and the deſtruction of the Egyptians; provided us with arms when in a defenceleſs ſtate; gave ſweetneſs to corrupt waters, and commanded ſtreams to burſt from the rocks when we were in danger of periſhing from extreme thirſt; afforded us food from the ſea, and ſupplied us with nouriſhment from heaven; thou by whoſe direction our laws were framed and our government eſtabliſhed; who art the righteous judge and infallible witneſs of all things in the creation; do thou eſpouſe my cauſe, and bear teſtimony, that in the appeals ſubmitted to my deciſion I have diſtributed juſtice equally, and never ſhewn partiality towards the rich man, or been corrupted to oppreſs the poor. Vindicate, O Lord, thy power and glory to future ages, by an exemplary puniſhment upon theſe blaſphemous detractors. Let them not meet the fate of common men, but as an example, teaching generations yet unborn, to hold thy divinity and power in due reverence, and as they are unworthy to inhabit the earth, let that earth ſwallow them with their families and all their deareſt poſſeſſions. If I am guilty of the crimes imputed to me, may the lot of my accuſers be happineſs and freedom, and may the imprecations I invoke upon them be directed to fall a juſt puniſhment upon myſelf. But when thou, O God, ſhalt direct thy vengeance againſt the oppreſſors of thy people, diſtinguiſh, I beſeech thee, the guilty from the unoffending; involve not ſuch as have lived in a due reverence of thy honour and glory in a common fate with thoſe who have dared to violate thy divine commands."

Their dreadful puniſhment.

Having delivered this appeal, which was frequently interrupted by tears, the earth became violently agitated, reſembling the billows of an enraged ſea; a general conſternation prevailed among the people, who confuſedly traverſed the camp with expreſſions of the utmoſt terror and amazement. At length, the ground on which they ſtood opened, with a horrible ſound, and ſwallowed up the whole faction, together with their families, their tents, and all their poſſeſſions: the fiſſure cloſing again immediately, with ſuch exact-

* In the moſt reproachful manner they ſent him word, that they hoped ſhortly to ſee the management of the nation in better hands than thoſe that had led them from a plentiful ſettlement, with promiſes of a fruitful country of their own, and at laſt left them to wander in a ſtarving wilderneſs, with nothing but a pretence that their children are to enjoy it forty years hence, when they are all dead; and as if it were not enough to loſe their country, they had loſt their liberties too, by ſubmitting to a man who impoſed what laws he pleaſed upon them; and, to advance himſelf, had given them nothing but one ſlavery in exchange for another.

neſs, that not the leaſt mark of it could poſſibly be perceived.

Such was the miſerable end of this deſperate faction; and in this manner did God at once vindicate both his juſtice and his power. Nor was the fate of theſe perſons in the leaſt commiſerated by their friends or relations; nay, the whole multitude, on the contrary, expreſſed the greateſt ſatisfaction on the occaſion, conſidering them in no other light than as the peſt of their nation, and as men who were undeſerving even of human compaſſion. Moſes afterwards aſſembled all thoſe who had offered themſelves as candidates for the high-prieſthood; again referring the choice to God himſelf, that he, among thoſe who pretended to that dignity, might be elected, whoſe oblation ſhould be found to be moſt acceptable in the ſight of the Almighty. The number of thoſe perſons was two hundred and fifty; all men of great reputation with the people; both on account of their high rank, and of their perſonal qualifications; and with them came Aaron and Corah. The whole company placed themſelves before the tabernacle, and began to offer up the incenſe they had brought with them. At this inſtant a fire ſuddenly appeared, to which that of volcanos, or of whole foreſts involved in flame, bore no kind of proportion; and its brightneſs and intenſity plainly demonſtrated that it came from heaven alone. This fire ſo effectually conſumed the bodies of Corah and his aſſociates, that not the ſmalleſt remains whatever of their carcaſes could be found; yet, as a convincing proof that this was effected by a ſupernatural agency, Aaron received no kind of injury from it. In order to perpetuate the memory of this tremendous judgment, Moſes ordered Eleazar, the ſon of Aaron, to affix the cenſers* of Corah and the reſt to a braſen altar, which was erected for that purpoſe. It was now incontrovertibly proved that Aaron had not been advanced to the pontificate by any unfair means, but by the appointment of God himſelf; in virtue of which evidence he continued to hold it for the remainder of his life.

CHAP. IV.

Regulations reſpecting the PRIESTS, and other Incidents, during 38 Years.

A freſh mutiny againſt Moſes.

THE ſeditious diſpoſition of the people ſtill prevailed, notwithſtanding the late calamities of which it had been productive; and another tumult aroſe, which was more fatal, if poſſible, in its effects than the former; as the cauſes which gave birth to it were of a nature not eaſily to be removed. The Hebrews had conceived a notion that the puniſhments which God was pleaſed from time to time to inflict upon them, were the reſult of the applications of Moſes to the Almighty for that purpoſe. The relations of the deceaſed embraced this opportunity of incenſing the multitude againſt Moſes, by repreſenting to them the neceſſity of giving a timely check to his arrogance and luſt of power, which, they obſerved, might be very eaſily effected.

Moſes foreſaw the approaching ſtorm, and with great prudence, in order to avert the danger which was greatly to be apprehended from the preſent tumultuous conduct and diſpoſition of the people, convened an aſſembly, in which he patiently liſtened to their complaints; and that he might not increaſe the popular ferment, ordered the heads of the reſpective tribes, each man to bring his rod, with the name of his tribe inſcribed thereon; and that the poſt ſhould be conferred on him whoſe rod ſhould bear upon it any peculiar mark of the favour of God towards him. This propoſal was agreed to, and Aaron brought his rod with the reſt, on which he had inſcribed the title of the tribe of Levi. Moſes placed them in the tabernacle for the preſent, and, on the following day re-produced them to their reſpective owners in the preſence of all the people. All the rods were found to be in the ſame ſtate in which they were left the day before, ſave that of Aaron, which appeared not only covered with branches and buds, but, to increaſe the wonder, bearing a ripe almond alſo; the rod having been taken from a tree of that ſpecies. This extraordinary ſpectacle threw the people into the greateſt conſternation imaginable; and, although they could not diveſt themſelves intirely of their reſentment againſt Moſes and Aaron, the rancour of their enmity having in a great meaſure ſubſided, they acquieſced in the determination of the Almighty, with reſpect to the election of Aaron, who was thus a third time confirmed by God himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the office of high-prieſt, in which he continued, without any further interruption, to the time of his death. This incident happily concluded thoſe commotions in which the Hebrews had been unfortunately engaged, at different periods, for a courſe of time.

Separation of the Levites.

Moſes exempted the Levites†, who, were dedicated to the immediate ſervice of God, from all military duty and charges; and, that

* As the cenſers had been employed to a ſacred uſe, which made it unlawful to adapt them to common uſes, therefore God commanded they ſhould be beaten into broad plates, and laid over the great braſen altar, i. e. the altar of burnt-offering, not the altar of incenſe, for that was overlaid with pure gold, Ex. xxxvii. 26. and theſe cenſers were of braſs. ver. 39. Beſides, the altar of incenſe was in the holy place, out of the view of the people; and conſequently plates there placed would not ſerve as a ſign to them. The cenſers were to ſerve for a memorial, to perpetuate the memory of this rebellion, to warn poſterity from doing the like, and to teach them by this ſad example to pay a due regard to thoſe whom God has choſen to miniſter in holy things, leſt they be overtaken with the ſame ſignal perdition.

† God having, by the foregoing miracles, vindicated the honour and authority of the prieſthood, he now lets Aaron know (probably by the hand of Moſes) the importance of his office, wherein he was that they might not be prevented from attending properly to the duties of their function by the care of providing a maintenance for themſelves, he directed that, as ſoon as the Hebrews ſhould, with the aſſiſtance of the Almighty, have acquired poſſeſſion of the land of Canaan, the revenues of forty-eight of the moſt flouriſhing cities throughout the country, together with the land round each, to the extent of two thouſand cubits, ſhould be appropriated to the uſe of the prieſts and Levites; granting them, beſides, a tenth part of the annual produce of the earth, which duty was to be paid by all the poſſeſſors of land in general; and this ordinance is to be obſerved, with the ſtricteſt punctuality, even to the preſent time. Having ſpoken ſufficiently reſpecting the revenues of this tribe, I ſhall now advert to thoſe particulars which relate to the prieſts alone.

Revenue of the prieſts.

Of the forty-eight cities above-mentioned, Moſes ordered that thirteen ſhould be aſſigned to the maintenance of the prieſts, and the tenth part of the amount of the tythes, and the firſt-fruits of all the productions of the earth, as oblations to God. The firſtling of every four-footed animal offered in ſacrifice, if a male, was delivered to the prieſts to offer up, and afterwards to be eaten by the owners and their families in the city; ſave only ſuch as, by our laws, are prohibited to be eaten, in which caſe the owner ſhall preſent a ſhekel and a half to the prieſt, in lieu of the animal, and the firſt-born of a man is to be redeemed with the ſum of five ſhekels: a duty is paid alſo upon wool and corn, as in the caſe of thoſe who bake bread, who are obliged to deliver a cake to the prieſt.

Vow of the Nazarenes.

With reſpect to the Nazarenes, who oblige themſelves by a ſolemn vow to ſuffer their hair to grow for a certain time, and during that period to abſtain from wine; when they repair to the temple, to conſecrate their hair, the time expreſſed in their vow being expired, whatever ſacrifices they offer, fall to the ſhare of the prieſts: and the ſame rule is obſerved with regard to the ſect, who ſtile themſelves Corban, which ſignifies, a gift. Theſe perſons, at the time they appear before the prieſts, and requeſt to be releaſed from their vow and engagements, are obligated to pay a certain ſum, which is fixed at fifty ſhekels for a man, and thirty for a woman; and thoſe who are unable to pay this tax, are obliged to ſubmit themſelves to the direction of the prieſt.

The breaſt and the right ſhoulder of every beaſt killed for private uſe belongs alſo to the prieſt. Such was the proviſion which Moſes made for the maintenance of the prieſts, excluſive of the ſin-offerings, of which we have already ſpoken in the foregoing book. The wives, children, and ſervants of the prieſts were alſo allowed to partake of all oblations, ſave in the caſe of ſin-offerings, which were to be eaten only by the prieſts officiating at the time, and that on the ſame day, and without quitting the temple.

The Idumeans refuſe to grant a paſſage.

Theſe regulations being made, and the public tranquillity being now fully reſtored, Moſes marched his troops to the frontiers of Idumæa, previouſly diſpatching his embaſſadors to the king of that country, to requeſt a free paſſage for the Hebrews through his territories; engaging that his troops ſhould be guilty of no irregularity on their march, and ſhould pay for whatever neceſſaries they might ſtand in need of. The king, however, refuſed to grant his requeſt, and, raiſing a numerous army, prepared to oppoſe him, in caſe he ſhould attempt to force a paſſage. Moſes, on this occaſion, applied to God for his direction how to act, and received for anſwer, that he muſt carefully avoid being the aggreſſor: whereupon he determined to purſue his route by the way of the wilderneſs.

Death of Mariam, ſiſter of Moſes.

At this period, Mariam*, the ſiſter of Moſes, died, in the commencement of the month Xanticus, forty years having now expired from the time of evacuating Egypt. She was publicly interred, with great magnificence, upon the mountain called Sin; and after thirty days, which was the time appointed for mourning, Moſes performed the ceremony of purification upon the people. A red heifer, which had not been ſubjected to the yoke, was brought by the prieſt to a clean ſpot at a ſmall diſtance from the camp, and there ſlaughtered; after which, dipping his fingers in the blood, he ſeven times ſprinkled it upon the tabernacle of the Lord; and the whole carcaſe was then put upon the fire, with a ſmall branch of cedar, ſome hyſſop, and ſcarlet wool. The whole being conſumed, the aſhes were gathered, and conveyed to the cleaneſt adjacent part, by a goat of unblemiſhed chaſtity. Such as required to be purified in conſequence of having rendered themſelves unclean, either by touching a corpſe, or attending the ceremony of interment, was to caſt a part of theſe aſhes into a fountain, and on the third and ſeventh day with a bunch of hyſſop to ſprinkle himſelf with the water. This ceremony of purification Moſes enjoined to be practiſed when the Hebrews ſhould poſſeſs the land promiſed them by the Almighty.

Death of Aaron.

The purification for the death of Mariam being performed, Moſes marched his army to Arabia, directing his road through the deſert; and upon his arrival at the principal city, which was called Arce, but now bears the name of Petra, Aaron aſcended an high mountain, and it having been predicted to him that the period of his life was near approaching, he diſrobed himſelf of the pontifical ſtole, and reſigned it to his ſon Eleawas to behave with great care and circumſpection; and withal he again declares what was the duty of the Levites, as diſtinct from that of the prieſts. And from thence he proceeds to tell them what maintenance he had ſettled upon both, for their encouragement in doing their duty.

* Mariam, the ſiſter of Moſes, is ſuppoſed to have governed the Hebrew women, as Moſes did the men. She died a virgin; and Euſebius ſays, that in his time her tomb was diſcovered at Kadeſh, near the capital of Arabia.

zar, as the rightful ſucceſſor to the dignity. In the firſt moon of the month called by the Athenians Hecatombæon, by the Romans Auguſtus, and by the Hebrews Sabba; he died upon this mountain in the preſence of the whole army, being in the hundred and twenty-third year of his age*. Thus in the ſame year Moſes loſt his brother and ſiſter.

CHAP. V.

MOSES ſubdues SEHON and OG, and divides their Kingdoms by Lot.

THE time allotted for the mourning for Aaron being expired, Moſes advanced with his troops to the banks of the Arnon, which takes its riſe among the mountains of Arabia, and, traverſing the whole deſert, finally diſcharges itſelf into the lake Aſphaltitis. The king of the Amorites was named Sehon, to whom Moſes ſent a very reſpectful meſſage, deſiring permiſſion to march through his country, and giving him the ſtrongeſt aſſurances that his ſubjects ſhould not ſuſtain the leaſt damage whatever. Sehon would not grant him a paſſage; but poſſeſſed himſelf of all the fords, to prevent his croſſing the river.

This refuſal, and the conſequent conduct of the Amorites, incenſed Moſes to a high degree, and he determined to diſappoint their meditated attack upon him, by carrying the war into their own country; being apprehenſive leſt the Hebrews, through inaction and the want of proviſions, ſhould again fall into their former irregularities. But, to avoid the imputation of rashneſs, he firſt applied himſelf to God, to know whether he might attempt to force a paſſage with the ſword; and the Almighty not only granted him permiſſion, but promiſed alſo victory in the conteſt. Thus encouraged, Moſes led his troops to the attack, having previouſly inſpired them with the fulleſt confidence of ſucceſs, by communicating to them the declaration of the ſupreme Being in their favour. Immediately upon the firſt onſet, Sehon and his army fled with the utmoſt precipitation, being ſeized with a terror which rendered them incapable of oppoſing the Hebrews. They flattered themſelves that they ſhould ſecure a retreat in ſome of their fortified cities: but the Iſraelites, who were lightly armed and very ſwift of foot, purſued them ſo cloſely, that their flight availed them little; Sehon and great numbers of his followers being ſlain on the banks of the river, where they halted to quench their thirſt. The victory, in ſhort, was complete, and the Hebrews obtained a prodigious booty on the occaſion; the moſt valuable part of which was a plenteous crop of corn, ſtill unreaped, of which they had long been in great want. The whole country, in fact, was now become their own, through which they ranged without coutroul; very few of the inhabitants having ſurvived the late defeat.

The Hebrews defeat the Amorites, and ſlay their king.

The Amorites manifeſted on this occaſion an equal deficiency of conduct and of courage; having neither prudence to avert the danger, nor firmneſs to ſuſtain it. The ſpot which the Hebrews had now acquired the poſſeſſion of formed a kind of peninſula, being ſituated between three rivers, viz. the Arnon on the ſouth; the Jaboc, which empties itſelf into the river Jordan, on the north; and the river Jordan on the weſt.

Og, and his army cut off.

But the Iſraelites had ſtill another formidable enemy to encounter, in the perſon of Og*, the king of Galadene and of Gaulonitis, who was haſtening to the aſſiſtance of Sehon, his friend and ally, at the head of a numerous and powerful army. He received intelligence on his way of the defeat of Sehon; but this did not in the leaſt diſcourage him from purſuing his deſign; and he continued his march, with a firm reſolution to riſk the event of a battle with the Hebrews. This temerity, however, coſt him dear; himſelf and his whole army being utterly deſtroyed. Moſes, in conſequence of this ſecond victory, croſſed the river Jaboc, penetrated into the territories of Og, razing the cities, and putting the inhabitants to the ſword.

CHAP. VI.

MOSES invades the Country of the MIDIANITES. Tranſactions between BALAAM and BALAK. PHINEHAS, from Motives of Zeal, puts ZIMRI and COSBI to Death.

THE Hebrews ſoon afterwards removed their camp to an extenſive plain, in the neighbourhood of Jericho; a city famous for its opulence, and abounding in palm-trees and balſam. Theſe people were ſo elevated with their late ſucceſſes, that they eagerly wiſhed for further opportunities of ſignalizing their valour; and Moſes deemed it highly impolitic to ſuffer this martial diſpoſition to be depreſſed through the want of exerciſe. He, therefore, after having ſpent ſome time in offering ſacrifices to God, and in rejoicings and entertainments, detached a body of his troops to ravage and deſtroy

* Aaron was buried in the ſame place where he died. He aſcended this mountain to prepare for his diſſolution; and conferred his ſacerdotal office, according to the divine direction, on Eleazar his ſon.

† This Og was of the remnant of the giants of Rephaim, who were a mighty people in the country of Baſhan, or Batanea. It would ſeem that this people too, as well as the Amorites, were the aggreſſors of the Iſraelites, and ſo brought their overthrow upon themſelves; unleſs we will ſay that the Iſraelites attempting to march their army through Baſhan without aſking the king's permiſſion, was equivalent to declaring war upon the Baſhanites; for we don't find that they aſked leave to paſs through their territories, as they did with reſpect to Edom and Sihon.

the country of the Midianites. The motives which induced him to commence this war were these:

The growing power of the Israelies had of late given great umbrage to Balak, king of Moab, and an ally of the Midianites; insomuch that he began to be apprehensive for the safety of himself and his dominions: for he was ignorant that God had restricted the Hebrews from attempting the conquest of any other country than that of Canaan. He durst not openly attack a people whom repeated victories had rendered so confident of success; but being desirous to give some check to their further progress, he sent embassadors to the Midianites, to consult with them on the steps necessary to be taken, for the common safety of both nations.

Balak requests Balaam to curse the Hebrews.

With these embassadors the Midianites joined some of the principal men of their own nation, and sent them to Balaam, who resided beyond the Euphrates, and had acquired a great reputation by his predictions, requesting him to return with those persons, that he might denounce the vengeance of Heaven upon the Hebrews. He received them with great respect, and after supper was ended, addressed himself in prayer to God, for his direction how to act. The Almighty was pleased to order him not to comply with the request which had been made to him; and he thereupon went back to his guests, and acquainted them, that he would gladly have gratified their desire, but that God, to whom he was indebted for all his reputation as a prophet, had refused him his permission; adding, that the people whom they wished him to curse, were the peculiar favourites of heaven; and that he, therefore, would rather advise them to secure their friendship upon any condition whatever.

The embassadors now returned home; but were sent back again on the same business by the Midianites, at the earnest intreaty of Balak, who was greatly chagrined at the [illegible] success of their first journey. Balaam, being [illegible]ous of obliging them, again had recourse to the Lord to know his pleasure, who being incensed at this second application to him on the subject, abruptly answered, that he might return with the embassadors, agreeable to their request; which he accordingly did, without noticing the extraordinary mode in which this permission was granted. In passing through a narrow part of the road which lay between two walls, and would not admit of the passage of two persons at a time, he was encountered by an angel of the Lord. The ass on which Balaam rode, stopped short at the appearance of this vision; and upon his endeavouring to make her proceed, she crushed his foot against the wall; the angel still remaining on the same spot, and the prophet continuing to correct the animal as before. But God being pleased to endue the creature with the power of speech, she reproached her master with the injustice and cruelty of his conduct, and explained to him the cause of her not going forward, pleading also, that she never till now had once given him the least offence. Balaam was equally amazed and alarmed at this circumstance, of the ass speaking with a human voice*; and the angel, now discovering himself, reproached him in very severe terms; telling him, that the beast was not in the least to blame on the occasion, but that he himself had incurred just censure, by presuming to enter upon a journey in direct contradiction to the express will of the Almighty. Balaam was very desirous to return immediately, but the Lord commanded him to proceed on his way, strictly enjoining him, however, to utter nothing but what he himself should suggest to him. The above condition being admitted, Balaam repaired to the king, who received him in a gracious and condescending manner, and he requested that he might be conducted to some adjacent eminence, commanding a view of the Hebrew army. Balak, attended by his courtiers and other persons composing the train of royalty, accompanied him to the top of a mountain about sixty furlongs from the camp. After mature deliberation, turning his face towards the spot on which the Hebrews were encamped, he delivered his predictions in these words:

Balaam's predictions.

"Happy people! God will bestow on you the blessings of this world in the utmost abundance; you shall be constantly directed and supported by the divine Providence, and shall render yourselves famous throughout the world for your virtues: the reputation of your offspring shall surpass even that of your progenitors; for the Almighty will make you his peculiar care, and will grant you a degree of happiness far superior to that of the other nations of the earth. You shall obtain possession of the promised land, which yourselves and your issue shall enjoy to the latest period of time. The whole universe shall be filled with your fame, and your offspring shall increase so abundantly, that they shall be found in every part of the earth. Blessed and wondrous nation! who, numerous as ye are, derive your origin from one common ancestor.

"You must, for a time, be satisfied with the possession of the land of Canaan, though a spot too confined, both for your numbers and your fame; but know, that the period approaches, when you shall have no other limits than those of the world. Your

* The angel of the Lord so moved her tongue, as to make her utter human accents. Maimonides takes all this that happened to Balaam for a prophetic vision, not being able, it seems, to reconcile the literal sense to reason. But there is no occasion for having recourse to that hypothesis; neither is there any thing absurd or incredible in understanding it literally; for if the Heathens believed their deities powerful enough to give speech to brute animals, as appears from the story of Achilles's horse in Homer, and of Phryxus's ram in Apollonius: how much more may Jews or Christians believe the same to have been effected upon an extraordinary occasion, by the special interposition of the Almighty or one of his angels.

This miracle of making the ass speak to Balaam, served to convince him demonstrably how vain it would be for him to endeavour to speak otherwise than God should order him; since the same power that here caused even a dumb animal to move its tongue very differently from what it was naturally capable of, would certainly over-rule even his tongue, and make him say just what, and no more than what was dictated to him.

iſſue ſhall be numerous as the ſtars of heaven: yet ſhall no want of any of the conveniencies or comforts of life be found among that infinite multitude: but the Almighty ſhall confer on you the bleſſings of plenty, peace, valour and victory; and the children of your foes ſhall be your ſubjects and ſervants. May our enemies therefore, be yours alſo; ſince, by riſing in oppoſition againſt you, they will expoſe themſelves to inevitable deſtruction. It is to God, in ſhort, that you are indebted for all theſe favours; to that God who alone can exalt the oppreſſed, and humble the haughty, as in his wiſdom and juſtice he ſees fit."

Throughout the whole of this ſpeech, it was apparent that the prophet was actuated by a ſupernatural and divine impulſe. But Balak vehemently complained that he had falſified his promiſe, and, after having received many valuable preſents to denounce a curſe upon the Iſraelites, he loaded them with bleſſings. To theſe reproaches Balaam replied in the following terms:

"Can you imagine, O king, that a prophet, when delivering his predictions, is permitted to utter and omit what he thinks proper? In this caſe, he is merely the inſtrument of the Deity, who ſuggeſts to him every word he ſpeaks, and he is himſelf totally unconſcious of all he ſays.

"When the Spirit of God takes poſſeſſion of our breaſts, we no longer retain a command over ourſelves. It was far from my intention to utter a ſingle word in praiſe of the Iſraelites, or concerning the happineſs and glory which the Almighty deſigns to beſtow upon them: but I found myſelf compelled to declare what the Almighty has decreed in their favour. However, in order, if poſſible, to fulfil the wiſhes of yourſelf and the Midianites, let other altars be erected, and freſh ſacrifices be offered up, and I will again make trial whether God will permit me to curſe this people." This propoſal was immediately complied with; but God ſtill refuſed to hearken to the ſolicitations of the prophet, who, falling on his face, predicted the unhappy fate of various princes and ſtates, who ſhould unfortunately oppoſe that choſen people; ſeveral of the particulars of which have been ſo circumſtantially verified, that there is every reaſon to expect that the reſt will be accompliſhed in due ſeaſon.

This diſappointment incenſed Balak to ſuch a degree, that he diſmiſſed the prophet with evident marks of diſpleaſure, who immediately departed homewards: but when he arrived on the banks of the Euphrates, he bethought himſelf of an expedient to ingratiate himſelf with Balak, and the princes of Midian, and being again introduced to them, addreſſed them in theſe words:

"In order to convince you how ſincerely I am diſpoſed to gratify your wiſhes, though in ſome degree, at the hazard of God's diſpleaſure; I have deviſed a ſcheme which, poſſibly, may produce ſome effect in your favour.

"If you can derive any ſatisfaction from the acquiſition of a ſlight and ſhort-lived advantage over them, adopt the advice which I ſhall now give you. Select a number of the moſt beautiful virgins of your country §; and having ſet off their natural charms with the ornaments of art, let them be ſent into your enemy's camp, being previouſly inſtructed in what manner to demean themſelves. If the young men among the Hebrews ſhould appear to be captivated with their beauty, and ſhould expreſs their paſſion with any degree of warmth, either in their words or actions, let them peremptorily declare their intention to return home directly, unleſs their ſuitors will conſent to abandon the religion and laws of their country; ſubſtituting in the place thereof thoſe of the Midianites and Moabites; and, ſhould they comply therewith, they will draw upon themſelves the reſentment of the Almighty." Having concluded his ſpeech, he retired.

This advice was immediately carried into execution; and the Hebrews were effectually enſnared by the charms of the perſons, and converſation of theſe maidens, and urged their ſuit with the utmoſt fervency of paſſion. The women conducted themſelves in ſuch a manner as to raiſe the deſires of their lovers to the higheſt pitch; and, perceiving that they had fully ſucceeded in this part of their deſign, they inſtantly feigned a reſolution of returning home without delay; but conſented to remain where they were for a ſhort time, at the earneſt requeſt of the men, who, to induce them thereto, eagerly preſſed upon them the acceptance of their affections, their lives, and their fortunes. The virgins now perceived that their lovers were ready to ſubmit to any terms they ſhould preſcribe, and one ſpeaking in the name of the reſt, addreſſed them in theſe words:

"It was not from any motives of diſguſt towards our parents and friends, nor with the view of making ſale of our perſons, that we have quitted our dwellings, moſt illuſtrious youths, to repair to your camp; but ſolely with the deſign, as you are intire ſtrangers in this country, to render you any ſervice which may lay in our power. You profeſs an ardent affection for us, and an earneſt deſire to retain us with you. Could we be convinced of the ſincerity of your profeſſions, we ſhould not heſitate to comply with your wiſhes, provided you will make us your wives, for on no other terms will we conſent to continue with you; nor will you, we truſt, think us over ſolicitous in a matter of ſuch delicacy."

The Iſraelites were ſo intent on the gratification of their appetites, that they implicitly yielded to whatever the virgins were pleaſed to require of them; and did not even ſcruple to abandon the ancient § Theſe women expoſed themſelves to the luſt of the Iſraelites, and enticed them to idolatry, by the counſel of Balaam, who having learned that the proſperity of Iſrael depended upon their obſervance of the divine laws, and that there was no way to bring a curſe upon them but by ſeducing them from their duty, bethought him of this low ſtratagem to accompliſh his wicked purpoſe.

religion and laws of their forefathers; joining with these women, who were now become their wives, in the notion and worship of a plurality of gods, in the indiscriminate use of all kinds of meats *, and, blinded by the vehemency of their passion, gave themselves up to the practice of every species of irregularity.

The whole camp, by imperceptible degrees, became infected with the conduct of these men; few instances remaining of that veneration of the Deity, by which the practice of former times was distinguished; for the licentiousness to which the introduction of these new customs and manners had given birth, so universally pervaded all ranks of people, that it soon became utterly impracticable to check the progress of this dangerous evil.

Zimri, a Hebrew, marries Cosbi, a Midianite.

One of the chiefs of the tribe of Simeon, who was named Zimri, had espoused Cosbi, the daughter of Zur, a Midianite of the first rank and quality. This man, at the instigation of his wife, openly avowed his marriage, and his consequent change of religion. Moses, fearful of the consequences of this disorderly conduct of the people, convened a general assembly, and, in a discourse which he had framed for the purpose, represented to them the indignity which the memory of their ancestors sustained from their present conduct, in thus preferring the indulgence of their inordinate lust and appetites, to that veneration which they owed to their Creator. He farther observed to them, how inconsistent it was for men who had demeaned themselves soberly and virtuously in the wilderness, to be guilty of such unpardonable excesses in a land of plenty, and to squander in their prosperity what they had acquired, not without considerable danger and difficulty, in the time of their adverse fortune. By these means he hoped either to shame, or to argue them into a change of conduct; carefully avoiding to give the least umbrage, by addressing his discourse to one in particular, it being his intention to reclaim those who were culpable, and not to expose them by a public censure. When Moses had finished, Zimri rose from his seat, and replied to him in a speech expressed in terms of the most insolent nature, in which he openly avowed and justified his conduct, and also delivered the sentiments of the whole party.

The people waited in anxious expectation of the event of so audacious an insult; being greatly apprehensive that it would be productive of mischievous effects. But Moses, being fearful lest the multitude should rise in arms if he should attempt to resent the gross affront which had been offered him, instantly dismissed the assembly, without making the least reply to his opponent. This outrage, however, would probably have been carried to much greater lengths, but for the death of Zimri, which happened soon afterwards in the following manner.

Phinehas, the son of Eleazar the high-priest, and grand-nephew of Moses, was highly renowned for his valour and other accomplishments. This youth was so much incensed against Zimri †, on account of the contempt he had shewn to the laws of his country, that he determined to put him to death; from a conviction that, in the case of a faction similar to the present, the more exalted the rank of the ringleader might be, the more exemplary ought to be his punishment. He, therefore, repaired to the tent of Zimri, and slew both him and Cosbi, with one thrust of his sword. Many others of the Hebrew youths, animated with a like spirit with Phinehas, immediately attacked the associates of Zimri, the major part of whom they devoted to a similar death with their leader; and those who escaped at that time, were quickly afterwards carried off by a pestilence, which swept away not only the rebels themselves, but such of their relations also, as, by their influence and authority, might have restrained them from the commission of those sins which occasioned their deplorable fate. The number of those persons who lost their lives in this manner, amounted to fourteen thousand. These treacherous practices of the Midianites enraged Moses so highly, that he detached a body of troops to over-run their country, and totally root out the whole nation.

CHAP. VII.

Defeat of the MIDIANITES. MOSES appoints JOSHUA his Successor.

THE number of the troops sent by Moses on this expedition was twelve thousand men, one thousand from each tribe, and they were headed by Phinehas, of whom we have made mention in the foregoing chapter.

When the Midianites heard that the enemy had already marched to their frontiers, and were still advancing, they assembled their troops, seized upon several passes, which they fortified in the best manner the shortness of the time would admit, and prepared to receive their attack. At the very first shock, however, they gave way, and fled, an incredible number of them being killed in the pursuit. Amongst these were the five kings of the country. The Hebrews ravaged the whole country, and, in pursuance of the instructions given by Moses to Phinehas, utterly destroyed all the inhabitants, save the virgins, who were carried away captives, to the number of thirty-two thousand. Phinehas afterwards returned with his detachment to the army,

* The feasts upon sacrifices, among the Heathens, were generally accompanied with music and dancing, and sometimes with pompous processions, which inticed youthful minds to partake of them, and had a tendency to inflame their carnal appetites, which the women would not let them satisfy unless they consented to worship their idols.

† Zimri appears to have been very impudently wicked, and to have had a high contempt both of Moses's authority, and of God's, whose servant he was; and as a farther aggravation of his sin, it is added, that he did it before the face of all the people, and that, when they were mourning for their sin, lamenting the common calamity, and imploring the pardoning mercy of God.

bringing with him a prodigious booty, consisting of fifty-two thousand oxen, sixty thousand asses, with household plate, and vessels of gold and silver to an immense value.

Upon a distribution of the spoil, Eleazar and the priests received one-fiftieth part, another fiftieth fell to the share of the Levites, and the remainder Moses divided among the people, every individual of whom acquired a considerable booty on the occasion. Moses, being now greatly advanced in life, declined the functions of a leader, governor, and prophet, in favour of Joshua, whom he proclaimed to be his successor, in conformity to the command he had received from the Almighty. Joshua was perfectly qualified to execute the important commissions with which he was invested, having obtained to a proficiency of knowledge in the divine and human institutions, under the immediate direction of his just and able predecessor.

Petition of Gad, Reuben, &c. after due consideration, granted.

About this time, the tribes of Gad and Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh, petitioned Moses to grant them the country of the Amorites, which had been lately conquered, and was considered by them as a spot highly desireable: they were the more solicitous to obtain this point, as they possessed numerous herds and other cattle, and the earth produced abundance of excellent pasture. Moses understood this request to be made merely to avoid engaging in a battle, and accused them of pusillanimity and indolence.

"I perceive," said he, "the drift of your stratagem: your design is, to indulge yourselves in ease and indolence, while your countrymen are opposing the common enemy, and encountering the difficulties which must inevitably occur in pursuing their victories beyond the Jordan, and penetrating into the country which has been promised them by the Almighty."

In consequence of Moses having manifested a displeasure at what they requested, they urged, that the sole motive of their application was a desire to obtain a place of security for their wives, children, and effects; adding, that if fortified places were to be assigned them for the above purpose, no impediment would remain against their engaging in the common cause, and that they would pursue the war wherever their leader should command §.

The scruples which Moses entertained being intirely removed by this declaration, he transferred to them the land of the Amorites, in the presence of Eleazar, the high-priest, Joshua, and the other chief magistrates, conditionally that they should unite with their countrymen in a league offensive and defensive, and not quit their arms till the war should subside.

Cities of refuge.

Ten of the forty-eight cities beforementioned were built by Moses, and three of them he appointed as sanctuaries for such as had killed a fellow-creature by chance-medley, or without malice prepense. During the life of the high-priest within whose jurisdiction the homicide was committed, the refugee was to remain in banishment; and if the offender was found without the place of refuge, the law allowed that the kindred of the deceased might slay him; but gave no other person an authority to deprive him of life. Bozor, erected on the borders of Arabia, Ariman in Galadene, and Gaulanan in the country of Batanæa, or Batanitis, were the cities of refuge or sanctuary. Moses enjoined, that upon taking possession of the land of Canaan, three cities of sanctuary, having the privileges above described, should be constructed, among those belonging to the Levites.

§ They declared, that they were all of them ready to go, or as many as should be thought necessary. Accordingly we find that forty thousand of them went over with their brethren, ready armed for war, to the plains of Jericho, Deut. iii. 18. Jos. iv. 12. and they shewed both faith in God, and love to their brethren, thus to go in the front of the battle, and generously risque their lives against such powerful enemies, without any farther benefit to themselves, leaving their weak families behind them to the divine protection.

CHAP. VIII.

The last Oration of MOSES to the People: The Laws which he delivers to them.

FORTY years, within thirty days, having now elapsed since the departure from Egypt, Moses assembled the people at a place now called Abila, on the banks of the river Jordan, and adjacent to a field of palm trees, and addressed them to the following purpose.

"The pleasure of the Almighty, and the course of nature requiring me to resign my breath, after having arrived to the hundred and twentieth year of a vexatious and toilsome life; and it being ordained that I shall no longer employ my arms in war, or my advice in council, to facilitate your progress towards the land of Canaan; I am sensible, in this the latest hour of my existence, of a peculiar satisfaction in the idea that I leave my fellow-soldiers and the partners of my toils and sufferings in a happy prospect of those promised blessings which are to crown their wishes. Even at this most important period, I must not omit that part of my duty which relates to your happiness; nor fail, according to the abilities I possess, of explaining to you in what that happiness consists, and pointing out the means by which it is to be obtained: The unremitting attention which I have observed in my endeavours to promote your welfare and happiness, will give authority to what I shall deliver, and let the integrity of my past days bear testimony that I am deserving confidence: and further be it observed, that the declaration of a man on the verge of eternity is uttered in sincerity of heart, and claims a sacred observance.

"Be assured, that all human happiness consists in the favour of the Almighty, to whom alone it belongs to reward the virtuous, and punish the wicked. If you demean yourſelves conformably to the commands of God, and to the precepts which I have communicated to you by his order, you ſhall acquire the higheſt degree of reputation, and the proſperous ſtate of your affairs ſhall conſtantly excite the envy and jealouſy of your neighbours; beſides, the happineſs you now enjoy ſhall be continued to you in perpetuity, and all your wants ſhall be abundantly ſupplied. But, beware that you make no innovations either in your laws or religion. Adopt my counſel, and you ſhall become invincible; for while God is on your ſide, it is a matter of no conſideration by whomſoever you are oppoſed. Obedience is conſtantly attended with adequate and glorious rewards, and is in itſelf the greateſt benefit which man can poſſeſs. Exerciſe it among yourſelves, and it will render you mutually happy, and eſtabliſh your fame in after-ages. By ſuch conduct you will enſure to yourſelves a happy eſtabliſhment; and my utmoſt wiſh would be gratified, could I but ſee you in a ſettled ſtate before I reſign my breath. To obtain this, you have only to pay due attention to the precepts which have been delivered to you for the regulation of your conduct, and to yield an implicit obedience to the orders of thoſe who ſhall be placed in authority over you, to provide for your welfare and ſecurity.

"The divine Being, by whoſe direction you have been hitherto guided, and to whoſe bounty you owe all the benefits derived from my adminiſtration, will continue to be your guardian and protector, ſo long as you worſhip him in the manner he has preſcribed. You will have alſo a ſufficient number of excellent adviſers in the perſons of Eleazar, the high-prieſt, Joſhua, the ſenate, and the heads of the tribes. Demean yourſelves towards them with all ſubmiſſion; for thereon will your happineſs greatly depend; as he will never be qualified to govern others, who has not firſt learnt the leſſon t[illegible]ey.

"God grant that none of my ſucceſſors may experience an impetuoſity of conduct from you, ſimilar to what I have been too often expoſed to; for you muſt be ſenſible that my life was frequently in much greater danger from you than from all the attacks of our enemies. I mention not this circumſtance with a deſign to reproach you; nor would I wiſh to remind you of your former faults at the time I am about to leave you for ever. Let your paſt misfortunes teach you prudence, and, when you have obtained poſſeſſion of the land of Canaan, do not ſuffer yourſelves to be ſeduced, by the riches and plenteouſneſs of the country, to depart from your duty to your governors; but remember that your welfare depends on a due ſubſerviency to your ſuperiors; and that if ever the attractions of wealth and luxury ſhall render you neglectful of that veneration which you owe to God, and of the reſpect to which your rulers are intitled, the Almighty will forſake you, and, inſtead of your guardian and protector, will become your avowed foe: you ſhall loſe with ignominy the conqueſts you acquired with reputation and valour, and ſhall be diſperſed as vagabonds over the face of the whole earth.

"When theſe calamities come upon you, it will be then too late to repent of your miſconduct, and to wiſh that you had conformed yourſelves to the laws of God and your country. Effectually, therefore, to guard yourſelves againſt falling into ſo fatal an apoſtaſy in future, you muſt utterly extirpate the inhabitants of the countries you ſhall ſubdue, and totally conſume their temples, groves, and altars with fire. Leſt this, however, ſhould not be ſufficient to anſwer the intent, I have compoſed a code of laws and ordinances, for the regulation both of your public and private conduct, under the immediate direction of God himſelf; the due obſervance of which will render you the happieſt people on the face of the earth." At the concluſion of this diſcourſe, Moſes delivered to them a written book, containing divers laws and rules, which are as follow:

Laws and rules for the government of the Hebrews in the land of Canaan.

"When ye have ſettled yourſelves in the land of Canaan, ye ſhall build on a ſpot diſtinguiſhed by its fertility and the beauty of its proſpect, and to be choſen by God himſelf, by the agency of his prophet, one ſingle temple*. In this temple ye ſhall erect one altar only, which ſhall be formed of unhewn ſtones, taken promiſcuouſly from the quarry, and fitted to each other with all poſſible accuracy and neatneſs; ye ſhall not aſcend, either to the temple or to the altar, by a flight of ſteps, but by a gentle riſing of the ground. And ye ſhall erect no other temple or altar throughout the land which ye ſhall poſſeſs; for ye are one nation, and adore one only God.

One temple, one altar, and one God.

Blaſphemy made death.

"Let the blaſphemer be ſtoned to death, and his carcaſe be hung upon a gibbet for the ſpace of a whole day, and afterwards be thrown into the ground with every mark of ignominy.

To worſhip thrice a year in the temple.

"Thrice a year, every individual of your nation ſhall repair from all parts of the land to this temple, to offer ſacrifices, and to implore the future bleſſings of heaven; and, by the freedom of a ſocial intercourſe, to give birth to a reciprocality of friendſhip among the different members of the community. It tends greatly to promote the benefit of men of the ſame lineage and profeſſion, to acquire a perſonal knowledge of each other: for the impreſſion made by a word, a look,

* This was commanded before, but is now repeated becauſe of the great importance of it, to prevent all ſtrange worſhip. As if Moſes had ſaid; As this injunction, whereby your nation is confined to one certain place of public ſacrifice and worſhip, is intended to keep up the diſtinction between you and other people, and is made in oppoſition to the general cuſtom of idolatrous worſhippers, who pick out numberleſs places for their devotions, as their ſuperſtitious prejudices and fancies dictate to them; you are to look upon it as a capital precept, and take ſpecial care to obſerve it.

or an action often ſurpaſſes all conception; whereas, this advantage will be intirely forfeited unleſs ſuch meetings are promoted.

A ſecond tenth.

"Excluſive of the tenth appropriated to the maintenance of the prieſts and levites, a ſecond tenth alſo of the value of the produce of the land ſhall be expended in ſacrifices, and in the celebration of public ſolemnities in this holy city; as the power who grants us the gratuitous poſſeſſion of the land is, doubtleſs, fully intitled to a part of the fruits thereof.

The hire of an harlot not to be offered.

"Nothing ſhall be offered in ſacrifice which is purchaſed with the wages of proſtitution; for the Almighty abhors all unclean practices. Nor, for the ſame reaſon, will any thing be accepted as an oblation which ariſes from the hire of a female animal, intended to preſerve the breed.

Not to revile the gods of other nations.

"Ye ſhall not ſpeak ill of the gods of other countries, nor ſhall ye deſpoil their temples, or take away any veſſel or other thing which is deſtined for the ſervice of their altars.

Prieſts only to wear mixed garments.

"No man ſhall preſume to wear a garment made with a mixture of woollen and linen, unleſs he be of the order of prieſts, to whom alone that privilege belongs.

Laws to be publicly read on the feaſt of tabernacles.

"At the concluſion of every ſeventh year, during the celebration of the feaſt of tabernacles, the prieſt ſhall read to the people aſſembled the book of laws, at which ceremony perſons of every rank, ſex, and age, ſhall be permitted to attend; for it is highly proper to impreſs their minds with a due knowledge of the laws, that they may not plead ignorance in excuſe for their miſconduct. Offenders alſo are more eaſily reſtrained from the commiſſion of crimes, when they know the puniſhments which they are liable thereby to incur. The impreſſions which men receive by the ear are forcible and permanent, and, being convinced of the propriety and neceſſity of legal inſtitutions, they are at all times prepared to accuſe themſelves, whenever they are guilty of a breach of thoſe inſtitutions.

Children to be taught the law.

"I particularly recommend it to you to initiate your children early in the knowledge of theſe laws, as the moſt advantageous and neceſſary ſtudy to which they can poſſibly apply themſelves. Twice a day, therefore, let them be put in mind of the memorable mercies of the Almighty towards them, particularly in their deliverance from the bondage of the Egyptians: for thankſgiving is a duty equally incumbent upon us with prayer. Inſcribe upon their doors, their heads, arms, and other parts of their bodies, memorials of the power and goodneſs of God, that they may conſtantly have in their minds the bounties of divine providence towards them.

Memorials of God's bleſſings.

"In each city let a council* be eſtabliſhed, conſiſting of ſeven perſons; men equally famed for their virtue and piety; and to theſe let twice the ſame number of levites be added. Permit no man to uſe irreverent or ſcurrilous language in your courts of juſtice; for by accuſtoming yourſelves to pay a due deference to your earthly governors, you will inſenſibly become attached to the practice of all religious as well as moral duties. The ſentence of the judge muſt be definitive, except in caſes of evident error or bribery. As juſtice is the point to which the proceedings of the courts univerſally tend, it ought to be adminiſtered with the ſtricteſt impartiality. It argues a diſtruſt of the divine power and mercy, to manifeſt more fear of the reſentment of a man in high ſtation than of God himſelf, as if the latter were inferior to the former; which thoſe who act in the above manner evidently inſinuate. If the perſons before whom a matter is brought to be decided, ſhould, either from the want of a thorough knowledge of the particulars from miſinformation, or from any other circumſtance, be found incompetent (which not unfrequently happens) to paſs judgment therein; let the cauſe be removed to the holy city, to be determined by the high-prieſt, the prophet, and the ſenate. No man ſhall be condemned upon the teſtimony of fewer than two credible witneſſes.

The Jewiſh magiſtracy inſtituted.

Women's teſtimony inadmiſſible.

"The natural levity, and propenſity to talkativeneſs in the female ſex, renders them unfit to be admitted as witneſſes in a court of juſtice: their teſtimony, therefore, ſhall not be received.

And that of ſlaves.

"Every ſlave alſo ſhall be rejected as an evidence, becauſe from the debaſement of his mind, ariſing from the abjectneſs of his condition, he may probably, either through fear, or from motives of avarice, be induced to deviate from the truth.

Puniſhment for a falſe oath.

"He who prefers a falſe accuſation againſt another upon oath, ſhall incur the ſame puniſhment as, in caſe of conviction, would have been inflicted on the party accuſed.

Homicide, or manſlaughter.

"If a man be found dead in any lone place, and no proof can be given, either poſitive or preſumptive, of the manner in which his death happened, the ſtricteſt inquiſition ſhall be made, and rewards offered for the diſcovery of the parties concerned. But, ſhould theſe meaſures fail of ſucceſs, the magiſtrates of the ſeveral diſtricts adjacent to the ſpot where the body was found, ſhall aſſemble, and aſcertain, by an exact meaſurement, which of thoſe diſtricts is neareſt to the ſpot in queſtion. This matter being determined, the inhabitants of ſuch diſtrict ſhall provide a heifer, which they ſhall bring into a place totally unfit for every purpoſe of vegetation; and, after cutting the ſinews of the neck of the victim, the prieſts, levites, and elders, ſhall waſh their hands with water over the head of the animal, and in the moſt ſolemn manner ſhall declare their innocence, and utter ignorance of the homicide in queſtion; concluding the ceremony with the moſt earneſt ſupplication to the Deity, to avert the guilt of blood from the people of that place in future.

* Accordingly, they had judges appointed, and conſiſtories erected in every city, for the determining all differences ariſing out of the law, tho' not as to the power of life and death, which was ſeldom granted them by their ſovereigns, except in larger cities.

Theocratic government preferred.

"A theocracy being the beſt form of government, let that be adopted and conſtantly maintained by the Hebrews, and the aboliſhment of it will be attended with many bad effects: for under ſuch a government the people are ſubjected to the laws alone, which will ſufficiently inſtruct them in every point of their duty: let them be ſatisfied, therefore, that the Almighty deigns to take upon himſelf the ſupreme direction of their affairs.

Advice concerning a king.

"If, notwithſtanding, ye ſhould find in yourſelves a propenſity towards a monarchical government, be careful to chuſe for your king* a perſon of your own nation; a perſon eminent for his juſtice and probity, of great moderation, and free from guile: one who ſhall place greater confidence in the direction of the Almighty, for the good government of his kingdom, than in his own judgment; a perſon, in ſhort, who ſhall conform himſelf upon all occaſions to the advice of the high-prieſt and elders: without indulging himſelf in a plurality of wives, or in uſeleſs parade and oſtentation; leſt this affectation of power and pomp ſhould in the end lead him to encroach upon your rights and privileges, and to aſſume a degree of authority which may prove highly inconſiſtent with your intereſt.

Not to remove landmarks.

"Ye ſhall not remove either your own or your neighbour's landmarks, as they were from the firſt deſigned to maintain inviolable the peace of ſociety. Let them remain immoveable as the foundations of the earth, and as if they had been fixed by the hand of God himſelf, at the æra of creation. The breach of this injunction will inevitably produce wars and tumults; and as ambition is the baſis of war, this kind of injuſtice derives its origin from avarice.

Fourth year fruit only to be offered, or eaten.

"Ye ſhall neither eat yourſelves, nor offer in ſacrifice to God, the firſt-fruits of ſuch trees as do not bear till the fourth year from the time of their being planted; all ſuch being unnatural productions. But in the fourth year, when the fruit is become fit for gathering, let the whole be plucked, and conveyed to the holy city, where the owner ſhall conſume it, together with the tithes of his other fruits, in company with his relations and friends, and with the widows and orphans.

Vineyards not to be ſown.

"No vineyard ſhall be ploughed up, for the purpoſe of its being ſown; ſince ſuperfluous cultivation will but impoveriſh the land.

To plow with oxen only.

"Oxen are the only animals which ſhall be uſed for the plough; for beaſts of different kinds ſhould not be joined together in the ſame yoke.

Seed to be unmixed.

"The ſeed with which ye ſow the land ſhall be unmixed; as, by mingling ſeveral ſorts together, you will create an unnatural confuſion.

No adulterate mixtures of beaſts.

"Ye ſhall not ſuffer animals of different ſpecies to generate; leſt the evil example ſhould tempt mankind to indulge themſelves in the gratification of unnatural luſts.

Gleanings to be left for the poor.

"When ye reap your corn, be careful that ye leave a large proportion of gleanings for the relief of the poor; and ye ſhall act in like manner when ye gather your grapes† and your olives; nor will your bounty go unrewarded: for when a man evinces a proper commiſeration of the miſeries of the poor, God will fertilize the land which he poſſeſſes, and will grant him the bleſſing of plenty. Ye ſhall not muzzle the ox whilſt he treadeth out the grain; as it would be totally inconſiſtent with juſtice and reaſon to debar any animal from partaking of the fruits his own labour.

Oxen treading corn not to be muzzled.

Paſſengers on a journey not to be denied ripe fruits.

"Suffer the paſſenger, whether he be a native or a ſtranger to gather the ripe fruit as he paſſes through your grounds, and to eat his fill; but without taking any part thereof away with him. At the time when ye preſs your grapes, if a traveller ſhould requeſt a few bunches of them, do not deny him ſo ſmall a proportion of thoſe fruits which God has been pleaſed to beſtow upon you in ſuch great plenty; particularly as this fertile ſeaſon is but of ſhort duration. The breach of this injunction ſhall be puniſhed with thirty-nine laſhes, to be inflicted by the hands of the common executioner. The remembrance of the many ſufferings which ye underwent, both in Egypt and the wilderneſs, ought to humanize your temper ſo far, at leaſt, as to render you compaſſionate to the neceſſitous.

Third tenth, for widows and orphans.

Excluſive of the two annual tenths, already mentioned, one of which was ſet apart for the uſe of the levites, and the other for the celebration of all public ſolemnities; a third alſo ſhall be levied, to be diſtributed every third year among the poor widows and orphans of your nation.

* This by no means imports that God commanded them to make them a king when they came to Canaan, as ſome of the Jews underſtand it; but only that if they would needs have a king, he ſhould be one of their brethren. It appears from this paſſage, that the fault of the Iſraelites lay not in aſking a king, but in aſking him from wrong motives, and in a licentious, diſorderly manner. See 1 Sam. viii. 5, 19, 20.

† From a grateful ſenſe of the ſame divine deliverance, Moſes exhorts them to be mindful of thoſe proviſions made for the poor by the laws, Lev. xix. 9, 10. xxiii. 22. wherein they are ordered not to be over-nice and exact in reaping the fruits of their fields and vineyards; but to leave ſomething to be gathered by their poor neighbours.

Ye

First fruits to the temple, as a thank-offering.

Ye ſhall not neglect, at proper ſeaſons, to bring your firſt-fruits* to the temple, and, after returning thanks to God, and offering the cuſtomary ſacrifices, ye ſhall deliver them into the hands of the prieſts; having paid the uſual dues to the levites, and for the ſolemnization of the feſtivals; when ye are about to return home, ye ſhall place yourſelves before the door of the temple, and ſhall give thanks to God for reſcuing the Iſraelites from their grievous bondage in Egypt, and for eſtabliſhing them in the poſſeſſion of ſo beautiful and fertile a country; publicly declaring, at the ſame time, that ye have paid the ſeveral dues required by the law. Ye ſhall then offer up your prayers to God, both for your own private welfare, and for that of the public; requeſting not only a continuance of his preſent favours and mercies, but alſo an increaſe of them in future.

Laws reſpecting wedlock.

A man who has attained to a marriageable age, and is inclined to take to himſelf a wife, ſhall make choice of a virgin, who is a free-woman, deſcended from virtuous parents, and well educated: but let no one preſume to attempt the chaſtity of the wife of another man, thereby to give uneaſineſs and vexation to her huſband. If a freeman marries a bond-woman, he ſhall not be juſtified on the plea of love; for a man derogates from the dignity of human nature when he ſuffers his paſſions to uſurp the maſtery over him. Let no man eſpouſe a reputed harlot; for God will not accept a nuptial oblation from the hands of an impure perſon; moreover, the offspring of ſuch marriages commonly manifeſt their origin by the depravity of their manners.

Puniſhment of a woman marrying as a virgin, who is not ſuch.

A man, who imagining he had married a virgin, finds himſelf deceived, ſhall bring the matter to a judicial determination, and ſhall produce his proofs: the father, brother, or the perſon who is the neareſt relation to the woman, ſhall appear in her behalf. If the charge againſt her be not clearly proved, the huſband ſhall be compelled to entertain her as his lawful wife, and the marriage ſhall never afterwards be diſſolved, but upon the moſt indiſputable evidence of her guilt. But, ſhould it appear that the accuſation was founded ſolely in malice and calumny, the huſband ſhall, by way of puniſhment, receive thirty-nine ſtripes, and ſhall alſo be amerced in the ſum of fifty ſhekels, to the uſe of the father of the woman. On the other hand, if the guilt of the woman ſhall be made evident, and ſhe be of mean extraction, ſhe ſhall be ſtoned to death; or, if honourably deſcended, particularly from a ſacerdotal family, ſhe ſhall be burnt alive.

Primogeniture adjuſted.

If a man ſhall marry two wives, and ſhall (from whatever motive) prefer the one before the other, and the favoured wife ſhall prevail upon him to demand the privilege of primogeniture in behalf of her ſon, who is younger than the ſon of the other wife; in this caſe, I ſay, ye ſhall not comply with his demand; for, according to my laws, the elder ſon is intitled to a double portion of the inheritance, and it would be unjuſt to ſuffer this partiality of his father to operate to his ſon's diſadvantage, by depriving him of the above privilege.

A virgin betrothed not to be corrupted, or ſeduced.

"If a virgin, who is contracted to one man, ſhall ſuffer herſelf to be debauched by another, both parties ſhall be deemed as guilty, and ſhall both be puniſhed with death; the man for ſeducing the woman to prefer the gratification of an avaricious or luſtful appetite, to an honourable matrimonial alliance, and the woman for ſuffering herſelf to be influenced by ſuch baſe and degenerate motives. But, if a man ſhall be convicted of having raviſhed a woman, on a ſpot at a diſtance from all help, he alone ſhall be ſentenced to death. Whoever ſhall ſeduce a virgin, who is under no engagement to any other man, ſhall either marry her, or, if the parents of the woman will not conſent thereto, let the delinquent compound for his offence by the payment of fifty ſhekels to her father.

Reſpecting a man's parting with his wife.

"When a man is determined, as often happens, to ſeparate himſelf from his wife, upon whatever account, he ſhall deliver to her an inſtrument, ſigned by his own hand, whereby he engages never to require her to return to him again: and this will bear her harmleſs in contracting a ſecond marriage: nor will the divorce be otherwiſe valid. But if, after the death of her ſecond huſband, the woman ſhould be inclined to return to the firſt, ſhe ſhall not be indulged therein.

Caſe of a huſband's dying without iſſue.

"When a married man dies, leaving no iſſue, let the brother of the deceaſed eſpouſe the widow†, and, if a ſon ſhould be the produce of this ſecond marriage, he ſhall be named after the firſt huſband, and ſhall inherit the eſtate; for it is neceſſary to the public welfare, that family

* Every Iſraelite being obliged by law to offer the firſt-fruits of his field and vineyard, at the tabernacle, at the proper ſeaſons of the year; Moſes now preſcribes to them the forms of ſolemn profeſſion and prayer, with which each offerer ſhould preſent them. Firſt, that at his preſenting them to the prieſts in waiting, he is to declare he brings them in humble and grateful acknowledgment of the divine providence and goodneſs, that has ſettled him and his family in this fruitful country, purſuant to the gracious promiſes made to his forefathers.

† This obligation is underſtood, by the Hebrew doctors, to lie upon the eldeſt ſurviving brother, by the ſame father. And if the eldeſt brother, that married his brother's relict, died alſo without iſſue, then the next ſurviving brother was to marry her; and ſo forward, according to the caſe ſuppoſed in the goſpel. But this is to be underſtood only of a brother that was unmarried, as appears from Lev. xviii. 18. And this is thought to be implied in the words, if brethren dwell together: for though the younger, while he continued ſingle, may be ſuppoſed to dwell with the elder, yet, when he married, he would dwell in an houſe of his own. If there was no brother, properly ſo called, to perform this duty, the next of family names ſhould be preſerved from one generation to another, and that their poſſeſſions ſhould devolve intire from heir to heir: and it will be a conſolation to the widow to ſpend the remainder of her days with one ſo nearly related to her firſt huſband. In caſe of the refuſal of the brother to conform to this ordinance, let the widow prefer a complaint againſt him to the ſenate, ſetting forth the inſult which, by his refuſal, he had caſt upon the memory of the deceaſed. The members of the ſenate ſhall then interrogate him on the ſubject of his conduct, and whatever arguments he may uſe in his defence, the reſult will be this: the widow ſhall looſen the latchet of his ſhoe, and, ſpitting in his face, ſhall reproach him with the contempt he has manifeſted for the memory of his deceaſed brother; adding, that by ſuch conduct he juſtly incurred his preſent puniſhment. He ſhall then quit the court, thus ſtigmatized; and the widow ſhall be permitted to marry whoever ſhe thinks proper.

Duties enjoined on a maid, wife, or widow, taken captive.

"If a woman, of whatever condition, whether maid, wife, or widow, be taken priſoner, and the perſon who makes capture of her be inclined to marry her, they ſhall not cohabit as man and wife 'till the woman ſhall have ſhaven her head, and ſhall have fulfilled the time of her mourning for the friends and relations ſhe may have loſt in the battle; and at the end of the time ſhe ſhall be allowed to enter into the nuptial ſtate. Every man who takes a woman to wife with the view of having iſſue by her, is bound to pay ſome attention to the wiſhes of his wife, and not to indulge his own inclination at the expence of her's. But at the expiration of thirty days, which is a ſufficient term for bewailing the loſs of our friends and relations, the marriage ceremony may be performed without any imputation. If he ſhould, through a natural ficklenefs of temper, wiſh to ſeparate himſelf from her afterwards, he ſhall not reduce her to her former ſtate of ſlavery, having that ſhe hath by her marriage emancipated herſelf from bondage.

Undutiful children to be admoniſhed;

"When children ſhall be guilty of irreverent behaviour towards their parents, let the father or mother, whom nature has conſtituted their judges, admoniſh them in terms adapted to convince them of their folly and diſobedicence; if ſuch admonition produce the proper effect, let the former miſconduct of the parties be forgiven, as the effect rather of human frailty than of premeditation; and this lenity will redound to the honour of our laws, and will greatly adminiſter to the comfort of the parents. But if the children ſtill perſevere in their rebellion, in utter contempt both of the authority and advice of their parents, let the laws, in that caſe, take their courſe; and let the parties, in conſequence, be ſtoned to death, on a ſpot without the city, and their bodies, after being expoſed one whole day on a gibbet, ſhall be taken down in the evening to be interred. The ſame rule ſhall be obſerved with reſpect to the burial of the body, in every other caſe of public executions. Even the enemies of the ſtate are intitled to the rights of burial. It is ſufficient that the delinquent ſuffers the penalty of the law, and the puniſhment ought not to extend beyond death.

"It ſhall not be permitted to one Hebrew to lend to another either money, meat, or drink, upon uſury; for it is an unjuſtifiable action to make an advantage of the diſtreſſes of thoſe of our own nation. Let it be remembered, that the conſciouſneſs of having done a good action, is its beſt reward: thus benevolence itſelf would become clear gain, did man but confide in the Almighty for that reward which he will indubitably confer, either ſooner or later, on the virtuous and humane. Let thoſe who borrow either money or fruits, wet or dry, make a point of diſcharging the debt whenever God ſhall enable them ſo to do: for this is nothing more than depoſiting ſo much money or effects in the hands of another, for your own uſe and ſervice upon any future occaſion.

No lending upon uſury to an Hebrew.

"If a debtor ſhall be ſo totally devoid both of ſhame and conſcience as to neglect the re-payment of what he borrowed, the creditor ſhall demand of him a pledge, which he ſhall receive at the door, but ſhall not be permitted to enter his houſe, unleſs in virtue of an order for that purpoſe from the judge. In caſe that the debtor can conveniently ſpare the article which he has pledged in the hands of his creditor, the latter ſhall retain it till he has received ſatisfaction for the debt; but if, on the other hand, he ſhall chance to be in very indigent circumſtances, it ſhall be returned to him again before ſun-ſet; particularly if it ſhould be a garment, which he may poſſibly want to keep him warm during the night: ſo much does God commiſerate the caſe of the poor.

Law relating to borrowing.

"Ye ſhall not receive in pledge either a mill, or any thing which appertains to the working of it*; leſt the owner ſhould thereby be deprived of the means of earning a maintenance.

Working utenſils not to be taken as pledges.

of kin, who in ſcripture is alſo often ſtiled brother, in a larger ſenſe, was bound to marry her. And, indeed, I ſhould be apt to think, that by brother here was meant only a kinſman; becauſe the law expreſly prohibits marriages between brothers in law and ſiſters in law, Lev. xviii. 16. However, it appears from Gen. xxxviii. 7, 8. to have been cuſtomary in very early times, even among the patriarchs, for brothers to marry their brother's widows. And Huetius aſſures us, that ſome of the Indians and Perſians, and the Tartars that inhabit Iberia and Albania, ſtill retain this cuſtom.

* This law is of the ſame merciful nature with that in Exod. xxii. 26, which enjoins, that a perſon's raiment, which was pledged, ſhould be reſtored before ſun-ſet: hence we find that an Iſraelite was not to take any thing of his neighbour in pawn or pledge, which is abſolutely requiſite for the ſubſiſtence of himſelf and family. The reaſon aſſigned for this prohibition, that the violation of it would be equal to taking a man's life to pledge, or to the depriving him of all means of ſubſiſtence, is very ſtrong, and inculcates the exerciſe of benevolence and charity in ſuch a light, as reflects no ſmall honour on the Divine legiſlator. Both the milſtones were neceſſary to grind his corn. The Jews made uſe of hand-mills, which they worked one upon another, to grind their corn.

Againſt ſelling Hebrews for ſlaves; and ſtealing.

"Whoever ſhall privately ſell a Hebrew into ſlavery ſhall be put to death; and he who ſteals from another either gold or ſilver, ſhall make a twofold reſtitution.

Theft.

"He ſhall not be ſubjected to the puniſhment of the law who ſhall kill a man in the act of ſtealing, or making forcible entry into an habitation, in order to rob the ſame.

Stealing cattle.

"The penalty for ſtealing a labouring beaſt ſhall be four times the value of the property ſtolen, except the creature be an ox, and in that caſe the fine ſhall be quintuple: the robber not being able to diſcharge the penalty, ſhall be made a ſlave to the party he has injured.

Hebrews to ſerve only ſix years.

"One Hebrew being ſold to another, ſhall ſerve for the term of ſix years, and be then emancipated: but in caſe of his having iſſue in the dwelling of his maſter, by any fellow-ſervant, and ſhall be inclined to continue in his ſervitude, himſelf, his wife, and children, ſhall be freed in the year of jubilee.

Goods found to be reſtored.

"A man who ſhall find gold or ſilver upon the way, ſhall inquire for the owner, and reſtore it to him: and in regard to cattle, the perſon who ſhall find ſuch as have gone aſtray, ſhall keep them till the proprietor can be diſcovered, calling heaven to witneſs that he covets not the goods of another man. It is contrary to the principles of humanity to take advantage of the misfortunes of our fellow-creatures.

Not to inſult the unfortunate.

The traveller to be ſet right in the way.

"Let thoſe who obſerve a traveller to be at a loſs upon the road, direct and adviſe him, according to the beſt of their knowledge and ability. To make a traveller the object of ſport, and to impede the progreſs of his journey, and thereby delay his buſineſs, argues a cruelty of diſpoſition.

Againſt backbiters, &c.

"Speak not injuriouſly of abſent perſons, or of thoſe labouring under the affliction of deafneſs.

Law concerning aſſaults, &c.

"If, in a quarrel, a man ſhall ſtrike another, and not with a ſword, the aggreſſor ſhall be puniſhed by a number of blows equal to thoſe conſtituting his offence. If the party aſſaulted linger for ſome days, and then expire, no action for murder ſhall enſue; but if he recover, the whole expence incidental to his cure ſhall be defrayed by the aſſailant. A man who by aſſaulting a woman ſhall cauſe her to miſcarry, ſhall be adjudged to a forfeiture for the loſs of a ſubject; and a further penalty ſhall be inflicted upon him, as a gratuity to the huſband. If the woman die, the ſentence of death ſhall be executed upon her deſtroyer; for the crime of taking away the life of a fellow-creature requires that the life of the offender be forfeited.

Puniſhment of poiſoners.

"Whoever ſhall be found with any poiſonous preparation in his cuſtody, ſhall ſuffer death, as a juſt puniſhment of his malicious deſigns.

Law relating to maiming.

"He who ſhall wilfully ſtrike out the eye of another, ſhall make ſatisfaction in kind; unleſs the injured party ſhall be inclined to accept of a ſum of money, as a compenſation for the hurt he has ſuſtained; the law, in this inſtance, leaving him to his option.

Vicious oxen to be killed.

"The owner of a vicious ox ſhall be obliged to kill him. If the animal chance to gore any perſon to death, let him be ſtoned, and let no man eat of his fleſh; and, in this caſe, if it be proved that the owner of the beaſt had been made acquainted with his miſchievouſneſs, he ſhall himſelf be put to death, for neglecting to take proper precaution to prevent the above clamiaty. The maſter of an ox that hath killed either a male or a female ſlave, ſhall pay thirty ſkekels* to the owner of ſuch ſlave. If one of thoſe animals chances to kill another, they ſhall both be ſold, and the produce of the ſale ſhall be equally divided between the two owners.

Pits, &c. to be covered.

"Whoever digs a pit, or a well †, ſhall lay boards over it, and raiſe a mound about it, not with the view of excluding others from a participation of the water, but to prevent any accident which might happen therefrom either to man or beaſt; and if, in failure of ſuch precaution, any animal ſhall unfortunately fall into ſuch pit or well, the proprietor of the ground ſhall make good the value of the creature ſo loſt.

Depoſits left in truſt not to be violated.

"Whoever receives either money or effects in truſt for another ſhall preſerve the depoſit inviolate, nor ſhall he ſuffer himſelf to be perſuaded to deliver it to any perſon but the legal proprietor thereof, upon any conſideration whatever. For, although there ſhould be no witneſs either to the depoſit, or to the peculation, in caſe he may have been guilty of it, yet his conſcience will aſſuredly ſupply that defect, and will either condemn or acquit him in the ſight of God, who cannot be deceived by the utmoſt exertion of human artfulneſs and fallacy. But if the depoſit ſhould be loſt, without any bad deſign on the ſide of the perſon in whoſe hands it was entruſted, he ſhall preſent himſelf before the ſeven judges, of whom we have already ſpoken, and ſhall make a ſolemn declaration, upon oath, that he is not privy, in any reſpect whatever, to the manner in which it was loſt; and he ſhall thus acquit himſelf of any imputation of fraud in the execution of his truſt. But ſhould any proof ariſe, in future, that he had converted the ſmalleſt part of the depoſit to his own uſe, he ſhall be ſubjected to the payment of the whole.

* This was the price of a ſlave; and can any thing give us a clearer idea of the malice and indignity expreſſed by the Jews, who when aſked by Judas, what they would give him to betray his maſter? anſwered, Thirty pieces of ſilver; by that means degrading their king to the meanneſs of a ſlave!

† It is a common practice in thoſe hot countries to dig for ſprings, and make large pits or ciſterns, as receptacles for rain-water, which if left uncovered, cattle might eaſily fall into them, and be maimed or deſtroyed thereby.

Poor labourers to be punctually paid.

"Ye ſhall obſerve the ſtricteſt punctuality in the payment of the labourers whom you employ; neither defrauding them of the ſmalleſt part of their juſt demands, nor delaying payment thereof a day beyond the time that the work is finiſhed.

Children and parents to be puniſhed for their own ſins.

"It were injuſtice to puniſh the children for the offences of their fathers: on the contrary, if their own diſpoſition be naturally good, the circumſtance of their parents' miſconduct ought to be conſidered as a misfortune to them; and we are bound rather to revere them for their own virtues, than to deſpiſe them on account of the vices of others. Nor ſhould we, in all caſes, impute the wickedneſs of the children to thoſe from whom they derive their birth; for there are ſome tempers ſo unaccountable as not to be influenced either by precept, example, or even by the ſeverity of the puniſhment.

All caſtration forbidden.

"Some perſons, influenced by horrid and unnatural paſſion, voluntarily render themſelves eunuchs, and thereby, as far as in them lies, counteract the deſign of nature and providence in the creation of the different ſexes; reſcinding, at the ſame time, the means of population, and, conſequently, depriving the world, to the utmoſt of their power, of the benefit of poſterity. Their minds alſo, muſt doubtleſs have been totally corrupted and debilitated, previouſly to their making this infamous experiment on their bodies. Avoid theſe wretches as monſters in nature; nor ſuffer any creature to be caſtrated, either of the human or brute ſpecies, as you, in that caſe, depart from the firſt inſtitute of nature.

"The foregoing laws I have formed for the regulation of your conduct in times of peace; and I hope that both yourſelves and your poſterity will ever religiouſly adhere to them. Yet, as it muſt be expected that accidents will naturally ariſe in the beſt regulated ſtates, I ſhall endeavour, in the feweſt words poſſible, to give you ſuch advice, as ſhall enable you to provide againſt all contingencies.

"May you poſſeſs in peace the land which God hath deſtined for your reſidence, and may you quietly reap the fruit of your toil and perſeverance, unexpoſed to the attempts either of foreign enemies, or of more dangerous domeſtic foes; as an internal ſchiſm would hazard the deſtruction of the ancient form of government, both civil and religious, which was eſtabliſhed by your anceſtors, and is founded on ſuch ordinances as they received from God himſelf: and from theſe you muſt never depart.

Advice in caſe of war.

"If, however, either yourſelves or your poſterity ſhould at any time be compelled to enter into a war, I ſincerely wiſh it may be with a foreign foe. To avoid the blame of raſhneſs and precipitation, let your proceedings be regulated in proper form. In the firſt place, ſend embaſſadors to reaſon with your opponents, on the injuſtice of their conduct towards you; for it is but right that you ſhould endeavour to ſettle your differences by a negociation, without proceeding to force. You may repreſent to them that it is not your deſire to enrich yourſelves with plunder, that you wiſh not to puſh matters to extremes, but are willing to accept of any terms which may be conſiſtent with juſtice and reaſon; not arrogantly preſuming on the ſuperior advantages you enjoy in a numerous and well-diſciplined army, plentifully provided with all kinds of military ſtores, or, what excels all, on the favour and protection of an Almighty Power, who will conſtantly fight on your ſide. But if your antagoniſts ſhould determine to riſk the event of a war, meet them boldly in the field, putting yourſelves under the direction of the Almighty, and, next to him, of the moſt experienced and valiant man you can ſelect from your whole army. Entruſt the ſupreme direction of the war in the hands of a few only; for a multiplicity of leaders is prejudicial; not only on account of the diſſenſions, but alſo of the delays which too commonly ariſe from thence. Be careful in the choice of your ſoldiers, for their courage muſt be equal to their ſtrength; as a defect of reſolution in a few may ſuffice to diſpirit and ſeduce a whole army *.

* It may not be amiſs, in this place, to exhibit, at one view, the whole form, order, and manner of incampment of the Iſraelites, with the diſpoſition of the twelve tribes, and the reſpective number of each, as in the following

There was a peculiar banner or ſtandard to each of theſe camps; and every ſtandard had its motto or inſcription, and likewiſe a diſtinct figure marked thereon. Reuben's ſtandard was diſtinguiſhed by the figure of a man; Judah's, that of a lion; Ephraim's, that of an ox; and Dan's, of an eagle. Ezekiel has alſo adopted the ſame four animals, in the deſcription of his firſt viſion. See Ezek. i. 10. and p. 64.

"But

Exemptions. "But theſe following perſons ſhall be excuſed from military ſervice: the maſters of new-built houſes, in which they have not yet reſided the term of one year intire; all ſuch perſons as have planted vineyards, the produce of which they have not yet taſted; and men lately married, who have not yet brought home their wives, leſt ſuch ſhould devote thoſe hours to dalliance which ought to be employed in the ſervice of their country.

Diſcipline. Fruit-trees to be ſpared. "Let your troops be kept under the ſtricteſt diſcipline. If at any time during a ſiege, you ſhould want wood, for the conſtruction of military engines, or for any other purpoſe, ye ſhall not cut down any fruit-trees; ſeeing that they were both created and planted for uſes very different from that to which you mean to apply them. Were they endued with the gift of ſpeech, they would complain bitterly for the injuſtice of deſtroying them, who were guiltleſs of the cauſe of the war, or, with the view of promoting its progreſs; and would add, that, could they be permitted to change their ſituation, they would tranſplant themſelves to ſome diſtant part of the earth.

Of giving quarter. "When you have obtained a victory, put thoſe to death who ſhall reſiſt you, but ſave the lives of the reſt, and render them your tributaries; excepting the Canaanites alone, the whole race of whom you ſhall utterly extirpate.

Dreſs to be diſtinct. "No man ſhall be permitted to wear the dreſs of a woman, nor ſhall any woman, in battle particularly, aſſume that of a man."

Such were the laws and regulations which formed the baſis of the Hebrew commonwealth, at the time of the death of Moſes, who left various other ordinances alſo, which he had framed about forty years before that period.

Charge given by Moſes. Moſes convened all the people on the next day, and obliged not only the men, women, and children, but even the ſlaves alſo, to enter into a ſolemn engagement, which they ratified by an oath, to pay the ſtricteſt obedience to the foregoing laws, unſeduced by promiſes, and unawed by threats. They likewiſe promiſed that, if any perſon, how cloſely ſoever he was connected with them, either by blood or friendſhip, or any body of people, ſhould attempt to introduce a change in thoſe laws, they would firmly unite themſelves againſt him or them; perſecuting them with unceaſing ardour, and utterly deſtroying their habitations: but, if the power of the innovators ſhould be ſuperior to theirs, they would at leaſt enter their proteſt againſt the impiety, and would, by every poſſible means, manifeſt their utter deteſtation thereof.

This was the ſubſtance of the oath which Moſes adminiſtered to the people on this occaſion. He alſo gave them the neceſſary inſtructions relative to the manner of performing ſacrifice; and recommended to them to undertake no enterprize of conſequence, till they ſhould firſt have learnt how far the Almighty favoured their deſign, by obſerving the appearance of the precious ſtones in the breaſt-plate of Aaron, according to the manner before preſcribed.

Moſes then gave his inſtructions to Joſhua, relative to the plan of operations which he was to purſue in the enſuing war againſt the Canaanites; giving him the ſtrongeſt aſſurances that God would grant him ſucceſs in his undertaking, and predicting many circumſtances of the future proſperity of the people, of whom he afterwards took his leave in the following ſpeech:

"I muſt acknowledge my own obligations to God's goodneſs, for the aſſiſtance he has been graciouſly pleaſed to afford me in all my endeavours to promote your happineſs and welfare, in effecting which I have had no other ſhare than as being an inſtrument in the hand of God. Let me remind you of the duty and reverence which you are bound to pay to that Supreme Power, who alone is intitled to your adoration. I would recommend it to you alſo to ſet a juſt eſtimate on the laws he hath communicated to you, through me, as being the moſt valuable and ſacred of all his bounties. An earthly law-giver would naturally reſent a neglect of his ordinances, and a contempt of his authority: judge then what will be the indignation of the ſupreme Being, who is your heavenly legiſlator, when he ſhall call you to account for your diſregard of his commandments."

After having pronounced this ſpeech, and bleſſed the ſeveral tribes, Moſes proceeded to the ſpot where he was to die; and deſired that the multitude would not follow him, to interrupt the tranquillity of his laſt moments. They obeyed; but ſtill purſued his ſteps with weeping eyes and afflicted minds, till they could no longer diſcern him. He proceeded forwards, accompanied ſolely by the elders, with Eleazar the high-prieſt, and Joſhua, whom it had pleaſed God to appoint as his ſucceſſor. When he had reached the top of Abarim*, which is a very high mountain ſituated oppoſite to Jericho, he ſpent ſome ſhort time in contemplating the proſpect which lay before him of the fertile land of Canaan, and then diſmiſſed the elders; retaining with him only Eleazar and Joſhua. Having bid a final adieu to theſe two perſons, and exchanged many reciprocal embraces, he was taken from their ſight in a cloud, and conveyed into a neighbouring valley. It is recorded in the Holy Scriptures, that he died, leſt the world ſhould give into a notion that, on account of his eminent virtues, he had been tranſlated immediately to heaven. He lived to the age of one hundred and twenty years; during a third part of which time, within one month, he poſſeſſed the ſupreme authority among the Hebrews. He died on the firſt day of the month Dyſtrus, as it is named by the Macedonians, and by us Adar: which is the concluding month of the year.

* In the country of the Moabites, between the rivers Arnon and Jordan, there were mountains which commanded a moſt extenſive and beautiful proſpect of Canaan, which Moſes was favoured with a view of, before his death.

This

This man excelled in wiſdom, was a conſummate orator, and poſſeſſed ſo admirable a command over his paſſions, that they ſeemed to form no part of his compoſition: as a general and a prophet, he ſurpaſſed all who have either preceded or followed him. The mourning for him continued thirty days; and the people were more affected by the loſs of this great and virtuous man, than by any other misfortune that they had ever experienced. Nor was this the character which he had obtained among his cotemporaries alone; but he has acquired as great reputation with poſterity by his writings, as he did with thoſe who lived in his own time, by the fame of his actions*.

* The character of Moſes has been inveſtigated by various writers, ſacred as well as profane, who all agree in aſcribing to him every quality neceſſary for a legiſlator and hiſtorian. He had undoubtedly a difficult part to act, and had as ſtubborn and rebellious a generation to govern, as any we read of in the whole compaſs of hiſtory. He was eminently endowed with meekneſs and patience, which were ſet in oppoſition to the turbulence and impetuoſity of the Iſraelites; and was an eminent pattern of Him, who he predicted ſhould in future riſe out of his brethren, and who ſhould be the founder of a new ſyſtem as ſuperior to that eſtabliſhed by Moſes, as the meridian ſplendor of the ſun exceeds in brightneſs the glimmering light and feeble dawnings of the day.

CHAP. I.

After the Death of MOSES, JOSHUA ſucceeds to the ſupreme Command; ſubdues the CANAANITES, and divides their Lands, by Lot, among the Tribes. The Death of JOSHUA.

Joſhua diſpatches ſpies to Jericho.

THE laſt duties having been paid to the memory of Moſes, and the time of mourning for him being now expired, Joſhua commanded the people to prepare themſelves for marching, and ſecretly diſpatched certain perſons to Jericho, to intelligence of the diſpoſition of the inhabitants, and the ſtrength of the place.

The tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manaſſeh, having been permitted to ſettle themſelves in the country of the Amorites, which includes a ſeventh part of the land of Canaan, Joſhua aſſembled the leaders of thoſe tribes on the preſent occaſion, and, after reminding them of their obligations to Moſes, urged them to fulfil the promiſes which they had formerly given him, and to afford their brethren the Hebrews every aſſiſtance in their power; with which they chearfully engaged to comply, and, accordingly, joined the army with a body of fifty thouſand men. Joſhua then quitted Abila, and marched ſixty furlongs nearer the river Jordan: the tents were ſcarcely pitched, when the ſpies which had been ſent to Jericho returned, and gave the following account of what had befallen them in the execution of their commiſſion.

That under the garb of ſtrangers, they obtained a free acceſs to the city, and were indulged in examining the walls, gates, and fortifications of the place, without the leaſt moleſtation or hindrance; that, towards evening, they retired to a houſe, in a quarter of the city adjoining to the wall, where they refreſhed themſelves; that, having finiſhed their ſupper, while they were conſulting on the means of effecting their retreat from the city, intelligence was brought them that the king had been made acquainted with their arrival, and with their concealment in the houſe of Rahab, and had ordered them to be inſtantly ſeized and put to the rack, for the purpoſe of extorting from them a confeſſion of their deſigns; that, in conſequence of this intelligence, Rahab conducted them to a retired part of the houſe, where ſhe covered them over with a quantity of flax, and told the officers of juſtice, when they came to ſearch for them, that it was true ſuch ſtrangers had come to her houſe that evening, about ſun-ſet, but that they had departed immediately after ſupper, and, if inſtant purſuit were made after them, they might eaſily be overtaken; that the apparent ſimplicity of the woman ſo effectually impoſed on the officers, that they retired without ſearching the houſe, and haſted towards the river Jordan, in hopes of diſcovering them; that, when the confuſion which this alarm had occaſioned was in ſome meaſure ſubſided, Rahab repreſented to them the great danger to which ſhe had expoſed both herſelf and her family, by ſecreting them, and exacted from them an oath, to preſerve herſelf and her relations from the univerſal deſtruction in which, it had been revealed to her by the Almighty, the whole city was to be involved; that they cautioned her to be careful when the city ſhould be attacked by the Hebrews, to remain cloſely ſhut up with her kindred in her own houſe, which ſhe ſhould diſtinguiſh from the reſt by a ſcarlet thread affixed to the door, the intent of which ſignal ſhould be communicated to the general, who would, doubtleſs, protect from harm all thoſe who ſhould be found within the walls of that houſe; and that, having returned her repeated thanks for her kindneſs, they then departed, being let down from the top of the wall by a cord*, which Rahab had provided for that purpoſe. Eleazar the high-prieſt, and the elders, having been conſulted how far the promiſe of ſafety which the ſpies had given to Rahab was binding, formally pronounced that it could not by any means be diſpenſed with.

As the city of Jericho was ſituated on the other ſide of the river Jordan, the waters of which were particularly rapid at that time, Joſhua, being totally deſtitute of the means of paſſing his army over, became greatly diſpirited at the proſpect of theſe apparently inſurmountable obſtacles to his ſucceſs; but God was pleaſed to revive his courage, by giving him a full aſſurance that thoſe difficulties ſhould be removed, and that the river ſhould be rendered fordable.

Jordan miraculouſly divided.

On the ſecond day after receiving this revelation, the promiſe was made good to him, and the army paſſed over. During the whole time that the army was paſſing over, the prieſts remained in the midſt of the channel; and when they alſo had landed, the waters reſumed their former ſtate.

The army then marched forwards to the diſtance of about fifty furlongs, and encamped within ten furlongs of the walls of Jericho. Joſhua erected an altar on this ſpot, conſiſting of twelve ſtones, which twelve princes of the ſeveral tribes had, by his order, collected from the bottom of the channel of Jordan, with the view of perpetuating the remembrance of this miraculous ſeparation of the waters. On this altar he offered ſacrifices, and celebrated the feaſt of the paſſover in the place where he was then encamped. The corn being ripe, and the whole face of the country overſpread with flocks and herds, the manna, which had been their only food for the ſpace of forty years in the wilderneſs, failed them at this juncture: but the loſs of this ſuſtenance was amply compenſated by the great abundance which they found themſelves at full liberty to enjoy.

Joſhua lays ſiege to Jericho

The conduct of the inhabitants of Jericho, in ſuffering the Iſraelites to ravage the open country, while they continued cloſe ſhut up within their walls, convinced Joſhua that no conſideration would be ſufficient to induce them to meet him in the field; and he, therefore, determined to lay ſiege to the city. On the firſt day of the above feſtival, Joſhua commanded a proceſſion to be made round the walls of the city, in the following order: ſeven prieſts, blowing horns or trumpets, to rouſe the ardour of the troops, led the way: theſe were followed by others of the ſame function, carrying the ark on their ſhoulders, and attended by a numerous guard of ſoldiers: the proceſſion was cloſed by the elders: when they had made the circuit of the city, they returned to the camp. This was repeated for ſix days ſucceſſively; and on the ſeventh, Joſhua, addreſſing himſelf to the army and people, acquainted them that they would become maſters of the place on that very day, without the leaſt effort on their part; as the walls would fall ſpontaneouſly, and leave the city utterly defenceleſs: enjoining them, at the ſame time, to put every living creature they ſhould find therein to the ſword, Rahab and her family only excepted, without reſerving to their uſe the ſmalleſt part whatever of the plunder. He farther ordered that all the gold and ſilver ſhould be collected together, and offered up to the Almighty, as the firſt-fruits of their conqueſts in the land of Canaan.

The city taken.

Having given them theſe inſtructions, he advanced with his army towards the city, and, after having gone in proceſſion ſeven times round the walls, with the prieſts, the elders, and the ſoldiers, in the manner mentioned above, they halted, and the walls ſuddenly fell to the ground, without the agency of any kind of engine, or other means to effect their fall. The conſternation of the inhabitants was ſo great on the occaſion, that they were deprived thereby of all power to defend themſelves: and the Hebrews, entering the city without the leaſt oppoſition, put all without diſtinction to the ſword, ſave Rahab and her friends and family, who were preſerved by the ſpies formerly mentioned, and conducted by them to Joſhua, who made her many acknowledgements for the eſſential ſervice ſhe had rendered his agents, and rewarded her with a liberality becoming his high ſtation.

Rahab and her family ſaved.

After the total extinction of the inhabitants, the city itſelf was reduced to aſhes, and a prophetical curſe† was denounced againſt thoſe who ſhould preſume to rebuild it; purporting, that he who ſhould lay the firſt ſtone of a new foundation ſhould loſe his eldeſt, and he who completed the undertaking, his youngeſt ſon. The gold, ſilver, and braſs, which was found in the city, amounted to an immenſe value; and Joſhua delivered the whole of it, without the leaſt diminution, to the prieſts, to be depoſited in the ſacred treaſury.

Achar's theft.

But, notwithſtanding the ſtrict precaution of Joſhua, it ſo happened that Achar,

* Rahab's houſe was fortunately ſituated on the town-wall, from whence, as ſoon as it was dark, ſhe let them down by a cord from one of her windows which faced the country, the gates being ſhut by the king's orders. The cord ſhe uſed for this purpoſe probably conſiſted of threads twiſted together, ſo as to be able to ſuſtain a man's weight; the Hebrew word ſhenah not ſignifying colour, but any thing twiſted, from ſhanah to double.

† This anathema was pronounced, that the miracle of the ſubverſion of Jericho might be perpetually remembered. Hiel, in the reign of Ahab, was ſo pleaſed with the beauty of its ſituation, that he rebuilt Jericho, 1 Kings xvi. 34. but in the attempt to lay the foundation, he loſt his firſt-born, and his youngeſt ſon when he ſet up the gates of it; however, it afterwards became famous on many accounts. Here the prophet Eliſha ſweetened the waters of the ſpring that ſupplied it and the neighbouring country; here Herod built a ſumptuous palace; and here the great Redeemer of mankind wrought ſeveral miracles.

the ſon of Zebedee, of the tribe of Judah, having diſcovered among the plunder the king's cloak, which was of gold tiſſue, and an ingot of the ſame metal, weighing two hundred ſhekels, ſecreted the whole for his own private uſe. To palliate the action, he argued thus: that it was ridiculous to offer up to God ſuch things as he could not poſſibly ſtand in need of; and that he had ventured his life to obtain this booty, which would be of infinite ſervice to him: he therefore buried the articles in a hole which he dug in his tent; vainly imagining that he might deceive the Almighty with the ſame facility as he impoſed on mankind. At this period, the army lay encamped at a place to which the Hebrews had given the name of Gilgal, ſignifying liberty; for they conſidered themſelves as being fully ſecured from all attempts of the Egyptians, and from all misfortunes ſimilar to thoſe which they had experienced in the wilderneſs.

The Hebrews defeated.

In a ſhort time after the deſtruction of Jericho, a body of three thouſand men was detached by Joſhua to poſſeſs themſelves of the city of Ain, which was ſituated a ſmall diſtance only from the former; but on this occaſion the Hebrews were repulſed with the loſs of thirty-ſix men. The news of this check threw the Iſraelites into the greateſt conſternation imaginable; not ſo much in conſideration of the number killed, though they were all choice men, as of the bad effects which it might produce; for, having flattered themſelves with a courſe of uninterrupted ſucceſſes (in conſequence of the promiſe they had received from God) they perceived that the ſpirits of their enemies were now revived, and this reflection induced them to ſet apart a whole day to the purpoſe of faſting and humbling themſelves before God. So univerſal was the deſpondency with which the army was affected, that Joſhua addreſſed himſelf to the Almighty on the occaſion with more than uſual importunity.

Joſhua remained proſ on the ground, whilſt he prayed; at the concluſion God commanded him to riſe, and to purify the army from a pollution which it had contracted, by a ſecret and ſacrilegious theft, for which atonement muſt be made; enjoining him, at the ſame time, to caſt lots for the diſcovery of the offender, who ſhould inſtantly be put to death; after which the Iſraelites ſhould infallibly obtain the victory over their enemies. Joſhua, having received theſe inſtructions and aſſurances, communicated them to the people; and, in the preſence of Eleazar the high-prieſt, and the princes of the ſeveral tribes, caſt lots as he had been commanded; taking firſt the tribes, ſecondly, the families of each tribe, and laſtly, the individuals of each family; when, in the concluſion, the lot fell upon Achar, who was of the family of Zacharis, of the tribe of Judah. He was immediately ſeized, and, finding himſelf detected, acknowledged the fact, and delivered up the effects he had ſecreted in the ſight of all preſent. He was inſtantly dragged away to an ignominious death; and his body, like that of a common malefactor, was interred without any of the cuſtomary honours.

Achar's crime diſcovered, and puniſhed.

The army being thus purified, Joſhua led them againſt the city of Ain* or Ai, having previouſly planted a body of troops in ambuſcade, and the next morning at day-break offered the enemy battle. The people of Ain were ſo elated with their recent ſucceſs, that with the moſt daring intrepidity they attacked the Iſraelites, who, on their ſide, feigned to give ground, till they had drawn their foes to a convenient diſtance from the city; when, upon a ſignal given, they halted, and, at the ſame inſtant, the troops which had been placed in ambuſcade, ſuddenly entered the city, with little or no reſiſtance on the part of the inhabitants, the majority of whom had got upon the walls to be ſpectators of the battle; imagining, from the appearance of matters, that the victory was already nearly won. A dreadful ſlaughter, however, enſued in the city; and thoſe troops which had marched out to the attack, having been, in the intermediate time, totally defeated by the army of Joſhua, retreated towards Ain for ſhelter; but, when they perceived the diſaſter which had befallen their city, they fled, in the utmoſt confuſion, to ſeek an aſylum in the fields and woods; but of thoſe who eſcaped in this manner, the number was very inconſiderable. The booty taken on this occaſion was of an immenſe value; conſiſting of a vaſt number of women, children, and bond ſlaves, a prodigious quantity of plate and coſtly furniture, numerous flocks and herds, and coined money to a very large amount. Both the city, and all the adjacent country, in ſhort, abounded in riches, and the plunder was divided among the troops which were encamped in Galgala.

Ain taken and plundered.

The Gibeonites, whoſe country was ſituated at a ſmall diſtance from Jeruſalem, having learnt the wretched fate of the two cities of Jericho and Ain, began to reflect that a like doom, in all probability, would ſoon befall themſelves, unleſs they could deviſe ſome expedient to ward off the impending danger. They propoſed to their neighbours the Cephirites, and to the people of Kerjath-jearim, to unite with them in a ſolicitation to the Hebrews for an alliance; repreſenting to them, that, if they ſhould not ſucceed in their views, their common intereſt required that they ſhould join their forces, in mutual aſſiſtance of each other. The propoſal was adopted, and a deputation was ſent to Joſhua, conſiſting of ſuch perſons as were deemed the beſt qualified for the taſk of executing ſuch a commiſſion. Theſe deputies were inſtructed cautiouſly to conceal from Joſhua the knowledge of their being Canaanites, but, on the contrary, to inſinuate

Fraudulent conduct of the Gibeonites.

* God would not deſtroy Ai by a miracle, as he had done Jericho, becauſe the people were now to appear formidable to other nations, both on account of their courage and policy. They were all to go up, though before they thought it might be taken by three thouſand men, becauſe their former defeat ſhould not intimidate them, and becauſe they might all enjoy the benefit of the plunder.

that they came from a distant land, and that they held no connection whatever with the people of that country. They were farther instructed to pretend, that the fame which the Hebrews had acquired had induced them to come thus far, to form an alliance with them; observing that the condition of their cloaths evinced the great length of the journey they had taken; being now worn to tatters, although quite new when they first departed from home. The garments themselves, also, were adapted, both in point of materials, and every other particular, to favour the deception. They accordingly presented themselves, thus habited, before the assembly of the chiefs of the Hebrews, in the quality of deputies from the Gibeonites, the Cephirites, and the people of Kerjath-jearim; requesting to be admitted to the honor of an alliance with them, and offering them their friendship and assistance, on the sole condition of being secured in the enjoyment of their rights and privileges; adding, that they were apprized of the promises of God to the Israelites, to put them in possession of the whole land of Canaan, and sincerely congratulated them on this predilection of the Almighty for their nation. Joshua was so far deceived by the specious pretext and appearance of these men, that he readily entered into a treaty with them, to which the high-priest and the elders acceded at the same time; and it was afterwards ratified, in the most solemn manner, in the presence and with the consent of the whole multitude assembled. Having thus insidiously effected their purpose, the deputies now returned to their respective cities†. Soon afterwards Joshua advanced with the army to that part of the land of Canaan which borders upon the plains.

Their artifice discovered.

Here he learnt that those Gibeonites and their confederates were of the Canaanitish race, and dwelt not far from Jerusalem. He, therefore, commanded the attendance of some of the principal men of the country, and reproached them with the disingenuousness of their late conduct; which they vindicated in the best manner they were able upon the plea of necessity. When the high-priest and the elders were consulted as to the validity of a treaty thus surreptitiously obtained, they were clearly of opinion that it could not in justice be dispensed with; but proposed, by way of modification, that the Gibeonites and the rest should be condemned to the most servile offices of labour, to which condition they gladly submitted for the preservation of their lives.

Their punishment.

When this revolt of the Gibeonites, and their alliance with the Hebrews, was communicated to the king of Jerusalem, he was so highly incensed on the occasion, that, joining his troops with those of the kings of four of the neighbouring districts, he laid siege to their city; encamping his army near a certain fountain not far distant from the walls of the place. In this emergency the Gibeonites applied to Joshua for assistance; being thus compelled to have recourse to those who had taken up arms against them, to preserve them from the attacks even of their own countrymen and neighbours. Joshua hastened to their aid, and, after marching night and day, attacked the enemy early in the morning, at the very instant they were about to assault the place; totally routed, and pursued them through a considerable extent of country, as far as the valley of Bethora. Never did the Almighty manifest himself more strongly in favour of the Hebrews, than on the present occasion; for, exclusive of a violent storm of thunder and lightning, accompanied with hail of a surprising size, which lasted during the whole time of the battle, the sun itself, to the utter amazement of every spectator, stood still in the firmament, and thus prolonged the day far beyond its usual extent, that the Hebrews might have sufficient day-light to complete their victory over their enemies. The five kings fled for safety to the cave of Makkada, where they were all discovered by Joshua, who put them to death. The circumstance of the progress of the sun being stopped is fully authenticated in the copies of the sacred writings, which are deposited in the temple‡. After this victory, Joshua marched the army back to the hilly part of Canaan, where he put great numbers of the people to the sword, acquired a large booty in cattle, and then returned with his troops to Gilgal.

The fame of the military actions of the Hebrews spread universal terror through the land. Nevertheless, the kings of that part of the country of Canaan which lies contiguous to Mount Libanus, and to the † Puffendorff observes, that "the artifice of the Gibeonites had nothing blameable in it, nor does it properly deserve the name of a lye: for what crime is there in any one's making use of an innocent fiction, in order to elude the fury of an enemy, that would destroy all before them? Nor indeed did the Israelites properly receive any damage from this imposture; for what does any one lose, in not shedding the blood of another, after having so weakened and disarmed him, that he is no longer able to rebel against him?" Had the Israelites, indeed, been only a company of banditti; who were carrying blood and desolation into countries where they had no right; or had the Gibeonites been ignorant that a miraculous Providence conducted those conquerors; the fraud which they here practised, might have been deemed innocent. But the case of the Israelites was particular: and if, in other things, they went contrary to truth, in this they certainly adhered to it, when they told Joshua, We are come because of the name of the Lord thy God, for we have heard of the fame of him, and all that he did in Egypt, &c. The idea which they had conceived should have put them upon some other expedient than that of lying and deceit. They should have inquired into the cause of God's severity against them; they should have acknowledged that it was their grievous sins which drew down his heavy judgments upon their nation; and after they had repented, they should have left the rest to Providence.

‡ The victories of this day are the most wonderful of any obtained by the Israelites, on account of the remarkable interposition of the Most High. The miracles which were performed were suited to convince the Heathens of the absurdity of their superstitions, and that the deities they worshipped, which were the sun, moon, and stars, were subject to the God of Israel. Hail-stones were poured from heaven in great abundance, and the sun and moon were stayed in their course, to shew that the God of Israel fought for Israel!

plains, as alſo the kings of the Philiſtines, united their forces, with the view of attacking the Hebrews, and encamped, with an army conſiſting of three hundred thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, and two thouſand chariots, near a city named Berothe, which is ſituated at a ſmall diſtance from the Upper Cœdeſia, in the province of Galilee. The formidable appearance of this army greatly diſpirited both the Iſraelites and their general; inſomuch that their fear fell little ſhort of deſperation: but the Almighty reproaching them with their cowardice, and diffidence of his power to protect them, and renewing his aſſurances of victory, he enjoined them to hamſtring the horſes, and conſume the chariots of the enemy with fire; thus encouraged, they quickly recovered their reſolution, and boldly marched againſt the foe, with the fulleſt confidence of ſucceſs. On the fifth day the armies joined battle, and the conteſt was maintained for a conſiderable time, with equal obſtinacy. The Canaanites were, however, at length broken and put to flight, and the ſlaughter of them was ſo great as almoſt to exceed belief: all the kings being killed, and their whole army in a manner annihilated: and ſuch was the fury of the victors, that when there remained none of the enemy to kill, they wreaked their vengeance on the horſes and chariots. This deciſive victory put Joſhua in poſſeſſion of the whole country. He made himſelf maſter of their cities, and deſtroyed the inhabitants where-ever he could find them. The very nation became, at length, extinct, ſave a ſmall number of perſons, who fortunately effected their retreat to certain places of conſiderable ſtrength. And all theſe ſucceſſes were obtained in the ſhort ſpace of five years.

The Canaanites ſubdued and exterminated, and their country poſſeſſed by the Iſraelites.

After this victory Joſhua marched from Gilgal, and encamped on the mountains near Siloe, where he fixed the tabernacle, and] oſed to remain till an opportunity ſhould offer fo. erecting a temple; the ſituation of the place being perfectly adapted to that deſign. From thence he repaired, accompanied by all the people, to Sichem, where, according to the command and prediction of Moſes, he erected an altar. He then ſeparated his army into two bodies, one of which he poſted on Mount Garizim, and the other on Mount Gebal; aſſigning to each an equal number of the prieſts and levites; and on the latter of the two mountains he built another altar. On this altar they ſacrificed, and, after denouncing the maledictions formerly recited, and cauſing them to be inſcribed upon the altar, they returned back to Siloe.

Joſhua erects an altar at Sichem.

Joſhua was now far advanced in years, and, reflecting that the Canaanites ſtill retained poſſeſſion of ſeveral places, which art and nature had combined to render in a manner impregnable. Joſhua convened a general aſſembly of the people at Siloe, which was very numerous, and all their proceedings were conducted with the utmoſt harmony. Joſhua, in a very conciſe ſpeech, acquainted them with the cauſe of their being ſummoned together. He began with repreſenting to them the numerous ſucceſſes with which God had been pleaſed already to favour them, in conſequence of their religious obſervance of his laws; one and thirty monarchs having been diſpoſſeſſed by them of their dominions: he obſerved, however, that the Canaanites ſtill retained poſſeſſion of many ſtrong cities, the conqueſt of which would neceſſarily take up a conſiderable time; and that, for this reaſon, he thought it adviſeable to permit thoſe tribes which had come to their aſſiſtance from the other ſide of Jordan, to return home. He alſo recommended that a certain number of perſons ſhould be ſelected out of each tribe, of reputed probity and ſkill, who ſhould be employed to take a ſurvey of the whole land of Canaan, and to return a faithful report thereof, with all poſſible diſpatch.

In a general aſſembly, Joſhua reminds the people of God's goodneſs to them.

This propoſal was unanimouſly approved, and, proper perſons being immediately choſen for the execution of this commiſſion, Joſhua appointed ſeveveral able geometricians to attend and aſſiſt them.

They were alſo inſtructed, excluſive of the eſtimate which they were to make of the extent of the country, to form another of the comparative fertility of the ſoil in different parts: for in Canaan there are many long tracts of land, which, when ſet in competition with ſome others, may be deemed fruitful, but which bear no proportion in fertility to the ground in the neighbourhood of Jericho and Jeruſalem. The perſons who were commiſſioned to execute this buſineſs, were ten in number; anſwering to the tribes which were to partake in the diviſion of the country. Theſe commiſſioners, after an abſence of ſeven months, returned to Siloe with the eſtimates they had formed, at which place the tabernacle ſtill remained.

Joſhua, hereupon, in the preſence of Eleazar the high-prieſt, the elders, and the princes of the tribes, divided the whole country by lot between the nine tribes, and the half-tribe of Manaſſes; proportioning each ſhare to the number of perſons in the tribe to which it was allotted§.

Canaan divided by lot among the tribes.

Joſhua was now rendered incapable, by age and infirmities, to diſcharge the duties of his ſtation; and, perceiving that they to whom he intruſted the direction of affairs, as well as they who were deſtined to ſucceed him in the ſupreme command, were totally regardleſs of the public welfare, he ſtrictly enjoined each tribe reſpectively, utterly to exterminate ſuch of the

§ The firſt lot that came up was for the tribe of Judah, that the prophecy of Jacob, with regard to the preheminence of that tribe, might be fulfilled. This lot was only a quantity of land for the whole tribe; unto every family of which a portion was aſſigned by Joſhua, and thoſe who were appointed to ſee that none were neglected, and that they had every one a juſt portion.

Canaanites

Canaanites as might remain in the ſeveral quarters which they had obtained for an inheritance; reminding them alſo of the earneſtneſs with which Moſes had recommended to them this meaſure; and expreſſing his confidence of their paying all due attention to the advice of their late legiſlator. He ſtrictly charged them to put the Levites in poſſeſſion of the remaining thirty-eight, out of the forty-eight cities aſſigned them by Moſes; they having already obtained thoſe ten cities which were ſituated in Amorrhæa, on the other ſide of the river Jordan. Of theſe cities three were appointed as places of refuge: in the diſtrict belonging to the tribe of Judah, the city of Hebron was ſet apart for the above purpoſe; in that of the tribe of Ephraim, the city of Sichem; and Cedeſe, in the Upper-Galilee, in the portion of the tribe of Naphtali: to all theſe regulations, from the great reſpect which they bore to the ordinances of Moſes, the people very willingly conſented. Joſhua then proceeded to ſhare the plunder which had been taken from the Canaanites among his troops; which plunder conſiſted of cattle and flocks, money, plate, houſehold furniture, and other articles to an incredible amount; and every individual of the Hebrew army became enriched by the booty which fell to his lot on the preſent occaſion.

Joſhua's laſt exhortation to the people.

Joſhua, perceiving that the infirmities of age had now rendered him totally unfit for all public buſineſs, convened an aſſembly of the elders, the princes of the tribes, and the magiſtrates, together with as many of the commonality as could conveniently attend. In a pious and pertinent diſcourſe, which he had compoſed for that purpoſe, he repreſented to them the great obligations they were under to that Almighty Being, who, from the very abyſs of miſery and diſtreſs, had raiſed them to the higheſt pitch of reputation and plenty. He enjoined them ſo to conduct themſelves in future, as to render themſelves worthy of a continuance of the divine favour and protection; aſſuring them in the ſtrongeſt terms, that their very exiſtence as a nation depended on the due obſervance of the commands of the Almighty Power. He conjured them to pay a proper attention to the advice he had given them, as he was now on the verge of his departure from this world, and had conceived that he could not employ the laſt moments of his life in any manner more to their advantage, than in inciting them to the ſtricteſt obſervance of their duty to God. He then took a great ſtone, and ſet it up under an oak, to be a witneſs againſt them, in caſe they denied their God, and worſhipped idols.

His death;

Having pronounced theſe words, he expired, in the one hundred and tenth year of his age, forty of which he had ſpent under the tutorage of Moſes, and had governed the people, in quality of his ſucceſſor, for twenty-ſix years. He was particularly eminent for his political knowledge, and for his admirable faculty of expreſſion and perſuaſion; equally qualified to conduct the moſt important operations either of war or peace; and, in ſhort, a perſon in every reſpect adapted to the execution of the high office to which God had appointed him. Nearly about this time alſo died, Eleazar the high-prieſt, who was ſucceeded by his ſon Phinehas. The tomb of Eleazar is ſtill to be ſeen in the city of Gabatha.

and that of Eleazar.

The people having conſulted Phinehas relative to the farther proſecution of the war againſt the Canaanites ‡, received for anſwer that it was God's pleaſure that they ſhould continue it, but that they ſhould commit the ſupreme management and direction thereof to the tribe of Judah. This tribe aſſociated to themſelves the tribe of Simeon; and it was agreed, that they ſhould mutually aſſiſt each other in extirpating the Canaanites who ſtill remained unſubdued in their reſpective diſtricts.

The CANAANITES defeated, and King ADONIBEZEC made Priſoner. The ISRAELITES beſiege JERUSALEM, and take HEBRON by Aſſault. Melancholy Hiſtory of a LEVITE, and his Wife. The War of the BENJAMITES.

The Canaanites under Adonibezec, and their leader made priſoner.

ADONIBEZEC was at this period at the head of a formidable army in the neighbourhood of the city of Bezec, waiting for an opportunity to engage the enemy, over whom they expected to obtain an eaſy conqueſt on account of the loſs they had ſuſtained in the death of their general. The tribes of Judah and Simeon gave them battle, which was ſupported with ſurpriſing bravery on both ſides, but at length, ten thouſand of the Canaanites were put to the ſword, many taken priſoners, and the reſt fled from the fury of their conquerors. Adonibezec was among the number of captives, and he was condemned to have his fingers and toes cut off; he admitted this ſentence to be a merited judgment of heaven, for having himſelf inflicted the ſame ſpecies of cruelty upon ſeventy-two kings. When this ſentence had been executed, he was conveyed to Jeruſalem, where he died and was buried.

The Iſraelites traverſed the country, laying waſte the towns, and ravaging the parts through which they directed their courſe; they at length laid ſiege to Jeruſalem, and gained poſſeſſion of the lower town, the inhabitants of which they put to death: but the ſituation of the city itſelf, the ſtrength of the walls and the fortifications proving obſtacles not to be ſurmounted, they retreated to Hebron, to which place they laid ſiege and conquered it by aſſault, great numbers of the people falling victims to the rage of the aſſailants. Among the dead were found many bodies of the race of giants, who were a people ſo greatly ſurpaſſing the reſt of mankind in bulk and ſtature, and in other reſpects ſo widely differing from them, that great numbers who beheld them, imagined them to be a different ſpecies. The bones of ſome of this gigantic race have been preſerved, and expoſed as prodigies.

Hebron taken by ſtorm.

The town of Hebron, which was a place of ſome importance, with two thouſand cubits of the circumjacent ground, was aſſigned to the Levites; the other part of the territory having been granted to Caleb, in conformity to the determination and appointment which had been made by Moſes. Caleb was one of the perſons whom Moſes had deputed to reconnoitre the land of Canaan. A portion of land was alſo given to the ſons of Jethro the Midianite, who was father-in-law to Moſes, as a gratuity for having abandoned their native country and joined the Iſraelites, ſharing the hazard of the war and the troubles which they encountered in the deſert.

The Iſraelites now declined the reſolution of proceeding to a war againſt the people of Canaan, whom they determined to employ in the occupation of huſbandry, expecting to reap very conſiderable advantage from their labour. But being violently addicted to avarice and luxury, they ſoon became wholly regardleſs of their duty to God, and of the diſcipline and legiſlative inſtitutions of their forefathers, yielding an implicit ſway to their inordinate appetites. The Almighty being highly offended by this depravity of conduct, ſignified to them, that they ſhould meet a ſpeedy retribution for having neglected to proſecute the war, and that the Canaanites themſelves ſhould execute the puniſhment denounced againſt them for their unſeaſonable lenity. They were ſo loſt to the principles of religion, that though this revelation of the divine will gave them ſome alarm, it was not ſufficient to induce them to commence hoſtilities. Their luxurious indulgences had enervated them, and deſtroyed their genius and inclination for military exploits; and the profit derived from the tribute and labour of the Canaanites proved an additional motive to continue them in a ſtate of inactivity *. No regularity was obſerved in the election of the ſenators and other magiſtrates, nor obedience paid to the authority of the elders; the people endeavouring only to promote their ſeparate intereſts, without regard to the public welfare; and the government having arrived to a ſtate of total diſſolution, an inſurrection happened on the following occaſion, and the conſequence was an inteſtine war:

God is diſpleaſed with the Iſraelites for their ſloth and luxury.

In the lot of Ephraim was a Levite, who had married a woman of the city of Bethlehem, and of the tribe of Judah, for whom he entertained the moſt tender and ardent affection; but as ſhe did not manifeſt an equal return of paſſion, frequent differences happened between them; and in the fourth month after their nuptials, ſhe eloped, and returned to her parents. Grieved at this unfortunate circumſtance, he haſted in purſuit of her, and was entertained with the greateſt hoſpitality and kindneſs by her relations; and a reconciliation being effected between him and his wife, he propoſed to return on the fifth day, but the friends being unwilling to leave each other, their departure was delayed to a late hour. An aſs being provided to carry the woman, they ſet out, attended only by one ſervant, who, when they had proceeded about thirty furlongs, adviſed them to take an opportunity of ſecuring a lodging at ſome adjacent place, that they might avoid the danger to which they would be expoſed by travelling by night, and in the country of an enemy; urging, that being obſerved on the road at a late hour, might ſubject them to injurious ſuſpicions. The city being at this time in poſſeſſion of the Canaanites, the huſband was not inclined to take up his reſidence there, but reſolved to travel twenty furlongs further, in order to obtain an aſylum among his friends and allies.

Hiſtory of the Levite's wife, abuſed by the Benjamites.

On the road towards Gabaa, a city in poſſeſſion of the tribe of Benjamin, they found themſelves, at a late hour of the night, deſtitute of all probability of procuring a lodging; but they were met by an eminent man of the tribe of Ephraim, who was returning from the country to his houſe at Gabaa, and he enquired the reaſon of their being abroad at ſo unſeaſonable a time; in anſwer to which, the huſband ſaid he was a Levite, and conducting his wife from her father's houſe to their own houſe, in the lot of Ephraim. From a principle of hoſpitality, and a regard to the tribe of which the travellers were members, the old man invited them to take ſhelter in his dwelling. This offer being accepted, ſome diſſolute young men of the town obſerved in the woman an uncommon ſhare of beauty, and when ſhe had entered the houſe, they knocked at the door, and inſiſted that ſhe ſhould be delivered to them. The old man expoſtulated with them on the heinous crime of violating the principles of religion, humanity and common juſtice, by perpetrating any violence upon his gueſt, who, being his kinſwoman and the wife of a Levite, he was bound to protect. But theſe arguments were treated with contempt, and they obſti-

* Though the extraordinary providence of the Deity might have ceaſed for a time, and though the Iſraelites were left to effect by natural means what they had hitherto effected by divine aſſiſtance, it is evident from this verſe, that they were able to diſpoſſeſs the Canaanites, had they not been unwilling. Their allowing them to become tributaries, when they were under an obligation to extirpate them if they did not quit their idolatry, argued a great propenſity to their ſuperſtitions, was a direct violation of the divine command, was an act of open rebellion againſt God, conſidered as their king, and involved them in all that train of miſeries and corruptions, which had been denounced as the puniſhment, and were the natural effects of their puſillanimous lenity.

nately perſiſted in their demand of having the woman reſigned to them, uttering the moſt horrid imprecations, and threatening to cut the old man's throat if he continued to protect her. In this extremity, he offered them his own daughter inſtead of the Levite's wife; judging it to be moſt eligible thus to preſerve the rights of hoſpitality, and the faith of ſociety, at the expence of the reputation of a private family.

Shocking conduct of the men of Gabaa.

But ſo determined were they on the execution of their brutal deſign, that neither interceſſion or argument would prevail; and in this diſpoſition they ſeized the woman, and forcibly conveyed her to their quarters, where the night was ſpent in ſcenes of the moſt profligate lewdneſs; and in the morning they ſuffered her to return. The unhappy event which had befallen her, overwhelmed her with grief, ſhame, and indignation againſt the ſpoilers of her honour, and conſidering herſelf to be branded with the indelible ſtamp of infamy, ſhe dreaded an interview with her huſband; and ſo ſenſibly affected was ſhe by the peculiar delicacy of her ſituation, that upon approaching him, ſhe ſuddenly dropt down, and inſtantly expired. At firſt her huſband ſuppoſed her to be oppreſſed with fatigue, or attacked with a fainting fit, and endeavoured to revive her, ſpeaking in the moſt tenderly affectionate terms, expreſſive of his unabating regard, and uttering the moſt ſoothing and pathetic aſſurances, that notwithſtanding the violence which had been offered to her, he did not conſider her as being degraded from the dignity of unblemiſhed virtue. But at length, he diſcovered that the animal powers were exhauſted; and on this alarming occaſion he manifeſted a remarkable inſtance of fortitude: he put the corpſe on the aſs which his wife had rode, and conveyed it to his habitation; where he ſeparated it into twelve parts, which he diſtributed among the twelve tribes. The perſons employed to deliver the parts of the body to the different tribes, were directed circumſtantially to relate the barbarity which had been offered to the deceaſed, and to particulariſe the parties concerned in the horrid wickedneſs.

Indignation of the other tribes thereat.

The people were ſo much exaſperated againſt the perpetrators of this unparalleled act of cruelty, that they aſſembled before the tabernacle at Siloe, determining immediately to aſſault the city of Gabaa, and execute an exemplary puniſhment upon the raviſhers. Hereupon the elders aſſuaged the firſt impulſe of their rage, by repreſenting the imprudence of a precipitate declaration of war againſt their allies, and recommending a ſcrutiny into the merits of the cauſe in diſpute. They urged that the laws and cuſtoms of the Iſraelites would not admit of having recourſe to hoſtilities, previous to a negociation for a compromiſe: they, therefore, adviſed that application might be made for giving up the offenders for the purpoſe of ſubjecting them to a puniſhment adequate to their guilt, urging that, in caſe of a refuſal, they might then appeal to the ſword for redreſſing the wrongs they had ſuſtained.

Compact of the Iſraelites againſt Benjamin.

In conſequence of this advice, the Iſraelites demanded the raviſhers; and they alledged, that they had determined to puniſh the particular perſons who had been guilty of the offence, rather than involve the community in the cauſe of theſe profligate individuals. But the inhabitants of Gabaa gave an abſolute refuſal, declaring, that they held it not conſiſtent with the principles of honour to yield ſubmiſſion from an apprehenſion of a war; that they were not deficient in point either of power or military ſkill; and that they were unanimouſly determined to maintain their common defence with unremitting ardor. Highly incenſed by this reply, the Iſraelites joined in a ſolemn covenant againſt contracting marriage with the tribe of Benjamin, and to proſecute a war againſt that people with a degree of vigour equal to that manifeſted by their progenitors againſt the Canaanites.

They are twice defeated by the Benjamites.

In conſequence of this reſolution, they marched againſt the enemy, the army being compoſed of four hundred thouſand men; and they were oppoſed by the Benjamites with a force of twenty-five thouſand ſix hundred, including five hundred ſlingers, ſo particularly dextrous in their profeſſion, that they were equally certain of their mark, whether uſing their implements with the left or right hand. The armies joined battle in the neighbourhood of Gabaa, and the Benjamites obtained a victory, and put twenty-two thouſand of their enemies to death, and the ſlaughter would in all probability, have been much more conſiderable had not a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities been cauſed by the appearance of night. The Benjamites returned triumphant to the city, and the Iſraelites repaired to their camp, in the utmoſt diſorder, and under a great depreſſion of ſpirits. On the following day the battle was renewed; and in this conteſt alſo, the Iſraelites were defeated, with the loſs of eighteen thouſand men. So greatly were they affected by theſe misfortunes, that they removed towards Bethel, obſerving a ſolemn faſt on the next day, and, by the agency of Phinehas * the high-prieſt, ſupplicating the Almighty to remove his diſpleaſure from them, and to grant them a ſuperiority over the Benjamites.

The Iſraelites, ſupplicating the divine aid, obtain a promiſe of victory.

The Almighty having liſtened to the prayers of the prophet and returned him a favourable anſwer; the army was ſeparated into two bodies, one of which was drawn up in order of battle, and the other ſub-divided into parties of ambuſh, encompaſſing

* This was the ſame perſon whoſe zeal for the glory of God was manifeſted on a former occaſion. the city. With a view to entice the Benjamites from the town, on the firſt attack the Iſraelites retreated, continuing to loſe ground in proportion as the enemy advanced; imagining victory to be ſecure, they evacuated the town, in expectation of obtaining plunder; but when they had arrived within a certain ſpace of the ambuſh, the Iſraelites faced about, and giving a ſignal for the other part of the army to fall upon the rear, fought with great fury, purſuing the Benjamites to a valley, where they were ſurrounded, and twenty-five thouſand of them put to the ſword. A choſen body of ſix hundred intrepid men, who had cut their paſſage through the midſt of the enemy's troops, took up their quarters in an adjacent mountain.

Gabaa, &c. taken by the Iſraelites.

The Iſraelites now proceeded to burn the city of Gabaa, and, without diſtinction of age or ſex, they ſacrificed the inhabitants; and many other cities belonging to the Benjamites ſhared the ſame fate; and ſo implacable was the animoſity conſequent on this diſpute, that they detached a party of twelve thouſand men againſt Jabes, a city of Gilead, which they ſubdued, and, on account of the inhabitants having refuſed to eſpouſe the cauſe of the Iſraelites in the war againſt the Benjamites, they were all maſſacred, excepting only four hundred virgins.

Deplorable ſtate of the fugitive Benjamites.

The tribe of Benjamin being in a manner cut off from the main body, the Iſraelites experienced ſome compunction at having carried their revenge to ſo great an extremity: and they propoſed the obſervance of a faſt, but not intending thereby to indicate a conſciouſneſs of having done wrong by inflicting a puniſhment upon the offenders againſt the law. They diſpatched meſſengers to invite the return of the ſix hundred men who had eſcaped to the mountains. They were found upon a rock cal[illegible] Rhoa, by the perſons commiſſioned t[illegible]eat with them. As a means to induce them to return, the meſſengers pleaded the unhappineſs of their relations conſequent on their departure, ſympathizing with them in their own diſtreſſes, and repreſenting that the tribe to which they belonged would inevitably be deſtroyed if they longer perſiſted to oppoſe the deſired re-aſſociation; adding that, on condition of their compliance, their lands, cattle, and other effects ſhould be faithfully reſtored. They accepted the propoſals made by the meſſengers, acknowledged the puniſhment inflicted upon them to be a righteous jugment of heaven for the offences they had committed, and ſubmitting themſelves to the authority of their ſuperiors, again connected themſelves in a fellowſhip with their tribe.

The Iſraelites relent and invite them to return.

Previous to the war, the Iſraelites had engaged, by the ſolemnity of an oath, not to intermarry with the tribe of Benjamin; ſome expedient, therefore, became neceſſary for providing wives for theſe ſix hundred men. One party were of opinion, that as the oath was made under the impulſe of ſudden paſſion, it neceſſarily became void: others held that the preſſing exigency of the matter depending, effectually diſcharged the obligation, alledging that the commiſſion of perjury could not be conſtrued to be a criminal act, if the party was not influenced by a malicious motive, and that it would be more acceptable to the Almighty to diſpenſe with the obſervance of the obligation, than to exact a rigid obedience to it, and thereby expoſe a whole tribe to imminent danger. But the elders declared themſelves utterly averſe to the very idea of perjury, and would not admit the force of any palliative circumſtances. The four hundred virgins who were preſerved from the ſlaughter at Jabes, were given in marriage to four hundred of the Benjamites; and for providing wives for the other two hundred, without violating the oath, one of the ſenators recommended the following expedient: on an approaching feſtival*, which was celebrated three times a year at Siloe, he adviſed that the Benjamites might be allowed to take ſuch virgins to wife as they might be able to carry off; adding that, if the fathers of the virgins ſhould apply for juſtice, the anſwer to them ſhould be, that they ought to have prevented the miſchief by a more circumſpect attention to the ſafety of their daughters; and that the ill-policy of creating diſagreements between the Iſraelites and Benjamites had been already proved by fatal experience. On the arrival of the feſtival above alluded to, the two hundred Benjamites who remained in an unmarried ſtate, diſperſed themſelves in the town, and as the maidens were repairing towards the place where the cuſtomary ſolemnity was to be celebrated, they were ſurprized by the Benjamites, each man ſeizing one of them, and conveying her to his plantation. They now aſſiduouſly applied themſelves to the buſineſs of huſbandry, and were, at length retrieved from a miſerable and deſponding condition to a ſtate of great opulence and power.

Expedient for providing wives for the remaining Benjamites.

The Iſraelites now entirely relinquiſhed the profeſſion of arms, and employed themſelves in rural occupations. The Canaanites availed themſelves of this change of diſpoſition, and formed a conſpiracy, intending ſo effectually to reduce them as to prevent all probability of their reviving into a formidable enemy. They trained up the people in the diſcipline of war, raiſed a powerful army, and provided chariots and other martial implements; they prevailed upon Aſcalon and Accaron, and ſeveral cities in the plains, to eſpouſe their cauſe. The Danites judging that they could not ſafely continue to reſide in the campaign country, fled for ſanctuary to the mountains. Their force was not ſufficient ſucceſsfully to maintain a war,

The Canaanites diſpoſſeſs the Danites.

* All the three great feſtivals were to be obſerved at the place where God had ſettled his habitation, which was now at Shiloh. Probably the feaſt here meant was that of tabernacles, which was a time of great joy, and was alſo the only ſeaſon wherein the Jewiſh virgins were allowed to dance.

nor would the produce of the land they poſſeſſed afford a ſubſiſtence in a tranquil ſtate: they, therefore diſpatched five of their people to diſcover ſome favourable ſpot for fixing their reſidence in the inland part of the country. Adjacent to mount Libanus and the head of the leſſer Jordan, theſe commiſſioners, after a day's journey, perceived a fertile, and every way commodious ſituation; of which they made an immediate report to their tribe, who ſpeedily marched to the place, and there erected a city, giving it the name of Dan, from one of Jacob's ſons by whoſe name the whole tribe was diſtinguiſhed.

The Iſraelites were now ſhamefully abandoned to indolence and luxury, and degenerated from a due obſervance of the laws and religion of the Almighty; and, in ſhort, the corruption and vices of the Canaanites prevailed amongſt them without controul, ſo that the government ſeemed to be threatened with a ſpeedy diſſolution.

CHAP. III.

The Judgment of God upon the ISRAELITES, who are ſubdued by, and kept Eight Years in Subjection to CHUSARTH.

Depravity of the Iſraelites.

THE impiety and moral turpitude of the Iſraelites proved ſo highly offenſive to God, that he withdrew his protection and ſupport from them, and left them deſtitute of all hope of enjoying that ſtate of happineſs which they had employed ſo many years of painful induſtry to obtain. While they were engaged in this profligate courſe of life, war was declared againſt them by Chuſarth, king of the Aſſyrians, who put to death a great number of the Iſraelites; conquered many of their towns by aſſault; rendered others ſubject to him by treaty; impoſed burthenſome taxes on the people, and continually annoyed them with various indignities and perſecutions. They remained in this miſerable ſituation for the ſpace of eight years: but they were, at length, relieved from this oppreſſion, in the following manner.

They are delivered from bondage by Kenaz.

Kenaz, a man of the tribe of Judah, diſtinguiſhed for the ſtrength of his underſtanding and his great courage, being animated by a divine impulſe, determined to attempt ſome bold enterprize in favour of the Iſraelites, who were reduced to the greateſt extremity of diſtreſs. This reſolution he communicated to ſuch of his particular aſſociates as he was perſuaded he might ſafely entruſt with ſo important a ſecret, and whom he knew to be men of ſteady and intrepid diſpoſitions, and diſſatisfied with the meaſures purſued in conducting the affairs of the government. It was agreed, when the matter in queſtion had been deliberately conſidered, that the firſt ſtep towards effecting the relief of the Hebrews, ſhould be to ſurprize the royal guards, and put the troops of the garriſon to death: and this being accordingly executed with a ſingular degree of bravery, they acquired a high ſhare of martial reputation, and their party having gained conſiderable ſtrength, they found themſelves in a condition to engage in a fair battle with the Aſſyrians, over whom they obtained a complete victory, obliging them to croſs the Euphrates, and reſtoring the Hebrews to the ineſtimable bleſſings of liberty.

They returned the moſt grateful acknowledgments to Kenaz for the important ſervice he had rendered them, highly applauding the courage and conduct which he diſplayed in effecting their deliverance; and, as an inſtance of their gratitude, they unanimouſly elected him to preſide over them in the character of governor: he accepted this office, which he held for the ſpace of forty years, and then expired.

The Iſraelites degenerating, are oppreſſed by Eglon.

Being again deſtitute of a ruler, the Iſraelites degenerated from a due reverence to God, and obedience to the laws. Their impolitic and irregular proceedings encouraged Eglon, the king of the Moabites†, to commence a war againſt them; and he proved victorious in ſeveral engagements, and ſo effectually humbled them as to render them tributaries to him. Having accompliſhed this, he eſtabliſhed his court at Jericho, and for the ſpace of eight years, kept them in a miſerable and almoſt ſtarving condition, inflicting continual oppreſſions upon them. But the Almighty attended to their ſupplications, and in commiſeration of their ſufferings, delivered them from the perſecution of the Moabites in the following manner:

Humbling themſelves, they are delivered by Ehud.

Ehud, a young man of Jericho, ſon of Gera, of the tribe of Benjamin, was of a particularly athletic make, and of a reſolute diſpoſition; and he had the advantage of uſing either hand with great dexterity, but he was moſt expert with the left. By means of preſents and other courtly offices, this man inſinuated himſelf into the favour of the king, who repaid the attention ſhewn to him with familiarity and profeſſions of friendſhip, which gained Ehud a conſiderable intereſt at court. Having furniſhed himſelf with a poniard, which he girded to his right-ſide, he repaired to the palace, being attended by two ſervants, who were directed, if occaſion ſhould require, to aſſiſt in concealing the weapon; and under pretence of making the king a preſent, he was admitted to him, in the middle of the day, at which time the guards were withdrawn, and moſt of the people retired to dinner. Ehud preſented a gift to the king, who afterwards retired for refreſhment to a cooler apartment. He now requeſted a private audience with Eglon, who, being ſeated on the throne, diſmiſſed the attendants. He now prepared to ſtrike the fatal blow; and being apprehenſive leſt he ſhould miſs his aim, he determined to occaſion the king to riſe that he might be at a greater certainty of ſtriking with effect. Pretending that he had a matter to communicate from the Almighty, reſpecting a late dream, the king was exceedingly anxious to learn what he had to divulge, and riſing, for the conveniency of attending, Ehud ſeized that opportunity to ſtrike the poniard into his heart, and, leaving the deadly inſtrument in the wound, he effected an eſcape, having cloſed the doors as he retreated from the building. During theſe tranſactions, the attendants remained quiet, leſt they ſhould diſturb the king, whom they imagined to be in a ſleep.

† This was the next enemy who oppreſſed the children of Iſrael; for, ſince they worſhipped the gods of the people round about them, it was fit they ſhould be puniſhed by thoſe very people. He poſſeſſed himſelf of Jericho; for though Joſhua had deſtroyed the town, yet it is probable fortifications were erected on the ſpot where it ſtood, that they might the better keep that fertile country in ſubjection.

He kills Eglon.

Ehud repaired immediately to Jeruſalem, and cauſed it to be privately circulated that, with a view to reſtore the people to the enjoyment of freedom, he had put the king to death. This circumſtance proved highly agreeable to them; and they diſperſed men to ſound trumpets through the country, which was the method of aſſembling the people. Towards evening the king's attendants became apprehenſive that ſome extraordinary accident had occurred, and upon going into the apartment, they perceived that their royal maſter had been murdered, and experienced an aſtoniſhment beyond the power of words to deſcribe. Signals were immediately given for the guards to aſſemble, but before they could be collected, great numbers of the Iſraelites forced into the palace, and in the firſt impulſe of their rage, ſlaughtered many of the enemy, about ten thouſand of whom endeavoured to eſcape to the country of Moab, but the fords and paſſes being previouſly poſſeſſed by the Iſraelites, their retreat was ſo effectually intercepted, that not a ſingle man eſcaped. Thus were the Hebrews releaſed from the tyrannous yoke of the Moabites; and as an acknowledgment for the benefits derived from the conduct of Ehud, they inveſted him with the government. He continued in the adminiſtration eighty years, and then died. Excluſive of the merit of the above noble exploit, on various accounts his memory deſerves to be honourably tranſmitted to poſterity. He was ſucceeded by Shamgar, the ſon of Anath, who died before the expiration of the firſt year of his government.

CHAP. IV.

The HEBREWS, oppreſſed by JABIN, are ſet free by DEBORAH and BARAK.

Incorrigibility of the Iſraelites.

SUCH was the perverſeneſs of the Iſraelites, that, notwithſtanding they found themſelves continually involved in great calamities, the natural conſequence of their diſregard of every inſtitution, divine and human, they could not be induced to alter their conduct, and to return to their obedience. They were no ſooner freed from the bondage of one nation, than they became the ſlaves of another; and, in the preſent inſtance, paſſed from under the tyranny of Eglon, king of Moab, to that of Jabin, king of the Canaanites.

The city of Azor, ſituated on the banks of the lake Samachonitis, was the metropolis of the dominions of Jabin, whoſe army conſiſted of three hundred thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, and three thouſand chariots, the command of which was conferred on Siſera, who after repeatedly defeating the Hebrews in various pitched battles, at length reduced them to ſubjection, and rendered them tributary to his ſovereign. In this abject condition, as a puniſhment for their impiety and ingratitude, they were ſuffered to continue for the ſpace of twenty years. However, at the expiration of that period, they manifeſted ſome ſigns of repentance, and appeared to be convinced that the miſeries to which they had been ſo long expoſed, were the natural conſequence of their apoſtaſy from the religion of their anceſtors. Under this conviction, they applied themſelves to a certain eminent propheteſs*, named Deborah, requeſting her to intercede in their behalf with the Almighty, that he would be pleaſed to deliver them from the perſecutions of their mercileſs oppreſſors. God was pleaſed to condeſcend to her requeſt, and ordered her to enjoin the Iſraelites, in his name, to elect Barak one of the chiefs of the tribe of Napthali, for their commander.

Deborah intercedes for them.

Deborah, accordingly, ſent for Barak, and directed him to aſſemble a body of 10,000 choice men, and to lead them againſt the enemy without delay; deeming the ſmallneſs of the number a matter of no kind of conſequence, as God had promiſed to grant them victory. Barak, nevertheleſs, peremptorily refuſed to engage in the enterprize unleſs ſhe would accompany him; to which, after reproaching him ſeverely for thus relinquiſhing to a woman the honour of the command to which God had appointed him, ſhe at length conſented. This matter being ſettled, Barak aſſembled his troops and took poſt on Mount Tabor; and Siſera, by the command of Jabin, marched out to give him battle. For a ſhort time, the two armies lay encamped within ſight of each other; but the Hebrews were ſo terrified at the great diſparity of numbers between their enemy's army and their own, that both the ſoldiers and their leader were on the point of retiring in the moſt daſtardly manner, without even ſtriking a blow: when Deborah, by the force of exhortations, and aſſurances of God's favour and Barak made commander.

* This word, in ſome places, denotes a perſon inſpired by God to foretel future events, and work miracles; in others, it ſignifies one endued with extraordinary talents for underſtanding the word of God, and explaining it to others. Deborah was a propheteſs in the latter ſenſe, and was endued with the gift of wiſdom, which qualified her to inſtruct, to direct, and to govern.

protection, prevailed on them, with no ſmall difficulty, to abide the event of a battle. At the very commencement of the attack there aroſe a violent ſtorm of rain and hail, which, being driven by the wind full in the face of the Canaanites, obliged them to ſhut their eyes, to preſerve them from the fury of the tempeſt; rendered their bows and ſlings totally uſeleſs; and benumbed their hands to that degree, as to prevent them from availing th mſelves of thoſe weapons which were adapted to the purpoſe of a cloſe fight. This tempeſt, which ſo much annoyed the Canaanites, proved of not the leaſt prejudice to the Hebrews; but, on the contrary, ſerved to increaſe their confidence in the divine aid. In ſhort, the Canaanites were totally routed; and, reckoning thoſe who fell in the engagement, thoſe who were trod to death by the horſes, thoſe who were cruſhed to pieces by the chariots, and thoſe who were killed in the purſuit, the whole of this immenſe army was utterly deſtroyed.

The Canaanites overthrown,

When Siſera perceived that his troops were flying on all ſides in the utmoſt diſorder and confuſion, and that the day was inevitably loſt, he leaped from his chariot, and took refuge at the houſe of a woman named Jael, by birth a Kenite, who received him with every outward demonſtration of friendſhip and kindneſs. Being totally exhauſted with the toil and fatigue of the day, he requeſted her to give him ſome drink, and ſhe, accordingly, brought him a draught of ſour milk, which he ſwallowed with the utmoſt eagerneſs, and immediately fell into a profound ſleep. When Jael perceived the ſituation he was in, ſhe took an iron nail*, and, approaching him without the leaſt noiſe, drove it through his temple into the ground; in which condition ſhe expoſed his body to the view of the Iſraelites, who came ſoon afterwards to her houſe in ſearch of him. Thus was the prediction of Deborah to Barak verified: that the honour of the victory ſhould in part be due to a woman.

and Siſera their general ſlain by Jael.

Barak afterwards directed his march towards Azor, and meeting with Jabin on the way, encountered and ſlew him. He next made himſelf maſter of the city, which he razed from the very foundation; and from this time continued to govern Iſrael for the ſpace of about forty years.

Soon after the deaths of Deborah and Barak, which happened nearly about the ſame time, the Midianites uniting their forces with thoſe of the Amalekites and the Arabians, attacked the Iſraelites, and vanquiſhed them in ſeveral battles; plundering and laying waſte their country, for the full term of ſeven ſucceſſive years. The Iſraelites were at length compelled to abandon their habitations on the plains, and to fly for refuge to the mountains, where they dug vaults and caves, both for the purpoſe of ſheltering themſelves from the purſuit of their enemies, and of ſecreting ſuch of their effects and proviſions as they had been able to ſave from the general depredation. The Midianites, however, did not attempt to obſtruct them from cultivating their land in the winter; but conſtantly deprived them of the fruits of their toil when the harveſt ſeaſon arrived. Thus were the Hebrews reduced to the moſt abject ſtate of miſery and want, and, in this extremity, placing all their hopes of relief in prayers and ſupplications to the Almighty, as their laſt reſort, were delivered, as related in the next chapter.

The Midianites, &c. reduce and inſlave the Iſraelites.

CHAP. V.

GIDEON delivers the HEBREWS from the Bondage of the MIDIANITES.

AS Gideon, the ſon of Joas, and one of the chiefs of the tribe of Manaſſes, was on a certain occaſion ſecretly threſhing a ſmall quantity of corn in a place where he had been accuſtomed to preſs his grapes; not daring to make uſe of his threſhing floor for that purpoſe, leſt he ſhould be detected by the Midianites; an angel appeared to him, in the ſhape of a young man, and felicitated him on his happineſs, in poſſeſſing the favour of the Almighty in an eminent degree. "It is hardly credible," replied Gideon, "that a man in my diſtreſſed circumſtances ſhould be thus diſtinguiſhed by the Creator of the univerſe." The viſion bade him take courage, and, from that hour, to employ all his thoughts in deviſing the means of delivering his countrymen from the bondage under which they had ſo long groaned. "Both my own incapacity," ſaid Gideon, "and the weakneſs, in point of numbers, of the tribe to which I belong, effectually cut off all hopes of ſucceſs in an enterprize of this nature." The angel made anſwer, that God would ſupply whatever might be deficient in him, and that under his conduct the Iſraelites ſhould certainly prove victorious. The particulars of this affair having been communicated by Gideon to ſeveral of his companions, they expreſſed the fulleſt confidence in the prediction, and, accordingly, quickly aſſembled an army of ten thouſand choice men, who were determined to encounter every danger in ſupport of the common cauſe.

Gideon viſited by an angel.

Mean time, the Almighty appeared to Gideon in a dream, and gave him further inſtructions in what manner to proceed, in words to the following effect: "In order to give you the

* That is, one of the nails or great pins with which tents are faſtened to the ground. The original is very emphatical, and ſeems to have loſt ſome of its force by the inſertion of the particles in our verſion; for, according to the Hebrew, the latter part of the verſe in our tranſlation ſhould be, "And ſmote the nail into his temples, and it faſtened itſelf into the ground; and he was faſt aſleep, and he was wearied, and he was dead."

ſtrongeſt conviction that victory is derived from above, and that all human ſtrength is vain without the divine aid, lead your army, in the moſt ſcorching time of the day, to the banks of the river Jordan, and take particular notice of the manner in which the ſoldiers drink. Such of them as ſhall lay themſelves along upon the ground, and ſhall drink with apparent compoſure and unconcern*, you may depend upon as men of courage and reſolution, and fit for the deſign you have in meditation; but, with reſpect to thoſe who drink in haſte, and with viſible marks of confuſion in their countenances, they are actuated by a fear of the enemy, and muſt not, on any account, be confided in." Gideon obeyed, and upon trial found no more than three hundred men who anſwered to the firſt deſcription. With this handful of men he took poſt on the banks of the river: but not without ſtrong apprehenſions reſpecting the event of the enterprize. To calm his fears, the Moſt High ordered him to go ſecretly over to the enemy's camp that night, accompanied by one of his ſoldiers, where he ſhould learn ſome particulars which ſhould revive his drooping courage. He accordingly repaired to the camp of the Midianites, taking with him his own ſervant Phuran.

Gideon's ſtratagem in attacking the enemy.

Gideon divided his little army into three bodies of one hundred men each, and having received orders from God to attack the enemy during the night, at the expiration of the fourth watch, he led them to the charge; each man carrying in one hand a pitcher containing a burning lamp, in order that they might attack the foe by ſurprize, and in the other a ram's horn, to ſerve inſtead of a trumpet. The prodigious number of camels which the enemy had, and the variety of nations of which their army was compoſed, each being diſtinctly poſted, neceſſarily occaſioned their camp to take up a very conſiderable extent of ground; the whole, being enclo[illegible]d within one common line of circumvallation. [illegible]e Hebrews were ordered by Gideon, upon their arrival at the enemy's camp, to break their pitchers, and, ſounding their horns, each man with his lamp in his hand, to begin the attack with loud ſhouts. In full confidence that God would grant them a complete victory, they ſtrictly adhered to the orders they had received, and the enemy, by this ſtratagem, were thrown into ſo great a confuſion and conſternation, to which the darkneſs of the night, the medley of languages, and thoſe impreſſions of terror which would not permit them to diſtinguiſh between friend and foe, all greatly contributed, that they turned their arms upon each other, every man imagining the perſon next him to be an enemy. The ſlaughter, in ſhort, was amazingly great; yet the number of thoſe ſlain by the Iſraelites bore but a ſmall proportion to that of thoſe who fell by the hands of their own aſſociates. When the reſt of the Iſraelites inhabiting the country received intelligence of this ſignal defeat, they inſtantly diſpatched various parties of troops, to take poſſeſſion of all the paſſes and paſſages of the mountains, rivers, and torrents, in order to cut off the retreat of the enemy, vaſt numbers of whom they put to the ſword, and among the reſt, two of their kings, Oreb and Zeb.

The Midianites diſcomfited, and their two kings ſlain.

The wretched remains of this vaſt body of men, conſiſting of about eighteen thouſand, with much difficulty effected a retreat, and took poſt on a ſpot as far diſtant as they conveniently could from the Hebrew camp. Although the army of Gideon had undergone great fatigue in the late action, he nevertheleſs continued the purſuit of this remnant of the Midianites, and, coming up with them, totally routed the whole party; taking priſoners their two commanders, the princes Zebin and Hezabon; and putting the reſt to the ſword. In theſe different engagements there fell, of the Midianites and their allies, nearly one hundred and twenty thouſand men; and the booty taken by the Iſraelites, conſiſting of gold, ſilver, rich ſtuffs, camels, aſſes, and other articles, was of an immenſe value. Gideon upon his return home put to death the two Midianitiſh princes mentioned above.

Gideon paciſies the murmuring Ephraimites.

The tribe of Ephraim, however, to which he belonged, jealous of the great reputation which he had acquired, affected to be highly offended at his conduct in engaging the enemy without their privity or concurrence, and were on the point of raiſing arms againſt him; but Gideon, whoſe modeſty and moderation were equal to his valour, averted the impending ſtorm, by repreſenting to them that throughout the whole of the late tranſactions he had acted under the immediate direction of the Almighty; and that they were equally entitled with himſelf to a ſhare in the honour of the victory, although it had pleaſed God to allot to him the moſt active part therein.

He is continued governor till his death.

Having thus accompliſhed the deliverance of his country, Gideon would gladly have relinquiſhed the command with which he had been inveſted†; but he ſuffered him-

* The means for this end was to leſſen the numbers of Gideon's army, and this expedient was well adapted to that purpoſe. The ſeaſon of the year was ſultry, the generality of the ſoldiers were weary, were faint, were thirſty; and it was probable that the greateſt number, when led to the refreſhing ſtream, would indulge themſelves in drinking copious draughts of water. Few of them could be ſuppoſed temperate enough to reſiſt the temptation; and it was highly probable that this expedient would contribute to thin the army. This ſeems to be the intention of this experiment, and explains the text in a more natural and conſiſtent manner, than the opinion of Joſephus, Theodoret, and Grotius, who imagine that they who lapped the water were of a timorous diſpoſition, and were choſen as the propereſt inſtruments to aggrandize the idea of the divine Omnipotence; whereas it is evident from the context, that they who were of a fearful diſpoſition had been diſmiſſed before: the conjecture of Jarchi, that they who kneeled down were by that means diſcovered to have been the worſhippers of Baal, and were rejected upon that account, is a far-fetched conceit, which has not the leaſt foundation in Scripture.

† It ſeems, they wanted to make him a king; but Gideon, who was too well acquainted with the nature of the theocracy to be corrupted with the proſpect of a crown, piouſly rejects their offer: an offer which at the ſame time as it dignifies the character of Gideon, ſhews the Iſraelites to be loſt to every principle of gratitude towards their heavenly king, who had reſcued them from miſery and deſtruction by an inexpreſſible ſeries of miracles.

ſelf, at length, to be prevailed on, by the earneſt intreaties and importunities of the people, to continue in his office as judge; which he held for the ſpace of forty years; enacting laws, and adminiſtering juſtice with ſuch ſtrict impartiality, that not one inſtance occurred of an appeal from his deciſions, throughout the whole period during which he governed Iſrael. He died in an advanced age, and was buried in his native place, the land of Ephraim.

CHAP. VI.

Cruelty and tyrannical Conduct of ABIMELECH. The AMMONITES and PHILISTINES ſubdue the HEBREWS. They are reſcued from Slavery by JEPHTHAH. ABSAN, ELON, and ABDON, ſucceſſively govern ISRAEL.

Abimelech uſurps the government and kills all his brethren, except Jothan, who eſcapes.

THE iſſue which Gideon left were ſeventy legitimate ſons, by various women, and one natural ſon by his concubine Druma, whom he named Abimelech. Soon after the death of Gideon, Abimelech repaired to Sichem, where the kindred of his mother reſided. From them he obtained a ſupply of money, and, finding them to be men of diſſolute lives, and qualified for the perpetration of any manner of wickedneſs, he engaged a certain number of them to accompany him on his return. Immediately upon his arrival at his father's houſe he put all his brethren to death, except Jothan, who fortunately eſcaped his cruelty, by concealing himſelf ſo ſecretly as to baffle every endeavour to diſcover his retreat. Having by this means ſeized on the ſupreme power*; Abimelech openly profeſſing the utmoſt contempt of every ordinance, divine and human, exerciſed his authority in a manner which drew upon him the univerſal odium. During theſe tranſactions, Jothan, who had eſcaped the general maſſacre of his brethren, for the ſpace of three years was compelled to lead a wandering life among the mountains, through fear of the reſentment of Abimelech. In a ſhort time ſubſequent to this event, the Sichemites being impreſſed with a due ſenſe of the barbarity which had been executed on the ſons of Gideon, baniſhed Abimelech from their city and tribe; which indignity he ſought every means to revenge.

Zebul cauſes Gaal to be expelled the city.

Zebul, one of the principal men among the Sichemites, and who had formerly been the hoſt of Abimelech, contrived to give him private notice of the practices which Gaal was carrying on againſt him; adviſing him, at the ſame time, to endeavour to ſeize his perſon, by ſtationing a party of his troops in ambuſh near the city; engaging to lure him into the ſnare, and, when that deſign ſhould be effected, to reinſtate Abimelech in the favour of the citizens. This advice was adopted: and Gaal, having imprudently remained too long in the ſuburbs, in company with Zebul, obſerved the troops of Abimelech advancing towards the city, and mentioned the circumſtance to Zebul; but the latter pretended to be of a contrary opinion, and endeavoured to perſuade him that it was the ſhadow of the mountains which he ſaw. Gaal, however, perſiſted in his former aſſertion, and was reproached by his companion with timidity, in thus retreating before Abimelech, whom he had ſo repeatedly branded with cowardice. This reproof induced him to lead his troops, though in ſome diſorder, againſt the enemy; but he was repulſed at the firſt onſet, and, after having loſt a few of his men, retired within the walls of the city. From this incident Zebul took occaſion to repreſent him to the people as a perſon deficient in valour, and thereby procured his expulſion.

Abimelech killed by a woman.

Abimelech led his army againſt Thebes, of which city he made himſelf maſter by aſſault; but the garriſon retired into the citadel. Having advanced to the very gates of this edifice, with a full determination either to force them or ſet them on fire, a woman let drop from the top of the wall a large piece of a mill-ſtone, which, falling on his head, beat him from his horſe. Perceiving, when he had in ſome degree recovered himſelf from the blow, that the wound which he had received was mortal, he ordered his armour-bearer to diſpatch him inſtantly, that it might not be ſaid that he died by the hands of a woman. He was obeyed; and paid the forfeit of his barbarities to his brethren and the Sichemites. Immediately after the death of Abimelech, his army diſbanded; each man returning to his own habitation.

Jair made governor.

A Gileadite named Jair, of the tribe of Manaſſes, was the next who undertook the government of Iſrael. This man, in every inſtance, enjoyed great happineſs, but particularly in the poſſeſſion of a numerous and deſerving progeny; being the father of thirty ſons, equally famed for their virtue and bravery, and of high rank and authority in the country in which they dwelt. He officiated in this poſt twenty-two years, died in an advanced age, and was buried in the city of Camon, in the land of Gilead.

At this period the Hebrews were become totally regardleſs of their duty both to God and man; and this extreme depravity rendered them ſo deſpicable in the eyes of their neighbours, the Ammonites and Philiſtines, that they invaded their country with a powerful army, and with great facility made an entire conqueſt of all that part thereof which lies on this ſide Jordan, intending to paſs the river, and ſubdue the remainder. In this dilemma, the Iſraelites, as was cuſtomary with them when they chanced to be involved in any great calamity, again had re-

* He muſt not be conſidered as a judge, much leſs appointed by God; but as an uſurper, who dared to alter the divine government, by making himſelf a king. Probably the ambition of Abimelech, and his dreadful end, ſo terrified the Iſraelites, that they did not attempt to elect another king; but wiſely ſubmitted to thoſe judges whom God was pleaſed to place over them.

courſe to ſacrifices and ſupplications to God for deliverance; and even this extorted repentance procured from the Almighty a promiſe of pardon and aſſiſtance. The Ammonites having at this time invaded the land of Gilead, the inhabitants took up arms with a view of repelling their attacks, and being deſtitute of a leader, ſolicited Jephthah, a man highly eſteemed among them both for his courage and conduct, and who kept a conſiderable body of troops in his own pay, to take upon him for life the command of their army.

He is ſucceeded by Jephthah:

Jephthah refuſed, at firſt, to comply with their requeſt; upbraiding them with baſeneſs, in thus applying to him in their diſtreſs, to whom they had formerly denied all aſſiſtance at a time when he ſtood in the utmoſt need of aid againſt the cruel perſecutions of his brethren. The Iſraelites, however, ſtill importuning him to eſpouſe their cauſe, he at length yielded to their ſolicitations, and was accordingly inveſted with the ſupreme command of their troops.

who marches againſt the Ammonites.

Having incorporated his own forces with thoſe of the Hebrews, Jephthah marched to Miſpah, from whence he diſpatched embaſſadors to the king of the Ammonites, to repreſent to him the injuſtice of which he was guilty, in thus invading the country to which he had no reaſonable pretenſion. This charge the king retorted upon the Iſraelites, who, he obſerved, after their departure from Egypt, had, without any other right than merely that of conqueſt, poſſeſſed themſelves of the country of the Ammonites; peremptorily enjoining them to quit the ſame, and to ſeek ſome more diſtant reſidence. Jephthah replied, that the Ammonites, inſtead of complaining that the Hebrews had eſtabliſhed themſelves in Amorrhæa, ought rather to acknowledge the moderation of that people in permitting them to retain the poſſeſſion of their own country of Ammon, from which Moſes might have expelled them; concluding with a declaration, that the Hebrews would not, upon any account, relinquiſh thoſe lands, in which they had been ſettled for the term of three hundred years, but would, with the divine aid, maintain themſelves therein againſt every effort of their enemies to diſpoſſeſs them. The peremptorineſs of this declaration at once put an end to the treaty, and both parties prepared for war.

When the two armies were in ſight of each other, Jephthah made a vow, that, if God ſhould be pleaſed to permit him to return a conqueror, he would offer up in ſacrifice the firſt living creature he ſhould meet with upon his entrance into the city in which he reſided. He afterwards engaged the enemy, and put them totally to the rout; purſuing them, with great ſlaughter, as far as the city of Manaith. He alſo made an irruption into the land of Ammon; taking and deſtroying ſeveral cities, and dividing the booty, which was very conſiderable, among his troops. This victory, in ſhort, emancipated the Hebrews from a bondage under which they had groaned for the term of eighteen years.

He defeats them.

In conſequence of a raſh vow, he ſacrifices his daughter.

The conduct of Jephthah, throughout the whole of this war, acquired him great and deſerved reputation; but upon his return home, an incident befel him which ſuddenly converted all his ſatisfaction into the deepeſt ſorrow. For, when he was on the point of entering the city in which he reſided, the firſt perſon whom he diſcovered was his only daughter, who, with a heart filled with joy, had come forth to meet him, and to congratulate him on his return. He was ſtruck with inexpreſſible horror at the ſight, and, in the utmoſt anguiſh of mind, acquainted her with the particulars of his fatal vow. Unmoved at the dreadful tale, ſhe nobly replied that ſhe would chearfully ſubmit to death, for the ſake of preſerving her father's honour, and of aſſuring the freedom of her country; requeſting only, that he would allow her two months to prepare herſelf, and to bid farewell to the virgins, her companions, after which he might perform his vow whenever he ſhould think proper. This requeſt was granted, and, at the expiration of the above term, this immaculate and ſelf-devoted victim yielded up her life at the altar, in compliance with the will of her father; who, hurried away by a blind zeal, manifeſted on the occaſion an utter diſregard of every conſideration of juſtice and common fame*.

Abſan ſucceeds to the government.

Jephthah died in the ſeventh year of his adminiſtration, and was interred at Sebeth, the place of his birth, in the land of Gilead. He was ſucceeded by Abſan, of the tribe of Judah, who dwelt in the city of Bethlehem, and governed Iſrael ſeven years; but no incident happened during that period, of ſufficient conſequence to be recorded. He left ninety children, ſixty of whom were males, and thirty daughters; all of whom were married at the time of his deceaſe. To him ſucceeded Elon, of the tribe of Zebulon, who ruled the people ten years; nor was his government diſtinguiſhed by any memorable event. The next perſon who governed Iſrael was Abdon, the ſon of Heliel, of the tribe of Ephraim, and a native of the city of Pharathon. He had a numerous progeny, conſiſting of

* This paſſage has opened a ſpacious field for controverſy, in which the commentators have ranged themſelves on oppoſite ſides: the whole ſtream of antiquity poſitively aſſerts that Jephthah ſacrificed his daughter; while ſeveral great names among the moderns have contended as warmly to prove that he did not. The difficulty ariſes wholly from Jephthah's ſaying, verſe 31. Whatſoever cometh forth—ſhall ſurely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up as a burnt-offering. But, as Grotius pertinently obſerves, ſuppoſing a dog or an aſs had met him, could he have offered up them for a burnt-offering? He could not have done it; and therefore his promiſe or vow muſt mean, that if it was any thing that could be offered for a burnt-offering, he would offer it; if not, whatever it was, it ſhould be the Lord's: and were the particle tranſlated and, in the ſentence ſhall ſurely be the Lord's, and I will offer it, tranſlated, as in the margin, and as it ſignifies many times, or, all the difficulty would certainly be removed.

forty ſons and thirty grandſons, all of whom were expert horſemen; and of theſe his ordinary guard was compoſed: but the tranquillity of the times during his adminiſtration, afforded no incident worthy of being tranſmitted to poſterity. He died at a great age, and was buried with much pomp and ſolemnity in the city of Pharathon.

CHAP. VII.

The PHILISTINES ſubjugate the ISRAELITES. Birth of SAMSON, and his wondrous Exploits.

The Hebrews are enſlaved by the Philiſtines.

THE Philiſtines, after the death of Abſan, held the Hebrews in ſubjection nearly for the ſpace of forty years; but they at length obtained their liberty in the manner following:

A perſon whoſe name was Manoah, of the tribe of Dan, a man of high rank and reputation in his own country, had married a woman of ſuperlative beauty, but, to his own unſpeakable grief, ſhe proved childleſs. He had a houſe ſituated on a lonely ſpot, in the midſt of an extenſive plain, to which he frequently repaired with his wife, and in this ſolitude he ſpent the greateſt part of his time in importuning heaven for the bleſſing of a child. It chanced on a certain day, when the woman was at the houſe alone, an angel appeared to her, under the ſhape of a tall young man, and, bidding her to conſole herſelf, predicted to her, that ſhe ſhould bear a male child, who, when he ſhould arrive at the years of maturity, ſhould be remarkable for the gracefulneſs of his perſon, and for his ſuperior ſtrength, and ſhould greatly humble the pride of the Philiſtines; enjoining her, in the name of God, neither to cut his hair, nor to ſuffer him to drink any thing beſides water; and having given her theſe inſtructions, the viſion inſtantly diſappeared. On the arrival of her huſband, ſhe acquainted him with the particulars of this viſion.

The angel, in a few days after, again preſented himſelf before her, in the ſame place in which ſhe had firſt ſeen him, and ſhe begged his permiſſion to fetch her huſband; who inſtantly came with her to the ſpot. He then earneſtly preſſed the angel again to confirm the prediction which he had before communicated to his wife; but this the angel declined; obſerving to him, that it was ſufficient his wife had been already made acquainted therewith. He alſo ſolicited the angel to declare to him his name and quality, that, when he ſhould have obtained the promiſed bleſſing of a child, he might know to whom to pay his acknowledgments. The viſion replied, that he neither expected nor deſired any gratification for the tidings he brought. Manoah, with ſome difficulty, prevailed on him, however, to ſtay and partake of a kid, which he had killed and given to his wife to dreſs.

When every thing was in readineſs, the angel ordered the fleſh and bread to be placed without diſhes, on an adjacent rock; which being done, with a wand which he held in his hand, he touched the fleſh, and inſtantly a flame iſſued therefrom, which totally conſumed both it and the bread; and the angel aſcended to heaven in the ſmoke which aroſe from this preternatural fire. Manoah expreſſed a ſtrong apprehenſion that this prodigy boded ſome great evil to them; but his wife endeavoured to diſpel his fears, confidently aſſuring him, that it would be productive of the greateſt comfort and happineſs to them both. She ſoon afterwards perceived herſelf to be pregnant, and from that hour carefully kept in mind the inſtructions which ſhe had received from the angel.

Birth of Samſon.

In due courſe of time ſhe was delivered of a ſon, whom they named Samſon*, ſignifying, in the Hebrew tongue, robuſt. As he grew up, the comelineſs of his perſon, and the rigid temperance which he obſerved in his manner of living, gave him an appearance of ſomething more than mortal.

Having repaired on the celebration of a ſolemn feſtival, to Timnah, a city belonging to the Philiſtines, he there ſaw a damſel of whom he became paſſionately enamoured; and urgently ſolicited his father to obtain her for him in marriage. His father, at firſt, refuſed to comply with his requeſt; repreſenting to him, that, by the Hebrew laws, all marriages with women of foreign nations were ſtrictly forbidden; and that there were many women of his own nation with whom a matrimonial connection would be far more eligible than the party with whom he ſought an alliance. But the impetuoſity of the ſon's paſſion, proved an over-match for all the diſcretion and authority of the father, and Samſon was permitted to contract himſelf to the damſel in queſtion. Being one day on the road which led to the place of reſidence of his intended bride, he chanced to meet a lion. Totally undiſmayed at the unexpected ſight of this terrible animal, he undauntedly advanced towards him, and though deſtitute of every kind of weapon, he attacked the creature, and quickly ſtrangled him, throwing the body afterwards into an adjacent thicket.

He kills a lion.

Some few days afterwards, he chanced to paſs along the ſame path again, on a ſecond viſit to his miſtreſs; and ſtepping out of the road to take a view of the carcaſe of the lion, he found it occupied by a ſwarm of bees, who were employed in working their wax and honey. He took three of the combs, which he preſented, together with ſome other articles which he had procured for the purpoſe, to his miſtreſs. On the day of the nuptials, he was attended by thirty of the ſtouteſt young men of the country, whom the friends of the bride, conſcious of his amazing ſtrength, had ſelected for that office, under the pretext of doing him honour; but, in reality, to prevent any bad

* Some derive his name from ſhemeſh, the ſun, becauſe his birth prognoſticated the riſing of the Hebrews, and ſetting of the Philiſtines. Our author, indeed, ſays it ſignifies robuſt; but upon what authority he founds his aſſertion, cannot be diſcovered.

effects which might otherwiſe happen, from his making too free a uſe of the juice of the grape. In the midſt of their jollity, Samſon informed the company that he had a riddle to propoſe to them, and that as many of them as ſhould ſolve it in the courſe of ſeven days, ſhould each man receive from him a coat and a ſhirt; and at once acquire both reputation and profit. The whole company, being animated, ſome with a deſire of manifeſting their penetration, and others with a thirſt of gain, eagerly requeſted him to propound the ænigma; which he accordingly did, in the following words: "Out of the eater came forth meat, and from the ſtrong was produced ſweetneſs †."

When the Philiſtines had in vain racked their imaginations for the ſpace of three days, to diſcover the meaning of this riddle they applied themſelves to the newly-eſpouſed wife of Samſon; enjoining her, at the peril of being burnt alive, to obtain from her huſband an explanation of the whole myſtery. He for ſome time reſiſted all her importunities; but on her reproaching him with a want of affection for her, in thus refuſing to confide the ſecret to her, he diſcloſed all the circumſtances relative to his combat with the lion, and to the honey-combs which he brought her; and ſhe communicated every particular to the Philiſtines. The day being now arrived which had been appointed for the ſolution of this riddle, the Philiſtines aſſembled before ſun-ſet, and repairing in a body to Samſon, gave him the explanation in the ſubſequent terms: "No creature poſſeſſes more ſtrength than a lion, nor can any thing be ſweeter than honey."

Samſon ſo highly reſented the conduct of his wife on this occaſion, that he formally repudiated her; and ſhe, from a motive of revenge, eſpouſed the perſon who had been the chief promoter of their union. This action Samſon conſidered as ſo heinous an affront, that he vowed vengeance not only on the woman, but alſo on the whole nation of the Philiſtines; and an opportunity ſoon afterwards offered for the ample execution of his deſign. The time of harveſt being now juſt at hand, Samſon procured three hundred foxes, and, tying them tail to tail, with a firebrand between each two of them, he turned the whole number looſe into the fields of the Philiſtines, where they preſently deſtroyed all the corn which was then ripe for cutting *. When the princes of the Philiſtines learnt who was the author of this outrage, and the motives by which he had been inſtigated to it, they immediately repaired to Timnah, and, ſeizing Samſon's late wife, with her father, and all her kindred, publicly burnt them alive.

Samſon had now fixed his reſidence on the rock of Etam, a place of prodigious ſtrength, and from thence made frequent incurſions into the lands of the Philiſtines, deſtroying great numbers of the inhabitants. This rock was ſituated in the diſtrict of the tribe of Judah, againſt whom the Philiſtines, in revenge for the continual depredations of Samſon, were on the point of commencing hoſtilities. It was in vain that theſe unfortunate people pleaded in their juſtification, that they had demeaned themſelves peaceably, had regularly paid the tribute which had been impoſed upon them, and were perfectly free from all participation in the guilt of Samſon and his aſſociates; for the Philiſtines peremptorily declared to them, that unleſs they delivered up the perſon of Samſon, they muſt expect to be conſidered, and to be puniſhed alſo, as the abettors of his crimes.

Samſon retires to the rock Etam.

To clear themſelves from every imputation on this head, they aſſembled a body of three thouſand armed men, and marched to the ſpot where he reſided, and there entered into conference with his companions, repreſenting to them the danger to which the violences of Samſon had expoſed the Hebrew nation, by exciting againſt them the reſentment of a powerful enemy, who, if not timely appeaſed, might probably be induced to extirpate their whole race; adding, that their ſole deſign in coming thither was to ſecure the perſon of Samſon, and to deliver him into the hands of the Philiſtines; to which they exhorted him to ſubmit voluntarily, both for their ſakes and for his own. Samſon hereupon deſcended from the rock, and, having obtained a ſolemn oath from them that they would be ſatisfied with delivering him up to the Philiſtines, without offering him any perſonal injury themſelves, ſurrendering himſelf to his countrymen, who bound him, and led him away to a ſpot before agreed on, which was then of no particular note, but which a memorable action afterwards performed there by Samſon rendered deſervedly famous to poſterity. At a ſmall diſtance from the camp of the Philiſtines, they were met by a numerous body of people, who expreſſed their joy at ſeeing this dreaded foe in their power, with the loudeſt ſhouts and acclamations.

An armed force is ſent to demand him.

Samſon in the mean time ſnapping aſunder the cords with which he was bound, ſeized the jaw-bone of an aſs which happened to lie near him, and ſuddenly attacking the Philiſtines, ſlew nearly a thouſand of them on the ſpot, and put the reſt to flight. He was ſo much elated with this victory, that he arrogated to himſelf the honour of that action, without conſidering that it was

† It was an ancient practice (among the Greeks eſpecially) to propoſe enigmas, and it has continued to this day in a greater or leſs degree. As ſymbolic writing, the more it receded from the proper hieroglyphic, the more it became obſcure; ſo it was with this parable, which grew the more myſterious, till it became a riddle, which exactly correſponded with the enigmatical hieroglyphic. This, in ſacred ſcripture, is called a dark ſaying, by way of eminence. In the interpretation of theſe riddles conſiſted old eaſtern wiſdom, according to the obſervation, Prov. i. 5.

* Foxes, it is well known, are beaſts of prey, and extremely cunning: Samſon did the country ſervice by collecting ſo many, and putting them together in the manner he did, and thereby deſtroying ſo great a number of thoſe rapacious creatures. This in ſome meaſure compenſated for the damage done to the corn.

to God alone, to whom the glory of the atchievement out to have been aſcribed. But, in the midſt of this impious vaunting, he found himſelf ſuddenly attacked by a violent thirſt, which convinced him of the vanity of his boaſts, by demonſtrating to him that all his ſucceſſes did not exempt him from the common accidents of human nature. He therefore humbled himſelf before God, acknowledging his former preſumption in aſſuming to himſelf the victory, requeſting pardon for his crimes, and promiſing in future to rely ſolely upon the power and goodneſs of the Almighty for deliverance in all his diſtreſſes. Nor was his penitence ineffectual: for immediately there guſhed from a neighbouring rock a ſtream of the pureſt water, for the relief of his raging thirſt; and this rock to the preſent time bears the name of the jaw, in alluſion to the above-mentioned exploit of Samſon.

Being attacked, for his pride, with extreme thirſt, God relieves him, in his humble prayer.

He now held the power of the Philiſtines in ſuch utter contempt, that he ſcrupled not to go publicly to Gaza, and to take up his abode at a common inn. The circumſtance of his arrival having been communicated to the governor of the city, he ſtationed a number of ſoldiers and ſpies about the houſe, to prevent his eſcape. Samſon having received ſome intimation of the deſign, roſe at midnight, and, taking the gates of the city off their hinges, conveyed them away on his ſhoulders, with all their appurtenances of frames, bolts, and locks, as far as mount Hebron, where he left them.

Samſon carries away the gates of Gaza.

By degrees, Samſon had now acquired ſo ſtrong a diſtaſte to the laws and cuſtoms of his own country, and, conſequently, ſuch a propenſity to thoſe of the neighbouring nations, as, in the ſequel, proved his deſtruction. He unfortunately conceived a violent paſſion for a common proſtitute, in the land of the Philiſtines, whoſe name was Dalilah; and with this woman he openly cohabited. The princes of the country, perceiving to how great a degree he was infatuated by his infamous paſſion, ſecretly wrought upon this mercenary woman, by the force of bribes and promiſes*, to unite with them in the deſign of effecting his ruin. The part which they aſſigned her to act in this plot was, to obtain from him a confeſſion where that invincible ſtrength was ſeated, of which he had given ſo many extraordinary proofs. She, accordingly, took every opportunity, in his hours of ebriety and dalliance, to expreſs her admiration of his ſtrength and activity, and to importune him to acquaint her in what part of his body that excellency lay, which rendered him ſo infinitely ſuperior to all other men. But Samſon retained as yet ſo much prudence, as enabled him to perceive and to counterwork the artifices of his miſtreſs; and he replied, that if his hands were bound with ſeven green withs, or creepers of the vine, he ſhould then poſſeſs no greater degree of force than the reſt of mankind.

This information Dalilah immediately communicated to the magiſtrates of the place, who, in conſequence, ſecretly diſpatched a band of ſoldiers to the houſe in which Samſon reſided, with orders to ſecure his perſon the firſt opportunity that ſhould offer. Finding him intoxicated and aſleep, they bound him in the manner before deſcribed; but Samſon being awakened by the outcries of Dalilah, that the Philiſtines were upon him, inſtantly ſnapped the withs, like ſo many threads, and, putting himſelf in a poſture of defence, obliged the aſſailants to make a precipitate retreat. Dalilah affected to be highly incenſed at the deception which had been put upon her, and bitterly reproached Samſon with a want of affection for her; adding, that ſhe thought herſelf greatly injured by his ſuſpicions that ſhe was leſs capable of keeping a ſecret than any of her ſex. She, however, ſtill perſiſted in ſoliciting him to reveal to her what ſhe deſired to know, and he again deceived her, on two ſubſequent occaſions, with feigned ſtories; telling her at firſt, that if he were to be bound with ſeven cords, he ſhould be deprived thereby of all power of reſiſtance: and, afterwards, that the ſame effect would be produced by filleting and braiding his hair.

He deceives the Philiſtines.

Though thus thrice baffled, Dalilah was not yet diſcouraged; but, partly through reſentment, and partly from a principle of obſtinacy, ſhe continued to urge him ſo earneſtly with intreaties and careſſes, that in an evil hour, he diſcloſed to her the important ſecret in theſe words: "That ſupreme Being, from whom I derive my exiſtence, and who has been pleaſed to diſtinguiſh me in a particular manner by his favour, has ſtrictly commanded me never to ſuffer my hair to be cut; as in the preſervation thereof intirely conſiſts my ſafety and ſtrength." Having made this diſcovery, ſhe ſoon afterwards deprived him of his locks whilſt he ſlept, and, in this defenceleſs condition, delivered him into the hands of the Philiſtines, who put out his eyes, and led him about as a public ſpectacle.

Dalilah, by her importunity, obtains the ſecret from Samſon, and delivers him up to his enemies, who put out his eyes, and impriſon him.

A conſiderable time had now elapſed, when a feſtival was celebrated by the Philiſtines, at which were aſſembled all the princes and nobility of the country. In the height of their merriment, it was propoſed to ſend for Samſon, to make ſport for the company. The roof of the edifice in which they were regaling, was ſupported by two large pillars only. Samſon, whoſe hair was now grown again, meditating vengeance on his enemies, was now brought into the aſſembly; and feigning to be weary with walking, he deſired the boy by whom he was attended to lead him to one of the pillars, that he might reſt himſelf againſt it.

* The text informs us, that every one of the lords of the Philiſtines engaged to give her eleven hundred ſhekels, on delivering Samſon into their hands. Now by "pieces of ſilver" is generally underſtood ſhekels; ſo that the whole ſum amounted to five thouſand five hundred ſhekels, or about three hundred and forty-three pounds fifteen ſhillings ſterling.

In revenge he pulls down the grand hall of the Philiſtines, when himſelf and the whole company periſh.

His requeſt being complied with, Samſon, exerting his utmoſt ſtrength, ſhook the pillar with ſuch force, that he ſoon brought down the building on the heads of all thoſe who were therein, amounting to full three thouſand perſons; himſelf periſhing with the reſt†.

Thus died Samſon in the twentieth year of his adminiſtration. He was famed for his amazing ſtrength and courage, and acquired great honour by the exertion of thoſe qualities againſt the enemies of his country. It muſt be acknowledged that he ſuffered himſelf to be deluded by the artifices of a wicked woman; but this is a frailty inherent in the very nature of mankind. His corpſe was conveyed by his relations to Saraſa, where it was interred in the burial place of the family.

CHAP. VIII.

Containing the Hiſtory of NAOMI, RUTH, and BOOZ.

A famine in Judea obliges Abimelech and his family to retire to Moab.

AFTER the death of Samſon, Eli the high-prieſt ſucceeded to the government, and in his time there aroſe a dreadful famine in the land. In conſequence of this dearth, Abimelech, a citizen of Bethlehem, in the tribe of Judah, accompanied by his wife Naomi, and his two ſons, Mallon and Cheſſion, retired with his effects into the land of Moab. Here every thing went favourably with him, and his ſons contracted themſelves to two women of the country, whoſe names were Orpha and Ruth. At the expiration of ten years, Abimelech and his ſons died, all within a ſhort time of each other. Naomi ſeeing herſelf thus deprived of thoſe p[illegible]s, her affection for whom had been the ſole mo[illegible] which had induced her to quit her own country, determined to return thither, eſpecially as ſhe had learnt that matters were now in a better ſtate then when ſhe came away. The widows of her ſons were very urgent with her to ſuffer them to accompany her; but to this ſhe abſolutely refuſed to conſent; alledging the length of the journey, and her incapacity to provide for them on their arrival at Bethlehem, as reaſons for her refuſal. Theſe objections ſatisfied Orpha: but no arguments could induce Ruth to abandon her mother-in-law; and Naomi therefore departed, taking Ruth with her.

Naomi and Ruth return.

They were received on their arrival at Bethlehem by Booz or Boaz, a relation of the deceaſed Abimelech; and, the people calling Naomi by her name, and welcoming her on her return home, ſhe replied that, inſtead of Naomi, they ought rather to call her Mara; the firſt ſignifying happineſs, and the latter ſorrow. It being now the time of harveſt, Ruth went with the permiſſion of her mother, into the fields to glean; and wandering by accident into a field which belonged to Booz, he chanced to come thither himſelf quickly afterwards, and inquired of his head-ſervant what he knew of her. The ſervant acquainted him with ſuch particulars concerning her ſituation as he had learnt from herſelf; and Booz, being highly pleaſed with the affection which ſhe manifeſted for her mother-in-law, and her regard for the memory of her deceaſed huſband, ordered that ſhe ſhould not only be permitted to glean, but alſo to reap and carry away as much corn as ſhe thought proper, and that ſhe ſhould be daily furniſhed with a like portion of meat and drink with the reſt of his ſervants. Ruth carefully ſaved a part of the proviſions which were given her, and carried it home at night, together with her gleanings, to her mother-in-law; and Naomi made a like reſerve for Ruth out of what ſhe obtained from her charitable neighbours.

Kind behaviour of Booz to Ruth.

Ruth acquainted her mother with the kindneſs of Booz towards her‡; adding that, as he was a perſon of conſiderable property, and famed for his virtue and piety, it was probable that he might commiſerate their misfortunes, and take them under his care. Ruth ſtill continued to repair every day during the harveſt ſeaſon to the fields of Booz, to glean with his maid-ſervants; and for the ſpace of a few days, while his people were employed in threſhing the corn, Booz took up his lodging in his own barn. This circumſtance coming to the knowledge of Naomi, ſhe adviſed Ruth to convey herſelf privately into the barn, during the night, and to lay herſelf down to reſt at the feet of Booz; imagining thereby to promote the advantage of both parties.

Ruth complies with Naomi's propoſal to her.

Ruth, from a ſcrupulous regard to the orders of her mother, obeyed; and Booz chancing to wake about midnight, and perceiving a woman lying near him, aſked her who ſhe was. Having been ſatisfied in this point, no further diſcourſe paſſed between them till morning, when he bid her to take as much corn as ſhe pleaſed, and to return home, before his ſervants ſhould riſe to their work; obſerving that, in ſuch-like caſes, perſons could not be too cautious, however innocent their intentions were, to prevent diſcovery. He further told her that, as there was a perſon then reſiding in Bethlehem, who was ſtill nearer related to her than himſelf, he would adviſe her to inſiſt upon his receiving her as his wife, according to the law of † Our great architect Sir Chriſtopher Wren, ſpeaking of this tranſaction, ſays, "I conceive this building was an oval amphitheatre; the ſcene in the middle, where a vaſt roof of cedar beams reſting round upon the walls, centered all upon one ſhort architrave, that united two cedar pillars in the middle. Now if Samſon, by his miraculous ſtrength, preſſing upon theſe pillars, removed them from their baſes, the whole roof muſt of neceſſity fall.

‡ The communion with heathen nations was peculiarly forbidden by the Iſraelitiſh law, as the grand barrier againſt idolatry. Some zealous adherents to the letter of the law carried this principle too far, nay, ſo far as to abſtain from every kind of intercourſe and beneficence. A ſtranger and an idolater, in the ideas of a Jew, were the ſame; Ruth, therefore, meeting with ſo much tenderneſs from Boaz, did not without reaſon expreſs her ſurpriſe.

Moſes; and that, if he ſhould refuſe to comply with her demand, he himſelf ſhould then be at liberty to eſpouſe her. With theſe inſtructions Ruth returned to her mother, to whom ſhe communicated all the above particulars; and Naomi offered up her moſt grateful acknowledgments to heaven, for this favourable change in their affairs.

Booz treats with Ruth's kinſman.

On the ſame day, about noon, Booz convened an aſſembly of the magiſtrates of Bethlehem: having previouſly given notice of attendance to Ruth and her kinſman. Upon their appearance, he queſtioned the latter, whether the eſtates of Abimelech, and his two ſons, Mallon and Chellion, did not devolve to him after their deceaſe. Having received an anſwer in the affirmative, he then reminded him, that the ſame law which gave him poſſeſſion of the eſtate, provided alſo that he ſhould marry the relick of the deceaſed; and pointing to Ruth, "That woman," ſaid he, "is the widow of Mallon: determine, therefore, whether you will receive her in marriage, or relinquiſh the poſſeſſions of her late huſband, which you now enjoy." The kinſman declined to eſpouſe her, alledging, that he was already married, and had ſeveral children; and in due form, reſigned to Booz, who, next to himſelf, was the neareſt of kin to her, all pretenſions both to the woman and the eſtate. Booz cauſed this renunciation to be regiſtered, and then ordered Ruth to looſe the ſhoe of her kinſman who had refuſed to eſpouſe her, and to ſpit in his face, according to a form practiſed in all ſimilar caſes.

Marriage of Booz and Ruth, and their offspring

Booz afterwards married her, and, before the expiration of the year, ſhe bore him a ſon, who was named Obed, which, in the Hebrew tongue, ſignifies aſſiſtance; alluding to the aſſiſtance which it was hoped he would render to Naomi in her old age. Obed was the father of Jeſſe, from whom deſcended David, king of Iſrael; in whoſe family the ſupreme government remained throughout twenty-one generations.

CHAP. IX.

SAMUEL is born. The PHILISTINES obtain ſeveral Victories over the HEBREWS.

Notorious profligacy of Eli's ſons.

THE Hebrews were now involved in an unſucceſsful war againſt the Philiſtines. Hophni and Phineas, the two ſons of Eli, the high-prieſt, were men totally diveſted of every ſentiment of religion and morality. Not ſatisfied with the cuſtomary gratuities and preſents which they received from the people, they were guilty of the greateſt exceſſes of extortion and rapine. They ſcrupled not to debauch women, even when engaged in the exerciſe of their devotions; and would often prefer their infamous ſuit at the very altar; and in the undiſtinguiſhing commiſſion of theſe enormities they manifeſted an effrontery ſcarcely to be paralleled. Eli obſerved, with the deepeſt ſorrow, the profligacy of his children; being under continual apprehenſions that ſome dreadful judgment would befal them, as a puniſhment for their wickedneſs§. Nor was he much leſs affected by the wretched condition of the people, who groaned under the intolerable oppreſſions of theſe mercileſs tyrants; but when God was pleaſed to reveal to the unhappy father, by the prophet Samuel, who was as yet but a child, the miſerable end which awaited thoſe men, he abandoned himſelf to his lamentations for them, as for perſons who were to be conſidered as already dead.

Elkanah, a Levite, dwelling at Ramath in the diſtrict of the tribe of Ephraim, had two wives, whoſe names were Hannah and Phenannah. The latter bore him ſeveral children; but the former, for a conſiderable time appeared to be barren; which circumſtance, however, did not in the leaſt leſſen his regard for her. Having repaired on a certain occaſion to Shiloh, where the tabernacle then was, he allotted to each of his wives a portion of the proviſions he had brought with him; Phenannah and her children eating at a ſeparate table. This circumſtance ſo much affected Hannah, who conſidered it as a reflection on her barrenneſs, that ſhe could not refrain from tears. It was in vain that her huſband and the reſt of her friends endeavoured to comfort her; and, in the anguiſh of her mind, ſhe immediately haſtened to the tabernacle, and, with the utmoſt fervency and devotion, addreſſed her prayers to the Almighty, that he would be pleaſed to grant her the bleſſing of a ſon; promiſing in the moſt ſolemn manner to dedicate him ſolely to his ſervice. Eli, who chanced to be ſitting before the tabernacle at the time, concluding, from the length and earneſtneſs of her prayer, that ſhe was intoxicated, reproached her with coming thither in ſuch a condition, and ordered her to be gone. She aſſured him that ſhe was perfectly guiltleſs of the charge, being accuſtomed to drink nothing but water, and that the agitation of her mind aroſe from the want of children, which had been the ſubject of her ſupplications to God. Eli, hereupon, diſmiſſed her with an aſſurance that God would grant her requeſt. Hannah, thus encouraged, returned with a joyful heart to her huſband, recovered her appetite, of which ſhe had long been totally deprived, and in a ſhort time went back with him to the place of their reſidence, where ſhe ſoon after conceived, and was in due time delivered of a ſon, who was named Samuel, which ſignifies, in our language, aſked of God. When the parents of the child went again to Shiloh, to make the uſual oblations, Hannah, being mindful of her vow, delivered her ſon into the hands of Eli, to be dedicated to the ſervice of God. His hair was Birth of Samuel.

§ The mild conduct of Eli towards his children was highly culpable; for, inſtead of reproving them in the tender language of an indulgent father, he ought to have exerted the authority of a zealous judge, by puniſhing them in an exemplary manner for ſuch notorious crimes as they were guilty of.

ſuffered to grow, and he was not permitted to taſte of any other liquor than water; was appointed to officiate, alſo, in the temple, and in time became a prophet of great reputation among the people. Hannah afterwards bore to Elkanah ſeveral ſons and three daughters.

Samuel, when he had attained his thirteenth year, began to propheſy; and, lying one night on his bed, he heard a voice which called him by his name. Imagining it was the voice of Eli, he immediately went to him, to know his will; but Eli aſſured him that he had not called him. This was repeated three times; and Eli, perceiving, at length, where the miſtake lay, ordered him, if the voice ſhould call him again, to anſwer in theſe words: "Say on, Lord, for thy ſervant heareth." At the next call, Samuel replied as he had been inſtructed, and the voice then proceeded in theſe words: "As thou art willing to liſten to my injunctions, I will now give thee to know, that the Hebrews are, at this moment, on the verge of a calamity ſo dreadful as not to be expreſſed, and almoſt ſurpaſſing conception. In the courſe of a ſingle day, the two ſons of Eli ſhall be ſlain; and the high-prieſthood ſhall be for ever taken away from his family, and transferred to that of Eleazar; for Eli hath manifeſted a greater regard for his ſons, than for my ſervice, and hath thereby involved both himſelf and them in one common deſtruction." Samuel was very unwilling to acquaint Eli with what had been communicated to him by the Almighty; but, being adjured by the high-prieſt to conceal nothing from him of all that had paſſed, he gave him a circumſtantial account of the revelation; thereby leaving him no room to doubt of the unavoidable ruin of his profligate children *. From this period, the reputation of the predictions of Samuel increaſed in the moſt rapid manner imaginable.

Divine denunciation againſt Eli and his ſons.

The troops of Philiſtines had now proceeded without oppoſition as far as Amphek, and, continuing to advance farther into the country of the Iſraelites, a battle at length enſued between the two armies, in which the Hebrews were ſhamefully defeated, with the loſs of four thouſand men on the ſpot, and were purſued even to their camp. This unexpected overthrow plunged the Hebrews in the deepeſt deſpondency, and they diſpatched meſſengers in all haſte to Shiloh, with a requeſt to the high-prieſt and elders, to cauſe the ark to be ſent without delay to the army, that through its preſence they might be enabled to obtain a victory over their enemies; being totally unconſcious that they were devoted to deſtruction by a power far ſuperior to that of the ark; even by that eternal Being, on whoſe account alone the ark itſelf was held in reverence. Their requeſt was, however, complied with; and the two ſons of Eli were commiſſioned by their father to convey the ark to the army, himſelf being too feeble to attend on the occaſion, with a ſtrict injunction never to ſee his face again, unleſs they brought back their charge in ſafety. On the arrival of the ark, the Hebrews reſumed their courage, as if victory had been inſeparably connected with its preſence; and their opponents, on the other hand, conſidered it as a preſage of their deſtruction. The event, however, proved, that both the hopes of the one party, and the fears of the other were equally ill-founded; for, in a ſecond engagement, which ſoon afterwards enſued between the two armies, the Hebrews fled in the moſt daſtardly manner on the very firſt onſet; leaving thirty thouſand of their men dead on the ſpot, among whom were the two ſons of Eli, and abandoning the ark of God to the poſſeſſion of the enemy.

The Loſs of the Ark occaſions the immediate Death of ELI. ICHABOD is born.

A Young Benjamite, who eſcaped from the battle, having brought the dreadful news of this defeat, and the conſequent loſs of the ark †, to Shiloh, the whole city was filled with the bittereſt ſorrow and lamentation. This being obſerved by Eli, who was ſitting in a chair at one of the gates, he directly ſuſpected that ſome diſaſter had befallen the army; and, calling the young man to him, learnt from him all the particulars of what had happened. The loſs of men which the Hebrews had ſuſtained in the battle, and the death of his ſons, were circumſtances of which, as we have before obſerved, he had already been forewarned by a revelation from heaven; and he therefore ſupported this part of the intelligence with a becoming fortitude. But, when he learnt that the ark of God had fallen into the enemy's hands, he ſunk under the unexpected ſhock, and, falling backwards from his ſeat, yielded up his life, in the ninety-eighth year of his age, and the fortieth of his government. When the wife of Phineas, who was at that time in the ſeventh month of her

† The heathens who held the doctrine of tutelary gods, carried theſe arks or ambulatory temples in their armies, imagining by theſe means to ſecure the protection of their gods. They likewiſe fanſied that if they could, by any means, propitiate or bribe the local god of their adverſary, their ſucceſs would be certain. With this view the Philiſtines ſeized on the ark, and ſuppoſed that, by poſſeſſing themſelves of the palladium of the Iſraelites, they ſhould deprive them of the aſſiſtance of their local and tutelary god, and at the ſame time ſecure his protection to themſelves.

CHAP. I.

The PHILISTINES take the Ark, which is removed to Five Cities, which are plagued thereby.

Dagon falls before the ark.

THE Philistines conveyed the ark in triumph to Ashdod, and deposited it among other trophies in the temple of Dagon. Upon repairing to the temple the next morning, in order to perform their devotions, the Philistines perceived that the figure of Dagon, which they worshipped as their god, had fallen from its pedestal, and was lying before the ark. They replaced the idol; but on their return the following day, again found it on the floor of the edifice, in a posture of adoration to the ark; and this was the case for several successive days. They were greatly surprised at this preternatural moving of the image, which they considered as an indication of ill-fortune. In short, the sacrilegious temerity of the people of the city and province of Ashdod was punished by a terrible plague, which destroyed great numbers of them. This plague was a violent dysentery, and rapid decay of the entrails, attended with the most excruciating tortures. They were also visited with another plague by their lands being infested by surprising numbers of mice, which intirely destroyed their corn, and the other fruits of the earth. Being at length convinced that their impious violence upon the ark was the cause of these judgments, they dispatched messengers to the people of Ascalon, to solicit them to remove the ark from their city. This offer was joyfully accepted, but in a short time the people had occasion severely to repent their conduct; for when the ark had been conveyed to Ascalon, that place was visited with the same plagues which had prevailed at Ashdod. It remained not long in this city, but was conveyed to different places, till it had passed through five of the Philistine cities, being constantly attended in its progress by the calamities above-mentioned.

The Philistines resolve to dispose of the ark.

A council of the principal men of the five cities of Gath, Ekron, Ascalon, Gaza, and Ashdod, was assembled, to determine upon measures for disposing of the ark. It was recommended by the one party, to return it to the people by whom it was originally possessed; for they believed that the God who had spread such devastation in their cities would still continue to exercise his displeasure upon those who should keep the ark in their possession. Others would not allow this to be the cause of the public calamities; and they argued, that it was not probable the Lord entertained the respect which was pretended for the ark, as he had suffered the Israelites to be deprived of it, by an enemy, and especially as that enemy professed a different religion; and they advised that the prevailing troubles might be considered as occurrences produced in the common course of nature. A third party adopted sentiments between the extremes of the two preceding: they proposed, that for each of the above-mentioned cities a golden image should be provided, and that these five images should be consecrated to the honour of God, as an instance of gratitude for having relieved them from the terrible affliction of the plagues, which human means were not able to eradicate. They also proposed five golden mice, thereby referring to the vermin which had destroyed the produce of their grounds*; and that a carriage, in the form of a waggon, should be constructed for the purpose of receiving the ark, upon which was to be laid a box containing the images and golden mice; this carriage was to be drawn by two milch-kine, their calves being taken from them and confined, that they might not cause them to delay their progress. The vehicle was taken to a spot branching into three roads, and the beasts being allowed to pursue their own course, it was to be understood that if they pursued the Hebrew road, the misfortunes which the people of the five cities had ſuſtained, proceeded from the ark; but if they took any other direction, the public calamities were to be attributed to ſome different cauſe.

CHAP. II.

Rejoicings of the ISRAELITES, on the recovery of the Ark. Defeat of the PHILISTINES.

The Iſraelites recover the ark.

THE animals being allowed the liberty of following their own courſe, immediately ſtruck into the Hebrews road*, and, with as much regularity as if they had been impelled by the direction of a driver, proceeded towards a village belonging to the tribe of Judah, called Bethſhemeth, where they ſtopped, notwithſtanding a fertile and extenſive plain ſeemed to invite them to continue their journey. At this time the people were buſily occupied in getting in the harveſt, but they left their work, and being joined by great numbers from the town, proceeded towards the ark, the return of which afforded them inexpreſſible pleaſure. They took the ark and the box containing the images and golden mice from the carriages, and having placed them on a large ſtone, ſacrificed the vehicle on which the ark was conveyed, and the beaſts which drew it, as a burnt-offering to the Lord. A number of the Philiſtines who had followed the ark, waited till the concluſion of the above ceremony, and then returned to their companions.

The Bethſhemites puniſhed.

Seventy of the Bethſhemites incurred the diſpleaſure of God on the above occaſion, by touching the ark, which was a liberty granted only to thoſe inveſted with the authority and qualification of prieſthood. In the midſt of their rejoicings, the ſpirit of the multitude were exceedingly depreſſed by the fate of theſe men, whom they lamented, not as having diſcharged the common debt of nature, but as falling judicial victims to their own temerity. This calamity convinced them, that they were unworthy to be entruſted with the care of ſo ſacred a depoſit; and they, therefore, diſpatched meſſengers to the Hebrews, to inform them that the ark was brought back. Upon this intelligence being communicated, it was conveyed to Kirjath-jearim, in the neighbourhood of Bethſhemeth, and depoſited in the houſe of a Levite named Aminidab, who, being a man of ſtrict piety and exemplary morals, was conſidered worthy of the ſacred truſt. To this man and his ſons the care of the ark was aſſigned, and, excepting the four months when it was detained by the Philiſtines, it remained twenty years in their poſſeſſion; and ſo worthily did they execute the office conferred upon them, that the public acknowledged themſelves to be perfectly ſatisfied with their conduct, and beſtowed upon them a high degree of reputation.

Samuel ſummoned the people to aſſemble at the city called Mizpeh, and at this place they performed ſacrifice, offering ſupplications to the Lord, and obſerving the day as a ſolemn faſt. The Philiſtines gained information of this meeting, and advanced towards the ſpot with a powerful army, intending to make an attack by ſurpriſe. The formidable appearance of the foe threw them into the greateſt conſternation, and they repaired to Samuel, to whom they alledged, that they dreaded the event of engaging an enemy by whom they had been ſo frequently vanquiſhed; adding, that in compliance with his direction, they had aſſembled at Mizpeh for the purpoſes of offering up ſacrifices and ſupplications to the Lord, and entering into a ſolemn engagement of fidelity; and that they now found themſelves in a defenceleſs ſtate, expoſed to the mercy of the Philiſtines; wherefore they intreated him to exert his endeavours to prevail with the Lord to deliver them from the impending danger, which they could not hope to eſcape but through the intervention of the Divine Providence. Samuel encouraged them to hope for ſucceſs; ſaying, that God would indiſputably grant them the protection which he had been graciouſly pleaſed to promiſe. After this, he offered a ſucking lamb as a ſacrifice in the name of the Hebrews; ſupplicating the Lord to preſerve them from the calamities threatened by the Philiſtines. This ſacrifice proved agreeable to the Lord, who, in reply to the requeſt of Samuel, promiſed that the Hebrews ſhould obtain a complete victory over their enemies. Before the ſacrifice was intirely conſumed, the Philiſtines formed themſelves into the order of battle; and as they had not afforded the Hebrews time to put themſelves in a ſtate of defence, they entertained the moſt confident expectation of conqueſt. But the iſſue of this matter proved ſo contrary to the expectation of the Philiſtines, that it would ſcarcely have been credited, had it been predicted by an oracle.

Samuel ſacrificing, the Philiſtines are diſcomfited.

On the ſpot where the Philiſtines were ſtationed, the Almighty cauſed a violent trembling of the earth, which opened in different places and ſwallowed up great numbers; at the ſame time the moſt terrible thunder roared in the heavens†, and the lightnings deſcended upon them in continual flaſhes, ſo dreadfully ſcorching them, that they could neither make uſe of their arms againſt the Hebrews, nor ſee how to avoid the danger. They fled in the greateſt conſternation to Chore, and were purſued by the He-

* Here was a remarkable inſtance of divine interference: it was unnatural for the kine to go tractably in yoke together, having never before been uſed to ſuch labour; therefore it were highly probable that they would have returned to their calves, out of natural affection; and it was very unlikely alſo that they ſhould go in the Hebrew road, when there were ſeveral other ways to take.

† The Philiſtines propoſed to attack the Iſraelites at a time when they were not prepared to receive them, being only gathered together before the Lord, and, probably, deſtitute of arms. But God ſoon convinced the uncircumciſed army, that in his hands are the iſſues of life and death, by attacking them with the artillery of heaven.

brews, who committed a great ſlaughter upon them in their retreat. At this place Samuel cauſed a monumental ſtone to be fixed, for the purpoſe of denoting the bounds of the ſpot whereon the victory and purſuit took place; and he diſtinguiſhed it by the name of the ſtrong, in commemoration of the powerful ſupport, which was manifeſted by the Almighty in behalf of the Hebrews.

Theſe events ſo effectually depreſſed the ſpirits of the Philiſtines, that they never re-aſſumed courage ſufficient to renew hoſtilities againſt the Hebrews. Samuel continued to make incurſions upon the enemy, till he reduced them to a ſtate of hopeleſs ſubjection. He recovered the whole tract of country between Gath and Ekron, which had been conquered by the Philiſtines. Previous to this period, the war between the Canaanites and the Hebrews had ſubſided.

CHAP. III.

SAMUEL reſigns the Government in Favour of his Sons, JOEL and ABIAH.

Samuel reſigns the government.

HAVING re-inſtated the people in their poſſeſſions, and made ſome progreſs towards introducing a regularity of government, Samuel eſtabliſhed a plan for the adminiſtration of public juſtice. Certain towns were appointed, wherein the judicial buſineſs was to be tranſacted; and to each of theſe he reſorted twice a year, in order to enforce an inviolable obſervance of the laws of his nation. For a long ſeries of time, this ſyſtem of policy was practiſed: but when the infirmities of advanced life had rendered him unequal to the arduous taſk of conducting the public affairs, he retired from the adminiſtration, and inveſted his authority in his ſons, Joel and Abiah. He commanded them to divide the people into two bodies, over each of which they were reſpectively to preſide; and that, at Bethel and Beerſheba, they ſhould each eſtabliſh a court for the purpoſe of attending to legiſlative appeals.

From the conduct of Joel (who was the elder ſon of Samuel) and his brother Abiah, we may learn, that children do not always inherit the good qualities of their parents, and that a virtuous offſpring may derive their orign from profligate anceſtors. Theſe degenerate ſons proceeded in a courſe diametrically oppoſite to the inſtructions and example of their father. They proſtituted the judicial character to intereſted conſiderations; for it was not according to the merits of the cauſe, but the eſtimated worth of the bribe, that judgment was pronounced. At the times they ſhould have been employed in the diſtribution of public juſtice, they were indulging themſelves in luxury and intemperance; and in every inſtance their conduct was a direct violation of the laws of God, and equally contrary to the commands of their father*, whoſe attention had not been more materially engaged on any ſubject, than the obſervance of a neceſſary ſubordination of the people towards their ſuperiors, and common juſtice among themſelves.

The Iſraelites deſire a king.

The licentious conduct of the ſons of Samuel incenſed the people to ſo high a degree, that, when he repaired to Ramah, where he then reſided, they loudly complained to him of the mal-adminiſtration of his children, and earneſtly preſſed him, in conſideration of his own infirmities, which rendered him incapable of ſupporting the weight of the government; and of the inſufferable diſorders committed by his ſons; that he would appoint a king to reign over them, under whoſe command they might revenge the injuries which they had ſo long ſuſtained from the Philiſtines.

In conſequence of inſtruction from heaven, Samuel convened an aſſembly of the people, and gave them a poſitive aſſurance that he would aſſign them a king; but firſt of all acquainted them with the evils and inconveniencies which they muſt expect to endure under that peculiar form of government. The people were totally deaf to all he could ſay upon the ſubject; alledging, that they could not preſerve themſelves from a foreign bondage under any other form of government, and juſtifying their choice by the example of all the neighbouring nations.

When Samuel perceived that all his arguments had not the leaſt effect upon them, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly, with a promiſe that he would call them together again as ſoon as God ſhould have revealed to him on whom he would be pleaſed to confer the regal dignity†.

* The crimes of Samuel's ſons were leſs atrocious than thoſe of Eli's ſons, becauſe there is no compariſon between taking bribes and openly profaning the tabernacle, thus rendering religion itſelf deſpicable. Beſides, the crimes of the ſons of Eli were perpetrated in his own ſight; and by not preventing, he was in ſome ſenſe the acceſſary or encourager of them: but Samuel's ſons were at a diſtance from him, and poſſibly their crimes might not reach his ears.

† Samuel had now, by a wiſe and painful direction of affairs, reſtored the purity of religion, and reſcued his nation from the power of the Philiſtines, and their other hoſtile neighbours, againſt whom they were utterly unable to make head, when he entered upon the adminiſtration. At this very time, the people, debauched as uſual by power and proſperity, took the pretence of the corrupt conduct of the prophet's two ſons, to go in a tumultuous manner and demand a king: but the ſecret ſpring of their rebellion was the ambition of their leaders, who could live no longer without the ſplendor of a royal court and houſhold. "Give me," ſay they, in Hoſea xiii. 10. "a king and princes," where every one of them might ſhine a diſtinguiſhed officer of ſtate. They could get nothing, when their affairs led them to their judge's poor reſidence, in the ſchools of the prophets, but the GIFT of the holy ſpirit; which a courtier, I ſuppoſe, would not prize even at the rate Simon Magus held it, of a paltry piece of money.——This it was, and this only, that made their demand criminal: for the chuſing regal, rather than ariſtocratic viceroys, was a thing plainly indulged to them by the law of Moſes, Deut. xvii. 14, 15. The clauſe, "whom the Lord thy God ſhall

CHAP. IV.

SAUL is proclaimed King. The City of JABESH is beſieged by NABASH, King of the AMMONITES.

Saul and Samuel meet. KISH, a perſon of virtuous character, of the tribe of Benjamin, had a ſon named Saul, who was equally famed for his perſonal and mental qualifications. The father having loſt ſome aſſes, which were of a good breed, ſent Saul, accompanied by one of his ſervants, to ſeek for them. After a long and fruitleſs ſearch, Saul determined to return home, being apprehenſive that his longer abſence would create an uneaſineſs in the mind of his father. When they approached near to Ramah, the ſervant adviſed Saul to have recourſe to a certain famous prophet who lived in that city, for intelligence concerning the aſſes. Saul replied, that he was totally deſtitute of money to gratify the prophet for his information, having expended the whole of what he brought from home. The ſervant anſwered, that he had himſelf a quarter-ſhekel ſtill remaining, which he imagined would be ſufficient for the purpoſe: for he was not appriſed that this man did not, like ſome others, make a traffic of his knowledge in hidden matters. Upon their arrival at Ramah, they met a number of damſels at one of the gates, who were coming out of the city to draw water. By them they were directed to the reſidence of the prophet; and the maidens further adviſed them to loſe no time in repairing to his houſe, as in caſe of delay they would not be able to obtain a conference with him that night, he having invited a number of gueſts to ſup with him.

Samuel had already been informed of God, that the perſon whom he was to proclaim king over Iſrael was a young man of the tribe of Benjamin, and that he ſhould come to his houſe that evening; and he was, in conſequence, waiting at home in expectation of the ſtranger's arrival. At the preciſe hour appointed by the Almighty, S[illegible]rrived at the houſe of Samuel, who immediately diſcovered, by inſpiration, that he was the perſon whom God had choſen. Saul, addreſſing Samuel with great courteouſneſs, deſired to be introduced to the prophet. Samuel replied, that he was the perſon; and, inviting him to partake of the repaſt which he had provided, informed him not only that the aſſes which he ſought were ſafe, but alſo that he was on the point of being advanced to the very ſummit of power. Saul anſwered, with great modeſty, that both his family and his tribe were too inconſiderable to permit him to indulge the moſt diſtant hopes of acquiring ſo tranſcendent an honour. At ſupper, Saul was ſeated above the reſt of the gueſts, conſiſting of ſeventy perſons, with his ſervant next him, and Samuel ordered the attendants to ſet before Saul a royal meſs. At the hour of reſt the company retired, but Saul and his ſervant remained with the prophet that night.

Saul anointed king. The next morning by ſun-riſe, Samuel diſmiſſed his gueſt, accompanying him a ſmall diſtance on his way home. Being come to a convenient ſpot, the prophet deſired Saul to ſend his ſervant a little way on before, as he had ſomething of conſequence to communicate to him in private. His requeſt being complied with, he took out of his pocket a phial of oil, and, pouring it upon his head, pronounced and ſaluted him king of Iſrael; at the ſame time admoniſhing him, that this diſtinguiſhed honour was conferred on him, to the intent that he might revenge the injuries which the Hebrews had received from the Philiſtines, and defend them from all future attacks of their enemies.

When Saul returned home, he was cloſely queſtioned by his kinſman Abner, for whom he entertained a particular friendſhip, relative to the incidents of his journey; all of which he readily communicated to him, ſave that which regarded his advancement to the regal dignity; being apprehenſive, from his knowledge of the frailty of human nature, that, if this circumſtance ſhould obtain belief, he ſhould draw upon himſelf the envy and jealouſy of his relations, or incur the cenſure of being a weak and vain young man.

An aſſembly of the people being ſoon afterwards convened at Mizpeh, Samuel reminded them of the obligations they were under to the God of Iſrael, and to the obſervance of his laws: that they had rejected the government of God, when they deſired a king; and in compliance with their wiſhes, he had anointed one to rule over them. They obeyed; and Saul, the ſon of Kiſh, of the family of Matri, of the tribe of Benjamin, was thus elected to the high office in queſtion*. The very moment that the election was finiſhed, Saul privately withdrew himſelf from the aſſembly, in order to avoid the congratulations of his new ſubjects. A rare example of modeſty and prudence, in one thus ſuddenly advanced from a private ſtation to the ſupreme government of a numerous and mighty people!

The prophet, upon the appearance of Saul, preſented him to the people, who received him with the loudeſt ſhall chuſe," plainly ſignifies that they ſhould take care, when they demanded a king, that they thought of none other than ſuch a king, who was to be GOD'S DEPUTY. As therefore court ambition was only in the wicked view of the ringleaders of theſe mal-contents, and no fooliſh fears for the ſtate, or hopes of bettering the public adminiſtration, it is evident to all acquainted with the genius of this time and people, that compliance with their demand muſt have ended in the utter deſtruction of the Moſaical religion as well as law. But it was God's purpoſe to keep them ſeparate, in order to preſerve the memory of himſelf amidſt an idolatrous world; and this not being to be done but by the preſervation of their religion and law, we muſt needs conclude he would not give way to their rebellious demand.

* But, we are told, 1 Sam. x. 27. "that the children of Belial (or of iniquity) deſpiſed him, and brought him no preſents," they did not come to wiſh him a happy reign, or to pay him homage. They were probably men of power and fortune, who deſpiſed him on account of his tribe and family: but as he paſſed by their affront without notice, he ſhewed both his magnanimity and his prudence.

loudeſt acclamations of joy; Samuel noticed to them, at the ſame time, the ſuperior height of his perſon, and his majeſtic mien. The prophet afterwards returned to Ramah, the place of his abode, and Saul repaired to Gibeah, his native city. A numerous train of perſons accompanied him thither, from motives of duty and reſpect; but with theſe were intermingled a number of profligate wretches, who behaved with the moſt contemptuous inſolence, not only towards their loyal fellow-ſubjects, but even towards the prince himſelf.

Within the courſe of a month after the acceſſion of Saul to the ſupreme authority, a war broke out between the Ammonites and the Hebrews, in the courſe of which he acquired conſiderable renown. Nahaſh, the king of the Ammonites, invaded the country of the Iſraelites beyond Jordan with a powerful army, where he ſubdued ſeveral cities, and ſpread deſolation throughout the land. This prince, not contented with reducing the inhabitants to ſlavery, in order to prevent even the poſſibility of their revolting, put out the right eye not only of his priſoners, but alſo of thoſe who yielded themſelves on capitulation; and thus, as in battle the left eye was conſtantly covered with the buckler, rendered them totally incapable of ſerving in the field.

Nahaſh ſends an inſulting meſſage to the Gileadites.

Nahaſh afterwards marched his army into the country of the Gileadites, ſituated on this ſide Jordan, and encamped near Jabeſh, the capital of the province. He ſent a ſummons to the inhabitants, peremptorily requiring them to ſubmit without delay to the cruel conditions above-mentioned, and threatening, in caſe of refuſal, to deſtroy the place, and to put the citizens to the ſword. Theſe people were at firſt much divided in their ſentiments, whether they ſhould return a reſolute or a ſubmiſſive anſwer to this ſummons; and they at length determined to ſteer a middle courſe, and ſent a meſſage to Nahaſh, requeſting that he would grant them a truce for ſeven days, during which time they might ſend to their allies for aſſiſtance; and promiſing, in caſe their applications ſhould prove unſucceſsful, either to yield themſelves upon the terms propoſed by him, or to march out and give him battle. To theſe conditions Nahaſh, influenced by the moſt conſummate contempt of the whole Hebrew nation, readily aſſented*.

The Gileadites, accordingly, diſpatched expreſſes to all parts of the country, to acquaint their neighbours with the imminent danger to which they were expoſed; but, though their ſituation was univerſally deplored, yet no one dared to ſtir in their defence; and the people of Gibeah, where Saul kept his court, were not leſs infected than the reſt with this extreme dread and apprehenſion of the power of the Ammonites.

Saul, who had been ſome time abſent from the capital, chanced to return juſt at this time; and, having learnt the cauſe of the apparent ſorrow and conſternation of the people, he, actuated by a divine impulſe, ſent back ſome of the meſſengers, with orders to aſſure their fellow-citizens that he would deliver them from their enemies in the courſe of three days, and that the riſing ſun ſhould behold the total defeat and deſtruction of the haughty foe; and the reſt he retained with him, to ſerve him in the capacity of guides.

CHAP. V.

SAUL defeats the AMMONITES, and is again anointed, and proclaimed King.

SAUL perceiving the great averſion of the people to engage in this war, and being ſatisfied that in the preſent caſe, the utmoſt diſpatch was neceſſary in aſſembling an army, deviſed the following expedient to induce them to take up arms: he firſt cut off the legs of a certain number of his own oxen, and then iſſued a proclamation, that the ſame ſhould be done to the oxen of all ſuch perſons as ſhould either refuſe or neglect to appear in arms on the next day, on the banks of the river Jordan; thence to follow him and Samuel where-ever it ſhould be deemed requiſite to lead them. The fear of incurring the above penalty influenced the people to that degree, that, at the preciſe time, they aſſembled to the number of 70,000 effective men, excluſive of a ſeparate body of 70,000, which were furniſhed by the tribe of Judah; as appeared by a muſter made near the city of Balam, which was the appointed place of rendezvous.

Saul defeats the Ammonites.

With this army Saul croſſed the river Jordan, and, after a march of about ten ſchæni during the night, at length halted on the ſpot which he had before fixed on for that purpoſe. At break of day the next morning, he ſeparated his army into three diviſions, and, ſuddenly breaking in upon the enemy's camp, defeated them with incredible ſlaughter; their king, Nahaſh, being among the number of the ſlain. He purſued the glorious advantage he had gained, and marched with his troops into the country of the Ammonites, which he utterly laid waſte, and re-conducted his army home, crowned with victory, and enriched by the ſpoils of their enemies. Theſe ſucceſſes acquired him great reputation; and thoſe of his ſubjects who had before taken every opportunity to manifeſt their contempt of him, were now the moſt zealous in his praiſe.

* Saul, indeed, had been appointed king; but not having as yet taken upon him the government, he lived in the ſame private manner as before: ſo that Nahaſh was perſuaded he could not levy an army in ſo ſhort a ſpace as ſeven days, and, conſequently, that there was no danger in granting them the reſpite they deſired.

At this period, Samuel propoſed that a ſecond convention of the people ſhould be held, with the view of confirming again the advancement of Saul to the ſupreme authority. They, accordingly, aſſembled at Gilgal, where the ſame ceremonies were repeated as had been uſed at the former election, in the ſight and hearing of all preſent. Thus was the Hebrew government changed, from a republican to a monarchical form. During the whole term of the adminiſtration of Moſes and Joſhua, it was ariſtocratic, and for the ſpace of eighteen years after the death of the latter, no one being inveſted with the ſupreme authority, the whole nation was involved in an abſolute anarchy. They were afterwards governed, for a conſiderable term of years, by certain magiſtrates, who were denominated judges; and to this form ſucceeded that of the regal government.

CHAP. VI.

The PHILISTINES are defeated by JONATHAN. SAUL's raſh Vow. His Offspring.

BEING eſtabliſhed in the regal authority, Saul aſſembled three thouſand men, ſelected from the body of the people; and two thouſand of them he commanded to accompany him to his reſidence at Beth-el, as a guard for his perſonal ſafety: he appointed the other thouſand to attend his ſon Jonathan, whom he had ordered to repair to Gibeah; near to which place Jonathan, with theſe thouſand men, attacked and conquered a caſtle belonging to the Philiſtines.

The Philiſtines oppreſs the Hebrews;

When the Philiſtines inhabiting the parts adjacent to Gibeah obtained advantage over the Hebrews, they did not only diſpoſſeſs them of their arms, but enjoined them againſt practiſing any handicraft branch, in which iron was a material; thereby ſubjecting them to the neceſſity of employing Philiſtine workmen to provide the iron-work, even for their domeſtic utenſils and implements of huſbandry. The Philiſtines poſſeſſed themſelves of the fords and paſſes, and having fortified their towns, they came into the field with an army of three hundred thouſand foot, thirty thouſand chariots, and ſix thouſand horſe, and eſtabliſhed their quarters at Michmaſh. When Saul had gained intelligence of theſe preparations, he repaired to Gilgal, and iſſued proclamations for all his people to take up arms againſt the enemy, whom he repreſented to be leſs formidable than they were in reality; but upon obtaining authentic information as to the military proweſs of the Philiſtines, an univerſal terror prevailed among the Hebrews, the greateſt part of whom paſſed the river Jordan, and fled to the tribes of Gad and Reuben for protection; the reſt concealed themſelves in caves, vaults, and ſuch other places as they imagined would ſhelter them from the vigilance of their adverſaries.

At this juncture Saul applied to the prophet Samuel, requeſting his advice for the regulation of his conduct in the preſent diſtreſsful ſtate of affairs. Samuel inſtructed him to remain in his preſent ſituation, and to prepare offerings to the Lord, ſaying, that at the expiration of ſeven days, he would himſelf attend the ceremony of oblation; after which he might give battle to the enemy. The appointed time was now arrived, and being continually abandoned by his ſoldiers, Saul became exceedingly impatient, and proceeded to offer up his ſacrifice; immediately upon the concluſion of which ceremony, the arrival of the prophet was announced. He cenſured Saul for having arrogated to himſelf the office of performing ſacrifice to God*. To extenuate the fault alledged againſt him, Saul urged, that he had waited the appointed time, but that the enemy having quitted Michmaſh, and directed their march towards Gilgal, had greatly intimidated his men, many of whom had deſerted; and that on theſe conſiderations, he was compelled to offer up the ſacrifice, leſt he ſhould be intirely abandoned by his followers. In reply to this, Samuel reproved him for having neglected a rigid obſervance of his direction, which he declared to be a meſſage from the Almighty himſelf; adding, that a compliance therewith would have effectually ſecured the government to him and his poſterity; and he then returned home, much diſpleaſed with the conduct of Saul. Attended only by ſix hundred men, and his ſon Jonathan, Saul removed to Gibeah, the Hebrews having been prohibited (as before obſerved) the manufacturing of iron, and the majority of his followers being deſtitute of arms.

The Philiſtine army, being divided into three bodies, penetrated into the country of the Hebrews by three different roads, and, as they proceeded, ravaged and laid waſte the territories of their afflicted adverſaries. Saul, Jonathan, and Abiah, the high-prieſt, beheld the mercileſs devaſtation from an eminence, and ſeverely regretted that they were not in a ſtate ſufficiently formidable to repel the invaders. Theſe outrages ſo exaſperated Jonathan, that he determined upon a brave enterpriſe for the preſervation of his country; and queſtioned his armour-bearer, whether he would ſhare with him the danger and glory of the generous attempt. He conſented, and bound himſelf by the ſolemnity of an oath, to put his life on the iſſue of

* The wickedneſs of Saul, on this occaſion, conſiſted partly in his encroaching upon the office of the prieſt and prophet, in not waiting for Samuel, in his endeavouring to palliate his fault by throwing it upon the prophet, and not ſhewing any ſigns of remorſe, compunction, or repentance. Samuel had expreſsly promiſed to come and offer ſacrifice; but Saul offered the ſacrifice himſelf. Samuel had enjoined him to wait ſeven days for him; but he offered on the ſeventh day in the morning: and, laſtly, Samuel had aſſured him, that he would direct him what meaſures to take; but, inſtead of this, he intended to commence his military operations without the prophet's advice.

the plot. Jonathan propoſed, that they ſhould ſecretly gain admittance to the camp of the enemy, and endeavour to throw them into confuſion by a ſudden and unexpected attack. The Philiſtines were encamped on a ſpot of ground of a triangular ſhape, bounded on all ſides by rocks, which rendered it nearly inacceſſible. Jonathan, to encourage his armour-bearer to behave himſelf courageouſly on the occaſion, told him, that if, in climbing up the rocks, they ſhould be diſcovered and ſpoken to by the enemy, he might conſider the circumſtance as a certain preſage of their ſucceſs; but, if the contrary ſhould happen, they muſt abandon the enterpriſe.

When they had nearly reached the camp, they were eſpied by ſome of the Philiſtines, who obſerved to each other in deriſion, that there were two of the Iſraelites who had ventured out of their lurking-holes; calling to Jonathan and his companion to draw nearer, to receive the reward of their raſhneſs. This incident afforded Jonathan the greateſt ſatisfaction; and having, with much danger and difficulty, at length attained the top of the rocks, he and his armour-bearer ſuddenly entered a part of the camp where the enemy were aſleep, and ſlew about twenty before they were ſenſible of his approach. The boldneſs of this attempt threw the Philiſtines into inexpreſſible confuſion; ſome abandoning their arms, and endeavouring to ſave themſelves by flight; ſome part of the army being compoſed of different nations, fell by the hands of each other, their terror not permitting them to diſtinguiſh friend from foe; many ruſhed upon death, merely from the very apprehenſion of it; and the number of thoſe who periſhed by theſe various means was very conſiderable.

Valiant exploit of Jonathan.

Saul, having by this time received intelligence that an extraordinary commotion prevailed in the camp of the Philiſtines, ordered inſtant inquiry to be made whether any of his own people were abſent; and being informed that Jonathan and his armour-bearer had ſecretly withdrawn themſelves, he commanded the high-prieſt to habit himſelf in his ſacerdotal veſtments, and to offer up prayers to God for inſtructions how to proceed on the occaſion. This being done, the high-prieſt acquainted Saul, that it was God's pleaſure that he ſhould immediately attack the enemy, in full confidence of obtaining a complete victory; which injunction Saul joyfully obeyed. In the intermediate time, ſuch of the Hebrews as had concealed themſelves in the hidden places of the rocks, having learnt what had happened in the camp of the Philiſtines, aſſembled to the number of nearly ten thouſand men, and putting themſelves under the conduct of their king, attacked the enemy with ſuch impetuoſity, that they ſoon put them to the rout, and purſued them to a conſiderable diſtance with great ſlaughter. But Saul, either through inadvertency, or infatuated perhaps with this unexpected and ſignal ſucceſs, fell into an error which nearly proved of the moſt fatal conſequence to his repoſe, and embittered even the ſweets of conqueſt. From a ſtrong deſire of taking a complete revenge on the enemy, he ordered that the purſuit ſhould be continued, without intermiſſion, till night; and vowed to puniſh with death any perſon who ſhould allow himſelf the leiſure even to eat or drink, till the chace ſhould be at an end †; and this denunciation was ratified by all the people who were with him at the time. Jonathan, however, who was totally unacquainted with the foregoing circumſtance, in paſſing ſoon afterwards through a wood, in the diſtrict of the tribe of Ephraim, perceived ſome bees at work, and taking a honey-comb, began to ſuck it; but, being informed by thoſe who were next him of all the particulars relative to his father's vow, he inſtantly deſiſted, and threw the comb to the ground; but not without ſome reflections on the impropriety of his father's conduct, in interdicting ſuch refreſhment to the people as might enable them to purſue the enemy with the greater alacrity.

Saul's raſh execration cenſured.

Saul was very deſirous of exterminating the wretched remainder of the Philiſtines; nor were the troops leſs anxious to effect this point than their leader. But he determined to conſult the will of God, with reſpect to the matter in queſtion, before he ſhould proceed in his deſign; and he therefore ordered Architob, the high-prieſt, to make application to God for his inſtructions on this head. Architob returned for anſwer, that the oracle was ſilent. Saul obſerved, that the ſilence of the Almighty, in this caſe, certainly proceeded from ſome ſecret and important cauſe, as, at other times, he had been accuſtomed to intimate his pleaſure to them, without any application on their part; adding, with a ſolemn oath, that he would put to death that perſon who ſhould be found by his iniquity to have ſubjected them to this dilemma, even ſhould his own ſon Jonathan be diſcovered to be the offender.

This declaration was highly applauded by the people, and Saul ordered the lot to be caſt; himſelf and his ſon ſtanding, during the time, ſome little diſtance from the reſt. When it was perceived that the lot had fallen upon Jonathan, his father bid him recollect what ſecret crime he had lately committed, and to make an open confeſſion thereof before all the people. Jonathan replied, that he had no fault to charge himſelf with, ſave that of having taſted, during the purſuit on the day before, a little honey; being totally ignorant, at the time, of the prohibition iſſued by his father. Saul aſſured him, with an oath, that his life ſhould pay the forfeiture of his diſobedience: as he preferred the religious obſervance of his vow, before every conſideration of parental tenderneſs and affection.

Jonathan reſcued by the people.

The generous youth, not at all diſmayed at the proſpect of death, calmly anſwered, that he ſhould readily relinquiſh his life, for the ſake of enabling his father to releaſe himſelf from the obligation of a ſacred bond; and that the reflection that he had been, in ſome degree, inſtrumental in revenging the injuries which the Hebrews had ſo long ſuſtained from the Philiſtines, would afford him ample conſolation under all his ſufferings. The noble conſtancy manifeſted by Jonathan on this trying occaſion, affected the people to that degree, that they forcibly reſcued him out of the hands of his enraged father; unanimouſly declaring, with the moſt ſolemn oaths, that they would not permit the leaſt injury to be done to the man to whom they were ſo largely indebted for the victory of the preceding day; beſeeching God to pardon a fault, into which he had been miſled by ignorance alone.

† The execration of Saul was fit only for a madman to utter, and than which nothing could be more extravagant, unleſs it was what immediately followed in this paſſage, namely, by his laying himſelf under an execration to cut the throat of his ſon Jonathan, for taſting a little honey, without knowing that he had incurred his father's curſe upon account of it.

After this remarkable victory, in which the number ſlain on the ſide of the Philiſtines amounted to nearly ſixty thouſand men, Saul returned to his capital, where he long enjoyed an uninterrupted ſeries of proſperity, and acquired immortal fame by the repeated advantages which he obtained over the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Philiſtines, the Edomites, and the people of Zoba‡. He had three ſons, whoſe names were Jonathan, Joſhua, and Melchiſhui: and two daughters, the eldeſt of whom was named Merab, and the other Michal. His army was commanded by Abner, the ſon of his uncle, Ner; Kiſh, the father of Saul, and Ner, were the ſons of Abiel. He had a numerous army of infantry, cavalry, and chariots; and from every encounter with his enemies, he conſtantly returned victorious. His guards were remarkable for their martial appearance and deportment. In ſhort, under his reign, the Iſraelites attained to a height of reputation and power, which rendered them at once both the envy and terror of all the neighbouring nations.

CHAP. VII.

SAMUEL delivers a Meſſage from the LORD, enjoining SAUL to deſtroy the AMALEKITES. SAUL incurs the Diſpleaſure of GOD for ſparing the Life of King AGAG.

THE prophet Samuel repreſented to Saul, that he had received an expreſs command from the Almighty, to remind him of his duty to the Creator of the univerſe, and the King of kings, who had exalted him to the regal dignity; and that it was the pleaſure of God he ſhould proſecute a war againſt the Amalekites, and utterly extirpate the whole race; that no advantage ſhould be made of the property of the people, and that their cattle, goods, and other poſſeſſions, ſhould be intirely deſtroyed, and, according to the prediction of Moſes, even the name of Amalek expunged from the hiſtory of mankind. Theſe judgments were denounced againſt the Amalekites, as a juſt puniſhment for their iniquities.

Saul engaged to execute with all poſſible diſpatch the inſtructions delivered to him by Samuel. He now aſſembled his followers at Gilgal, and upon a review of his forces, they appeared to conſiſt of forty thouſand men, excluſive of the tribe of Judah, which muſtered thirty thouſand. With this army Saul prepared to attack the Amalekites: he ſtationed ambuſhes upon the paſſes of the rivers and woods, ſo that the enemy could not move from their quarters without danger of being attacked by ſurpriſe. After ſome ſkirmiſhes, a general battle took place, and the Amalekites were totally defeated; great part of them being ſlaughtered during the battle, and excepting a very inconſiderable number, the reſt were effectually cut off in the purſuit. After this victory, in conformity to the divine prediction, Saul proceeded to attack the walled and fortified towns, and other places of ſtrength. Some of theſe he ſubdued by ſiege, and others by ſtratagem.

Saul's criminal lenity, in ſparing Agag.

King Agag was taken priſoner, and, merely from his being of an agreeable perſon, Saul determined to preſerve him from the common ruin: and this act of diſobedience was the foundation of the calamities afterwards experienced by the Hebrews. A conduct ſimilar to that of the king was adopted by the people, who converted the cattle and other valuable effects to their own uſe, and deſtroyed only what was not worth preſervation. Saul ravaged and laid waſte the whole country, extending from Peluſium, on the confines of Egypt, to the Red Sea.

After theſe great atchievements, Saul returned home, apparently reconciled to the idea that, in the important work of reducing the Amalekites, he had inviolably obſerved the directions communicated by the prophet Samuel. But the Lord was incenſed againſt Saul, for having diſregarded his commiſſion in ſparing the life of Agag, and ſuffering the people to make advantage of the plunder; and he was pleaſed to inform Samuel, that as Saul had proved himſelf inclined to purſue the dictates of his own inclination, rather than fulfil the orders intruſted to him, he repented having advanced him to the ſovereignty. The prophet was ſo greatly diſtreſſed by this revelation, that he employed the following night in fervent ſupplications in favour of Saul. In anſwer to theſe interceſſions, the Lord was pleaſed to ſay, "that to excuſe offences of ſuch magnitude as thoſe committed by Saul, would be an ill-placed mercy, and an encouragement for the perpetration of additional crimes."

Finding his prayers for obtaining the pardon of Saul to be ineffectual, he, the next morning, repaired to Gilgal. Upon his arrival, the king embraced him, and after a congratulatory thankſgiving for the late ſucceſſes, he obſerved, that he had, in every inſtance, acted in conformity to his commiſſion. Upon this, Samuel inquired reſpecting the bleating of ſheep which he heard in the camp. The king replied, that the ſound proceeded from ſome beaſts which the people had reſerved for ſacrifice; and ſaid, he had ſo effectually deſtroyed the Amalekites*, that only one man remained alive, and that he kept him priſoner, that he might be inſtructed in what manner to diſpoſe of him. Samuel ſaid, it was not ſacrifices, but the righteouſneſs of mankind that proved acceptable to the Almighty; who accounted the only true ſacrifice an obſervance of his ſacred will, without which the fat of beaſts, and offerings of gold and ſilver, he conſidered as oſtentations of pretended piety: but that from thoſe who inviolably obſerved the divine commandments, the moſt trifling offerings were received by the ſupreme Being with infinitely greater ſatisfaction than all the pomp of ceremony unaccompanied by a pious integrity of heart.

‡ The kingdom of Zoba was a part of Syria, bounded by the river Euphrates on the eaſt, and by Damaſcus and the land of Canaan on the weſt. We are told in ſcripture, that it was under the government of ſeveral kings, 1 Sam. xiv. 27.

Samuel denounces God's diſpleaſure againſt Saul for diſobedience.

"I am now to reveal to you, ſaid Samuel, that you have incurred the diſpleaſure of the Almighty, by the contempt which you have ſhewn towards his commandments. As a puniſhment for your diſobedience to the declared pleaſure and expreſs command of God, you are doomed to be deprived of the ſovereignty, and of the authority which you have groſsly abuſed, in violation of the reverence due to the ſupreme Being, by whom you were exalted to the regal ſtate." Saul admitted that he had been guilty of an heinous tranſgreſſion, in exceeding the commiſſion delivered to him by the prophet; and in extenuation of his crime, he uſed no other argument, than that the ſoldiers were ſo reſolutely determined to plunder the enemy, that he dreaded the conſequence of an attempt to reſtrain their violence: and he intreated Samuel to obtain a pardon from the Lord, promiſing, that the offence of which he had been guilty ſhould be a warning for the better regulation of his future conduct. Having made this declaration of his ſincere repentance, he endeavoured to prevail upon Samuel to continue with him ſome longer time, in order to avert the vengeance of heaven; but, being ſenſible that his mediation would prove ineffectual, the prophet expreſſed his unwillingneſs to comply with that requeſt.

CHAP. VIII.

SAUL is rejected, and DAVID proclaimed King of ISRAEL.

WHEN Samuel was about to leave Saul, the latter, in order to delay his departure, caught hold of the garment of the prophet, who endeavoured to diſengage himſelf, and in the conteſt the mantle was rent; which accident Samuel applied by an alluſion, telling Saul, that the government of the kingdom would be torn from him, and a man of piety, juſtice and probity, appointed as the ſucceſſor to his throne. "This ſentence, (ſaid he,) is paſſed, and the threatening of God concerning you is irrevocable." Having confeſſed that the diſpleaſure of the Almighty was due to his iniquities, Saul intreated the prophet to return with him, that he might humble himſelf before his offended Creator: Samuel complied, and they joined in the worſhip of the Lord. The devotions being concluded, Agag, the king of the Amalekites, was brought forth. He had been heard to make uſe of ſome expreſſions concerning the terrors of death, and theſe were retorted upon him by the prophet, who ſaid to him: "Many an Hebrew mother hath been overwhelmed with affliction by thy deſtructive ſword; it is, therefore, juſt that thy mother be numbered among thoſe who are childleſs." Having given orders for putting Agag immediately to death, the prophet returned to Ramah. This was the laſt interview between Saul and Samuel.

God commands Samuel to anoint David king.

Saul repaired to his palace at Gibea, in the full perſuaſion that his contempt of the divine commands had produced his ſad reverſe of fortune. Samuel was greatly diſtreſſed on account of the ſeparation: but the Lord commanded him to ſuppreſs his uneaſineſs, and, providing himſelf with a cruſe of holy oil, to repair to Bethlehem, and there anoint one of the ſons of Jeſſe, the ſon of Obed, king of Iſrael; ſaying, that the party adjudged worthy to ſupport the regal dignity, ſhould be diſtinguiſhed to him from his brethren. On the arrival of the prophet, the people of Bethlehem anxiouſly inquired as to the cauſe of his journey: he gave them a general anſwer, ſaying, that his buſineſs was to perform ſacrifice.

The holy ceremony being concluded, the prophet invited Jeſſe and his ſons to dine with him. He was ſtruck with admiration by the graceful form and deportment of the elder ſon; and concluded that he was the perſon deſtined to fill the throne. But upon aſking whether he was the man to be anointed, he was anſwered in the negative; and told, that the Almighty judged not from external excellencies: but that the qualifications moſt acceptable to him, were piety, juſtice, fortitude, and the other virtues which harmoniſe and compoſe the beauty of the human ſoul. Upon this, Samuel requeſted the attendance of the other ſons, and five more appeared, who, in point of perſonal advantages, he found in no reſpect inferior to their elder brother.

* The exciſion of the Amalekites had been determined by God about four hundred years before this tranſaction. Balaam in his viſion confirms this doom. The order to cut them intirely off was renewed by God ſeveral years afterwards; and agreeable to this order, Saul ſet out on this expedition. It may be obſerved alſo, that they continued inveterate enemies to the Hebrews, and joined with their adverſaries, whenever they could, to enſlave and deſtroy them; particularly with the Midianites, Judg. vi. 2, 3, 33. Nay, this very order to Saul, utterly to deſtroy them, ſeems to have been given becauſe they had, together with Moab, Edom, the kings of Zobah, and the Philiſtines, invaded and ſpoiled them; chap. xiv. 48. The Iſraelites, therefore, had a right to revenge themſelves on them, as they were aggreſſors by the law of nature and nations, and utterly to extirpate them too, if that was neceſſary for their own preſervation; and were obliged to do it, if God commanded them. God did command it. And will any man diſpute the right of God to deſtroy an incorrigible nation by peſtilence, earthquake, ſtorm, or famine? As no ſenſible perſon can deny this, how then can he deny the right of God to deſtroy them by the ſword? If this right in God be allowed, then his giving it in command to Saul, by Samuel, was not unworthy of him, and Saul ought to have done it in the full extent of his commiſſion.

The names of theſe ſix ſons of Jeſſe were Eliab, Abinadab, Samma, Nathanael, Rael, and Aſa. Samuel, having conſulted the Almighty on which of theſe brethren he had determined to confer the ſovereignty, received for anſwer, that neither of them was the man on whom he had fixed his choice. The prophet then inquired of Jeſſe, what other ſons he had; who replied, that he had only one more, who was employed in tending his flocks, and was named David. Samuel deſired that he might be ſent for; ſaying, it was but right that he ſhould be admitted to partake of the repaſt. The phyſiognomy of this youth prepoſſeſſed every beholder in his favour; he being of a florid complexion, with ſomething of a martial air, and a countenance highly expreſſive of modeſty and benevolence. Immediately upon his entrance, Samuel whiſpered Jeſſe that this was the youth whom God had deſtined to reign over his people. The prophet ſeated him next himſelf; the father and the reſt of his children taking their places below him. Samuel then anointed* David, and told him in a whiſper, it was the pleaſure of the Almighty that he ſhould aſſume the government of the kingdom; enjoining him to a ſtrict adminiſtration of juſtice, and a due reverence to the commands of God; and aſſuring him, that, by ſuch a conduct, he would eſtabliſh himſelf in the government, ſubdue the Philiſtines, and all his other enemies, and perpetuate his fame to the lateſt poſterity.

CHAP. IX.

GOLIATH, the Champion of the PHILISTINES, defies the ISRAELITES, [illegible] ſlain by DAVID.

The Philiſtines renew the war.

SOME ſhort time afterwards, the Philiſtines entered the country of the Hebrews, and encamped with a vaſt army between the cities of Shecoth and Azekah. Saul obliged them to quit this ſituation; and they eſtabliſhed their quarters on a mountain, oppoſite to that which was occupied by the Iſraelites. In the army of the Philiſtines was a man of prodigious ſtature and ſtrength, named Goliath, a native of Gath. He meaſured in height ſix cubits and a ſpan, and the armour which he wore was proportioned to his vaſt bulk and force: his coat of mail weighing five thouſand ſhekels, and the head of his ſpear, which was of iron, ſix hundred ſhekels: this ſpear he bore upon his ſhoulder, it being too ponderous to be carried in the hand, as lances generally are.

Thus equipped, this prodigy of nature deſcended into the valley between the above-mentioned mountains, accompanied by a numerous body of armed Philiſtines, and, with a voice in the higheſt degree expreſſive of his extraordinary ſize and ſtrength, he uttered the following defiance in the ears of the Hebrews: "Prompted by a deſire of preventing the effuſion of human blood, I come hither, ye men of Iſrael, to propoſe to you a deciſion of the conteſt between the two nations, by ſingle combat. I here offer myſelf as a champion on the part of the Philiſtines; and if you will ſend ſome perſon with a like commiſſion from your nation, the prevailing differences may eaſily be ſettled, without proceeding to a general battle. If he chance to vanquiſh me, then will we be your ſervants; but if I prove victorious, ye ſhall be ſubjected to us: for it is better that one man only ſhould be expoſed to deſtruction, than a whole army." At the concluſion of his ſpeech, he returned to the camp; and this defiance he regularly repeated during the courſe of forty days; the Hebrews being highly chagrined to remain thus long inactive, in ſight of the enemy.

Among the troops of Saul, were three of the ſons of Jeſſe; but David had been ſent back to his father, at the commencement of the war, to his former employ of tending the ſheep. Having been diſpatched to the camp, by Jeſſe, on a certain day, to carry proviſions to his brethren, and to inquire after their welfare, he chanced to hear Goliath reproaching and execrating the Iſraelites, with more than uſual virulence, for their cowardice in declining his repeated challenges. David, who was engaged at the time in converſation with his brethren, could not contain his emotion on the occaſion, and reſolutely declared his willingneſs to encounter this haughty boaſter; but Eliab, the eldeſt ſon of his brethren, ſharply reprehended him for his raſhneſs; bidding him, in deriſion, return to the care of his flocks, as being far the more ſuitable employment for one ſo young and inexperienced.

David deſires to fight the giant.

From reſpect for his brother, David was ſilent for the preſent; but, when he was about to quit the camp, having again mentioned, in the hearing of ſeveral of the ſoldiers, his deſire to engage the giant, they immediately carried the intelligence to Saul, who ordered him to be brought before him, and queſtioned whether he had made any declaration of the kind related by the ſoldiers. David replied in the affirmative; and aſſured the king, that, with his permiſſion, he would quickly render this arrogant Philiſtine as contempti-

* He ſingled him out from the reſt, and privately anointed him: for it is plain, from what is ſaid before, that Samuel was afraid to have it known, and therefore did not anoint him publicly in the midſt of his brethren. And by Eliab's treatment of David, after this, 1 Sam. xvii. 28. it is evident, that he did not know him to be anointed king over Iſrael. David himſelf might be as ignorant of the preciſe intention of Samuel in this ceremony as his brethren, becauſe it was cuſtomary to anoint a perſon for the Prophetic office as well as the Regal. Samuel's not revealing this ſecret to David, ſhewed his prudence; becauſe, if it had got wind before the proper criſis, it would have endangered both their lives.

DAVID anointed KING of ISRAEL.

ble as he at preſent appeared to be formidable; adding, that the glory redounding to the nation from ſuch a conqueſt would be the greater, as being obtained by a raw and inexperienced youth. Saul was ſtruck with amazement at the courage of David, but he dared not intruſt the deciſion of ſo important a cauſe to one whom he deemed, from his want of years and judgment, to be ſo inadequate to the taſk.

David, clearly perceiving in the countenance of the king what paſſed in his mind, endeavoured to diſpel his doubts by the following words: "It is not, Sire, ſo much the Hebrew army, as the omnipotence of heaven itſelf which this wretch dares thus impiouſly to defy; nor ſhould the combat be conſidered as a conteſt between Goliath and David, but between Goliath and the Lord of Hoſts, who ſometimes deigns to effect the moſt glorious purpoſes by the agency of the weakeſt and meaneſt inſtruments. I confide in that almighty power, for the like aid and protection which he has been graciouſly pleaſed to afford me on former occaſions. It chanced on a time, as I was tending the flocks of my father, that a lion entered the fold, and carried off a lamb: I purſued the furious beaſt, and, ſeizing him by the tail, daſhed him againſt the ground with ſo much force, that he inſtantly yielded up his life at my feet. In the like manner I, ſome time afterwards, encountered a bear with ſimilar ſucceſs. I do not conſider this Philiſtine as a more formidable foe than a lion or a bear; but, on the contrary, am firmly perſuaded, that God will make me the humble inſtrument of that puniſhment which he will inflict on this audacious and blaſpheming wretch."

Saul conſents, and arms him for the combat.

Saul was now convinced, from the manner in which theſe words were uttered, that the youth was actuated by a divine impulſe, and therefore no longer heſitated to grant the requeſted permiſſion. To prepare him for the combat, he equipped him in his own ſuit of armour; but David found, that theſe arms were likely to prove rather an incumbrance than a defence to him, and therefore deſired leave to lay them aſide; modeſtly obſerving, that they were better adapted to the uſe of the ſkilful warrior, than of the inexperienced ſhepherd. Having reſumed his own habit, he took his ſhepherd's ſtaff and his ſling *; and putting five ſmooth ſtones, which he had collected from the brook, into his wallet, he advanced towards his antagoniſt, who ran, as well as he was able under ſo cumbrous a load of armour, to meet him. When Goliath perceived the diminutive ſtature of his adverſary, and the uncommon weapons with which he had provided himſelf for the encounter, he aſked him, with ineffable contempt, whether he imagined that he was come thither to beat a dog, or to engage in combat with one ſkilled in the uſe of arms. David replied, that he conſidered him as far worſe than a dog. Theſe words inflamed the Philiſtine with ſuch violence of rage, that he vented the moſt bitter execrations againſt David, and declared that he would give his dead carcaſe for food to the fowls of the air, and the beaſts of the field. "You," ſaid David, "come to the field clad in a coat of mail, and armed with a ſword and ſpear; but my armour is the commiſſion which I have received from the living God, who will this day, by my agency, deliver both yourſelf and your army into the hands of the Hebrews; and I ſhall, ere night, ſeparate your head from your body, and throw your carcaſe upon the dunghill, to be devoured by dogs, of whoſe nature you ſo nearly partake. And this event ſhall convince mankind, that the God of the Iſraelites makes the ſafety of his people his peculiar care; and that neither arms nor numbers can afford any protection to thoſe who incur his reſentment." Goliath was ſo much prepoſſeſſed with a contempt of the youth, and the inexperience of his antagoniſt, that theſe words made not the leaſt impreſſion on him, and he eagerly preſſed forward to the combat.

* Though we ſhould not urge David's confidence in the divine aſſiſtance to clear him from the imputation of raſhneſs in this glorious undertaking, yet his conduct may be vindicated. So far is there from any appearance of raſhneſs, that David ſeems rather to have had the advantage. The Philiſtine was armed with heavy armour, a ſword, a ſpear, and a ſhield; and therefore David, though a ſtripling, was quite ſafe whilſt he kept the ſtalking monſter from coming near him; and had this peculiar advantage over him, that he could ſtrike him at a diſtance, and if he had miſſed him once, had more chances of hitting him, and at laſt could have run away; whereas the ſword, the ſpear, and the ſhield of his enemy, were wholly inſignificant, as theſe could only be employed againſt him in a cloſe encounter. David was dexterous at his ſling, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, and could ſcarce fail of his blow whilſt he had ſo huge an object to aim at. The ſling was an offenſive weapon uſed in war, and it was reckoned an exceeding uſeful qualification for a ſoldier to be exerciſed in it. They were brought up to, and frequently exerciſed in it, and attained to an amazing dexterity in the uſe of it; inſomuch that we read, that they "could ſling ſtones at an hair's breadth, and not miſs."

CHAP. X.

The Death of GOLIATH. The PHILISTINES are purſued and defeated by the HEBREWS. SAUL conceives a mortal Envy and Hatred againſt DAVID.

David kills Goliath with a ſtone and a ſling.

THE eagerneſs which David manifeſted to proceed to action was not at all inferior to that of his adverſary, being incited by his all-powerful and inviſible Protector; and, when the combatants had advanced within a certain diſtance of each other, David took one of the ſtones from his wallet, and, placing it in his ſling, hurled it with ſuch force at the giant, that it fractured his ſkull, and killed him. David inſtantly ran towards the ſpot, and, unſheathing his enemy's ſword, ſtruck off his head therewith.

The Philiſtines are overcome with great ſlaughter

The army of the Philiſtines was thrown into ſo great a conſternation by this defeat of their champion, that they inſtantly fled in the utmoſt confuſion; and were purſued

ſued by the Hebrews as far as the frontiers of Gath, and to the very gates of Aſcalon. On this occaſion full thirty thouſand of the Philiſtines were ſlain, and the wounded amounted to nearly double that number. The Hebrews, upon their return from the purſuit, plundered the enemy's camp, and afterwards ſet it on fire. The head of Goliath was preſerved by David as a trophy, and he offered the ſword as an oblation to the Lord.

When Saul was upon his return with the army, he was met upon the road by the women and maidens of the ſeveral cities through which he paſſed, who came out in troops, to gratulate him on his ſucceſſes, with muſic and ſongs of triumph; the women leading the chorus with the words, "Saul has ſlain his thouſands!" and the virgins replying, "And David his ten thouſands!" From this circumſtance, Saul conceived the ridiculous notion, that he ſhould be no longer ſafe on his throne, while David continued about his perſon; and he, therefore, removed him from the poſt he held in his guards, and advanced him to the command of a thouſand men, in hopes that he might fall in ſome of the enterpriſes in which, from the nature of his new dignity, he would be frequently engaged.

David, on the other hand, was ſo highly favoured by the Almighty, that he eſcaped all the ſnares ſpread for his deſtruction; and not only acquired the univerſal eſteem of the people for his valour and conduct, but alſo made a ſtrong impreſſion on the heart of Michal, the king's youngeſt daughter. Saul ſoon perceived the growing paſſion of the maiden, and would ſometimes inſinuate, in the courſe of converſation, that he ſhould not be altogether averſe to the match, on certain conditions: meaning by this conduct, to lure David into a ſnare which might lead to his deſtruction, to which point all his machinations tended.

Saul, at this time, made declaration to ſome of his courtiers, that he was willing to give his daughter in marriage to David, on condition that he ſhould bring him the heads of ſix hundred Philiſtines. This propoſition he ſuppoſed would naturally engage David, who he knew was ever ready to attend the calls of glory, in ſome dangerous enterpriſe againſt the Philiſtines; preferring that he ſhould be taken off by their hands, rather than by his own immediate command. He alſo employed ſome of his emiſſaries to ſound David on the ſubject of the match in queſtion; who repreſented to him, that the favour which he had acquired both with the prince and the people was ſuch, that a report was current, that Saul intended to confer his daughter on him in marriage; but David rejected their intelligence, as improbable.

Saul lays a ſnare for David.

They were a ſecond time diſpatched by Saul, on the ſame buſineſs, with inſtructions to acquaint David, in his name, that the want of riches he ſhould conſider as no objection in the perſon whom he ſhould conſent to accept as a ſon-in-law; being determined to beſtow, and not to ſell his daughter, whenever he ſhould part with her; and that he required nothing further from him, than to bring him the heads of ſix hundred of the Philiſtines*; which would be the moſt acceptable preſent he could offer, both to himſelf and his daughter; and would, moreover, by the bravery of the action, fully juſtify her in her choice to the world. David, totally unaware of the ſiniſter deſign of Saul in this propoſal, gave himſelf no concern with reſpect to the difficulty and danger of the enterpriſe, but inſtantly concerted the proper meaſures with his companions for carrying it into execution. He accordingly gave battle to the enemy, routed them with great ſlaughter, and delivered to the king the number of ſlain required.

CHAP. XI.

Evil Practices of SAUL againſt the Life of DAVID, whom JONATHAN warns of his Danger.

ALTHOUGH Saul, to avoid the reproach of a breach of faith, had now given his daughter to David in marriage, yet this cloſe alliance did not in the leaſt alter his diſpoſition towards him. For, remarking that David increaſed daily in the favour and eſteem of God and man, he became violently apprehenſive, that both his crown and life were in danger, from the attempts of the youth; and, to ſecure both, reſolved to put him to death in the moſt ſecret manner poſſible; to the performance of which office he deſtined his own ſon Jonathan, and a certain number of his moſt faithful domeſtics. Jonathan was greatly amazed to ſee the late affection which his father bore to David, thus ſuddenly converted into the extremity of hatred; and, ſtruck with horror at the baſe and treacherous deſign meditated by Saul, inſtantly communicated to David the whole matter; and adviſed him to fly with all ſpeed, as the only means of preſerving his life. Jonathan further promiſed to learn from his father the cauſe of this extraordinary enmity towards the youth, and to endeavour to influence him in his favour; obſerving, that he knew of no fault committed by David, which could juſtify the king's indignation; and that, ſhould he accidentally have fallen into any trifling errors, the ſervices which he had rendered both to his ſovereign and to

* The only juſt reaſons that could vindicate Saul in commanding, and David in executing his command, to cut off ſuch a number of Philiſtines, were either God's order, or their being at war with the Philiſtines, or the neceſſity of it to weaken their enemies, the ſafety of their country, the ſecurity of their liberty, and ſuch like motives: and if theſe motives concurred to juſtify David in accepting the condition of becoming Saul's ſon-in-law, by bringing the ſtipulated number, his bringing more was yet a higher ſervice to the public; and ſo far from being any breach of the rules of religion and morality, as that it was a proof of real patriotiſm and public ſpirit, highly merited the thanks of his king and country, and rendered him worthy of the honor intended him. In 1 Sam. xviii. 25. Saul's demand is an hundred fore-ſkins (not heads) of the Philiſtines.

And Saul cast the javelin; for he said, I will smite David even to the Wall with it, and David avoided out of his presence twice.

his country, made ample compenſation for them all. He then aſſured David, that he would, from time to time, give him intelligence of his father's proceedings; after which they ſeparated, and David, in conformity to the advice of Jonathan, retired to a place of ſafety, to avoid the reſentment of the king.

On the following day, Jonathan, obſerving that his father was in a placid diſpoſition of mind, took the opportunity to ſpeak to him in favour of David. "It appears to me," ſaid he, "very extraordinary, that you ſhould have conceived ſo violent a hatred againſt this young man, without the leaſt apparent cauſe. Our whole nation is highly indebted to him, not only for the deſtruction of the Philiſtines, but for his victory over the giant, whoſe repeated challenges, for the term of forty ſucceſſive days, ſo deeply affected our national honour; and which no one had courage ſufficient to vindicate, ſave the youth in queſtion. He is doubly entitled to your eſteem, both as a man of great perſonal courage, and alſo as being your ſon-in-law; an honour which he purchaſed on your own terms, by preſenting you with the heads of ſix hundred Philiſtines. Reflect, I pray thee, on the grief which our whole family muſt feel for the loſs of this worthy youth; particularly your own daughter, who, by his death, will be reduced to the pitiable condition of widowhood before ſhe has experienced the happineſs of the maternal ſtate. Be pleaſed to recollect alſo, the relief which you have received from him in thoſe hours when poſſeſſed with that malignant ſpirit which has ſo often of late deprived you of your repoſe; and to entertain ſentiments more worthy of yourſelf, and of the man to whom our family is ſo highly obligated." Theſe arguments made ſo ſtrong an impreſſion on the mind of Saul, that he declared, with a ſolemn oath, that he would never, in the ſlighteſt degree, be guilty of any violence towards David, for the time to come. This welcome intelligence Jonathan immediately communicated to David, who returned with him, thereupon, to court, and reſumed his attendance on the perſon of the king *.

CHAP. XII.

The PHILISTINES are again vanquiſhed by DAVID. He is preſerved by MICHAL from the Deſigns of SAUL, who had again determined to put him to Death. JONATHAN and DAVID contract a ſolemn League of Friendſhip. DAVID reſorts to NOB, and alſo to GATH; at the former of which Places, he is kindly received by ABIMELECH. This Circumſtance being communicated to SAUL, he, in conſequence, puts to Death not only ABIMELECH, but alſo the whole Sacerdotal Race, ſave ABIATHAR, who eſcapes by Flight. The miraculous Deliverances of DAVID; and Death of SAMUEL. DAVID takes to Wife ABIGAIL, the Widow of NABAL. He is received by ACHISH, who puts him in Poſſeſſion of ZICKLAG, and retains him in his Service.

The Philiſtines again defeated by David.

NEARLY about this period, the Philiſtines again commenced hoſtilities againſt the Hebrews, and were defeated in a pitched battle by David, to whom Saul had entruſted the command of the army. Upon the arrival of David at court, with the intelligence of this glorious victory, he was received by the king with a ſullen and gloomy air, and in a manner little conſonant either to his expectation or his deſerts: for Saul was conſtantly apprehenſive of the increaſing reputation of David with the people.

The envy and jealouſy of Saul ſtill continues.

On a certain day, Saul, being ſeized with a return of his old diſorder, ſent for David, to ſing and play on the harp, as uſual; and, whilſt the latter was employed in the above manner, Saul, ſuddenly ſtarting from his couch, with the utmoſt effort of his ſtrength, threw at him a javelin which he held in his hand, and which muſt have put a period to his life, had not David providentially avoided the blow, by ſlipping on one ſide. He immediately retired, in all haſte, to his own houſe, where he remained for the reſt of the day. When night arrived, a guard of ſoldiers were ſent to the houſe, with orders from the king to prevent his eſcape, and to ſeize his perſon in the morning, in order to his being put to death with all the formalities of a public execution. But Michal, who had received intimation of her father's deſign, gave David inſtant warning of his danger; adviſing him to fly before day-light; and, after mutual endearments and lamentations, ſhe let him down from a window at the back part of the houſe; and thus he eſcaped the imminent peril to which he was expoſed.

Michal favours David's eſcape.

When the ſoldiers whom her father had ſent entered the houſe, and inquired for her huſband, Michal anſwered, that he had been very ill during the night, and was juſt then fallen aſleep; and to confirm her aſſertion, ſhewed them the bed, under the coverlet of which ſhe had purpoſely placed the liver of a kid newly killed, which, by its palpitation they ſuppoſed to be the body of the ſick perſon. They, therefore, returned to Saul with an account of theſe particulars; but were inſtantly ſent back again, with orders to bring David away with them, in whatever condition they might find him; Saul being determined, at all events, to put him to death. Having repaired a ſecond time to the houſe of David, they diſcovered the deception which had been put upon them; and, acquainting the king therewith, he severely chid his daughter for thus leaguing against her father with his greatest enemy. But Michal excused herself, on the plea that her husband had compelled her to conceal him, and to assist him in his escape, by threats of instant death, if she refused; and by this pretence she pacified her father's wrath. In the mean time, David fled to Ramah, where Samuel then resided, and acquainted the prophet with all the particulars of Saul's conduct towards him; assuring him, at the same time, that he had been guilty of no fault which could afford the slightest pretext for the king's present inveteracy against him.

* The reader will obſerve, that Jonathan ever conſiders David as an innocent perſon, and pleads for him to his father, not as a rebel or notorious offender, to obtain his pardon, but as having never done any thing to forfeit Saul's favour, or his own life; and therefore Jonathan muſt be commended in diſobeying his father's order to David's hurt, and doing all he could to prevent his purpoſe to kill him.

David resorts to Samuel;

Samuel, hereupon, in order to shelter David from the great danger with which he was now threatened, repaired with him to Galbaah, where they remained together for some time. But no sooner was Saul made acquainted with the place of their retreat, than he dispatched thither a number of armed men, with orders to seize the person of David, and to bring him away in chains. When the messengers arrived at Galbaah, they found Samuel in company with several other prophets; and, the Spirit of God falling upon them at the instant, they also began to prophesy with the rest; and the like happened to those also whom Saul sent afterwards on the same business. Saul, at length, went thither himself; but, as soon as he came within sight of Samuel, he found himself possessed with the same spirit; and, upon a nearer approach, he threw off his garments, and prophesied naked before Samuel and David, for the space of a whole day and a night *.

and complains to Jonathan of Saul's treatment.

David, conscious of the irreproachableness of his conduct, bitterly complained to Jonathan of the injustice of the king in seeking his life. Jonathan assured him, that he had been misled by the reports which he had heard on that subject; as the king his father never formed any resolution of importance without acquainting him therewith, previously to the carrying it into execution. But David persisted, with an oath, that his fears were too well founded; adding that, as Saul was acquainted with the strict friendship which subsisted between them, it was not probable that he should communicate to his son any design of a like tendency to that in question. Jonathan was at length convinced; and desired his friend to consider in what manner he might render him the most effectual service.

A private token between David and Jonathan.

Jonathan directed David to a certain spot without the city, there to remain concealed till his return; promising that, when he should have discovered the disposition of his father towards him, he would come to the place with his bow and arrows, attended by one page only; that he would let fly three arrows, and, if the intelligence he brought him was favourable, he would order the page to fetch them again to him; but, if he gave him no such order, David was from thence to conclude, that his person was in danger from the king's resentment.

At the festival of the following day, Saul, having first purified himself in the customary forms, took his seat at the table, with Jonathan on his right hand, and Abner, the general of his army, on his left; the seat which, in virtue of his office, belonged to David remaining vacant. Saul observing this circumstance, imagined that David had not regularly purified himself, and therefore passed it over in silence; but, remarking that he still did not attend on the second day of the festival, Saul, with a considerable degree of asperity, questioned Jonathan why David had thus absented himself, for two successive days, on so solemn an occasion. Jonathan replied, that he had granted him permission to repair to Bethlehem, to solemnize the festival with his own tribe; adding that, from the sincere affection which he bore to the young man, he should be glad to have his majesty's leave to repair thither to him.

Saul resents Jonathan's good-will to David.

These last words so highly irritated Saul, that he could no longer conceal his hatred to David; and, loading his son with the injurious epithets of traitor, and confederate with the enemy of his family, he ordered him forthwith to send some persons to Bethlehem, to bring David from thence, that he might be punished according to his demerits; observing, that it must be apparent to every one who did not wilfully shut his eyes against the truth, that his personal safety could be no otherwise secured than by the death of David. Jonathan, in the most respectful manner, desired his father to inform him by what heinous offence David had thus drawn upon himself his resentment: but the question had nearly cost him his life; for Saul, seizing a javelin which stood near, would infallibly have killed him therewith on the spot, but for the interference of some of the attendants, who wrested it out of his hand.

This action clearly evinced to Jonathan the violence of that hatred which his father had conceived against David, and he immediately retired from the company, deeply affected with the reflection on the danger which threatened both his friend and himself. Having spent the night in sleepless anxiety, he rose at an early hour in the morning, and, taking with him his bow and arrows, he repaired, with one page only, to the spot where David was concealed.

* The change in the messengers of Saul was great; but that which was wrought in Saul himself was astonishing. He came to wreak his vengeance: but instead of a murderer, he becomes a prophet; puts himself naked intirely into the hands of Samuel, the prophets, and David, who might have made what advantages they pleased of an adventure so fortunate, even to have cut off Saul, and raised David to the throne. But they abhorred the thought; and as the spirit of the Lord kept Saul in that condition till David was safe, so Saul was safe during the time that he was naked (i. e. destitute of his royal military robe.) A noble evidence this of the innocence and loyalty of Samuel, the prophets, and David; whilst at the same time it affords a pleasing instance, to a generous compassionate mind, of the care of Providence over persecuted virtue, and of the impotence of human malice towards those whom God is determined to preserve.

He

He first discharged his arrows, and in token that the intelligence he brought was unfavourable, instead of sending the page to pick them up, he re-dispatched him into the city, on a feigned errand, that he might be at liberty to converse with his friend with the greater privacy.

The two friends part, to meet no more.

Immediately upon the departure of the lad, David came forth from his hiding-place, and prostrated himself at the feet of his benefactor, who raised him up in the most affectionate manner; and they joined in deploring the malignity of their fate, which thus compelled them to a separation, to which death itself was, in the opinion of each, far preferable. After some time spent in these mutual condolements, and in renewing, with the most solemn protestations, the league of friendship they had formerly contracted, they took a final leave of each other *, and Jonathan returned to the city.

David repairs to Abimelech, the priest, at Nob, who gives him money and arms.

In order to avoid the unceasing persecution of Saul, David fled to Nob, the residence of Abimelech the high-priest. As he came without a single attendant, Abimelech could not conceal his surprize at the circumstance; but David informed him that, being charged by the king with the execution of a commission of a most secret and important nature, he had, for the greater privacy, dismissed his suit for the present, and had appointed them a certain place where they should meet him. Under this pretext he obtained from Abimelech a supply of money, and also the sword of Goliath, which had been hung up in the temple, and dedicated to God; and, being thus provided, he retired to Gath in the land of the Philistines, where Achish, the king of the country, then kept his court. It chanced, that the whole of the foregoing conversation between David and Abimelech was overheard by a Syrian, named Doeg, who was employed by Saul in the capacity of a groom.

David arrives at Gath.

Immediately upon the arrival of David at Gath, he was recognized by several of the king's servants, who seized him, and conducted him before their master, with loud complaints of the many signal injuries which their nation had sustained from this man. David, now perceiving himself involved in a worse dilemma than before, suddenly assumed the behaviour of an idiot; drivelling at the mouth, and using other actions of a like kind; which expedient succeeded so well, that Achish, in a violent passion, bid his servants remove him from his presence, and drive him out of the city: and thus David escaped the imminent danger to which he had been exposed.

He retires to a district of Judah.

From Gath he retired into the district of the tribe of Judah, where he remained concealed for some time, in a cave situated in the field of Adullam. Hither numbers of his friends, relations, and other persons repaired to him, some being influenced thereto by an affection for himself, others by their hatred and fear of Saul, and others again by the hopes of retrieving their ruined fortunes; and with these, amounting in the whole to about four hundred persons, he put himself under the protection of the king of Moab, who entertained him and his followers with the greatest hospitality, during the whole time that they remained in his dominions, from whence, by the advice of the prophet Samuel, they removed to Hareth in the land of Judah.

Saul quickly received the alarming intelligence, that David had been seen at the head of an armed force; and, being well acquainted with the courage and enterprising genius of the man, he was greatly apprehensive that he might enter upon some attempt, which might, at least, perplex the peace of his kingdom, and might probably endanger even the security of his crown and government.

Saul chides Abimelech,

Saul ordered Abimelech and the rest of the priests to be brought before him, and upon their arrival addressed the high-priest in these words: "What offence had I given you, that you should thus favourably receive the avowed enemy of my person and government; furnishing him with money and arms, and encouraging him in his perfidious designs, by communicating to him the responses of the oracle relative thereto? You cannot be unacquainted, that he is at the present time a fugitive, merely from the apprehension of receiving the punishment to which his inveterate malice against my person and family has justly rendered him obnoxious."

who clears himself.

Abimelech did not attempt to disprove the charge, but alledged, in vindication of his conduct, that he had considered David, not as the enemy, but, on the contrary, as the friend and faithful servant, as well as the son-in-law of the king. He added, that it was in consideration of these qualities that he had afforded him the assistance he had requested, on the plea that he had been sent by the king to execute a commission, which required the utmost secrecy and dispatch; that, with respect to the circumstance of his consulting the oracle at the desire of David, it was nothing more than what he had repeatedly done on former occasions: and, finally, that, whatever designs it might appear David had formed against the person or government of the king, he beseeched his majesty to do him the justice to believe that, either directly or indirectly, he had not the least share or concern therein.

This justification, though highly plausible, Saul, being prepossessed by his fears, totally disregarded, and instantly commanded his guards to seize Abimelech and the rest of the priests, and to put them

* This adieu is the most pathetic and tender that ever was described. There was reason for David to exceed in sorrow (which in 1 Sam. xxi. 41. we are told, was the case), as he was now to become an exile from his friends, from his wife, from his parents, from his kindred, from the people of God, and from all sacred solemnities.

to

to death on the ſpot*. But, it being prohibited by the law of Moſes to ſpill the blood of any perſon inveſted with the ſacerdotal function, the Hebrews unanimouſly and ſteadily refuſed to comply with the king's order; and the execution of this barbarous commiſſion was, in conſequence, committed to Doeg, the Syrian, and a band of ruffians whom he ſelected for that purpoſe: the number of thoſe who were thus inhumanly maſſacred, amounted to three hundred and eighty-five perſons.

Abimelech and the prieſts maſſacred by Saul's order.

The vengeance of Saul not being yet ſufficiently glutted, he diſpatched his agents to Nob, the reſidence of the prieſthood, with orders to put the inhabitants to the ſword, without diſtinction either of ſex or age: this ſavage commiſſion was executed in its fulleſt extent; no one eſcaping the general deſtruction, ſave Abiathar, the ſon of Abimelech, who was preſerved by a miraculous interpoſition of the divine providence. Thus was verified the revelation which God had diſcloſed to Eli the high-prieſt, intimating, that the guilt of his two ſons would, in the courſe of time, be puniſhed with the utter extirpation of his family.

Abiathar eſcaping, repairs to David.

Abiathar, the ſon of Abimelech, who was the only perſon, that eſcaped the general maſſacre, repaired to David, with the afflicting intelligence of all that had paſſed. David condoled with him on the occaſion; expreſſed great ſorrow to have been in any reſpect the cauſe of ſo dreadful a calamity, of which he had from the firſt been apprehenſive, from the circumſtance of Doeg's being preſent at the interview between him and Abimelech; and concluded with recommending it to Abiathar to continue with him, as the beſt means of ſheltering himſelf from the purſuits of Saul.

David ſuccours Keilah.

Nearly at this period David received intelligence, that the Philiſtines had invaded the provin[illegible] of Keilah with a numerous army, ſpreading un[illegible]al devaſtation wherever they came; he therefore reſolved to oppoſe them, but previouſly conſulted the oracle; and, having received a favourable anſwer, advanced with his ſmall force againſt the enemy, routed them with a conſiderable ſlaughter, and acquired a valuable booty. After this victory, he continued ſome time at Keilah, to protect the inhabitants during the ſeaſon of harveſt. When the intelligence of this victory, which was repreſented much to the advantage of David, and the circumſtance of his ſhutting himſelf up in the city of Keilah, were communicated to Saul, he inſtantly diſpatched a body of forces to beſiege the place, with orders not to abandon the ſiege till David was delivered into their hands. But David, being forewarned, that if he continued at Keilah, the people would deliver him up, in order to make their peace with the king, he retired from thence, with his four hundred followers, and encamped upon a hill of great natural ſtrength, named En-gedi, which was ſituated in the deſert.

But, when Saul received information that David had quitted Keilah, he countermanded the orders which he had before given, reſpecting the ſiege; and David again changed his quarters, retiring to Cœna, in the diſtrict of Ziph. At this place he had an interview with Jonathan, who exhorted him to ſupport himſelf with reſolution under his preſent troubles; aſſuring him, that in a ſhort time he would be inveſted with the ſupreme government; and repreſenting to him, that ſuch exalted dignities were not attainable without much toil and danger.

The Ziphites engage to ſeize David.

The people of Ziph, with the view of ingratiating themſelves with the king, gave him notice of the place whither David had retired; and engaged, if Saul would furniſh them with a body of troops, to ſeize his perſon; which, they alledged, might eaſily be effected, by ſecuring certain paſſes, whereby his retreat would be rendered totally impracticable. Saul expreſſed his acknowledgments for this intelligence, and immediately diſpatched a party to carry the deſign into execution; promiſing to follow them at the head of a larger force, with all convenient diſpatch. The Ziphites ſerved as guides to the troops ſent by Saul, and afforded them every aſſiſtance in their power towards executing the commiſſion with which they were charged.

He retires to the deſert.

But God would not permit theſe wicked deſigns to take effect; for David, having received information of the king's approach, retired to a large rock in the deſert of Maon †. Hither he was ſo cloſely purſued by Saul, that he appeared to be deprived of every hope of eſcaping, when intelligence was brought to the king, that the Philiſtines had invaded his dominions, and were ravaging the country without controul. This circumſtance induced Saul to abandon the purſuit of David, and to turn his arms againſt the invaders; conſidering it as highly imprudent to riſk the total loſs of his kingdom, merely for the ſake of gratifying his revenge againſt a particular perſon. In this manner was David preſerved, from the apparently

* Why ſhould the prieſts have been involved in this barbarous maſſacre? Doeg mentions only Abimelech as being applied to by David; and in like manner Saul himſelf, in the charge he brings againſt Abimelech, accuſes him and David: Why have ye conſpired againſt me, thou and the ſon of Jeſſe? without a ſyllable of any other prieſts. As to the prieſts not acquainting Saul with David's flight, why ſhould they do it, if they were not informed of it, but believed, as David had pretended, he was in haſte upon the king's buſineſs? And if they had known the reaſon of it, it was not in their power to have acquainted Saul with it time enough for him to have apprehended him: it is therefore evident, from Saul's charge againſt Abimelech, that his ſuſpicion of the prieſts being in David's intereſt, aroſe merely from the information of Doeg, and not from any thing they had done, before this, contrary to their duty.

† Maon was a diſtinct wilderneſs from Ziph, though they both lay in the tribe of Judah.

inevitable deſtruction with which he was threatened; and from hence he marched with his troops to the ſtreights of En-gedi †.

Saul perſiſts in perſecuting David;

As ſoon as Saul had routed the Philiſtines, and compelled them to return to their own country, he ſelected three thouſand of his choiceſt troops, and, putting himſelf at their head, renewed the purſuit of David, of whoſe retreat to En-gedi he had now obtained the moſt indiſputable information. When he had arrived very near to the ſpot, he retired, for a ſhort time, without any of his attendants, into a dark and ſpacious cave, in which it ſo happened that David and his companions were concealed; one of them recollecting the perſon of Saul, inſtantly acquainted David with his diſcovery, and adviſed him to avail himſelf of the opportunity which God had thus afforded him, of eſtabliſhing his own ſafety by the death of his implacable foe. But David rejected this advice with horror, and contented himſelf with cutting off a piece of the ſkirt of Saul's robe; and even this action created a ſtrong compunction in his breaſt, as he conſidered it as an unwarrantable violence committed againſt the perſon of one whom God had been pleaſed to ſet over him in the quality of his ſovereign.

Immediately upon the departure of Saul from the cave, David followed him, and, in the moſt reſpectful manner, addreſſed him in theſe words: "It is the common misfortune of all princes, Sire, to be ſurrounded with numerous ſycophants, whoſe conſtant practice it is to fill their minds with injurious ſuſpicions of their ſincereſt and moſt approved friends. Profeſſions may deceive, but the man who acts in conformity to his duty, gives an incontrovertible teſtimony of his affection and reſpect for his ſovereign. I have been accuſed to your majeſty of crimes which never entered into my imagination; and you, in conſequence, purſue my life with the moſt unremitting ardour. But I truſt, Sire, that the example of my conduct on the preſent occaſion, will convince you how totally undeſerving I am of the rigour which I have experienced at your hands. For it was equally in my power to have deprived you of your life, as to cut of this piece of your garment, which you now ſee in my hand: but even all the provocation which I have received, could not induce me to be guilty of ſo vindictive an action. Judge then, Sire, whether you can, without the moſt palpable injuſtice, continue to perſecute me. I ſubmit my conduct to the judgment of the Almighty, and he will decide by whom the charge of guilt hath been incurred."

Saul juſtifies David's conduct.

Saul reflecting on the imminent peril which he had eſcaped, and on the great moderation exhibited by David on the occaſion, obſerved that he had repaid all the benefits and ſervices which he had received from him with the baſeſt ingratitude and cruelty. He further acknowledged that David, by his conduct on that day, had proved himſelf to be poſſeſſed, in the higheſt degree, of the generous ſentiments of their forefathers, who gloried in ſparing the lives of ſuch of their foes as Providence had delivered into their hands; adding, that he was from hence convinced, that it was the intention of the Almighty to confer on him the ſupreme government of the Hebrew nation; and conjuring him, when that period ſhould arrive, to ſhew mercy to his children. After David had bound himſelf to the king, by a ſolemn oath, to a ſtrict obſervance of his requeſt, they ſeparated, and David removed with his troops to the ſtreights of Mizpeh *.

Death of Samuel.

Nearly at this period the Hebrews were deprived of the prophet Samuel; a man whoſe numerous virtues had juſtly endeared him to the whole nation. He died at Ramah, his native city, and was interred with a magnificence highly expreſſive of the affection which the people entertained for him. He held the ſupreme authority twelve years ſubſequent to the death of Eli, and died in the nineteenth year after the introduction of the monarchical form of government.

Story of Nabal and Abigail.

In the city of Emma, ſituated in the diſtrict of Ziph, and near the ſpot on which David had encamped his troops, dwelt a certain perſon named Nabal, whoſe flocks were ſo numerous that they were computed to amount to three thouſand ſheep, and one thouſand goats. David ſtrictly prohibited his people from committing the ſlighteſt depredation on the poſſeſſions of this man, and even permitted them to aſſiſt the ſhepherds of Nabal in tending their flocks; flattering himſelf, that he ſhould thereby confer an obligation on a perſon who was deſerving of his favour. But the diſpoſition of Nabal was naturally churliſh and moroſe, whilſt his wife was equally remarkable for the graces of her perſon and mind.

Nabal's churliſh behaviour to David.

When the ſeaſon of ſheep-ſhearing arrived, David ſent ten of his men to compliment Nabal, in his name, and to requeſt a ſmall ſupply of proviſions, for which he would, when opportunity offered, make him ample compenſation. They were further ordered to repreſent to him that, during the whole time of their abode in the deſert, they had never once injured him in his property, but, on the contrary, had done him some service by the assistance which they had afforded his servants. Nabal enquired from whom they came, and, being informed that they were sent by David, the son of Jesse, he not only peremptorily refused to comply with their request, but accompanied his refusal with many opprobrious expressions respecting David, whom he styled a fugitive, who had left his master from an apprehension of receiving the punishment due to his crimes.

† This ſtrong hold, now called An-guedi, was a large village, ſituated in the deſerts, which lay upon the weſtern coaſt of the Salt or Dead-Sea, not far from the plains of Jericho. This country abounded in mountains aad large caverns, and therefore was a very commodious place for David to retire to, and conceal himſelf from his jealous enemy.

* That Saul ſhould break his vows, and, what is worſe, that he ſhould ungratefully purſue his deliverer; with increaſing thirſt after his blood, is an extraordinary inſtance of the length in wickedneſs which ſome men are permitted to run. Saul imitated in this reſpect thoſe who had ſold themſelves to work iniquity in the ſight of the Lord.

He vows revenge; When David was informed of this behaviour of Nabal, he instantly put himself at the head of a party of four hundred of his followers, and, leaving the remaining two hundred to guard the baggage, began his march towards the dwelling of this man, with a full determination utterly to extirpate his whole family, and destroy his habitation: and this he bound himself by an oath to perform before the next day's dawn. In the mean time, some of the servants of Nabal, who had been present at the conversation between their master and the persons sent by David, communicated to Abigail, the wife of Nabal, the particulars of all that had passed; at the same time suggesting to her their fears, lest this conduct of their master should be attended with fatal consequences to himself and his family. Upon this intelligence Abigail, without mentioning a syllable of her design to her husband, who was, at the time, in a state of intoxication, ordered a number of asses to be laden with refreshments of various kinds, and immediately began her journey to meet David on the way.

but is pacified by Abigail, When she arrived near the foot of the mountain, she perceived David and his men descending into the valley, and, upon a nearer approach, prostrated herself before him, and earnestly solicited him to pardon the contemptuous expressions uttered by Nabal, whose name strictly accorded with his disposition. She assured him, that she was not present when his messengers came to her husband; observed, that he ought to return thanks to heaven for preserving him, by her agency, from the guilt of blood, and expressed her wishes, that he might ever continue free from that pollution, as a means of securing the favour and assistance of God in all his contests with his enemies. She readily admitted the justice of his resentment, but earnestly besought him to set due bounds to his vengeance, and to reflect, that nothing gave so great a lustre to the character of a person destined to rule over others, as the virtues of moderation and clemency; concluding with a request, that he would condescend to accept from her hands the refreshments which she had brought with her, as a small token of her respect and good will.

David received her in the most favourable manner; accepted her presents, and assured her, that God himself had certainly inspired her with the design of atoning for her husband's offence in the manner she had adopted; and that she, otherwise, would never have seen the morning's light, as he had solemnly sworn, never to close his eyes till he had utterly destroyed the habitation of Nabal, and had put every individual of his family to the sword. He added, however, that, although he was content, upon her account, to pass over the affront which he had received from her husband, yet Nabal would certainly be punished in due time by the hands of the Almighty. who obtains her request.

Abigail, upon her return home, found her husband so much intoxicated, that she perceived it would be in vain to acquaint him that night with what had passed. When Nabal learnt, on the next day, the imminent danger which he had escaped, he was affected so strongly, that he was immediately seized with a numbness which pervaded his whole body; and, in this condition, he continued to the time of his death, which happened on the tenth day. When David was informed of this event, he observed, that Nabal had merited the punishment he had suffered; and returned thanks to God, for his goodness in preserving him from the guilt of blood. Death of Nabal.

David dispatched a messenger to the widow with proposals for taking her in marriage*. She replied, that she was unworthy even to wash the feet of David; but in compliance to his desire, she repaired to him, and they were espoused. The virtues of her mind, and the beauties of her person, obtained her this honourable preferment. Michal, the first wife of David, was disposed of by her father to Phalti, the son of Laish of Gallem; after which he contracted a marriage with a woman of Abesar, named Ahinoam. David marries Abigail.

The people of Ziph informed Saul, that David was returned to their quarters, and that he might be repulsed with a moderate force. Hereupon Saul repaired immediately to Zicklag. David dispatched spies to learn the situation of the enemy, and upon receiving intelligence, that Saul had pitched his tents at Zicklag, he rose in the night, and attended only by Abishai, the son of his sister Zeruiah, and Abimelech the Hittite, privately departed and gained admittance to the royal tent, where he found the king asleep, Abner, his general, and his guards being in the same situation. Abishai was desirous of putting Saul to death, but this design was opposed by David, who said, that however iniquitous, considered as a man, the person of the king was sacred, since he had been exalted to a David enters Saul's camp while he and his attendants were asleep, but refrains from violence.

* The heart of David was susceptible of the tenderest emotions. The amiable and lovely appearance of Abigail compensates for the brutal behaviour of her husband, and wins the affections of the Israelitish Champion, though he waited for the death of Nabal before he acknowledged his passion. Had he used the same wisdom and justice in the affair of Bathsheba the wife of Uriah, he would have saved himself many bitter lamentations, and the cause of religion much disgrace.

throne by the appointment and authority of the Almighty; and that for the abuſe of power he was accountable only to the Supreme Being, by whom that power was delegated. He ſaid, though he would not avail himſelf of the advantage afforded him, he would take away the lance and pitcher of water from the bed-ſide, as teſtimonies to prove how abſolutely the king depended upon his mercy.

He reprehends Abner, &c.

He now left the camp, and, having croſſed the river, aſcended a mountain whence he called aloud to Abner and the guards: the general, ſurpriſed to hear himſelf thus addreſſed by name, demanded whence the voice proceeded. David acknowledged himſelf, and ironically aſked Abner, whether the general of an army, the favourite of a prince, and the profeſſed guardian of his perſonal ſafety, did not greatly exalt his character, by indulging himſelf in ſleep at the time his maſter's life was in danger. He mentioned the circumſtance of the lance and pitcher of water being taken from the king's tent, obſerving that, whether the opportunity of removing them was afforded through neglect or treachery, Abner had merited to be condemned to the loſs of his head.

Saul acknowledges David's laudable conduct.

Saul knowing the voice of David, and finding that he had been a ſecond time in the power of this generous friend, whom he conſidered as an implacable enemy, publicly thanked him for having ſpared his life; and deſired him to return home, in full aſſurance, that all enmity ſhould ſubſide on his part; for he was convinced that his life and ſafety were not dearer to himſelf than they were to David, who, in return for repeated baniſhments and attempts upon his life, the loſs of friends, and other injuries, had manifeſted a ſteady attachment towards him, by an uninterrupted ſeries of friendly offices. David deſired a meſſenger to be diſpatched, by whom he might return the lance and the pitcher, calling God and man to witneſs, that when he took them from the tent, the king's life was equally in his power.

Saul now returned to his palace; and David, at the head of his ſix hundred men, marched into the land of the Philiſtines, from whom he had obtained permiſſion to eſtabliſh his reſidence among them. David and his two wives, Ahinoam and Abigail, met with a liberal reception from Achiſh, the king of Gath: but conceiving himſelf to be degraded, by remaining a burden on the public, his ſituation became extremely irkſome, and he determined to petition Achiſh to grant him a portion of land. In conſequence of his application, the king aſſigned Ziklag to himſelf and his heirs in perpetuity; and for this place he entertained a great partiality, even after his exaltation to the throne.

David remained in Ziklag four months and twenty days, during which ſpace he made frequent incurſions upon the Sarites and the Amalekites, from whom he obtained great numbers of mules, camels, and other ſpoil; but he avoided taking any priſoners, leſt they ſhould betray his proceedings to Achiſh. He diſpoſed of part of the booty in preſents to the king, who often queſtioned him reſpecting the manner of his obtaining the gifts. His anſwer was, that he had made inroads on the ſouthern parts of Judah *.

The Philiſtines prepare for renewing the war.

About this time, the Philiſtines were making preparations for commencing a war againſt the Hebrews, and a day was appointed for a general rendezvous at Rengam, whence Achiſh was to lead his troops to the encounter. The king requeſted the aſſiſtance of David, with his ſix hundred men; and to this he readily conſented, obſerving that the period was approaching when he ſhould be afforded an opportunity of making an honourable compenſation for the bounties he had received. In return, the king promiſed, that if he proved victorious in the engagement, he would appoint David to the command of his guards, and inveſt him with every honourable diſtinction within the compaſs of his power.

CHAP. XIII.

The Ghoſt of SAMUEL foretells the Defeat of SAUL, and the Death of himſelf and his Sons. ZIKLAG pillaged and burnt by the AMALEKITES, who are purſued and cut off by DAVID.

SAUL had already baniſhed from his kingdom the ſoothſayers, fortune-tellers, and all other vain pretenders to a ſkill in foretelling future events; but the prophets were not included in the proſcription. Intelligence being communicated, that the Philiſtines had pitched their tents upon a plain at Sunem, Saul drew up his forces oppoſite to the camp of the enemy, near the mountain of Gilboah. The armies being in ſight of each other, Saul obſerved, that the Philiſtines had a great ſuperiority both in point of numbers and diſcipline; and his ſpirits being greatly depreſſed by this circumſtance, he reſolved to conſult the prophets in relation to the iſſue of the expected engagement. The queſtion being propoſed, and no anſwer given, his uneaſineſs encreaſed to abſolute deſperation; for he conſidered the ſilence of the oracle, as a certain indication of approaching calamity. Notwithſtanding this, and a conſciouſneſs that he had forfeited the favour of the Almighty, he had recourſe to wizards and conjurers, in order to obtain the knowledge of future events, and employed agents to find out ſome woman ſkilled in the myſteries of divination. Being informed that a woman of this deſcription reſided at Endor, he immediately repaired thither, being diſguiſed, and attended by two confidents. Upon his arrival, he requeſted her to call up the ſpirit of a perſon he ſhould name, as a proof of her ſkill. In conſideration of the king's edict, which had prohibited this mode of divination, on the penalty of baniſhment, ſhe declined a compliance, intreating him not to lead her into an act of diſobedience, the diſcovery of which would inevitably prove her deſtruction. Saul continued his importunities in a more urgent manner, invoking the moſt bitter imprecations to befal him, if he ſhould divulge any part of the proceeding; and on the credit of his aſſurances, ſhe at length conſented to gratify his deſire.

* The anſwer was true, but ambiguous; for all thoſe people actually dwelt on the ſouth of Judah. But Achiſh underſtood the anſwer as meaning that the incurſion was made on Judah, on the Jerahmeelites and Kenites themſelves, though David aſſerted no ſuch thing. He therefore was not guilty of a falſity, as ſome writers ſuppoſe, and labour to palliate or condemn; and if in any thing he was to blame, it was for giving an ambiguous anſwer to a queſtion which he was not obliged to give a direct reply to. Achiſh well knew that David had made an incurſion upon ſome of the neighbouring tribes, and in this David did not deceive him; but he thought he was no ways obliged to tell him who they were; and therefore ſaid only in general, that they were ſuch as dwelt on the ſouth of Judah. And if Achiſh miſunderſtood him, I do not yet ſee that David was obliged to undeceive him.

Saul ſeeks to a witch at Endor.

Saul deſired her to call up the ghoſt of Samuel. Being entirely unacquainted with the perſon of Samuel, ſhe was greatly aſtoniſhed by the divine figure of the ſpectre; and turning to Saul, ſhe aſked him, if he was not the king? (this Samuel had intimated to her): and he replied in the affirmative, deſiring to know the cauſe of the confuſion by which ſhe appeared to be affected*. She ſaid, the apparition cauſed her diſorder, being the reſemblance of an aged man, encompaſſed with a glory, and in the attitude of aſcending from the earth. He queſtioned her as to the age, figure, and habit of the ſpectre; and was anſwered, that it appeared to be an ancient and venerable man, in a ſacerdotal garment. Hence Saul concluded it to be the ghoſt of Samuel, and proſtrated himſelf on the earth. The ſpirit aſked Saul, for what reaſon he had called him from his peaceful abode; and the [illegible] replied, that being threatened with a powerful army, and having no prophets to conſult with, or viſions imparted for the regulation of his conduct, and being abandoned by the Lord, he was compelled into the preſent meaſure by the moſt urgent neceſſity, finding his laſt reſource for advice to be in Samuel, whom he had, on various occaſions, found to be ſteadily attached to his intereſt.

Saul deſires the ghoſt of Samuel to be called up.

The ghoſt reproved Saul for his unſeaſonable deſire of learning what ſhould befal him; but added that, as he had expreſſed himſelf ſo anxiouſly on the ſubject, he would foretel his fate. The ghoſt proceeded to inform Saul, that himſelf and his ſons would be ſlain in battle the next day, and that David would ſucceed to the government, and effect an happy termination of the war; adding, that he was doomed to the loſs of his crown and life for his diſobedience to the commands of God, reſpecting his conduct towards the Amalekites.

He is rebuked by the ſpectre, and greatly terrified at his relation.

Upon hearing this ſentence pronounced, the king's vital powers ſeemed to deſert him, and he fell to the ground; but whether this was the effect of ſudden ſurpriſe, or having remained without food for the ſpace of four and twenty hours, may admit of a doubt. However, upon his recovery, the woman urgently preſſed him to take the neceſſary refreſhment for the ſupport of nature, that he might be able to return to the camp. Her repeated ſolicitations, at length, induced him to compliance; and ſhe killed a calf, and, having dreſſed it, ſet it before her royal gueſt and his attendants. After the repaſt, the king departed, and the ſame night joined the army.

The Philiſtine troops were aſſembled, according to their ſeveral diſtributions, into tribes, kingdoms, and governments; Achiſh, the king of Gath, and his men, being drawn up behind the other forces, and David, with his party of ſix hundred, in the rear of him. The Hebrews being obſerved by the Philiſtine commanders, they demanded whence they came? by whoſe order? and for what purpoſe? Achiſh replied, that "the leader of the Hebrews, (pointing to David) had been ſervant to Saul, whoſe diſpleaſure he had incurred; and, judging his life to be in danger, he fled into my dominions for ſanctuary, attended by the party whom he now commands; in gratitude for the aſſiſtance I afforded him, and from a principle of reſentment againſt his late maſter, he has engaged, on the preſent occaſion, to exert his utmoſt efforts in ſupport of our cauſe." The Philiſtines unanimouſly diſapproved of repoſing confidence in a declared enemy; urging that, in the important cauſe depending, the moſt dangerous conſequences might ariſe from the treachery of the party in queſtion; they, therefore, requeſted that Achiſh would order him to leave the army, and return to the place appointed for his reſidence†; adding, that David was the man by whom many thouſands of the Philiſtines had been ſlaughtered, and whoſe exploits were ſo highly celebrated in the ſongs of the Hebrew virgins. Theſe objections were ſo reaſonably founded, that they were readily admitted by Achiſh. He aſſured David, that experience had convinced him of his bravery and ſteady attachment, and that on theſe con-

The Philiſtines being jealous of David, he is diſmiſſed from the army.

* Magic, eſpecially that part of it which was ſtyled Necromancy, owed its origin to the ſhows which were exhibited in the Pagan myſteries; and this woman deſigned to have put the trick upon Saul, by paſſing ſome accomplice upon him for the prophet Samuel. But to her great aſtoniſhment the prophet now appearing, ſhe was ſo ſurpriſed that ſhe cried out. Saul, as ſhe had told him before, had proſcribed all the profeſſors of magic; but by the appearance of Samuel, ſhe collected that the perſon who conſulted her was Saul himſelf; and reflecting on his ſeverity, ſhe could expect nothing but death for exerciſing her trade: ſhe might therefore well aſk him, "Why haſt thou deceived me?"

† The lords of the Philiſtines were ſuſpicious of David's purpoſes, and inſiſted upon his diſmiſſion. His pleaſure muſt certainly have been great, to find himſelf extricated out of ſo delicate a ſituation as he had been in, when there might have been a ſtruggle between his gratitude to his friend and his love to his country; and in which he could not poſſibly know what part he had to act, or was bound to act, till the two armies were nearly, or actually engaged.

Luyken inv.

Saul consults the Ghost of Samuel.

ſiderations he had received him as an ally; but he deſired him to decline taking a further part in the preſent expedition, and to return to Zicklag, in order to guard the people againſt any advantage which might be meditated by the enemy during the abſence of the army; obſerving, that by this commiſſion he would be able to render himſelf as effectually ſerviceable, as by remaining with the troops. Achiſh having declared, that the friendſhip he had conceived had ſuffered no abatement, David departed for the place of his deſtination.

The Amalekites attack and burn Zicklag.

The Amalekites availed themſelves of David's attendance upon the Philiſtine army, and attacked Zicklag, which they fired, and entirely deſtroyed, and committed great devaſtation in the adjacent country; after which they retired, making booty of all the effects which they were able to remove. David finding his habitation to be laid deſolate, and that his wives, thoſe of his fellow-ſoldiers, and their children, had been made priſoners, gave way to the moſt paſſionate lamentations, tearing his garments, and by other extravagant actions proving the exceſs of his ſorrow. His companions were ſo exaſperated on this occaſion, that they formed a reſolution of ſtoning David to death, as being the cauſe of their preſent diſtreſs, but they did not carry this deſign into execution.

When the violence of his grief had ſubſided, David requeſted Abiathar, the high-prieſt, to habit himſelf in his pontifical robes, and conſult the Lord, whether, upon purſuing the enemy, it would be granted to the Hebrews to recover their women and children, and to take revenge for the injuries they had ſuſtained. Abiathar directed him to follow the Amalekites, ſaying, ſucceſs would attend the expedition. Thus encouraged, David put himſelf at the head of his troops, and cloſely purſued the enemy as far as the brook of Beſor. At this place they perceived a man, who, it appeared, had loſt his road in the deſert, and was on the point of ſtarving, having remained three days without ſuſtenance. After taking ſome refreſhment, the man ſaid, in reply to the queſtions put to him by David, that he was an Egyptian, who had attended his maſter at the deſtruction of Zicklag, and that, on the return of the troops, his ſtrength failed him, and he was left in the deſert.

David overtakes the Amalekites, and recovers the ſpoil and priſoners.

David appointed this man to be a guide in the purſuit of the Amalekites, whom he, at length, overtook, and found in a ſtate of the utmoſt diſorder; ſome being engaged in a vain contemplation of the ſpoils they had obtained, others in the indulgence of gluttony, ſome unarmed, and thoſe who were provided with weapons, ſo much intoxicated as to be unable to uſe them. In this confuſed ſituation, they were vigorouſly attacked by David and his followers, who committed ſo terrible a ſlaughter, that not more than four hundred men eſcaped, and theſe were indebted for their ſafety to the ſpeed of their camels. The purſuit continued from noon till evening; and, during the action, the women and children belonging to David's party were recovered, as were the effects which had been pillaged from Zicklag.

His impartial juſtice to thoſe not concerned in the action.

On this expedition David was attended by only four hundred men, having ſtationed the other two hundred of his party as a guard to the baggage. The four hundred who were engaged in the action, objected to the other two hundred being admitted to ſhare in what had been recovered from the enemy, inſiſting that their wives and children only ſhould be reſtored. David remonſtrated againſt arrogating to themſelves the merit of the victory, which was to be attributed only to the Almighty; urging, the injuſtice of excluding the party of two hundred men from their proportion of the booty; as, while the others were engaged in purſuit of the enemy, they had guarded the baggage, the preſervation of which was eſſentially neceſſary to the common cauſe. This determination was ſubmitted to the authority of a law, which ſtill remains in force, whereby ſuch as guard the baggage, are declared to have an equal right to the ſpoil with thoſe who are more actively engaged in the war*. Upon his return to Zicklag, David diſpatched meſſengers with a part of the ſpoil, as preſents to his friends in the tribe of Judah.

Deciſive battle between the Philiſtines and Hebrews, in which Saul and his ſons are ſlain.

The armies of the Philiſtines and Hebrews joined battle in the neighbourhood of the mountain of Gilboa. Saul and his ſons, Jonathan, Aminadab, and Melchi, fought with aſtoniſhing bravery: they foreſaw that they muſt inevitably fall in the conteſt, but reſolutely determined that the enemy ſhould have but little cauſe to boaſt of the victory. They were oppreſſed by a great ſuperiority of numbers; and when they had ſubdued one party, they were attacked by others in ſucceſſion, till, at length, they yielded up their lives in the heat of the battle. Upon the death of Jonathan, Aminadab, and Melchi, the army fled, and was purſued by the Philiſtines with a terrible ſlaughter. Saul maintained a defence, at the head of a ſmall party, ſome time longer: but from the wounds he had received from the darts and ar-

* The equity of this law appears not only from its being perpetuated, but likewiſe from the nature of things: for theſe two hundred were left behind by common conſent to guard the baggage; they were part of the ſame corps, and belonged to the ſame nation; they were prevented by too great fatigue from being preſent at the engagement; and as they would otherwiſe have taken part in the battle, their will was accepted for the deed. By ſtaying with the baggage they facilitated the conqueſt of their fellow-ſoldiers, who, when embarraſſed and hindered with that impediment, could neither have charged with ſo much vigour, nor could have performed the neceſſary manœuvres and evolutions with ſo much dexterity and addreſs. In this reſpect they might be conſidered in a remote view as having a ſhare in the defeat of the enemy. Beſides which it may be added, that they were equally expoſed to danger with thoſe who actually engaged the enemy; for if the four hundred had been defeated, the enemy would undoubtedly have marched up to them for the ſake of booty, and would have cut them off as well as their main body.

rows of the Philiſtines, his ſtrength was ſo much exhauſted, that he became incapable of further reſiſtance, and even of the power of depriving himſelf of life. In this extremity of his fate, he commanded his armour-bearer to diſpatch him: but the man, from a veneration he entertained for the king, excuſed himſelf from the office; in conſequence of which, Saul ruſhed on the point of his own ſword; but this not fully anſwering his purpoſe, he applied to a young Amalekite, requeſting him effectually to prevent his being taken alive by the enemy. The Amalekite immediately killed the king, and taking his crown and golden bracelets, made a precipitate retreat. When the armour-bearer perceived that his royal maſter was dead, he immediately put an end to his life; and of thoſe who compoſed the king's guard not a man ſurvived his royal maſter.

The Philiſtines diſpoſſeſs the Hebrews of their cities.

The Hebrews, inhabiting the valley beyond Jordan, and the cities upon the plains, having learnt the event of the battle, and that Saul and his ſons had periſhed in the action, quitted their open towns and ſtrong holds, and the Philiſtines poſſeſſed themſelves of the places which the others had evacuated. On the day following that of the battle, the Philiſtines returned to the field, and finding the bodies of Saul and his ſons, they ſtripped them, cut off their heads, and expoſed the bodies under the walls of the city of Bethſham, which at this time bears the name of Scythopolis. The people of Jabeth-Gilead being highly incenſed againſt the Philiſtines for theſe violences, formed a party of enterpriſing men, who determined to take down the bodies; and after privately travelling all night, they arrived at the ſpot, and effected their purpoſe. The death of Saul and his ſons † was ſeverely regretted by the people of Jabeſh, who afforded a teſtimony of their eſteem, by a public interment of their remains in the chief part of the country. On this occaſion, all ranks of people were enjoined to a ſtrict obſervance of faſting and mourning for the ſpace of ſeven days. Thus was Saul puniſhed for his diſobedience to the command of the Lord, reſpecting the war againſt the Amalekites, the maſſacre of Abimelech and his family, and the deſtruction of the ſacerdotal city. Saul continued in the government eighteen years previous to the death of Samuel, and twenty-two years after that period.

† On peruſing this narrative, no one will expreſs much regret at the death of the cruel, unrelenting, and perſecuting Saul, the firſt king of Iſrael; but that the amiable, generous-hearted Jonathan ſhould fall a ſacrifice at the ſame time, will ſenſibly affect the tender feelings of the friendly and benevolent. It is one among a thouſand other proofs, that, with reſpect to the affairs of this life, "One event happeneth to the righteous and to the wicked."

BOOK VII.

Containing the HISTORY of EVENTS from the YEAR of the WORLD 2890, to 2931.

CHAP. I.

DAVID expreſſes the deepeſt Sorrow for the Death of SAUL and JONATHAN. He is proclaimed King by the Tribe of JUDAH; but the other Tribes declare in favour of ISHBOSHETH. His Forces are defeated by thoſe of DAVID, under the command of JOAB. ASAHEL, the Brother of JOAB, is ſlain by ABNER. In conſequence of a Reproof received from ISHBOSHETH, ABNER abandons his Intereſts, and joins the Party of DAVID; and is, ſoon afterwards, treacherouſly aſſaſſinated by JOAB.

THE battle, which proved ſo fatal to the Hebrews, was fought on the ſame day in which David obtained the victory over the Amalekites: and, on the third day after his return to Zicklag, a perſon arrived there, who had eſcaped from the encounter in which Saul and his ſons were ſlain. He preſented himſelf before David with his garments rent in various parts, and his head covered with aſhes, and acquainted him with the defeat of the Hebrews, and the death of the king and his ſons; adding that he was an Amalekite by birth, and that Saul, after having received many wounds, attempted to thruſt himſelf through with his own ſword, in order to avoid the diſgrace of falling alive into the enemy's hands; but, wanting ſtrength to execute his purpoſe, he had earneſtly requeſted him to perform the above office, with which requeſt he found himſelf under the neceſſity of complying; and, in confirmation of the truth of his aſſertions he, at the ſame time, delivered into the hands of David the royal bracelets and diadem.

David laments the death of Saul and Jonathan.

Upon receiving this intelligence, David rent his cloaths, and devoted the whole of that day to lamentation for the loſs which both the nation and himſelf had ſuſtained on the occaſion. But his grief aroſe chiefly from the conſideration of the ſincere affection and friendſhip which had ſubſiſted between him and Jonathan, to whom he had more than once been indebted for the preſervation of his life. As a proof of the generous diſpoſition of David, he not only thus publicly lamented the cataſtrophe of Saul, but, uninfluenced by any conſideration of the manifold injuries which he had received from him, he alſo condemned to immediate death the wretch who had confeſſed himſelf to be his murderer; and who, by his principles, clearly evinced from what country he derived his birth. David compoſed various elegies and epitaphs, in praiſe of Saul and his ſon Jonathan, all which are ſtill extant.

He fixes his reſidence at Hebron.

When the term of the mourning for Saul and his ſons was expired, David conſulted the oracle in which of the cities of Judah he ſhould take up his reſidence; and was directed to fix upon the city of Hebron for that purpoſe. He accordingly repaired thither, with his two wives and thoſe perſons who conſtituted his body-guard, and was quickly followed by all his whole tribe, who, in an aſſembly held for that purpoſe, unanimouſly proclaimed him king of Iſrael.

Abner makes Iſhboſheth king.

Abner, the ſon of Ner, and the late general of the army of Saul, no ſooner heard of the death of that prince and three of his ſons, than he inſtantly repaired to the camp, in ſearch of Iſhboſheth, another of the children of Saul, whom he conducted to the further ſide of Jordan, in order to preſerve him from danger, and cauſed him to be acknowledged and proclaimed king of Iſrael, by all the tribes ſave that of Judah; fixing on Meanahaim, for the place of his reſidence. The conduct of the men of Judah, in electing David for their king, had given ſuch offence to Abner, that, aſſembling a numerous army, he marched into their country, with the deſign of puniſhing them ſeverely for their temerity. The forces of David were commanded by Joab, the ſon of Suri and Zeruiah, the ſiſter of David; and Joab was accompanied in the expedition by his two brothers, Abiſhai and Hazael.

Bloody conteſt between twelve men of each army.

When the two armies arrived in ſight of each other, in the neighbourhood of Gibeon, they drew up in order of battle: but, previous to the commencement of a general engagement, Abner propoſed that each party ſhould ſelect a certain number, to make trial of their valour in a ſeparate combat. This propoſal being accepted by Joab, twelve men on a ſide were choſen for the purpoſe; and, in the ſpace between the two armies, they attacked each other firſt with their darts, and afterwards with their ſwords, with ſuch fury, that, in the end, they all fell lifeleſs upon the ſpot. The two armies then joined battle, and, for a while, the conteſt was maintained with equal obſtinacy; but, at length, the troops of Abner were utterly defeated, and put to flight.

Aſahel killed by Abner.

Aſahel, the brother of Joab, poſſeſſed a ſwiftneſs of foot, in which he was ſurpaſſed by very few horſes. This man, without paying any attention to the reſt of the fugitives, confined himſelf wholly to the purſuit of Abner, who, perceiving that his adverſary gained ground on him at a very conſiderable rate, repeatedly deſired him to deſiſt from following him, and offered to compenſate him with a full ſuit of arms*; repreſenting to him how unwilling he ſhould be to kill him, even in the defence of his own life, as he was ſenſible that he ſhould thereby draw upon himſelf the irreconcileable enmity of his brother Joab. But when Abner perceived that all his arguments were loſt upon Aſahel, he ſuddenly darted his lance at him, and laid him breathleſs on the ground.

The ſtruggle for the ſupreme authority, between David and the ſon of Saul, produced a civil war which was of conſiderable duration, but terminated, at length, in favour of the former.

Abner, taking offence at Iſhboſheth, quits his party, and joins David.

The valour, diſcretion, and popularity of Abner were, throughout the whole war, the chief ſupport of the pretenſions of Iſhboſheth; but that prince, having received information that a familiar connection ſubſiſted between Abner and Rizpah, the daughter of Sibeth, who had formerly been one of the concubines of his late father Saul, reproached him on the ſubject with ſo much acrimony, that Abner, from that hour, determined, in revenge, to quit the party of Iſhboſheth, and to unite himſelf with that of David. In purſuance of this reſolution, he diſpatched one of his friends ſecretly to Hebron, with inſtructions to inform David that he was ready to enſure him the poſſeſſion of the kingdom with the general conſent of the whole people, by bringing over to his intereſts thoſe tribes which had been hitherto adverſe to his pretenſions, on condition that he ſhould bind himſelf by an oath to confer on him the office of prime miniſter, as ſoon as he ſhould have made good his engagements. David eagerly cloſed with the propoſal, and deſired that Abner, as a proof of his ſincerity, would cauſe his wife Michal, whom he had obtained from her father at the imminent hazard of his life, to be immediately reſtored to him. Michal was accordingly taken from Phalti, on whom her father had beſtowed her after the diſgrace of David, and was again delivered up to her firſt huſband; and this was done with the privity and conſent of Iſhboſheth, who however expreſſed a ſtrong conviction of the reaſonableneſs of the requiſition.

Abner confers with David at Hebron.

After theſe proceedings Abner repaired to David at Hebron, with a band conſiſting of twenty perſons, whom he had ſelected for the purpoſe; the intent of his journey being to ſettle matters with David in perſon, and to acquaint him him with the progreſs he had made towards the completion of his engagements. Upon his arrival at the court of David, he was received in the moſt friendly manner by that prince, who entertained him with the utmoſt magnificence for the ſpace of three days, at the expiration of which time Abner requeſted to be diſmiſſed, that he might finiſh the undertaking in which he had embarked.

* Kimchi imagines that Abner's real meaning was, that Aſahel ſhould take one of his attendants with his armour, and be content with the glory of carrying him off as a captive. Others ſuppoſe, he bids him try his valour on one of the common ſoldiers, by endeavouring to diſarm him, in order to divert him from attacking himſelf, who was an old ſoldier, and an experienced general.

During the above three days, Joab, the general of the army of David, was abſent from Hebron; but he returned juſt at this juncture, and entered the city at one gate as Abner quitted it by another. Having been made acquainted with all that had paſſed during his abſence, he inſtantly conceived a ſuſpicion that Abner, with whoſe abilities he was well acquainted, would effectually ſupplant him in the king's favour, even, perhaps, to the depriving him of the honourable office of commander of the forces.

He endeavoured, therefore, at firſt to impreſs the mind of David with ſentiments diſadvantageous to Abner, whom he repreſented as a perſon, whoſe ſole intention it was to miſlead him by his profeſſions, that he might with greater facility ſecure to the family of Saul the poſſeſſion of the throne. When he perceived that all his ſuggeſtions were ineffectual, he formed the execrable deſign of ridding himſelf of his rival by aſſaſſination; and, accordingly, ſent meſſengers after Abner, to deſire him, in the name of David, to return immediately; he having omitted to mention a matter to him which was of great moment. Abner was overtaken by the meſſengers at Sirah, about twenty furlongs from Hebron, and, not ſuſpecting any miſchief, he readily accompanied them back to the latter city, at the entrance of which he was met by Joab and his brother Abiſhai, who, the better to conceal their infamous purpoſe, received him with the moſt flattering profeſſions of regard and eſteem.

He is treacherouſly ſlain by Joab.

When, under the pretext of private buſineſs, they had [illegible]n him on one ſide, to a diſtance from his attendants, Joab ſuddenly thruſt him through with his ſword. He pretended to juſtify this baſe and treacherous deed on the plea of reſentment for the death of his brother Aſahel; but his ſole motive to the commiſſion of the fact was, the fear leſt Abner, by his ſuperior merit and ſervices, ſhould prove a dangerous rival to him in the favour of the king.

David grieves for the murder of Abner, and denounces a curſe on Joab for the horrid deed.

David expreſſed the greateſt affliction for the untimely fate of Abner, and, in the moſt ſolemn manner, declared his utter ignorance of the barbarous deſign; venting, at the ſame time, the moſt bitter execrations on the perpetrators and abettors of ſo nefarious an action†. He ordered all the honors of a public mourning to be paid to his memory, and attended his funeral in perſon, as chief mourner, accompanied by all the great officers of ſtate. On this occaſion his whole deportment manifeſted the real eſteem he had entertained for Abner whilſt living, and the ſincere grief he felt for his death. He cauſed the body of Abner to be interred, with the utmoſt magnificence, at Hebron; and inſcribed on his tomb an epitaph of his own compoſition, in which he highly extolled the bravery and other numerous virtues of the deceaſed. By this conduct David conciliated the affection of the people in general, but eſpecially of the friends of Abner; and they unanimouſly exculpated him from all imputation of being acceſſary, either directly or indirectly, to the barbarous treachery of Joab.

† If we tranſlate the words uſed by David on this occaſion, "Let the blood of Abner reſt on the head of Joab, &c." in the future tenſe, inſtead of the imperative word, "It ſhall reſt, &c." the character of David may be cleared from aſperſions, and the ſentence, inſtead of an execration, will become a prophetical prediction, which David delivered by divine inſpiration, and which was, in the ſequel, accompliſhed in its greateſt extent. David had, indeed, the greateſt reaſon for expreſſing his indignation in the moſt paſſionate manner for ſo foul an act. Abner was a man of great power and authority, and at that time the head of the oppoſite party, and therefore rendered it ſuſpicious that David had ſome concern in the murder, as it was perpetrated by his firſt miniſter, and the general of his forces. Beſides, as Abner had been reconciled to David, the breach of faith and hoſpitality was added to the crime of murder, which was ſufficient to alienate the minds of the Iſraelites from him for ever.

CHAP. II.

ISHBOSHETH aſſaſſinated. The Conſpirators carry his Head to DAVID, who cauſes them to be put to Death. The Tribes unanimouſly concur in electing DAVID for their King. He aſſembles an Army, and makes himſelf Maſter of JERUSALEM.

ISHBOSHETH was extremely afflicted at the loſs of Abner, not only on account of his relationſhip, but alſo as by his intereſt and influence alone he had been advanced to the throne of his father. But that prince did not long ſurvive him, being treacherouſly murdered by Baanah and Rechab the ſons of Rimmon. Theſe men, who were two of the principal perſons of the tribe of Benjamin, vainly imagining that they ſhould thereby recommend themſelves to the higheſt preferments in the ſervice of David, determined to aſſaſſinate Iſhboſheth whenever an opportunity ſhould offer. Accordingly, at a time when that unfortunate prince had retired to repoſe himſelf, on account of the violent heat of the weather, they entered his chamber, his attendants being all aſleep, and, after having deprived him of life, they cut off his head, and then retired with the ſame privacy with which they had entered.

They immediately began their journey to Hebron, at which place, after travelling with the utmoſt expedition during the whole night, they arrived on the next day. But when they appeared before David, and preſented him with the head of Iſhboſheth, magnifying the ſervice they had rendered him by thus ridding him of his competitor for the kingdom, he, to their great aſtoniſhment, expreſſed his utter abhorrence of their conduct. David ordered theſe men to be taken from his preſence, and to be put to death: and he cauſed the head of Iſhboſheth to be placed in the tomb of Abner, with ſuch funeral ſolemnities as were due to the exalted ſtation of the deceaſed.

The tribes vow allegiance to David at Hebron.

Soon after this event, the principal perſons of the tribes of Iſrael, and the officers of the army repaired in a body to Hebron, where they ſolemnly acknowledged David as their king, vowed allegiance to him, and made him a formal tender of their lives and fortunes; repreſenting to him the predilection they had always manifeſted for him, even during the reign of Saul; adding, that they were convinced, from the declaration of the prophet Samuel, that he and his deſcendants were deſtined by the Almighty to rule over them for a ſucceſſion of ages, and that the important work of ſubduing the Philiſtines, and, conſequently, of eſtabliſhing the kingdom on the firm and ſolid baſis of peace and ſafety was reſerved alone for him. David expreſſed his acknowledgments; and aſſured them, that he would exert all his endeavours to fulfil their expectations. After having regaled them with the utmoſt magnificence for the ſpace of three days, he diſmiſſed them, with inſtructions to ſelect out of each tribe all thoſe who were capable of bearing arms, and to conduct them, properly equipped, to Hebron.

David unanimouſly choſen king.

Theſe troops repaired to David at Hebron; bringing with them corn, wine, and all other neceſſaries in the greateſt plenty. They unanimouſly ſaluted David with the title of king, and, after having ſpent three days in public rejoicings on the occaſion, he put himſelf at their head, and marched againſt Jeruſalem; which city was then inhabited by the Jebuſites, who were deſcended from the ancient Canaanites. Upon the approach of David, they ſhut their gates, and, to ſhew their contempt of the force he had brought againſt them, they placed their blind and lame on the walls, thereby intimating alſo their confidence in the natural ſtrength of the place. David was ſo highly incenſed at this inſult, that he determined to attack them in the moſt vigorous manner, without any further delay; hoping, by the capture of this place, to ſtrike ſuch a terror into the inhabitants of all the other cities, as ſhould induce them to ſubmit upon the very firſt ſummons.

He reduces Jeruſalem.

Having made the neceſſary diſpoſitions, he advanced to the walls, at the head of a ſelect body of his troops, and, by making a general aſſault, ſoon became maſter of the place‡: but the garriſon retired into the citadel. This fortreſs was of very conſiderable ſtrength, and David, conſidering how much his honour was concerned in the ſubjection of it, endeavoured to animate the courage of his ſoldiers and their leaders, by promiſes of pecuniary gratifications to the former, and by engaging to confer on him, among the latter, who ſhould firſt make good his ſtation on the parapet of the citadel, the poſt of commander in chief of all his forces. The proſpect of theſe rewards inſpired the Hebrews with ſo ſtrong an emulation, that each man performed miracles of valour on the occaſion: but it was the fortune of Joab to reach the top of the battlements, before any of his companions.

CHAP. III.

DAVID repairs and beautifies JERUSALEM, and eſtabliſhes his Court there. The King of TYRE ſends Embaſſadors to DAVID, and makes an Alliance with him.

Jeruſalem repaired, and alſo called the city of David.

AFTER the capture of the citadel, David repaired the fortifications of the place, and gave it the additional title of the city of David; and he removed his court thither, where it continued for the whole ſubſequent term of his reign. At the time of transferring his court from Hebron to Jeruſalem, he had reigned over the tribe of Judah alone ſeven years and ſix months; and, by the continual embelliſhments which he beſtowed on the latter place, it became, at length, the ſeat of the utmoſt ſplendor and magnificence.

Embaſſy of Hiram.

At this period embaſſadors were ſent by Hiram, king of Tyre, to ſolicit an alliance with David; and theſe perſons brought with them a valuable preſent of cedar-wood, and alſo a number of ingenious workmen, in different branches, for the purpoſe of conſtructing a palace for his reſidence in Jeruſalem. David united the fortreſs above-mentioned to the city, and encompaſſed both with a wall.

CHAP. IV.

DAVID gains ſeveral Victories over the PHILISTINES and their Allies. The Ark is conducted to JERUSALEM. UZZAH, for touching the Ark, ‡ David was of an enterpriſing genius, which he always employed for the honour and intereſt of his country. His ſiege of Jeruſalem was founded in juſtice, and the taking it neceſſary to the ſafety of his government and people. It was ſituated in the middle of the tribe of Benjamin, and taken by the Hebrews ſoon after Joſhua's death; not indeed the whole of it, but the lower city; for the Jebuſites kept poſſeſſion of the fortreſs of Zion, the Hebrews and Jebuſites dwelling together in the other part of the city after it was rebuilt. The Hebrews dwelt in it in the reign of Saul, for David took the head of the Philiſtine, and brought it to Jeruſalem; 1 Sam. xvii. 54. But the whole city, as well as the fort, was now in the hands of the Jebuſites; for when David demanded the reſtitution of the city, the Jebuſites ſay, "Thou ſhalt not come in hither." How it came into the poſſeſſion of the Jebuſites, is not ſaid. Probably they ſeized it during the war between Saul and the Philiſtines; or the conteſt between David and Iſhboſheth, which laſted for above ſeven years. David therefore had a right to recover it, as the ancient poſſeſſion and property of his people; and would have been an impolitic negligent prince, had he ſuffered ſo ſtrong a fortreſs, in the midſt of his dominions, to have remained in the hands of his enemies. And what fixed David the more in his reſolution to become maſter of it, was the inſult offered him by the Jebuſites in the town and fortreſs, upon the ſuppoſition that it was impregnable.

is punished with instant Death. DAVID sings and dances before it; and is reproached by his Wife MICHAL, as acting unbecomingly.

The Philistines attack the Hebrews, who defeat them.

WHEN intelligence was communicated to the Philistines that the sovereignty of David had been recognized by all the tribes, they marched into the country of the Israelites, and encamped on a spot, situated at a small distance from Jerusalem, which bears the name of the Valley of the Giants. David having consulted the Oracle, as was his constant custom before he entered upon any enterprize of importance, and having received a favourable answer, immediately marched against the enemy, whom he surprised in their camp, and routed with a prodigious slaughter.

Although this victory was obtained with great facility, and with a very trifling loss of men on the side of the Israelites, it must not be from thence inferred that the enemy were deficient either in numbers or bravery; they having called to their aid the Syrians, Phœnicians, and several other warlike nations; their frequent losses in former contests with the Hebrews having rendered them incapable of supporting a war without such assistance. Their martial spirit, however, was not depressed, for they again appeared in the field, with an army thrice as numerous as that with which they last invaded the country of the Hebrews, and encamped on the same spot on which they had been defeated by that people.

David once more consulted the Oracle, and was ordered to post his army in a certain forest, named the Grove of Mourning, and to lie quiet till he should perceive a supernatural agitation in the leaves and branches of the trees, without the slightest breath of air to occasion it; immediately upon which signal he might attack the enemy, with the most perfect confidence of success. These orders David closely observed, and the Philistines gave way on the first onset, and fled in the utmost confusion as soon as the Israelites advanced so near as to be able to use their swords. The Hebrews continued the pursuit, with great slaughter, as far as Gazer, which is situated on the frontiers of the country of the Philistines; after which they returned to plunder the enemy's camp, where they found an immense booty, and also the idols of the Philistines, which they utterly destroyed.

They are a second time worsted.

This war being terminated so speedily and fortunately for the Israelites, David, with the advice of the elders and chief persons of the several tribes, determined to march with his whole army, accompanied by the priests and Levites to Kirjath-jearim, for the purpose of conducting the ark of God from thence to Jerusalem; which city was destined to be the place at which the people were to assemble in future, to offer up their oblations, and to perform all the other offices of their religion; a proper observance of which duties, would have preserved Saul from the fatal catastrophe which he experienced.

David makes preparations for bringing the ark to Jerusalem.

When the necessary preparations had been made, the ark was removed from the house of Aminidab, by the priests and Levites, who placed it on a carriage constructed for the purpose, and drawn by oxen, and delivered it into the care of their sons, and the other persons of their families. David took the lead in the procession, and was followed by a numerous body of the people, dancing and singing hymns of praise to the Almighty, in which they were accompanied by various performers on the harp, cymbal, and other instruments. In this order they proceeded towards Jerusalem; and, when they arrived at the spot which is distinguished by the title of the Threshing-floor of Chidon, or Nachon, the oxen which drew the carriage chancing to stumble, Uzzah, who happened to be close to the ark at the time, put forth his hand to save it from falling, and was immediately struck dead by the judicial vengeance of heaven, in consequence of his presuming to touch it: a privilege enjoyed solely by the priests and Levites*. The unhappy fate of this man, greatly affected both David and the people in general; and the place was, from that day, intituled Perez-Uzzah, or the Transgression of Uzzah.

Uzzah's presumption punished with death.

The severity of the punishment inflicted on Uzzah so much alarmed David, that he was apprehensive lest a similar fate should attend himself, if he persisted in his design of removing the ark to Jerusalem: he, therefore, deposited it in the house of Obed-Edom, a Levite of great reputation for the sanctity of his manners, who lived in the open country, at some distance from that city, where it remained for the space of three months. During this period, Obed-Edom, whose circumstances had been hitherto much contracted, acquired a degree of wealth, which rendered him at once the envy and admiration of all who knew him. This incident being communicated to David, he no longer entertained any doubts of the propriety of conducting the ark to Jerusalem; and he, accordingly, gave immediate orders for its removal, which was performed in the following form:

The ark brought to the house of Obed-Edom.

A certain number of the priests went first, carrying the ark on their shoulders, and these were accompanied by a band of ſinging men, at the head of whom was the king himſelf, who danced and ſung with the reſt, to the ſound of his harp; and the proceſſion was cloſed by an infinite multitude of the people. Upon the arrival of the ark at Jeruſalem, it was placed in the tabernacle which David had cauſed to be built purpoſely for its reception; and ſo numerous were the oblations offered up in conſequence of this event, that each man, woman, and child, who were preſent at the ceremony, received a piece of fleſh and a cake of bread.

* The ark ought not to have been drawn by oxen, but carried by the Levites on their shoulders, as we find it afterwards; and their neglecting to do it on this solemn occasion, and consulting their ease more than their duty, was an offence of no small aggravation. Besides this, the Levites were prohibited from touching the ark, under the express penalty of death, Numb. iv. 15—20. And as this is the first instance that we have of violating this prohibition, the penalty of death was incurred, and therefore justly inflicted by him that threatened it, as an example to others, and to preserve a due reverence to the divine institution, and shews that the prohibition was divine; and as David himself and the whole house of Israel were present at the solemnity, the nature of the death, and the reason why it was inflicted, could not be concealed.

The ark conveyed to Jeruſalem.

When David returned to his palace, he was met by his wife Michal, the daughter of Saul; who could not refrain from reproaching him with an indecency of conduct, in dancing before the ark, in the manner above-mentioned, and thus expoſing himſelf to the deriſion of his ſervants and handmaids. But David juſtified the action, as being, he maintained, pleaſing to that Almighty Power, who had preferred him before the king her father, and all the reſt of his countrymen.

David forms a deſign to build a magnificent temple.

The uninterrupted felicity which David now enjoyed, inſpired him with the deſign of building a ſumptuous temple for the public worſhip of the Deity; deeming it in an high degree criminal, any longer to permit the ark of God to remain in ſo unworthy a building as a tabernacle, at a time when he reſided in a palace conſtructed and ornamented with the utmoſt profuſion of elegance and ſplendor; and to this he was further incited, by an ancient prediction of Moſes on that ſubject. Nathan the prophet alſo, to whom the king communicated the reſolution which he had formed, highly approved of the deſign, and encouraged him to execute it with all convenient diſpatch. But on the following night the Lord ſpake thus to Nathan: "Inform David, that I approve his propoſal for dedicating a temple to my worſhip; but that on account of the hoſtilities in which he has been engaged, having rendered him a man of blood, I cannot conſent to the deſign being carried into effect in his days. Inſtruct him, that on the concluſion of a long reign of felicity, he ſhall charge the execution of this important buſineſs to his ſon Solomon, who ſhall experience from me the tendereſt care of a father towards an only child. You are further commiſſioned to ſay, that if Solomon ſhall degenerate into wickedneſs, the land ſhall be viſited by ſickneſs or famine, but that the government ſhall not be tranſlated to another family." Nathan immediately repaired to David, and related this meſſage from the Almighty. David proſtrated himſelf before the ark, and worſhipped the Lord. "Almighty God (ſaid he) thou haſt exalted thy ſervant from the ſheep fold, to the eminence of regal power and dignity. For all thy benefits and mercies, glorified be thy holy name. I bleſs thee, O God, for thy providences towards myſelf, thy gracious promiſe to my poſterity, and for the many protections and deliverances of thy people*." Having accompanied this benediction with an hymn to the honour of God, he departed.

Meſſage from God, by the prophet Nathan, concerning it.

CHAP. V.

The PHILISTINES, the MOABITES, and the SOPHENIANS ſubdued by DAVID.

BEING naturally averſe to a life of inactivity, David determined to commence hoſtilities againſt the Philiſtines; and to proſecute this deſign, he was animated by the prediction, that having effectually vanquiſhed all his enemies, he ſhould leave the government to his ſucceſſor in a ſtate of perfect tranquillity.

In preparation for the conqueſt he had meditated, he called a general rendezvous of his forces; and when he judged them to be in a proper condition to march, he invaded the country of the enemy, and made ſeizure of very conſiderable tracts of land, which he annexed to the juriſdiction of the Iſraelites. He declared war againſt the Moabites, upon whom he committed a terrible ſlaughter. About one third of the enemy eſcaped the rage of battle, and they were rendered tributaries to David. Near the Euphrates he encountered, and obtained a complete victory over, Adrazar the ſon of Arach, who was king of the Sophenians. In this action he deſtroyed twenty thouſand foot, and five thouſand horſe. He took from the enemy a thouſand chariots, one hundred of which he reſerved, and the reſt he burnt.

David overcomes Adad, king of Syria.

Some time after, Adad, king of Syria and Damaſcus, marched a formidable army to the aſſiſtance of his friend and ally Adrazar, expecting thereby to remove the ſeat of war from the country of the Sophenians. After ſome ſkirmiſhes, a general engagement enſued near the Euphrates, wherein twenty thouſand of the troops of Adad were deſtroyed, and the reſt were put to flight.

His further conqueſts.

David ſubdued Damaſcus and the other parts of Syria, and eſtabliſhed garriſons in ſuch places as he judged to be convenient; and having ſubjected the whole country to contribution, he returned to Jeruſalem, taking with him the golden quivers and other rich trophies obtained in the battle with Adad. He dedicated this ſpoil to the Lord, in gratitude for the victory obtained through his favour; and ſtill continued to purſue his conqueſts under the evident aſſiſtance and protection of heaven. He beſieged two of the moſt conſiderable cities in the dominions of Adrazar, which were called Bettea and Machon, and acquired gold and ſilver to an immenſe value, excluſive of a conſiderable quantity of a kind of braſs, held in greater eſtimation even than gold itſelf; and this metal Solomon cauſed to be uſed in forming the beautiful baſons and the extenſive veſſel called the ſea, by which the temple was decorated.

* Abarbinel, in his explanation of this part of ſacred writ, tells us, that the royal prophet, on this occaſion, magnifies the goodneſs of the Lord, who had not only made him a powerful king, but had promiſed that his ſeed for a long ſeries of years, and at laſt, the great Meſſiah, the deſire of all nations, ſhould ſit upon his throne.

Toi enters into a league with David.

Toi, the king of Hamath, having received intelligence that David had ſubdued the army of Adrazar, he judged it expedient to provide for his own ſafety by connecting himſelf to the victor in a league of amity. He furniſhed his ſon Joram with a variety of magnificent preſents, conſiſting of antique veſſels in gold, ſilver, and braſs, curiouſly wrought, and in the higheſt perfection, and commiſſioned him to congratulate David on his victory over Adrazar, and to propoſe an alliance. The king graciouſly received the embaſſador, accepted the preſents, and gave him an honourable aſſurance that he acquieſced in the propoſed alliance. Theſe gifts, and the remaining part of the ſpoil obtained from the enemies he had conquered, he gratefully dedicated to the Lord, to whom he attributed the whole honour of his victories. David's ſucceſs was not confined to thoſe undertakings wherein he was perſonally engaged; for the Almighty favoured his cauſe in the enterprizes which were attempted by the officers he deputed, as will appear in the following inſtance: Abiſhai, the brother of Joab, being commiſſioned to lead an army againſt the Idumæans, encountered and cut off eighteen thouſand of the enemy, and having ſecured the intire ſubmiſſion of the reſt by the eſtabliſhment of a number of garriſons, made them tributaries, and impoſed a tax upon the whole people by the head.

Principal officers, &c.

David was a man of ſuch ſtrict integrity in the execution of his judicial character, that in all the appeals ſubmitted to his deciſion he never pronounced a ſent that was not ſtrictly conſiſtent with the principles of juſtice. He appointed Joab, the ſon of Zeruiah, to be his general; and Joſephat, the ſon of Ahilud, keeper of the records; from the houſe of Phinehas, he ſelected his friends Abiathar and Zadok to be his prieſts; and he nominated Seraiah his ſecretary; his perſonal guard, into which his elder ſons were incorporated, was commanded by Benaiah, the ſon of Jehoiada.

David inquires after Jonathan's iſſue.

Having regulated and eſtabliſhed his domeſtic concerns, the king directed his attention towards his deceaſed friend Jonathan; inquiring what ſons, friends, and relations he had left, with a view to make them the ſubjects for the exerciſe of his gratitude; for among his virtues was that of remembering paſt benefits, which he ever made it a point of conſcience to acknowledge and requite*. A man named Ziba, who had been in the ſervice of Saul, was brought to David as the moſt likely perſon to ſatisfy his inquiries; and from this man he learnt that a ſon of Jonathan, named Mephiboſheth, was ſtill living, and that he was lame of one leg, the nurſe having let him fall from her arms upon hearing of the terrible engagement wherein his father and grandfather were ſlain. Upon further inquiry, the king was informed that the ſon of his friend had been brought up by one Machir, of the city of Lodeba, where he ſtill remained. The king immediately ſent for the young man, who being ſoon brought into his preſence, proſtrated himſelf at his feet, and ſhewed him other marks of reverence. David encouraged him with the aſſurance that he might rely upon a continuance of the favour and protection of his ſovereign. He ſoon after gave him poſſeſſion of the eſtates and other effects left by his father and grandfather; receiving him as his particular gueſt, and appointing him to eat at his own table. Mephiboſheth having made grateful acknowledgments to his benefactor, Ziba was called, whom David commiſſioned to ſuperintend the grounds; and at ſtated periods, to deliver the profits to the ſon of Jonathan, who took up his reſidence with the king, and was on all occaſions treated with the reſpect due to a child of the family. The king further ordered that Ziba, his fifteen ſons and twenty others of his family, ſhould be the attendants upon Mephiboſheth. Mephiboſheth's iſſue was a ſon called Micha.

Hanun's inſulting uſage of David's meſſengers.

Nahaſh the king of the Ammonites, the friend and ally of David, died about this time, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Hanun; to whom David diſpatched an embaſſy to offer condolements in his affliction, and aſſurances of maintaining the league of amity which had ſubſiſted between him and the deceaſed. The principal people among the Ammonites falſely inſinuated to their king, that theſe meſſengers, under the pretext of being charged with a compliment of ſtate, had been ſent by David for the purpoſe of examining into the ſtrength and defenſive ſtate of the country; and they adviſed him to act with circumſpection, leſt the opportunity ſhould eſcape of fruſtrating the treacherous deſigns which they pretended to have been meditated by the king of Iſrael. Hanun, being prevailed upon by theſe unmerited calumnies, diſmiſſed the embaſſadors with one half of their beards and one half of their veſts cut off. In this condition they returned; and having repreſented to David the ignominious treatment they had received, he became highly incenſed againſt Hanun for his contempt of the laws of nations, honour, and hoſpitality, and determined to avenge the groſs inſult which had been offered to him, in the perſons of his embaſſadors, by an immediate declaration of war. The Ammonites being convinced that their perfidious conduct would not admit of excuſe, prepared to defend themſelves againſt David, who they learnt had formed the reſolution of vindicating himſelf by force of arms. Hanun diſpatched embaſſadors to Syrus, king of Meſopotamia, with a preſent of a thouſand talents, in order to engage him in an alliance; Syrus conſented, and obtained the aſſiſtance of the king of Zoba, in ſupport of the cauſe of the Ammonites. The joint forces of theſe kings amounted to twenty-two thouſand foot. The aſſiſtance of the king of Maachab, and of king Iſhtob was likewiſe purchaſed, and they alſo muſtered twenty-two thouſand men equipped for war.

* David's generous diſpoſition towards the children of Jonathan, evidenced a grateful and princely ſpirit: his benevolence herein alſo implied thankfulneſs to God, for being elevated to the regal dignity in the room of Saul; who, though his inveterate enemy, is remembered with kindneſs, and whoſe poſterity, agreeable to the oath David had taken, had many favours heaped upon them.

CHAP. VI.

JOAB obtains a Victory over HANUN and the confederate Powers. DAVID defeats the King of SYRIA, and commits a terrible Slaughter upon his Army. DAVID becomes enamoured of BATHSHEBA, and, after having gratified his Paſſion, contrives the Death of her Huſband. AMNON violates TAMAR, and her Brother ABSALOM meditates his Deſtruction.

The Syrians are defeated.

CONSCIOUS of the ſupport of God in a juſt cauſe, the courage of David ſuffered no diminution on account of the powerful confederacy which was formed againſt him. He intruſted the conduct of the army to Joab, who proceeded on his march, and encamped before the principal city of the enemy, which was called Rabbah. The troops marched out of the town, and the auxiliaries were drawn up in order of battle in the open field, while the Ammonites were ranged under the walls of the town, facing the Hebrew army. Joab made a ſimilar diſpoſition of his army, and giving the command of one body to his brother Abiſhai, with orders to attack the Ammonites, he put himſelf at the head of the other, which was compoſed of choſen men, and prepared to engage Syrus. It being agreed, that in caſe of either being hard preſſed by the enemy, the other ſhould repair to his aſſiſtance; and Joab having enjoined his brother to an honourable diſcharge of the truſt repoſed in him, they proceeded to their reſpective deſtinations. Joab gave battle to Syrus, who for ſome time maintained a courageous defence, but a conſiderable number of his men being cut off, the reſt declined the conteſt and made a retreat. This circumſtance ſtruck the Ammonites with ſuch terror, that they retired into the town before Abiſhai approached to offer them battle. Joab now led his army in triumph back to Jeruſalem.

The Ammonites and Syrians are again overcome.

Notwithſtanding this ſignal defeat, the reſtleſs ſpirit of the Ammonites ſtill remained unſubdued; and they applied to Chalama, king of the Syrians, who was ſtationed on the other ſide the Euphrates, for an auxiliary force, which he undertook to provide on condition of receiving a ſtipulated price. Chalama appointed Shobac, his lieutenant general, to lead an army of eighty thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe to the aſſiſtance of the Ammonites. In conſequence of the formidable reinforcement which the enemy had received, David judged it to be no longer expedient to intruſt the conduct of the war to his deputies; and therefore he aſſumed the command of his whole army, and having paſſed the Jordan, proceeded to an engagement, in which he killed forty thouſand foot and ſeven thouſand horſe: Shobach, the general of Chalama, received a wound in the action which cauſed his death. The preſumption of the Meſopotamians being effectually humbled by this event, they ſent embaſſadors with preſents to David; and with acknowledgments of ſubmiſſion to his power, they were commiſſioned to intreat that he would decline a further proſecution of the war. David now returned to Jeruſalem; and Joab was again diſpatched againſt the Ammonites, whom he obliged to retire into Rabbah, to which place he a ſecond time laid ſiege, and committed great havock in that city and ſeveral other parts of the enemy's country.

Account of David's adultery with Bathſheba, and murder of Uriah.

Though David was a man of great piety and juſtice, he was not exempt from the frailties of human nature; for he was guilty of an heinous crime, whereby he incurred the diſpleaſure of the Almighty. In the cool of the evening, as he was walking on the terrace of his palace, he perceived a woman of moſt exquiſite beauty who was bathing. He inſtantly conceived a violent paſſion for her, and cauſed her to be brought to his bed. She became pregnant, and repreſenting to the king that if her fault ſhould be diſcovered, the laws of her country would condemn her to death, ſupplicated him to deviſe ſome means for keeping the affair profoundly ſecret. Uriah, Joab's armour bearer, and the huſband of this woman, who was named Bathſheba, was ordered into the preſence of the king, who queſtioned him concerning the ſtate of the army, and the progreſs of the ſiege. He replied, that things were in the moſt favourable train for ſucceſs. David invited him to ſupper, and after the repaſt, ordered him to repair to his habitation and repoſe that night with his wife. Uriah, notwithſtanding, remained among the guards in the palace; and when this was known to the king, he aſked him on what account he had neglected the opportunity of viſiting his wife, after ſo long an abſence? Uriah an-

The other, which may be named the parapet-wall, hangs immediately over the court, being always breaſt-high, and anſwers to the battlements, Deut. xxii. 8. Inſtead of this parapet wall, the tops or terraces of ſome houſes are guarded with baluſtrades, or latticed work, which ſeems to be the ſame with that net or lattice, 2 Kings i. 2. ſwered, that he judged it not conſiſtent with the honour of a ſoldier to indulge himſelf in the embraces of his wife at a time when his general and fellow ſoldiers lay on the earth in the open country of an enemy. The king commanded him to remain another night, telling him he ſhould return to the camp on the following day. He was again called to ſupper with David, and he plied him with liquors in expectation that in the gaiety of his heart he would go to Bathſheba; but he was diſappointed, for Uriah ſpent this night alſo, as he had done the preceding one, among the guards. This proved ſo highly aggravating to the king, that he wrote to Joab, informing him, that being juſtly incenſed againſt Uriah, he was determined to puniſh him according to his demerits*: this letter further expreſſed, that to prevent any reproach falling upon David, Joab ſhould appoint Uriah to undertake ſome deſperate enterprize, and that his companions ſhould be inſtructed to deſert him to the mercy of the enemy. David having written this letter, and ſealed it with the royal ſeal, committed it to the care of Uriah, to be delivered to Joab, who having received it, obeyed the royal mandate by ordering Uriah to undertake a moſt dangerous expedition; but, to put a face of plauſibility on the matter, commiſſioned ſeveral men of acknowledged bravery to ſecond him; and told him, that if any difficulty aroſe as to his entrance into the town, he ſhould be ſupported by the whole army. Joab likewiſe recommended it to him, to ſupport the character he already held in the opinion both of the king and the army, by every poſſible exertion of his military courage. Uriah accepted the commiſſion with great readineſs; but Joab gave private orders to thoſe who attended him, to deſert him when they found that he was ſurrounded with the utmoſt difficulties. As the Hebrews preſſed hard upon the wall, the Ammonites were apprehenſive that they would enter the town by force; on which they threw open their gates, and ruſhed out in great numbers; which ſerved as a hint to thoſe who attended Uriah, that this was the preciſe moment to obey the orders of Joab, by deſerting him. Thus, then, they left him at the mercy of his enemies, againſt whom he fought with aſtoniſhing reſolution, and did wonders with his ſingle arm againſt an oppoſing multitude; but after being wounded in ſeveral places, he fell breathleſs on the ground; and with him fell a ſmall number of his friends, who had not been informed of the plot laid againſt him.

As ſoon as the conteſt was ended, Joab ſent an expreſs to David, acquainting him that, to put a ſpeedy end to the ſiege, he had made an aſſault on the town, but had been compelled to retreat to the camp, with the loſs of ſeveral of his men. Joab gave private inſtructions to the perſon who carried this expreſs, that if David appeared affected with his information, he might add, that Uriah was among the ſlain.

David having expreſſed his diſapprobation of the conduct of Joab, the meſſenger mentioned, as a caſual circumſtance, the death of Uriah; on which the king obſerved, that it was but an effect of the common chance of war, and that ſoldiers muſt be alike prepared to meet every change of circumſtances†.

The intelligence received of Uriah's death occaſioned Bathſheba to ſhut herſelf up for ſome time, while ſhe paid the tribute of mourning to his memory; but no ſooner was the ſeaſon of ſorrow at an end, than David eſpouſed her, and ſhe ſoon afterwards made him the mother of a ſon. So contrary was this match to the will of heaven, that Nathan the prophet was informed, in a dream, of the diſpleaſure of God on the occaſion, and commiſſioned to reprimand David for his crime. Nathan, who poſſeſſed great knowledge of mankind, conſidering how little regard princes paid to the admonition of reaſon, particularly while they were under the influence of their paſſions, inſtead of directly informing David of what he had learnt in the viſion, introduced his inſtructions by way of narrative, as will be ſeen in the following recital.

"Two men (ſaid he) dwelt in the ſame city, one of whom was diſtinguiſhed by his affluence, having plenty of oxen, ſheep, and all other kinds of cattle. The other was a very poor man, poſſeſſed of only one ſingle lamb, which he reared and fed with his children, and loved it as tenderly as if it had been his own child. It happened that the rich man had a viſitor came to ſee him, whom he could not do leſs than entertain in an hoſpitable manner; but rather than furniſh his table from his own abundant ſtore, he cauſed the poor man to be robbed of his only lamb, to furniſh a ſupper for the viſitor."—"Wretch that he is (cried the king) to be guilty of ſo inhoſpitable an action; he ought to make fourfold reſtitution to the injured party, and forfeit his life as a farther atonement;"—On which Nathan inſtantly ſaid, "Thou art the man, and ſtandeſt condemned from the words of thy own mouth."—After this declaration the prophet related the particulars of his viſion, ſaying how highly God was offended with the conduct of David: reminded him of his ingratitude to

* This account differs very materially, in ſeveral parts of it, from that given in holy writ; and it ſhould ſeem that Joſephus had not conſulted the ſacred writings on this ſubject, but had only regarded traditional information. Notwithſtanding the difference, this may be eſteemed as one amongſt many other proofs of the authenticity of the ſcriptures: for although other hiſtorians may differ in the relation of the ſame circumſtance, it is a corroborative evidence that ſuch circumſtance really occurred, and that there was no colluſion between them to deceive mankind.

that Providence which had advanced him to the throne, ſubjected the ſurrounding nations to his command, and repeatedly delivered him from the hands of Saul. "And now (ſaid Nathan) ſhall you, who have a number of legal wives, compel in defiance of all laws divine and human, the wife of another man to cohabit with you, and then betray the huſband to certain death from the hands of the enemy! What, after ſuch conduct, can you expect, but that the vengeance of Heaven ſhould overtake you?"—Nathan farther ſaid, that David ſhould live to know that one of his ſons had committed a rape on his women, and ſhould find that ſon brought to condign puniſhment. The prophet moreover added, that this child by Bathſheba ſhould die in a ſhort time. The terrors of theſe words affected David to ſuch a degree, that he trembled with apprehenſion, and confeſſed his ſins with tears expreſſive of his contrition. In conſideration of the good tenor of his life, and that, except in this caſe of Uriah, he had acted as a righteous man, God took compaſſion upon him, and accepted his repentance, promiſing, by his prophet, the continued poſſeſſion of his life and kingdom.

The prophecy of Nathan * having been thus delivered, he took his leave of the king; but he had not been long departed, when the child of Bathſheba, by David, was ſmote with a ſevere illneſs, which afflicted David to ſuch a degree, that he retired to his chamber, and remained there ſeven days, refuſing all kinds of food, laying on the ground wrapped in ſackcloth, and praying inceſſantly for the life of that child to whoſe mother he was ſo much attached. The child died on the ſeventh day; but ſtill the family avoided acquainting the king with it, as they conceived that he whoſe grief was ſo exceſſive, as to induce him to refuſe the common neceſſaries of life only on account of the child's illneſs, would not hear with any kind of patience the news of his death.

The looks of the domeſtics ſufficiently appriſed David that ſomething unuſual had happened, of which they were afraid to give him intelligence; and attributing the matter to its true cauſe, he acquainted one of the ſervants with his ſuſpicions, who owned that the child was dead. Hereupon David aroſe from the ground, waſhed himſelf, put on clean garments, and having ordered his ſervants to provide ſupper againſt his return, went to the tabernacle to worſhip God. A conduct ſo extraordinary and unexpected filled the relations and domeſtics of David with aſtoniſhment: they thought it ſtrange that he ſhould ſo calmly reſign to the death of the child, when his dangerous illneſs only had given riſe to ſo extravagant and ungovernable a degree of grief. Curioſity prompting them to know the real cauſe of this alteration in David's conduct, they hinted their wiſhes to him, and he replied, that "While the child was living, and there were yet hopes of his recovery, he was unwearied in prayer to God to ſpare his life; but when he was abſolutely dead, it would have been equally fooliſh and preſumptuous to weary heaven any longer with his prayers; or to grieve for an irrevocable event." Theſe ſentiments of David were generally approved by all who heard them. Some time after this Bathſheba had a ſon by David, to whom he gave the name of Solomon, in conſequence of the advice of the prophet Nathan.

The Ammonites were by this time extremely diſtreſſed by Joab, who had prevented their receiving ſupplies of proviſions, and cut off all their water except one ſmall ſpring, which they were obliged to uſe very ſparingly, leſt that alſo ſhould fail them; ſo that they were on the verge of periſhing through hunger and thirſt. At this juncture, Joab diſpatched to David a minute account of the ſituation of affairs, requeſting his perſonal attendance at the deſtruction of the city, as an event that would be worthy to be recorded among the other diſtinguiſhed actions of the king's life. No ſooner had David received Joab's diſpatches, than, convinced of his zeal and loyalty, he aſſembled his army, and marched at the head thereof to the aſſault of Rabbah, which being taken by ſtorm, the king allowed his troops all the plunder, which was of immenſe value, excepting a crown of gold, weighing a talent, on which was a ſardonyx ſtone, which was afterwards conſtantly worn by David. The inhabitants of Rabbah were put to death with circumſtances of great torture; and all the other rebellious Ammonite cities ſhared the ſame fate.

Soon after the iſſue of this diſtinguiſhed victory, its glory was tarniſhed by a moſt unfortunate circumſtance. David had a maiden daughter, named Tamar, who was deemed, beyond all compariſon, the greateſt beauty of the age in which ſhe lived; and ſhe was born of the ſame mother as Abſalom. With this daughter, Amnon, the eldeſt ſon of David, fell violently in love; but as ſhe was ſtrictly guarded, and was poſſeſſed of an innate modeſty, he ſaw no proſpect of ſucceſs in addreſſing her, and pined away through exceſs of grief. This change in Amnon, which daily increaſed to an alarming degree, being obſerved by Jonathan, who was his friend and relation, and a perſon of uncommon ſagacity and penetration, he aſked him the cauſe of his indiſpoſition, and particularly queſtioned him if love was not at the bottom of it; which Jonathan really imagined to be the caſe. To this Amnon replied, that he was enamoured of his own ſiſter; on which, Jonathan gave him a hint how he might gratify his wiſhes. "Feign yourſelf ſick, (ſaid he) and when David pays you a viſit, tell him that you wiſh for the company of your ſiſter, whoſe kind attendance you think will tend greatly to the reſtoration

of your health*." This advice was followed by Amnon; who, on ſeeing David, requeſted his ſiſter's company. This being granted, he begged her to make him ſome cakes; which ſhe made, and baked in his preſence, and preſented them to him; but he refuſed to touch them, and directed the ſervants to leave the apartment, ſaying that he wiſhed to compoſe himſelf. They were no ſooner gone than he begged his ſiſter to carry the cakes into a private room, which ſhe complied with; and he following her, made uſe of every poſſible argument to induce her to gratify his unnatural paſſion. The harmleſs maiden expoſtulated with him, called out for aſſiſtance, and intreated him not to think of ſacrificing the honour of his family for ſuch an extravagant luſt. "Let me be gone, (cried ſhe) for God's ſake, and learn to regulate your deſires by the dictates of honour, religion, and law: or think how you may obtain your father's conſent, nor ſeek to gratify your paſſion by violent means." All her intreaties, however, were in vain; his paſſion made him deaf to the voice of reaſon, and notwithſtanding all her endeavours to the contrary, he forcibly violated her perſon.

Amnon's baſe treatment of her.

The paſſion of Amnon was no ſooner gratified, than the violent love he appeared to have had for his ſiſter was changed into as violent a degree of hatred, and in a moſt imperious tone he commanded her to quit his apartments†. Shocked at this treatment, ſhe aſked if, after having been thus injured, ſhe was to be expoſed to the public, and diſmiſſed, by day-light, to tell the world how ſhe had been inſulted. "This treatment, (ſaid ſhe) even aggravates, if any thing can aggravate, the horror of the crime of which you have been guilty; for in the former inſtance at leaſt, the prevalence of an ungovernable paſſion might be pleaded." All her remonſtrances, and even her ſtruggles were fruitleſs; Amnon ordered his ſervants to turn her out of the houſe; and they complied. As ſhe went through the ſtreets with her veſt torn, and aſhes on her head, lamenting the ill uſage ſhe had received, ſhe was met by her brother Abſalom, who, ſurpriſed at the ſingularity of her appearance, demanded what had happened to her; on which ſhe related the particulars of the ſhocking ill uſage ſhe had received. By way of conſolation, Abſalom ſaid that ſhe was not ſo blameable, as the crime was perpetrated by her own brother; and Tamar becoming thereon ſomewhat pacified, went with Abſalom to his houſe, and reſided with him a conſiderable time.

When David was acquainted with this affair, he was afflicted beyond expreſſion; but as Amnon was his eldeſt and moſt beloved ſon, he declined to puniſh him as the crime deſerved. In the mean time, Abſalom waited for a proper opportunity to be revenged on Amnon‡; and after the expiration of two years from the rape of Tamar, he invited his father and brothers to attend at a ſheep-ſhearing at Baal-Hazor, a city in the tribe of Benjamin. David urged the trouble and extraordinary expence, as a reaſon for his non-attendance; on which Abſalom requeſted, that his brothers only might come; to which David conſenting, Abſalom iſſued orders to his ſervants to attack and kill Amnon when he was in liquor, on a ſignal to be given by their maſter; which they, watching the proper opportunity, executed accordingly.

CHAP. VII.

ABSALOM retreats to GESHUR. JOAB obtains Permiſſion for his Return; and, after a while, to wait on DAVID, whoſe Leave he procures to go and pay a Vow at Hebron, where he gets himſelf proclaimed King. DAVID retires from JERUSALEM. ABSALOM, by the Advice of ACHITOPHEL, is guilty of an heinous Offence.

THE outrage committed on the life of Amnon affected the reſt of the brothers to ſuch a degree, that, conceiving the plot to be intended equally againſt them all, they mounted their horſes, and haſtened away to their father. In the interim, a meſſenger arrived, and informed David that Abſalom had cauſed all his brothers to be ſlain. This afflictive news had ſuch an influence on the mind of David, that, without waiting for a confirmation of it, or reflecting on its incredibility, he abandoned himſelf to the extremity of grief, tore his garments, and, proſtrating himſelf on the ground, lamented equally the horrid crime of the murderer, and the unhappy fate of the deceaſed.

When this news arrived, Jonathan the ſon of Shimei, the brother of David, being with him, adviſed him to have patience, till he had conſidered the improbability of the circumſtance, and received farther information: "For (ſaid he) as there is not the leaſt reaſon to believe all your ſons ſhould be ſlain, I cannot give credit to the ſtory: with regard to Amnon, indeed, it is not improbable but Abſalom may have taken this opportunity to wreak his vengeance on him, for the inſult offered to his ſiſter." During their converſation they heard the feet of horſes, and the noiſe of people as juſt come off a journey; and, on inquiry, they found that the ſons of David, who had eſcaped from the houſe of Abſalom, were juſt then arrived.

* This perſon is here honoured with the name of Jonathan, the approved friend of David; but, alas! a far different ſpirit was in him! In the ſcripture account, he is called Jonadab.

† When love is unlawful, it is vexatious and tormenting in the extreme. Its enormity muſt ſtrike the ſoul with horror, and the impoſſibility of an innocent gratification muſt increaſe that horror to deſpair. A ſituation too painful for human nature to endure.

‡ Becauſe Abſalom neither threatened nor expoſtulated, nor even took the leaſt notice of what had paſſed, Amnon lulled himſelf into a belief that Abſalom would not trouble him on account of his baſe conduct towards Tamar: whereas he had greater reaſon to apprehend that Abſalom was meditating ſome terrible revenge.

This

This meeting between David and his children was very affecting, and mutual tears flowed in abundance. The father wept at once with joy at the ſight of thoſe ſons whom he ſuppoſed to be no longer living, and through grief at the recollection of him whom he knew to be dead: while the ſons lamented the murder of their brother, but were conſoled at the thought of returning ſafe to their father: ſo that the whole ſcene was wonderfully pathetic. In the interim, Abſalom departed to Geſhur, where he remained about three years with his grandfather by the mother's ſide, who was a man of conſiderable rank and influence.

Joab's ſtratagem for recalling Abſalom.

By the expiration of this time, the anger of David towards his ſon Abſalom was in a great meaſure ſubſided, and he became diſpoſed to recall him to his favour and friendſhip; and this diſpoſition of the king being obſerved by Joab, the friend of Abſalom, who was continually with David, he conſidered how to improve it to the advantage of his friend. To effect his purpoſe, he had recourſe to an ancient and venerable woman, whom he cauſed to be cloathed in deep mourning, and inſtructed her to lay her caſe before the king, which ſhe repreſented, by way of petition, in the following manner, viz. That two of her ſons, who reſided in the country, having had an unfortunate quarrel, which grew to that height that they came to blows, one of them was unhappily killed in the conteſt: whereupon, ſome of the friends of the deceaſed demanded juſtice to be done on the murderer. Wherefore ſhe ſolicited the king to ſpare the life of her ſon, who, notwithſtanding his offence, was the only comfort of her old age. She added, that her ſon's enemies were ſo determined in their malice, that nothing could protect him, but the interference of the royal authority; and that ſhe had no hope of relief, but in the mercy of her ſovereign *. Having acted her part with great ſkill, the king was induced to comply with her requeſt: upon which, having made many acknowledgments of his conſiderate goodneſs to a mother who ſolicited the life of an only child, ſhe yet beſought his majeſty to grant her one further favour, as a proof that ſhe ſhould not fail to reap the benefit of the royal promiſe; and this was, that he would let the pardon of her child be preceded by that of his own ſon Abſalom: for by extending his compaſſion to him, there could remain no doubt but the intended mercy would be ratified in the caſe of her own child. She added, that as his majeſty had already the misfortune to have loſt one ſon, it would be very inhuman for himſelf to be the deſtruction of another.

David now began to conjecture, that this application of the woman was in conſequence of the advice of Joab; and interrogating her on the ſubject, he found it to be as he ſuſpected; wherefore calling Joab to him, he acquainted him, that his device had ſucceeded, that his anger againſt Abſalom had ſubſided; that he freely pardoned him; and that Joab might recall him whenever he thought proper. This was joyful news to Joab; who, having made the moſt grateful acknowledgments to his ſovereign, repaired inſtantly to Geſhur, and brought back his friend Abſalom to Jeruſalem. When the king was informed of the return of his ſon, he ſent a meſſage to him, importing, that he muſt abſtain from appearing before him for the preſent, for that he could not yet be reconciled to the ſight of him; whereupon, Abſalom remained within the walls of his own houſe, that he might by no means come into the preſence of the king. The trouble and anxiety he had for ſome time paſt encountered, together with the manner of his living, had been rather incompatible with his rank as the ſon of David; yet the ſingular manlineſs and grace of his perſon was not in the leaſt diminiſhed, ſo that he was deemed the wonder of his age. Once in eight months he uſed to cut his hair, and in that ſhort ſpace of time it would grow to the weight of two hundred ſhekels, which are equal to five pounds.

He lived in Jeruſalem, in the private manner above-mentioned, about two years, and by this time had become father of four children, viz. three ſons and a daughter; the latter of whom was remarkably diſtinguiſhed by her beauty, and was afterwards the wife of Rehoboam, the ſon of Solomon, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Abia. As Abſalom grew uneaſy from his mode of living, he ſent to his friend Joab, to obtain permiſſion for him to wait on his father, in hopes that a perfect reconciliation might be the conſequence of an interview. Having in vain expected an anſwer for ſome time, he diſpatched ſome of his ſervants into a field belong to Joab, to burn his corn on the ground, as it was growing. This coming to the knowledge of Joab, he went to Abſalom, complained of the injury, and demanded the reaſon of ſuch proceeding; to which the latter replied, that he had no other way of obtaining ſight of him; that he had written to requeſt his interceſſion with his father, but that he had done nothing in the buſineſs: and added a wiſh, that he would endeavour to pacify the king; "for (ſaid he) if he ſtill continues inflexible, baniſhment itſelf would be preferable to my preſent condition †." This addreſs affected Joab ſo much, that he made immediate application to David, and was ſo ſucceſsful in his ſuit, that the king gave orders for his ſon to be admitted to his preſence. This favour being obtained, Abſalom threw himſelf at the feet of his father, and humbly ſued for pardon of all his paſt offences: on which David extended his right hand, raiſed him up, and gave him the moſt ſolemn aſſurance that all former crimes ſhould be buried in everlaſting oblivion.

* The whole intention of this woman's ſpeech was, to frame a caſe ſimilar to that of David, in order to convince him how much more reaſonable it was to preſerve Abſalom. But there was great art in not making the ſimilitude too plain and viſible, leſt the king ſhould perceive the deſign of her petition, before ſhe had obtained a grant of pardon for her ſon, and came to make the application to the king.

† The ſeverity David thought proper to inflict upon his ſon, by not permitting him to appear in the royal preſence, was intended not only to make him ſorry for what he had done, but alſo to convince the people how deteſtable his crime was in his ſight, and how averſe he would be to pardon murderers, ſince he could not endure the ſight of a ſon whoſe hand was defiled with a brother's blood. His affection to him did not hinder him from ſeeing that it would not be for his honour to admit him to be near his perſon.

Abſalom aſpires to the crown.

Within a ſhort time, Abſalom became ſo much ingratiated in the favour and affection of the king, that he was permitted to keep a ſplendid equipage, to retain fifty men as his body guard, and to have a great number of ſervants and dependents, beſides chariots and horſes in proportion. He was conſtantly one of the moſt officious in perſonal attendance on the king, yet at the ſame time ever ready to beſpeak, by the moſt plauſible behaviour, the affections of the people. When any perſon who had a cauſe in litigation came to ſue for juſtice, he would treat him in the moſt familiar manner, demanding his name, country, buſineſs, &c. and aſk if he could be perſonally ſerviceable. On the application of ſuch as appeared diſcontented at the paſſing of a hard ſentence, or when verdicts had gone againſt them, he uſed to obſerve, that "bad men were about the king; that his majeſty was ſometimes miſtaken as well as other people; and hinted, that if himſelf had been in the place of others, things would not have happened as they had done:" he would then wiſh the perſons who applied, great ſucceſs, and, in the moſt artful way imaginable, endeavour to ripen their ſentiments to the promotion of the ſcheme he had in view.

Abſalom, by diſſimulation, acquires popularity, and is proclaimed king.

By theſe inſidious methods, he ſoon gained over a large party to his intereſt; and, in the fourth year from the reconcilement to his father, thinking his plan then ripe for the execution, he aſked permiſſion to repair to Hebron, there to fulfil a vow which he had made during his baniſhment. David readily granting his requeſt, he invited a great number of people to attend him, and was followed by many others; among whom was Ahithophel, the Gilonite, the king's principal miniſter, who was attended by two hundred inhabitants of Jeruſalem: but neither theſe nor Ahithophel knew of the intended deſign, namely, to proclaim Abſalom king, which was ſoon afterwards done, by the common conſent of the people.

David departs from Jeruſalem.

Information of this atrocious act being brought to David, he ſtood aſtoniſhed at the inſolence and ingratitude of his ſon, who, after having obtained the royal pardon and being taken into favour, could ſo ſoon embark in ſo rebellious a plot: for it ſeems that the ſcheme was, not only to ſeize on the kingdom, which was the gift of God to David, but to attempt his life alſo. In this perplexing ſituation, the king deliberated with his friends, on the ſteps moſt proper to be taken; and it was agreed that he ſhould go over the river Jordan, to ſome place of greater ſecurity, committing to ten of his concubines the care of the royal palace. Having reſolved, then, to leave the event of this affair to the Almighty, he ſet out on his journey, attended by immenſe numbers of people, who voluntarily embarked in the cauſe of their ſovereign; particularly his ſix hundred friends, who had heretofore ſo faithfully attached themſelves to him when he was perſecuted by Saul. Abiathar and Zadock the high-prieſts, together with the Levites, would gladly have taken the ark with them, and attended David; but he adviſed them not to think of removing, and enforced his requeſt by obſerving, that the preſence of the holy ark would not be neceſſary for his protection, as he ſhould be immediately under that of heaven. His laſt advice was, that they ſhould deviſe ſome private method of informing him, from time to time, of ſuch news as it might import him to be acquainted with: and theſe inſtructions were afterwards admirably obeyed by the good conduct of Jonathan the ſon of Abiathar, and Ahimaaz the ſon of Zadock. With regard to Ittai the Gittite, though adviſed to the contrary, he inſiſted on a perſonal attendance on his ſovereign, whom he accordingly attended.

He hears of the defection of Ahithophel.

As David, ſurrounded by the weeping multitude, was walking bare-footed up mount Olivet, a perſon arrived expreſs, with information that Ahithophel had deſerted his duty, and taken part with the rebellious Abſalom: which news ſo ſhocked the king, that he beſought the Almighty to deprive him of his ſenſes*. Ahithophel was a man of ſo great penetration and ſubtilty, that there was nothing David dreaded ſo much, as the pernicious effects of his counſels.

David had no ſooner reached the ſummit of the mountain, than he caſt his eyes on the city, and wept while he lamented the loſs of his government: on this ſpot he met with the loyal and friendly Huſhai, who, with his cloaths torn and ſtrewing aſhes on his head, was regretting the uncertainty of all ſublunary enjoyments. David encouraged him to bear up under the misfortune with reſolution; and earneſtly adviſed him to return to Jeruſalem, where he might be of eſſential ſervice, by pretending to ſide with the friends of Abſalom, which would give him an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the counſels, and perplexing the ſchemes of Ahithophel. Huſhai, convinced by theſe reaſons, went back to Jeruſalem, to which place Abſalom likewiſe ſoon after repaired.

Falſehood and treachery of Ziba.

David continuing his journey, was met by Ziba, a ſervant to Mephiboſheth, to whom the king had committed the management of an eſtate which he had given to the ſon of his friend Jonathan. Ziba, who was driving a couple of aſſes, complimented David and his attendants with their choice of any part of the burden of his beaſts. Ziba

* The ſacred writer does not ſay ſo much as this; but repreſents David as praying that the counſel of Ahithophel (which was ſo ſure and ſafe, that it was generally followed without ever doubting of its ſucceſs) might be "turned into fooliſhneſs," or fruſtrated and over-ruled.

being asked where his master was, replied, that he was at Jerusalem, entertaining hopes that, in honour of the memory of Saul, the people might be induced to take advantage of the present disturbances, to elect him their sovereign. David was so enraged at this instance of ingratitude, that he resumed the estate above-mentioned, which he committed to the care of Ziba, who deemed himself highly gratified by the trust.

Shimei curses and insults David.

When David, in the course of his journey, arrived near Bahurim, Shimei, the son of Gera (a relation of Saul), advancing towards him, threw stones at and cursed him; and abused him the more violently, the more his friends took the part of their sovereign. Shimei attributed all the public calamities to David, whom, with most opprobrious language, he directed to quit the country; thanking God, that his own son had retaliated upon him the insults which David had heretofore offered to his father. All the company present were shocked at this behaviour, and he would certainly have fallen a sacrifice to the resentment of Abishai, but for the interposition of David, who advised him to restrain his passion, and not seek to increase the present calamities. Having given this advice, David proceeded slowly on one side of the mountain, while Shimei went on the other side, cursing him as he advanced *. At length David and his followers arrived on the bank of the river, where they halted to take refreshment after their tedious march, the troops being mustered on the occasion.

Hushai pretends to join Absalom.

About this time, Absalom and Ahithophel arrived at Jerusalem, where prodigious crowds of people received them with every demonstration of joy; nor did Hushai fail to make one of the number, to cry "God save the king," and to wish that his reign might be long and prosperous. Absalom, struck by this circumstance, demanded how it happened that the zealous Hushai should desert his king, and attach himself to the interest of another? To which Hushai artfully replied, that the will of God, and the approbation of the people were not to be resisted. This speech lulled all suspicion that Absalom might have entertained of Hushai.

Ahithophel's abominable counsel followed.

Ahithophel was now consulted what was proper to be done in the present posture of affairs; and his advice was, that Absalom should lay with all David's concubines; and he enforced his advice by saying, that when matters were thus advanced beyond a possibility of reconcilement, the people would infer that the state was more secure. "In the present state of things, (added he) they may think a reconciliation may be effected, in which case their safety would be endangered by declaring in your favour." This advice was followed; and a tent being erected in the place for the occasion, Absalom, in the view of the people, lay with the king's concubines. Thus the prophecy of Nathan, respecting what would befal David, was fulfilled †.

* Whether this man had been a personal sufferer in the fall of Saul's family, or what had exasperated him against David, no where appears; but it seems as if he had conceived some rancorous hatred to him, when neither the presence of the king, nor the terror of his guards, could restrain him from throwing stones, and venting bitter speeches against him; and it appears as if the king was fallen into the utmost contempt, when a private man could think of venting his malice at him, in so gross a manner, with impunity. Such rage was little less than madness; since he could not injure David, but might, for his insult, have suffered immediate death.

† In addition to this grievous affliction, it should seem that David's transgression, in the matter of Uriah, was, in a greater or less degree, the cause of his mourning all his days; and though God forgave the sin, he caused David to see and feel both that, and the punishment of it, in the miseries with which he was afterwards afflicted in his family.

CHAP. VIII.

AHITHOPHEL opposed, and over-ruled by HUSHAI. AHITHOPHEL hangs himself in his own House. AMASA, being created General by ABSALOM, engages DAVID in Battle, and is routed. ABSALOM found hanging on the Bough of a Tree, by the Hair of his Head. JOAB strikes ABSALOM, with his Javelin, through the Heart.

Ahithophel's further counsel to Absalom defeated by Hushai.

AHITHOPHEL's late advice had no sooner been carried into execution, than consultations were held how to prosecute the war; when he said, that if he might be intrusted with the command of ten thousand select men, he would bring the head of David, or be content to forfeit his own: adding, that the loss of David's life would secure the government to Absalom, and safety to the public. This proposal appeared highly agreeable to Absalom; but before he came to a resolution, he thought it prudent to take the advice of Hushai; whose opinion being demanded, he gave it to the following purport: "It is unnecessary for me to remind you, Sir, of the acknowledged valour of your father, and of the numbers of brave men in his service, in conjunction with whom he hath always been victorious. You are equally well acquainted with his courage and his skill. Our advances will undoubtedly be announced to him; and it is probable, that his troops will wait to engage us, in some wood, valley, or behind a rock; or should we advance to attack them, they would probably retreat by degrees till we are surrounded, and the whole body fall upon us at once. I would wish you, Sir, to consider, that in an emergency, such as I speak of, whether the encouragement given to the enemy, joined to the consternation into which we should be thrown, would not create a confusion very unfavourable to your army. You will now, Sir, please to consider, whether my advice or that of Ahithophel is most proper to be pursued. But having proceeded thus far, let me inform you what I think, in our present situation, would be the most rational mode of acting. Give orders that the whole body of the Hebrews aſſemble, at a fixed time and place, to wage war with David; and when they are come together, do you aſſume the command of them all, without delegating your authority to any other perſon. This being done, David muſt either retire to the walled towns, ſtrong holds, or other ſecure places, or take the open field: in the latter caſe, your numbers will be ſufficient to deſtroy him; and among them will be a multitude whoſe pride and ambition will ſtimulate them to appear foremoſt in the ſervice of their prince and country. Thus the ruin of David will be certain: but, if he ſhould act only the defenſive part, and ſeek ſecurity by ſecreting himſelf; there are many ways of reducing him to ſubmiſſion, ſuch as ſtarving, mining, or battering*." Huſhai had no ſooner delivered his opinion, than it was determined to follow his advice, in preference to that of Ahithophel; and even Abſalom voted in favour of this reſolution; but it ought to be remembered, that the hand of Providence guided this event.

Huſhai informs David of what paſſed.

This determination was no ſooner made, than Huſhai haſtened to Abiathar and Zadok, the prieſts, with an account of the reſult of the conference; intreating them to ſend away inſtantly an expreſs to David, conjuring him to paſs over the river Jordan that night; for that his enemies might attack him in his preſent ſituation, if they ſhould learn where he was, or if any alteration ſhould happen in their ſentiments. To forward any intelligence of this kind, the high-prieſts had procured lodgings for their ſons without the city, and had a truſty maid-ſervant to carry the diſpatches to them; and no ſooner was the information received, than the young men haſtened to obey their orders: but they had not proceeded a quarter of a mile on their journey before they were diſcovered by ſome horſemen; and Abſalom, being ſoon appriſed of the circumſtance, gave orders for apprehending them. The young men, having learnt the danger they were in, quitted the high-road, and went towards Bahurim, a little village not far from Jeruſalem, where a woman undertook to hide them; which ſhe effected, by putting them down into a well, over which ſhe threw the ſkins of ſome beaſts. They were but juſt got ſafe into this retreat, when ſome men came after them, and inquired if ſhe had not ſeen ſuch people. She confeſſed, that two men anſwering the deſcription had drunk at her gate, and were gone forward; nor could there be any doubt of overtaking them in a ſhort time. This did not ſatisfy the purſuers, who ſought for them a long time in vain, and then returned to Jeruſalem. When the woman was certain they were at a proper diſtance, ſhe releaſed the young men from the well, who immediately purſued their journey, and informed David of the proceedings of Abſalom. Though their arrival was late, David managed ſo as to get his people acroſs the river before morning.

Ahithophel, on his advice being rejected, hangs himſelf.

Ahithophel was ſo much chagrined that Huſhai's advice had been preferred to his, that he got upon his aſs, and retired to his houſe at Galmon, and, aſſembling his family, acquainted them what counſel he had given to Abſalom, who had rejected it; adding, that the rejection of this advice would ſoon prove ruinous to him, for that David would conquer his ſon, and recover the ſovereign authority: "And now (ſaid he) it is leſs diſgraceful for me to meet death while I can boaſt my freedom, than to wait the re-eſtabliſhment of the king, when I ſhall be ſacrificed by the father for the ſervices I have done the ſon." He had no ſooner thus expreſſed himſelf, than he retired to a private room, and hanged himſelf†, from a conſciouſneſs of his own demerits; and he was buried by his relations.

Barzillai, &c. meet David, with a ſupply of proviſions.

David had now paſſed the river Jordan, and arrived at Mahanaim, one of the principal cities in that part of the country; when Siphar, a prince of Ammon, Barzillai and Machir, two of the chief inhabitants of Gilead, treated him with the utmoſt liberality and affection, as did alſo all the principal perſons of that diſtrict; not only in his preſent diſtreſſed circumſtances, but from the recollection of his former rank and dignity. Such was the kind affection of theſe people, that David and his retinue were amply ſupplied with meat, bread, wine, lodging, and every other article that could contribute either to their ſupport or accommodation. During theſe tranſactions, Abſalom having aſſembled a large army to oppoſe David, croſſed the river Jordan, and encamped near Mahanaim, a town of Gilead. Of this army Amaſa was appointed general, in the room of Joab: now Zeruiah the mother of Joab and Abigail the mother of Amaſa, were both the ſiſters of David.

Diſpoſition of David's ſmall army for attacking that of Abſalom.

On the review of the army, David found himſelf able to muſter only four thouſand men; yet with this ſmall number he determined rather to act offenſively, than to wait till he ſhould be attacked by Abſalom: he therefore ſeparated his army into three diviſions, and appointed proper officers to each; giving the firſt diviſion to Joab, the ſecond to Abiſhai, and the third to Ittai, the Gittite. The king would willingly have been preſent with the army; but in this he was oppoſed by his adherents, urging, that if they ſhould be vanquiſhed while he was in the field, their whole plan would be fruſtrated, and the conteſt at an end; whereas, on the contrary, if one of the diviſions ſhould be routed, the reſt might retreat to him, and ſome mode might be adopted to recruit the army: and, excluſive of this conſideration, the king's ab-

* Since the laws of nature and arms have made no difference with reſpect to the way of conqueſt; and thoſe of mercy and humanity ſeem to incline to that ſide where the leaſt blood is likely to be ſhed; Huſhai may be ſaid to have acted herein the worthy patriot, as well as the faithful ſubject.

† He was convinced, from the methods Abſalom was going to purſue, that David would get the better of him; and, in that caſe, he well knew he ſhould be put to death for his treaſon, and therefore choſe to be his own executioner.

ſence from the field might induce the enemy to think that he had another army which had not made its appearance. By theſe arguments David was influenced to remain at Mahanaim: but he bound his adherents, by every ſacred tie, to diſcharge their duty manfully; requeſting, that if Providence ſhould decree the victory in their favour, they would ſpare the life of his ſon Abſalom; for, in caſe of his death, his own life would become of no value. Having expreſſed himſelf to this purpoſe, he diſmiſſed his friends, with all good wiſhes and prayers for their ſucceſs*.

The two armies join, and engage.

Abſalom no ſooner remarked the diſpoſition of Joab's diviſion, which was on a plain, with a wood behind them, than he oppoſed his own troops to them in a ſimilar ſituation. As ſoon as the two armies engaged, equal valour appeared to inſpire either party; the one anxious to recover David's loſs, the other no leſs ſo to ſupport Abſalom in his uſurped authority: the adherents of David were determined to do and ſuffer every thing, to puniſh the guilty ſon for his rebellion againſt his father. For a conſiderable time Abſalom's people fought moſt courageouſly, aſhamed of being vanquiſhed by the few forces of David; while, on the other hand, the royal party had in view the honour of putting ſo many ſuperior thouſands to the rout. At length, however, the veterans of David, with a bravery that diſdained all oppoſition, broke the enemy's ranks, totally routed them, and purſued the flying diviſions through woods, over mountains and precipices, or wherever they ſought for ſafety. Great numbers were loſt in the purſuit, many taken priſoners; and the number killed on the field of battle was eſtimated at twenty thouſand.

Abſalom, in his flight, is entangled by his hair among the boughs, and ſlain by Joab.

The perſon of Abſalom was ſo diſtinguiſhable, both for his height and comelineſs, that he was the univerſal mark at which they wiſhed to aim: in order therefore to avoid being taken priſoner, he mounted his ſwifteſt mule, and rode off at the full ſpeed; but the wind blowing his long hair above his head, it catched hold of a bough of a tree, and the mule continuing her ſpeed, left Abſalom hanging in this ſituation. This being obſerved by one of David's troops, he informed Joab of the circumſtance, who ordered him to go and ſtab Abſalom, and his reward ſhould be fifty ſhekels of ſilver. This the ſoldier refuſed, ſaying, that two thouſand ſhould not bribe him to ſuch an act, eſpecially as David had given orders that the young man's life ſhould be ſpared. Joab now inquired where Abſalom was hanging, and having at length found him, ſtruck his javelin through his heart. Joab's armour-bearers being preſent at this ſcene, lifted the body from the tree, and buried it in a pit, over which they erected a kind of rude ſepulchre, by piling a number of ſtones upon it. This ceremony being ended, Joab ordered a retreat to be ſounded, to ſtop the purſuit, and ſave the unneceſſary effuſion of blood. Some time before this, in a place denominated the king's valley, adjacent to Jeruſalem, Abſalom had cauſed a marble column to be erected, to which he gave the name of the "Hand of Abſalom," and intended it as a laſting memorial of himſelf, in caſe (as he himſelf expreſſed it) he ſhould die childleſs.

Ahimaaz and Cuſhi diſpatched to carry intelligence of the event to David.

THE immediate diſperſion of Abſalom's troops was the conſequence of his death: and now a kind of conteſt aroſe who ſhould carry the news of the victory to David. Ahimaaz, the ſon of Zadock the high-prieſt, beſought Joab that he might be the meſſenger, as the victory appeared to be the immediate conſequence of an interfering providence; but Joab replied, that as he had hitherto carried the king only good news, he would be an improper meſſenger of the death of his ſon; he therefore ordered Cuſhi to be the bearer of this intelligence, as he had been witneſs to the event: but Ahimaaz again applied, urging, that David's concern for the loſs of his ſon, would yield to his joy on the general import of the meſſage. Hereupon Joab permitted him to go; and as he was acquainted with the neareſt road, he arrived before Cuſhi.

While David was ſitting at the gate of his palace, auxious to learn the event of the conteſt, a ſervant brought him intelligence that he could diſcern a perſon advancing haſtily toward them, but that he was not near enough to aſcertain his perſon. David began to conſole himſelf with the hope of good news, when the ſervant told him that he ſaw a ſecond perſon running, which ſtill increaſed his expectations. By this time the firſt meſſenger was come very near, and proved to be Ahimaaz, the ſon of the high prieſt Zadock, who travelled in a chariot. "This man (ſaid David) certainly brings me acceptable intelligence;" and ſcarcely had he pronounced theſe words,

* The ſtrength of paternal affection was fully exemplified in king David, and ſhone conſpicuouſly amongſt many of his ſplendid virtues. The king's anxious concern for the life of a rebellious ungrateful ſon, who was ſeeking the deſtruction of his indulgent father, merely to gratify his own ambition, and the lamentations he made at his death, are ſcarcely to be parralleled in hiſtory.

when Ahimaaz proſtrated himſelf before the king, who inſtantly demanded what news from the army. To this Ahimaaz replied, "Succeſs and victory." The king then eagerly inquired the fate of Abſalom, to which the meſſenger anſwered, that he had no ſooner been a witneſs of the victory by the routing of the enemy, than he hurried away with the news; that his orders from Joab were given in haſte, and related ſolely to the advantage gained over the enemy, without regard to Abſalom, of whom, however, he knew the troops were in purſuit, from the noiſe and clamour that he had heard. He had ſcarcely done ſpeaking, when Cuſhi arrived with intelligence of the victory, and throwing himſelf at David's feet, was interrogated with regard to the fate of Abſalom: to which he replied, "May all the enemies of my lord the king be no more ſucceſsful than Abſalom has been!" Intelligence thus fatal to the hopes of David, turned a day of joy into ſorrow and lamentation. The king was inconſolable for the loſs of his ſon; and the people were equally aſtoniſhed and grieved, that their ſovereign could thus afflict himſelf for the death of a rebel, by which his life and crown were ſecured. David, however, withdrew himſelf from public buſineſs, and, on the top of one of the higheſt towers of the city, lamented his fate with many tears: and, while he ſmote his breaſt, and tore his hair, exclaimed, "Oh Abſalom, my ſon, my ſon! Ah! that I could have died with thee, my ſon Abſalom*! By this time Joab and the army were entering the city in triumph; and were not a little ſhocked, that the grief to which the king had abandoned himſelf, ſpread an air of gloom over the joyous ſolemnity, and made them appear rather as the vanquiſhed than the conquerors.

David laments the death of Abſalom.

On this occaſion David gave himſelf up ſo intirely to [illegible], that Joab thought it requiſite to throw off all reſtraint, and ſpeak his ſentiments with freedom, which he did as follows: "Conſider, Sire, (ſaid he) the tendency of your conduct: conſider how inglorious it is for you thus to waſte your time in fruitleſs repinings: this behaviour carries with it the appearance of deſpiſing the good offices of thoſe friends, who have riſked their own lives to preſerve your's; nay, it looks like a degree of contempt for yourſelf and your own family, and a partiality for thoſe enemies which the juſt vengeance of heaven hath doomed to deſtruction, as an inſtance of mercy to you.

Joab reprehends David, and inſtructs him what ſteps to take.

Arouſe then, I beſeech you; appear before your ſubjects, and acknowledge that, next to the immediate interference of Providence, you owe the victory you have obtained to their courage and fidelity: for if you continue in this deſponding way, your army will deſert you, your kingdom will be loſt, and then you will find real and ſubſtantial cauſe for lamentation." Such was the effect of this honeſt addreſs to David, that he began to recollect himſelf, and reſolved to pay more attention to the intereſts of his people, and the dignity of his government; and therefore appeared at the gate of his palace, with unuſual complacency in his look and behaviour. This alteration in his conduct had ſuch an influence on the people, that they crouded in from all parts, to make ſubmiſſion to their ſovereign.

The inſurgents recant, and are diſpoſed to ſubmit to David, and implore pardon.

During this ſituation of affairs, the late adherents of Abſalom, who had fled on the day of battle, and were now got to their own habitations, diſpatched expreſſes acroſs the country, deſiring their friends to recollect what a variety of obligations they lay under to David, for the numerous hazards and toils he had undergone in aſſerting their common rights and liberties; how ungenerous they had all behaved in rebelling againſt him: and recommending an immediate ſubmiſſion to him, when they ſhould intreat his forgiveneſs, and ſolicit him once more to take them under his royal protection; and theſe arguments were enforced by the conſideration, that the uſurper they had ſet up in the place of David was no more.

By means of the high prieſts, the people and Amaſa are brought over to David.

In conſequence hereof David received addreſſes in great number, which he regularly diſpatched to Zadok and Abiathar, the high-prieſts, inſtructing them how to treat with the heads of the tribe of Judah, to confirm his reſtoration. Hereupon the high-prieſts repreſented to them how ſcandalous it would be for them to remain indifferent, while others were taking the lead in an act of common juſtice to ſo benevolent a prince, who was, moreover, of their own tribe. This mode of addreſs inſpired a ſpirit of emulation who ſhould be moſt zealous in the ſervice of the king. The high-prieſts were alſo inſtructed to inquire of Amaſa how it happened that he, the king's nephew by his own ſiſter, had failed to model the army to a diſpoſition fit for the reſtoration of the true government: and it was hinted to Amaſa, that David would give him the ſame poſt he held under Abſalom, and likewiſe grant him his free pardon. In this mode the high-prieſts treated with the heads of the tribe; and with Amaſa, who, by the promiſe above-mentioned, was eaſily reconciled to the king's intereſt.

The tribe of Judah alſo invite the king to re-aſſume his authority.

The firſt tribe that ſent deputies to David, to invite him to re-aſſume the regal government, was that of Judah; and partly by the influence of this example,

* Nothing can certainly be more moving and pathetic, than the words uttered by David on this ſolemn occaſion: but whether it was David's deliberate wiſh, that he had died in Abſalom's ſtead; or only the effect of his exceſſive love and and grief for him, is not ſo eaſy to determine. St. Auguſtine ſeems to be on the affirmative ſide. Whether David's wiſh was deliberate or not, his grief was doubtleſs increaſed by reflecting that himſelf, by his own ſin in the caſe of Uriah, had been the unhappy inſtrument and occaſion of his ſon's death, what was moſt lamentable of all, in a ſtate of ſinful rebellion againſt a kind and indulgent parent.

ample, and partly through that of Amaſa, all the tribes agreed to receive the king at Jeruſalem. Among the very foremoſt to pay the tribute of ſubmiſſion was the ſaid tribe of Judah, who advanced to meet him even to the banks of Jordan. There likewiſe went Ziba, a freed-man of Saul's, with fifteen children, and twenty ſervants; and a thouſand Benjamites, preceded by Shimei the ſon of Gera. Theſe all combined with the tribe of Judah, to throw a bridge acroſs the river, that David and his troops might paſs with greater convenience.

Shimei humbles himſelf, and obtains favour.

When the king had reached the river ſide, the tribe of Judah firſt paid their obedience: then Shimei, approaching to the bridge, humbled himſelf at the feet of David, implored his pardon for all that was paſſed, and hoped it would not be remembered to his diſadvantage when David ſhould be reinſtated in his government: requeſting farther, that his ready ſubmiſſion, and unfeigned repentance, might be accepted in extenuation of his former crimes. In anſwer to this, Abiſhai, the brother to Joab, exclaimed, "Think you thus eaſily to compenſate for the inſults that you have offered to the king whom God hath appointed to rule over you?" David, in reply, ſaid, "Be at peace, no farther try to foment old diviſions, by ſeeking out new cauſe of diſquietude. Conſider this as the firſt day on which I begin to reign, and obſerve what I moſt ſolemnly ſwear. Every one is now abſolutely forgiven by me; and I hereby engage, that not any perſon, of what rank or condition ſoever, ſhall ſuffer on account of any inſult offered to myſelf, or on any other account: and you, Shimei, may now reſt at eaſe, for your life ſhall not be endangered." Hereupon Shimei aroſe from his ſuppliant poſture, paid his humble reſpects, and retired.

Mephiboſheth alſo waits on the king, and apologizes for his neglect.

Mephiboſheth, the grandſon of Saul, now approached the king, in a diſguiſe which was the conſequence of a vow by which he had bound himſelf when David was expelled, that he would neither cut off his hair, nor change his clothes, till his ſovereign ſhould be reſtored. Ziba had endeavoured to traduce Mephiboſheth to David; for on the latter inquiring how he could deſert him in the day of diſtreſs, he attributed the fault to Ziba, who had diſobeyed his commands, and treated him with the utmoſt inſolence, notwithſtanding he had given expreſs directions to have every thing prepared for his journey. This was heard by David, who neither made any comment on it, nor hinted the leaſt diſcredit of what Ziba had heretofore ſaid; but told Mephiboſheth, that he would order Ziba to reſtore half the eſtate that had been intruſted to his care*: to which Mephiboſheth anſwered, that Ziba was welcome to the whole, ſince he had the happineſs of ſeeing his ſovereign reſtored to his throne and kingdom.

Barzillai is kindly received by David.

Barzillai, the Gileadite, a man renowned for acts of honour and virtue, had been long the ſteady friend of David, whom he had aſſiſted in deeds of heroiſm; nor, on this occaſion, could Barzillai deny himſelf the pleaſure of attending the king on his way to the river Jordan. David intreated him to accompany him to Jeruſalem, aſſuring him, that he would treat him with the tenderneſs of a parent, and that every convenience ſhould be ſupplied to render his old age comfortable to him. To this invitation Barzillai replied, that a retired and private life was now more eligible to him, than all the gaiety and ſplendor of a palace: for that he was eighty years of age, and had outlived all taſte for the pleaſures of a court; his chief care now being to give directions for his funeral, and prepare for another world. For theſe reaſons he requeſted his majeſty's permiſſion to return and dwell at his own houſe, where he might live in the way moſt agreeable to himſelf: he ſaid farther, that he could no longer receive pleaſure from luxurious living; and with regard to dancing, ſinging, and the concert ariſing from the accordance of voice and inſtrument, he had no longer any pleaſure in them, for that he was almoſt deprived of his hearing. In conſideration of theſe reaſons, David was induced to part with Barzillai, on condition that his ſon Chimham ſhould go with him, and accept of ſuch favours as his majeſty could with propriety beſtow on him. Barzillai committed his ſon to the king's care, with every acknowledgment of the honour done them, and retired to his own houſe, after offering up his warmeſt wiſhes and prayers for the long and proſperous reign of David.

On David's arrival at Gilgal, he found that his followers conſiſted of the whole tribe of Judah, and one half of the whole nation. At this time there came to David many of the chief men of the country (followed by vaſt multitudes of people), who reflected on the tribe of Judah, for their preſumption in waiting up-

* David firſt gave the whole in property to Mephiboſheth, and afterwards to Ziba: and yet, I have ſaid, Thou and Ziba divide the land, muſt refer to ſome former determination of David with reſpect to the eſtate. But no ſuch determination is to be found but in that original one, chap. ix. 10. in which the eſtate was divided between Mephiboſheth and Ziba; the whole to Mephiboſheth in property, and to Ziba ſufficient to maintain himſelf and family, for taking care of it, out of the profits it produced: ſo that this was, in reality, confirming the original grant, and reſtoring him to the poſſeſſion of the whole upon the ſame terms on which the poſſeſſion was at firſt granted him. It was certainly a revocation of the grant to Ziba, who therefore could claim no part of the eſtate by that grant, nor by any other; for there was no other but that by which he was allowed a proper maintenance out of it: ſo that if David was too haſty in giving Mephiboſheth's eſtate to Ziba, he was, upon being undeceived, as haſty in reſtoring it to him, and thereby diſcovered his great regard to truth and equity, and the firmneſs of his affection and friendſhip to Jonathan and his family. And though he confirmed the original grant, thereby leaving to Ziba and his family a maintenance out of the eſtate, it was out of reſpect even to Saul, of whoſe houſe Ziba was, and as a recompence for that ſeaſonable and noble ſupply that he brought him when he was forced to abandon the capital, by the unnatural rebellion of Abſalom his ſon; 2 Sam. xvi. 2.

on the king without the concurrence of their brethren, as in reaſon they ought to have gone all in a body. To this the tribe of Judah replied, that they hoped their brethren would not be offended that they had made the firſt offer of their ſervices, as they conſidered it as a duty to which they were bound by their affinity to the king, which had made them more zealous on the occaſion than otherwiſe they ſhould have been: they averred, that they had not a view to any private advantage in what they had done, and thought that, in reaſon, this teſtimony of their zeal ought not to give any offence to thoſe who were later in their profeſſions of loyalty and attachment.

Rebellion of Sheba.

During this debate among the principal men, Sheba the ſon of Bichri, of the tribe o Benjamin (a man of a violent and litigious diſpoſition), ſtanding up in the midſt of the aſſembly, exclaimed in a loud voice, "Wherefore do they talk to us of a part in David? What connexions can we have with the ſon of Jeſſe?" Hereupon he ordered a trumpet to be ſounded, and proclamation to be made, that "the people might depart to their tents;" from which moment it was conſidered that a war was declared againſt David: the majority appearing to adhere to the party of Sheba; but the tribe of Judah ſtill held their allegiance to David, whom they eſcorted to Jeruſalem.

As ſoon as the king arrived at the city, his firſt care was to remove from his palace all his concubines, whom Abſalom had heretofore publicly violated: but he gave orders for their being properly attended and accommodated, in lodgings prepared for them, though from this time he never held any correſpondence with them. His next ſtep was, to promote Amaſa to the rank of general, in the room of Joab, and to him he gave orders to aſſemble all the troops he could of the tribe of Judah, and prepare to march, within three [illegible], againſt Sheba, the ſon of Bichri. This commi[illegible] Amaſa endeavoured to execute with all poſſible expedition; but not being able to aſſemble them ſo ſoon as he wiſhed, David grew impatient, and on the third day, ſpoke to Joab to the following purport: "There is no time to be loſt in counteracting the deſigns of Sheba; do you, therefore, inſtantly aſſemble ſuch troops as are in readineſs, together with the ſix hundred veterans; and, taking your brother Abiſhai as your aſſiſtant, proceed directly in ſearch of him, and the moment you get ſight of him encounter him, before he has a poſſibility of arranging his forces; for, if there be any delay on our part, his numbers will increaſe like the gathering of a ſnow-ball; and, when he is ſufficiently ſtrong, he may ſecure himſelf in ſome fortified town, and it may be a work of more time and labour to diſlodge him, than it was to conquer Abſalom."

Amaſa treacherouſly murdered by Joab.

No ſooner had Joab received his orders, than he and his brother collected their troops, and marched in purſuit of Sheba. When Joab came to Gibeon, a village about five miles from Jeruſalem, Amaſa met him at the head of a numerous army. While Amaſa was approaching to ſalute him, Joab, who wore a breaſt-plate, and had his ſword by his ſide, let fall the ſword from the ſcabbard, but immediately took it up again; and advancing towards Amaſa, took him by the beard, under pretence of ſaluting him, but inſtantly ran him through the body, ſo that he died on the ſpot*.

Amaſa was no ſooner dead, than Joab and his brother Abiſhai proceeded on their march in ſearch of Sheba, leaving a perſon in care of Amaſa's body, with orders to proclaim that he was a bad man, and had only been puniſhed according to his demerits: proclamation was alſo made, that the friends of David ſhould follow Joab and his brother. During the time the body lay expoſed, great numbers aſſembled to view it; on which the perſon in whoſe care it was, removed it to a neighbouring village, where he put it in a houſe, and covered it with a coat, and the ſoldiers now followed their leaders. Joab and his army had nearly traverſed the whole country, before they knew that Sheba had taken refuge in a fortified town named Abel-Maacha. The gates of this place being ſhut againſt Joab and his troops, he was reſolved to beſiege it; and accordingly gave orders for throwing up a trench round it, and that the walls ſhould be undermined, and the place attacked by means of batteries.

A woman procures the death of Sheba, which reſtores the public tranquillity.

While the neceſſary ſteps were taking for the attack of the city, a public-ſpirited woman, zealous for the ſervice of her country, aſcended the battlements of the wall, whence ſhe called aloud to Joab, deſiring to ſpeak to him apart from his troops. Joab complying with her requeſt, ſhe addreſſed him in the following manner: "Although Providence hath appointed kings and governors to rule over us, to induce us to live at peace one among another, and to defend us from the aſſaults of our foes, yet have you advanced againſt us, to deſtroy one of the moſt capital cities in all the land of Iſrael; and this without any provocation or inſult on our parts." To this Joab replied, that ſhe was miſtaken in her judgment; for that he had no wiſh either to deſtroy the city, or to injure any one of its

* This action was attended with the higheſt perfidy and inſolence. Many reaſons concurred to prevent David's calling Joab to an account now, particularly his power, authority, and intereſt with the army: but it is plain he never forgot, nor forgave him. That he highly reſented it, we find in his laſt charge to Solomon, where he nobly recommends, and gives it in charge to his ſon, to do juſtice on that bloody aſſaſſin. He was not now in a capacity to do it. Joab was too powerful a ſubject to be brought to account. After Abſalom's death, he had the inſolence to tell the king with an oath, that he would make every one of his ſubjects deſert him; and after this aſſaſſination of Amaſa, he reſumed, contrary to his maſter's will, the command of all the forces; who had an affection for him as their own general, and becauſe he had reſtored the quiet of the land by quelling the inſurrection of Sheba. Joab's being continued captain-general of all the forces was not from David's inclination, but contrary to it, and by force.

Joab takes Amasa by the beard, under pretence of saluting him, but instantly ran him through the body, so that he died upon the spot.

inhabitants: all he wiſhed and demanded was, that the rebel Sheba the ſon of Bichri ſhould be delivered up as a victim to public juſtice, and his army ſhould be immediately withdrawn from before the walls. The woman having heard this declaration of Joab, requeſted him to ſuſpend his operations but for a ſhort time, and the head of Sheba ſhould be thrown over the wall to him. Joab conſenting to this, ſhe deſcended from the wall, and addreſſed the citizens in the following manner: "Can you, O fellow-citizens, be ſo abandoned, as for the ſake of affording protection to one bad man, who is moreover a ſtranger among you, to conſent to the loſs of your wives and children, and to be driven from your habitations in ſo diſgraceful a manner? What obligations have you to Sheba, to counterbalence thoſe you owe to David? Or if this was not the caſe, is it poſſible to hold the city in deſpite of the beſiegers?" This ſhort addreſs had the intended effect: it was agreed to purchaſe peace at the expence of Sheba, whoſe head was immediately cut off, and thrown over the wall; on which the troops returned to Jeruſalem, where Joab was appointed general: the command of the guards, and the ſix hundred veterans, was given to Benaiah; Adoram was appointed treaſurer; the recorders were Achilaus and Sabathes; Suſa was made ſecretary; while the office of high-prieſt remained with Abiathar and Zadock.

A famine ſent; and removed by the execution of Saul's ſeven ſons.

Matters had not long been thus adjuſted, when a famine raged ſo violently, that David intreated God to acquaint him with the cauſe and cure of the calamity. To this the prophet returned an anſwer, intimating, that Saul having treacherouſly ſhed the blood of the Gibeonites, it appealed to heaven for vengeance; for that this blood had been ſhed, not only in oppoſition to the rights of natural equity, but to Joſhua's promiſe and oath, which the elders had ratified. The prophets therefore inſtructed the king to redreſs the injury ſuſtained by the Gibeonites, in the murder of their citizens, in ſuch manner as they ſhould require, on which the Almighty would avert the preſent judgment. As ſoon as David heard this, he ſent for the Gibeonites, and demanded what recompence they would wiſh: to which they anſwered, "Let ſeven of the ſons or relations of Saul be given up to our diſpoſal." Hereupon David gave orders that ſeven of them ſhould be ſought for; but with an exception in favour of Mephibоſheth, on account of his father Jonathan. Theſe being given to the Gibeonites, they were appeaſed, and inflicted ſuch puniſhments on them as they thought proper: immediately after which, rain fell in great abundance, the earth recovered its former verdure, and produced the accuſtomed plenty.

Soon after this event, David marched his forces againſt the Philiſtines, whom he attacked and routed; but being too eager in the purſuit, he was obſerved, when alone and fatigued, by Achmon, the ſon of Araph, a man of the gigantic race (armed with a ſword, a coat of mail, and a lance which weighed three hundred ſhekels), who, turning quick on the king, beat him down, and would infallibly have killed him, but that at the inſtant came up Abiſhai, the brother of Joab, who ſtanding acroſs the king, attacked and ſlew Achmon. The great danger David had been in, and his providential deliverance, ſo much affected the army, that the officers inſiſted on his ſwearing never again perſonally to engage in war; for that the bleſſings derived to the nation by his government, were in the utmoſt danger of being loſt, from that natural bravery which led him to expoſe himſelf in ſituations of the moſt imminent danger *.

David narrowly eſcapes being ſlain by a Philiſtine giant.

Not long after this battle, the Philiſtines re-aſſembled their troops at Gaza; on which David ſent an army to attack them. Sobach, the Hittite, obtained a great character on this occaſion, by killing, with his own hands, ſeveral of the race of the giants, who were equally remarkable for ſtrength and ſize. In a word, the victory was principally owing to his courage. The Philiſtines once more took the field, againſt whom the king ſent freſh detachments; and in this attack, Nathan, a relation of David, performed miracles of valour: among the reſt, killing one of the braveſt of the Philiſtines in ſingle combat; whereon the remainder fled, with the loſs of great numbers of their troops.

The Philiſtines worſted, and ſeveral of their gigantic heroes ſlain.

The Philiſtines took poſſeſſion of a town near where the Hebrews lay; and among them was a man deſcended from the race of the giants, whoſe height was ſix cubits, and who had on each foot ſix toes, and on each hand ſix fingers. This enormous giant, while fighting at the head of his ſoldiers, was attacked by Jonathan, the ſon of Shimei, and ſlain, fighting hand to hand; which circumſtance went far in the deciſion of the victory, and eſtabliſhed Jonathan's character as a man of great courage. This might be called a deciſive victory; for the Philiſtines wanting courage to engage the Iſraelites any more, the war was at an end.

The fatigues and hazards of war being now over, and the bleſſings of peace reſtored, David devoted almoſt all his time to the compoſition of pſalms and hymns to the honour of God. Theſe being in various meaſures, and adapted to different tunes, he gave orders that the Levites ſhould ſing them on the ſabbath, and other ſolemn feſtivals. This ſinging was accompanied by muſical inſtruments; among which were the pſaltery, which had twelve ſtrings, on which the fingers of the muſician moved; an inſtrument of ten ſtrings, which was ſounded by touching it with a quill; and cymbals of a great ſize, made of braſs.

* This deſire of the people is beautifully expreſſed in 2 Sam. xxi. 17. "Thou ſhalt go no more out with us to battle, that thou quench not the light of Iſrael." David, in 2 Sam. xxii. 66. "Thou haſt given me the ſhield of thy ſalvation," celebrates the eſcape he experienced, when on the point of being ſlain by the giant abovementioned.

David was now ſurrounded by many men of diſtinguiſhed courage and honour, among whom were thirty-eight who had become ſuper-eminently remarkable for their valour: theſe men ſeemed born for glorious atchievements, and adapted to give laws to empires.

David orders the people to be numbered.

The king had now come to a reſolution to number the people of Iſrael, to ſee what forces could be raiſed on an emergency: but he did not recollect an ordinance of Moſes, which decreed, that, on every ſuch occaſion, half a ſhekel for each man ſhould be offered to God, by way of oblation. David diſpatched orders to Joab to take the account, which he declined as an unneceſſary buſineſs: but the king would not be refuſed, ſaying, that he would have it done immediately. Hereupon Joab took the advice of the Scribes, and the heads of the tribes, and a computation was immediately made through the whole country. Joab went, at the end of nine months and twenty days, to the king at Jeruſalem, and informed him that the number of Iſraelites fit to engage in war, was nine hundred thouſand, excluſive of the tribes of Benjamin and Levi, an account of whom had not as yet been taken. Four hundred thouſand men, he ſaid, might be muſtered in the tribe of Judah only.

During the progreſs of the above buſineſs, David regretted the orders he had given; and was told, by the prophet, of the anger of God: on hearing which, he humbled himſelf in unfeigned repentance, and obtained his pardon in conſequence of his prayers. Soon afterwards, the prophet Gad came to him, and ſaid, that God gave him his choice of the three following things, viz. "A famine for ſeven years; a flight of three months before his enemies; or a peſtilence of three days." To chooſe either of theſe, David thought very diſtreſsful: "If (ſaid he) I fix on famine, I ſhall ſeem to r d my people's intereſt leſs than my own; for it is not likely that I can be deprived of bread: If my choice be to fly before the enemy, the appearance will be the ſame, as my perſonal ſafety may be provided for in caſtles and ſtrong fortreſſes; but the third calamity is equally threatening to ſubjects, and to their rulers." While he was thus deliberating on the matter, the prophet urged a ſpeedy anſwer; on which the king ſaid, "he ſhould expect greater mercy from the hands of God than man, and therefore choſe rather to ſubmit to the peſtilence, if agreeable to the divine will." This anſwer being given to the prophet, he made a report of it; ſoon after which, the Iſraelites were attacked with diſorders equally new and violent, which were attended with almoſt ſudden death, and bid defiance to all the ſkill of the phyſicians. Some were afflicted with ſuffocations, ſome with ſwimmings in the head, others with dimneſs of ſight; others again either with violent gripes, languors, or faintings, and various diſeaſes, ſo that they expired at an amazing rate; ſome even died in lamenting the death of others: in a word, the diſeaſe ſpread ſo faſt, that ſeventy thouſand perſons fell a ſacrifice to it, between day-break and dinner-time. The diſorder was now making haſty ſtrides towards Jeruſalem, when David cloathed himſelf in ſackcloth, and deprecated the vengeance of heaven by prayers, and tears of unfeigned humiliation. While he was thus engaged, he looked upwards, and beheld an angel advancing to Jeruſalem, with a drawn ſword in his hand. Struck with this appearance, he exclaimed, "Let thy puniſhments, O Lord, fall on the ſhepherd; but in what hath the flock offended? On me, and on my family, be thy wrath poured forth*; but have mercy, I beſeech thee, on my people!"

His crime puniſhed by a peſtilence.

The plague removed.

It pleaſed the Almighty to put an end to the raging of the peſtilence, on the interceſſion of David, who was directed by the prophet Gad to repair inſtantly to the threſhing-floor of Araunah, and there to offer ſacrifice, on an altar to be erected on the occaſion. David repaired thither, when Araunah, who was threſhing his corn, obſerving the king and his ſons advancing, went out to pay his obedience. Araunah was a Jebuſite, and ſo warm an adherent to David, that he had preſerved him at the time of taking the city, as before mentioned.

Araunah now inquired, if he could any way ſerve David; to which the king replied, "I come to purchaſe your threſhing-floor, on which to build an altar, and ſacrifice to God." "Not the threſhing-floor only, (ſaid Araunah) but my ploughs, my oxen, and my burnt offerings, are all at the ſervice of my king, without expence; and I pray that your ſacrifice might be acceptable to God." This behaviour charmed David, who ſaid it would be wrong to offer a ſacrifice which coſt him nothing; wherefore he muſt purchaſe the floor, for which he gave fifty ſhekels of ſilver. This being done, David was reſtored to the favour of the Almighty, after ſacrificing burnt offerings, and peace-offerings on the place. This was the very ſpot on which Abraham would have offered up his ſon Iſaac, but for the intervention of the angel, and the appearance of the ram in his place; of which we have already written.

David ſacrifices.

The prayers of David being heard, and his ſacrifice become acceptable, he determined to give the name of "The Altar of the People," or "The Iſraelites' Altar," to the whole place, and thereon to cauſe a temple to be erected: and this reſolution was ſtrengthened by one of God's prophets, who predicted to David that the temple ſhould be built by his ſucceſſor. Hereupon David gave orders for numbering the ſtrangers in his dominions; who appeared to be about one hundred and eighty thouſand, of whom one hundred thouſand were employed to carry materials for building, and eighty

* With reſpect to this crime of numbering the people, it is the opinion of ſome, that God, for wiſe ends and purpoſes, known only to himſelf, permitted David to be influenced and perſuaded by ſome evil counſellor; ſince, from Joab's words on this occaſion, 2 Sam. xxiv. 3. it ſeems plain, that the matter had been previouſly debated in the council, and that though Joab oppoſed the act, yet David was ſtirred up to perform it, by the perſuaſion of ſome other perſon.

thouſand to do the ſtone-work: beſides which, thirty-five thouſand were directed to act as overſeers of the workmen. Vaſt numbers of cedar trees, the largeſt and beſt that could be got, were procured from Tyre and Sidon, and an immenſe quantity of iron and braſs was brought together on the occaſion. To his particular friends David uſed to ſay, that theſe things were only procured in readineſs, againſt the time his ſon might want them, which would forward the work, and ſave much time and labour: but that his ſon was not yet of an age to engage in ſuch an arduous taſk.

CHAP. X.

SOLOMON receives Directions from his Father concerning the building of a Temple. ADONIJAH, DAVID's fourth Son, uſurps the Government. DAVID nominates SOLOMON his Succeſſor.

David gives directions for building the temple.

MATTERS were thus ſituated, when David commanding the preſence of his ſon Solomon, enjoined him ſtrictly, on his advancement to the throne, inſtantly to ſet about the building of a temple for the adoration of the Divine Being. "This (ſaid David) I would myſelf have done, but that my frequent wars having marked me as a man of blood, the particular command of God prevented my proceeding in it, and deſtined it for you." Now of Solomon it was foretold, that he ſhould be a prince of peace; that he ſhould be taken under the peculiar protection of the Almighty; that under his government the ſubjects ſhould not only be free from foreign wars, but live without private quarrels and animoſities. Then David, addreſſing his ſon, ſpoke to the following purport: "As it was predicted before your birth, that you ſhould wear a crown, act worthy of that diſtinction: let piety, fortitude, and juſtice, govern your actions; let the laws, traditions, and commandments of Moſes be revered by you: neither violate them yourſelf, nor permit others to do ſo. With regard to the building God's temple, let no difficulties prevent your proceeding in it. I will take care, that at the time you aſcend the throne, all the materials ſhall be ready for the beginning of it. Ten thouſand talents of gold, one hundred thouſand of ſilver, beſides an incredible quantity of iron, timber, and ſtone, are already provided. You will find no want in ſupplies, and thouſands of maſons and carpenters ſhall wait your commands. Let the whole work be conducted with care and expedition; for, on its being completed, you need not doubt but God will continue to you his protection and bleſſing."

Having thus ſpoken, the king gave it in charge to the princes, to aid Solomon in the advancement of this work; and, in preference to every other concern, to attend the duties of religion, ſince that would infallibly ſecure peace and proſperity to the community. David likewiſe ordered, that when the temple was completed, the ark, with all the holy veſſels and utenſils thereunto belonging, ſhould be placed therein; which, agreeable to the commands of God delivered to their forefathers, ought to be done, ſince they had been enjoined to raiſe a temple immediately on their arriving in the Land of Promiſe. David laid theſe injunctions equally on his ſon, and on the princes who attended him.

The king had now juſt completed his ſeventieth year, but was ſo debilitated by a complication of diſorders, that his blood was almoſt ſtagnated, ſo that he could not get any warmth from all the clothes that could be lain upon his bed. On this occaſion, a conſultation of phyſicians was held, who were unanimouſly of opinion, that nothing was ſo proper in his diſorder, as the ſleeping with a healthy young perſon, the genial heat of whoſe body being communicated to the king, might relieve nature, without doing it any violence. Hereupon a maiden, named Abiſhag, famed for her health and delicacy, was put to-bed to David, to lie by him, and keep him warm*; which ſhe might do with perfect innocence, as the king was paſt the age of temptation.

Adonijah aſpires to the ſovereignty.

The next ſon that David had, after Abſalom, was Adonijah, whoſe mother was named Haggith. This youth was not much unlike Abſalom, either in height, comelineſs, or ambition. Soon after the death of Abſalom, Adonijah ſeemed to have an eye to the ſucceſſion, and took great pains, by himſelf and friends, to make a popular intereſt. He furniſhed himſelf with horſes, chariots, and guards, keeping a ſuperb equipage; nor did his father reſtrain him in this mode of proceeding, or even inquire the reaſon why he lived in ſuch pomp. Joab the general, and Abiathar the high-prieſt, were the principal adherents to Adonijah; while Nathan the prophet, Benaiah the captain of the guards, Zadock the high-prieſt, Shimei, and the officers in general, took the part of the king.

In the ſuburbs of Jeruſalem, not far from the fountain in the royal gardens, Adonijah prepared a ſumptuous entertainment, which he invited all his brothers to partake of, except Solomon. Joab, Abiathar, and the principal men of the tribe of Judah, were alſo preſent; but neither Zadock, Nathan, Benaiah, nor a man of their party, had any invitation given them. This affair being reflected on by Nathan, he ſaid to Bathſheba, Solomon's mother, "Obſerve how Adonijah is already aſſuming the ſtate of royalty, while David is ignorant of his proceedings: it becomes you, therefore, equally for your own ſake and your ſon's, to intereſt yourſelf in this buſineſs. Go then to David, and, when alone, remind him that he has ſworn that Solomon ſhall be his ſucceſſor; adding, that Adonijah behaves as if he was already king. During this diſcourſe, I will come into the room, and confirm what you ſay." This advice pleaſed Bathſheba, who ſought the king, paid her reſpects, and obtaining permiſſion to deliver her buſineſs, did it as Nathan had directed; recounting the ſtory of the entertainment, who were invited, and who were admitted; adding, that the public were anxious to know whom he would appoint to ſucceed him; and that the life of herſelf and ſon reſted on the event. At this moment Nathan's attendance was announced to David, and orders being given for his immediate admiſſion, he ſaid to the king, with an air of aſtoniſhment, "Have you this day transferred the ſovereign rule to Adonijah, and appointed him to ſucceed you?" The prophet then told him of the feaſt, who were invited, and who left unaſked: "And there are they (ſaid he) feaſting and carouſing, and drinking healths to Adonijah, their new ſovereign; but for me, and the high-prieſt Zadock, and your captain of the guards, Benaiah, we were utterly unacquainted with the affair. Now I would adviſe your majeſty to ſignify to the public, whether theſe proceedings have the ſanction of your approbation." When the prophet came in, Bathſheba had retired, and being now ſummoned to appear, the king ſaid, "The oath I formerly made to you, Bathſheba, I now repeat, in the preſence of Almighty God. Solomon, your ſon, ſhall ſucceed to the government, and this day ſhall the buſineſs be accompliſhed." Hereupon, Bathſheba wiſhed the king long life, and departed.

David appoints Solomon for his ſucceſſor.

The king inſtantly ſending for Zadock and Benaiah, deſired them to accompany Nathan, and, being conducted by the guards, place Solomon on the king's mule, and attending him to the fountain, called Gihon, without the city, anoint him with holy oil, and proclaim him king. David likewiſe farther ordered, that he ſhould be carried ...ugh the city, eſcorted by troops, and attended by crowds, crying, "Long live king Solomon!" that his having been appointed to ſucceed to the throne, might become a matter of the moſt public notoriety. Finally, David commanded Solomon to rule over all his people with the utmoſt regard to the principles of equity and religion. A prayer to God, for a bleſſing on Solomon, being now pronounced by Benaiah, they all departed to execute the king's commands.

Solomon being placed on the king's mule, was attended to the fountain, anointed, and accompanied back again, amidſt the ſhouts of the people, who prayed that his reign might be long and proſperous. He was now conducted to the palace, and ſeated on the throne of David; which being done, the whole city joined in feſtivity, and nothing was to be ſeen or heard but feaſting, dancing, and muſic, and every poſſible demonſtration of joy. At this time Adonijah, with Joab and his other gueſts, who were at their feaſting, were ſo alarmed at the ſound of the trumpets, and the acclamations of the people, that they quitted their dinner; and while they were wondering what had happened, Jonathan, the ſon of Abiathar the high-prieſt, came in, whom Adonijah rejoiced to ſee, on the preſumption that he was the meſſenger of good news; but Jonathan had no ſooner acquainted them with the orders iſſued by the king, and what honour had been done to Solomon, than the company left the entertainment, and privately retreated to their own houſes. Adonijah alone, conſcious that the nature of his crime ſcarcely left hope for mercy, fled to the horns of the altar for ſanctuary *, and there ſolicited forgiveneſs. As ſoon as Solomon was told how Adonijah had diſpoſed of himſelf, and that he expected ſome ſecurity that his pardon ſhould be granted, he, with an equal degree of mercy and prudence, ſent him a pardon for all paſt tranſgreſſions, attended with a hint to him, to be extremely cautious in his future conduct; for that in caſe of a ſimilar behaviour hereafter, he muſt certainly abide the fatal conſequence. Adonijah being brought from the place of his retreat to the palace, made his ſubmiſſion to the new king, who told him to return in peace to his own habitation, and hereafter to behave like a good ſubject, which he would find greatly to his advantage.

Adonijah ſubmits to Solomon, and is pardoned.

CHAP. XI.

The dying Counſel, Prayer, Farewell, Death, and Funeral of DAVID. The Siege of JERUSALEM by ANTIOCHUS.

AFTER having given ample directions for building the temple, and commanding the great men of Iſrael to aſſiſt his ſon Solomon in a work which lay ſo near his heart, David, being heavily oppreſſed by the infirmities of age, judged himſelf on the point of diſſolution; and having called Solomon into his preſence, he addreſſed him to the following effect: "I am now preparing to depart to a world, whither, in due time, you muſt follow. To die, is to pay the common debt of nature; and that debt once paid, puts a final period to all our concerns with this life. While I have power, I muſt not omit to remind you of the doctrines which I have ſo frequently inculcated: in the government of the people, fail not to obſerve a ſtrict regard to the adminiſtration of pub-

* Though no precept in the law makes the altar a privileged place, the Jews, in conformity to the cuſtom of other nations, ſeem to have conſidered it as ſuch. But the queſtion is, to what altar Adonijah fled; whether to the braſen one which Moſes made, and which was now at Gibeon, or to that which his father had lately erected in the threſhing-floor of Araunah? It is expreſsly ſaid, that he "caught hold on the horns of the altar;" but it is hardly to be ſuppoſed, that the altar in the threſhing-floor, erected in ſuch haſte with ſtones and turf, was made in this form. We may ſuppoſe, that as David had built a place for the reception of the ark of the covenant on Mount Zion, he had alſo built there an altar, for the oblation of the daily ſacrifices, in the exact form of the original one which was then at Gibeon; and that it was to this altar that Adonijah fled for refuge.

lic juſtice; zealouſly adore that Eternal Being to whom you are indebted for the regal dignity, as well as for your exiſtence; pay a rigid regard to his commands, as they are tranſmitted to us by Moſes; for, if through fear, vanity, intereſt, or any other human infirmity, you ſhall violate his laws, you muſt no longer expect a continuance of the protection of divine Providence. But if you religiouſly conform yourſelf to the pleaſure of the Lord, the government will be eſtabliſhed to yourſelf and your ſucceſſors in perpetuity. I muſt now mention the iniquity of Joab, in the aſſaſſinations of thoſe brave warriors, and dutiful ſubjects, Abner the ſon of Ner, and Amaſa the ſon of Ithra, whom he cruelly maſſacred, from motives of malevolence and envy. * I had myſelf inflicted upon him the puniſhment due to his crimes, but was reſtrained by a conſideration of his popularity; yet you may act towards him as your judgment ſhall direct. It is my requeſt, that you will exert yourſelf in offices of friendſhip towards the ſons of Barzillai, the Gileadite; and this I mean you ſhould do, as a requital of the obligations I received from Barzillai, during the period of my baniſhment; and theſe ſervices I conſider as a debt which my whole family are bound to acknowledge. With Shimei, the Benjamite, the ſon of Gera, you may find ſome proper occaſion to account for thoſe opprobrious and unmerited cenſures, during my perſecution at Bahurim*. On our interview at the river Jordan, he obtained my pardon; but in caſe of future tranſgreſſions, you will determine as to the propriety of puniſhing theſe injuries."

Having concluded this diſcourſe, David expired, in the ſeventieth year of his age, after a reign of ſeven years and ſix months over the tribe of Judah, at Hebron, and thirty-three years over the whole people of Iſrael at Jeruſalem. David was a man poſſeſſed of every qualification neceſſary to the exalted ſtation which he filled. No man was more remarkable for bravery and fortitude; and he took the lead in all dangerous expeditions, either for the defence or protection of his people. The valour of his ſoldiers was more animated by his example than by the authority of his command. He was judicious in the appointment of his council; and poſſeſſed a ſingular degree of penetration, whereby he was enabled to improve preſent advantages, and obviate future difficulties. He was of a temperate, humane, and affable diſpoſition; an impartial judge, and a righteous man. His life was irreproachable, excepting in the caſe of Bathſheba, and her huſband Uriah. The wealth he left greatly exceeded the poſſeſſions of any former prince. His remains were interred at Jeruſalem, with a magnificence of pomp exceeding the powers of deſcription. Solomon, his ſon and ſucceſſor, depoſited an immenſe treaſure in his ſepulchre; concerning which it muſt be obſerved, that about thirteen hundred years after this period, in the time of Hyrcanus the high-prieſt, Jeruſalem being beſieged by Antiochus, the ſon of Demetrius, he made an offer to abandon the place, in conſideration of being paid three thouſand talents. Hyrcanus had no reſource but in David's tomb, which he broke open, and thence took the ſum demanded for the compoſition. Many years afterwards, king Herod diſcovered a cell, from which he took riches to an immenſe amount; but ſo deeply ſunk in the earth, and ſo ingeniouſly concealed was the place where the remains of David were depoſited, that both Hyrcanus and Herod were unable to effect a diſcovery. In the tenth chapter of the ſixteenth book, the reader will find a particular account of Herod's rifling this tomb, where he found much valuable treaſure.

* This is certainly a blot in the laſt hour of this good man. He had ſworn to Shimei and pardoned him; and he now in a manner deſires Solomon to find an occaſion of revenge. Alas, how frail, how imperfect the beſt of men are! What eminent virtues are diſcernible in David! how contraſted with deteſtable vices!

BOOK VIII.

TRANSACTIONS from the YEAR of the WORLD 2931, to 3048.

CHAP. I.

SOLOMON ſucceeds to the Throne, and cauſes ADONIJAH, JOAB, and SHIMEI to be put to Death. He tranſfers the Sacerdotal Dignity from the Houſe of ITHAMAR to that of PHINEHAS.

SOLOMON, the ſon of David, ſucceeded to the government at an early period of life, being inveſted with the regal authority by the appointment of the Almighty, and the avowed conſent of his father. Upon his advancement to the throne, he was congratulated by the people, who expreſſed the moſt ſanguine wiſhes that he might enjoy a long life, and a reign of uninterrupted felicity.

Adonijah, who, during the life of David, had made an attempt to poſſeſs himſelf of the government, adopted an inſinuating addreſs, in order to obtain an intereſt with Bathſheba, the king's mother, through whoſe mediation he had conceived a deſign of promoting his own intereſt. She aſſured him, that ſhe would exert her utmoſt power to render him ſervice. Bathſheba alſo told him, that ſhe was diſpoſed to promote his ſuit, and encouraged him to hope that the king would not reject the joint intereſt of his mother and brother, even on a ſubject of greater conſequence than that in queſtion.

Solomon not only refuſed the requeſt of his mother, but cauſed Adonijah, Joab, and Shimei to be put to death; and baniſhed Abiathar the high-prieſt*, for attaching himſelf to the cauſe of Adonijah and Joab. Thus, according to the prediction of God to Eli the grandfather of Abiathar, the pontifical dignity was transferred from the houſe of Ithamar to Zadock, of the family of Phinehas. Eli was the firſt of the houſe of Ithamar inveſted with the ſacerdotal function: and from his time, the following perſons of the family of Phinehas led private lives; Boccias, ſon of Joſeph; Jonathan, of Boccias; Maræoth, of Jonathan; Arapha, of Maræoth; Architob, of Arapha; and Zadock, of Architob.

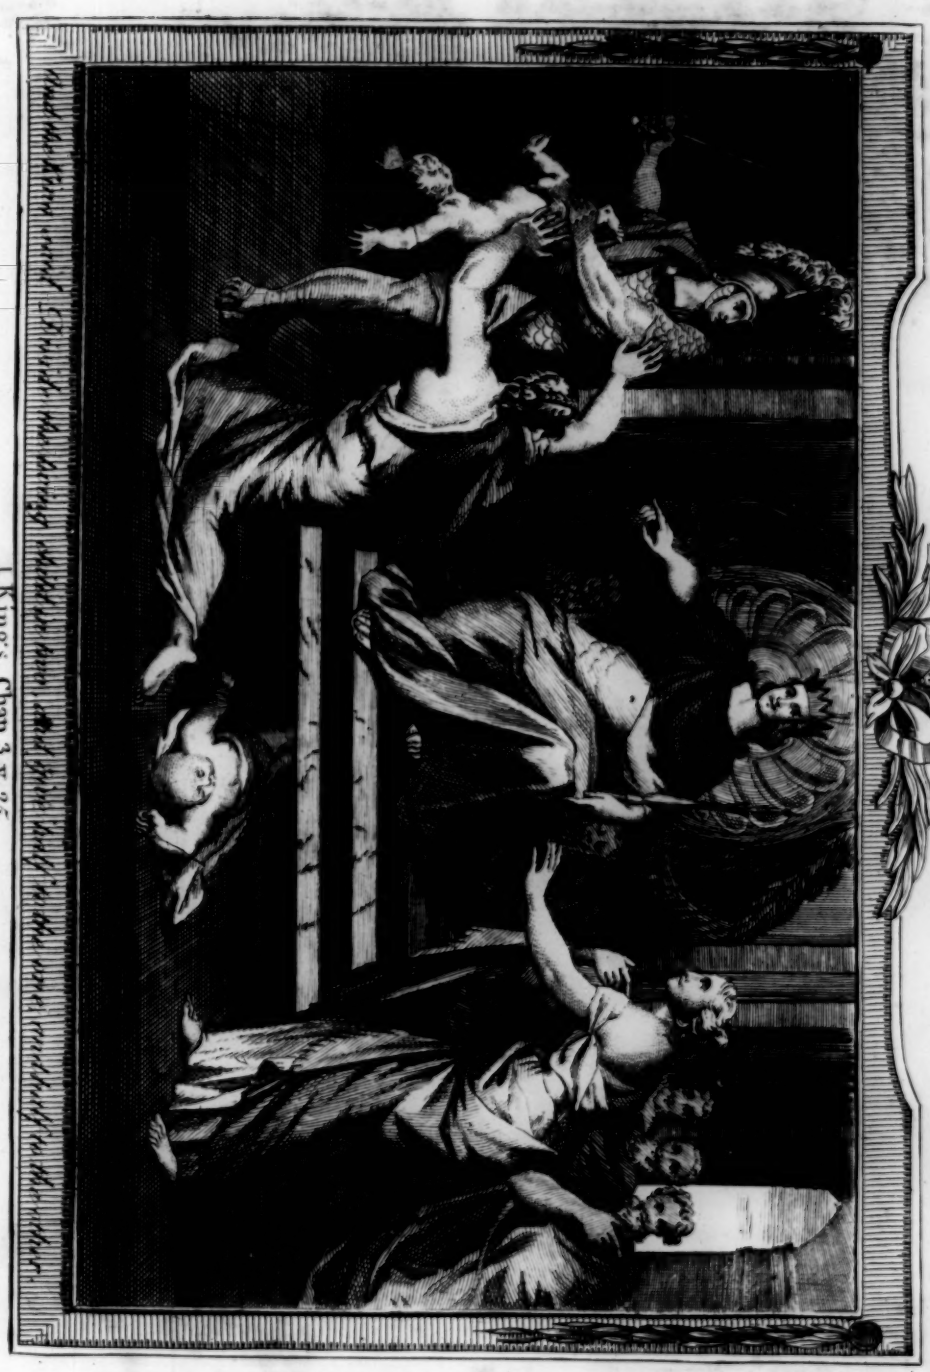
SOLOMON marries the Daughter of the King of EGYPT. The Gift of Wiſdom beſtowed upon him by the Almighty. Wonderful Structure of the Temple. He builds a ſuperb Palace; and erects Fortifications of great Strength for the Defence of JERUSALEM. He vanquiſhes the CANAANITES. His immenſe Riches. He degenerates into Idolatry. Evil Conſequences of his Miſconduct.

Various tranſactions of Solomon.



THE regal authority of Solomon was at this time perfectly eſtabliſhed; his people were reconciled to the government; and his enemies acknowledged the ſuperiority of his power. During this ſtate of uninterrupted tranquillity, Solomon contracted a marriage with the daughter of the king of Egypt, enlarged and conſiderably ſtrengthened the walls of Jeruſalem, and applied himſelf to the diſtribution of public juſtice. His early time of life was no obſtruction to an unremitting obſervance of the duties of his exalted ſtation, and a religious conformity to the inſtructions of his dying father. In ſhort, his judgment and penetration were arrived to ſuch a ſtate of maturity at this early period, that they would have done honour to the gravity of age and extenſive experience.

Solomon now determined to humble himſelf in prayer, and perform ſacrifice to the Lord, in gratitude for the bleſſings he enjoyed; and having repaired to Hebron, he made an oblation, conſiſting of a thouſand victims, upon the braſen altar erected by Moſes. This inſtance of piety proved ſo agreeable to the Almighty, that on the following night he viſited Solomon in a dream, and aſſured him that he would grant whatever he ſhould requeſt. He determined that the object of his choice ſhould be what the bountiful Donor would beſtow with the greateſt ſatisfaction; and, at the ſame time, an acquiſition of ſingular advantage to himſelf; and he petitioned the Lord to the following effect: "Grant me, O God! a juſt comprehenſion of things and a perfect judgment, that in the government of the people I may invariably regulate my conduct by the rules of truth and juſtice!" This proved ſo agreeable to the Almighty, that, in addition to the bleſſing of greater wiſdom than ever man poſſeſſed, he promiſed wealth and glory to Solomon; and, on condition of his conforming in all things to the divine will, and following the virtuous example of his father, the ſovereignty ſhould be continued in his family for many generations. Solomon awaked upon hearing theſe aſſurances, and having worſhipped the Lord, and offered thankſgivings, he returned to Jeruſalem, where he performed ſacrifice, and gave a general feaſt to his people.

Two harlots appealed to the king on the following occaſion: The complainant related, that ſhe had dwelt in the ſame lodging with the other woman; that while ſhe was aſleep, the defendant took her infant from her arms, and in the place ſubſtituted the body of her own child which ſhe had overlaid and ſmothered; that early in the morning ſhe diſcovered the fraud, and earneſtly pleaded to have her child returned, which ſhe infallibly knew to be her own from certain marks, but that her opponent perſiſted in a refuſal. She ſaid ſhe had no witneſs to ſupport her cauſe, but ſupplicated the king for juſtice. Solomon aſked the defendant what plea ſhe had to offer in extenuation of the charge. She reſted her defence on the aſſertion that the complaint was groundleſs, and that the living child was the iſſue of her body. The firmneſs with which each party ſupported her depoſition induced the auditors to ſuſpend their judgment on the iſſue of the cauſe, which at length was determined by the following happy expedient. Solomon commanded the living and the dead child to be produced, and that with his ſword one of his guards ſhould cut the bodies exactly in halves, one half of each to be given to each woman. Hereupon, the mother of the living child wept moſt bitterly, earneſtly ſupplicating that this ſentence might be reverſed, and declaring, that rather than the infant's life ſhould be ſacrificed, ſhe would relinquiſh all claim in favour of the other woman. The pretended mother appeared to be ſatisfied with the judgment, and even to enjoy a cruel pleaſure in the diſtreſs of her adverſary. On this evidence of maternal affection and natural tenderneſs, Solomon aſſigned the child to the real mother; and he ſeverely reproved the iniquity of the other woman in having endeavoured, after the loſs of her own child, to effect the deſtruction of that of her friend. The conduct of Solomon on this occaſion was conſidered as ſo ſingular an inſtance of his ſagacity and penetration, that from this time he was honoured as a king acting under the immediate direction of the ſupreme Being*.

Upon the acceſſion of Solomon to the throne, Hiram, the king of Tyre, ſent an embaſſy to congratulate him on the occaſion, and to expreſs the ſatisfaction he enjoyed upon the government being continued in the family of David, for whom he had entertained a great friendſhip. Solomon ſent the following letter by theſe embaſſadors.

"King SOLOMON to King HIRAM, greeting."

Solomon's meſſage to Hiram, king of Tyre.

"MY father David, be it known to thee, O king, long entertained the deſign of conſtructing a temple, and dedicating the ſame to the honour of God: but the wars of his time compelled him to decline this holy work, which he left to be compleated by me, during a ſtate of peace, according to the prediction of the Lord. Praiſed and bleſſed be his holy name for the preſent tranquillity of my reign. By the divine aſſiſtance, I ſhall avail myſelf of the opportunity that is afforded to proſecute this important work. I therefore requeſt that you will permit ſome of your people to accompany my ſervants to mount Libanus, and there aſſiſt in cutting down materials for the intended ſtructure; the Sidonians having more judgment in that buſineſs than we have. Such rewards as you may judge to be reaſonable ſhall be given to the workmen."

Solomon's letter proved highly ſatisfactory to Hiram, who ſent the following reply.

"King HIRAM to King SOLOMON."

Hiram's letter, in anſwer.

"NO circumſtance could have afforded me greater pleaſure, than that I experience in conſequence of the government of your bleſſed father being transferred to a ſucceſſor of ſuch eminent virtue and wiſdom. Praiſed be the name of the Almighty, for the gracious providence manifeſted in this happy event. Your requeſt ſhall be chearfully granted. Such numbers of the fineſt cedar and cypreſs-trees as you may have occaſion for, I will order to be cut down; and they ſhall be tranſported to ſuch ports as you may appoint, whence they may be conveyed to Jeruſalem by your own people. In exchange for this, if you will ſupply us with ſuch a proportion of corn as may be convenient, it will be conſidered as a particular obligation; that being an article moſt wanted in this iſland."

Hiram's letter proved ſo agreeable to Solomon, that he ordered him an annual preſent, conſiſting of two thouſand meaſures of wheat, two thouſand veſſels of oil, and two thouſand veſſels of wine, each veſſel containing ſeventy-two quarts. The friendſhip thus commenced between the kings, daily increaſed, and was manifeſted by a conſtant interchange of offices of kindneſs.

Solomon commanded thirty thouſand workmen to be ſelected, ten thouſand of whom he ordered to cut wood upon mount Libanus for the ſpace of one month, at the expiration of which time they were to be relieved by a ſecond ten thouſand, who were to do duty for a like period, and then to be ſucceeded by the third ten thouſand. Thus they were at liberty to remain at their reſpective habitations for two months, and, according to the rotation, every fourth month they were to return to labour. Adoniram was appointed ſuperintendent or inſpector-general of theſe workmen. There were beſides, ſeventy thouſand foreigners, whom David had intended for conveying ſtones and other materials, eighty thouſand maſons and ſtone-hewers, and thirty-two thouſand overſeers. They were ordered to ſearch for the largeſt ſtones for the foundation, and to prepare them for uſe on the mountains where they were procured, and then to convey them to Jeruſalem; and in this part of the buſineſs, Hiram's men were commanded to aſſiſt.

Solomon begins to build the temple.

Solomon began this important undertaking in the fourth year of his reign†, and in that month which is called Artemiſius by the Macedonians, and Jar by the Hebrews; five hundred ninety-two years after the Iſraelites had come out of Egypt; one thouſand and twenty years from the period when Abraham removed from Meſopotamia into the land of Canaan; fourteen hundred and forty years after the flood; and three thouſand one hundred and two years from the creation of the world. It was two hundred years after building the city of Tyre, and in the eleventh year of the reign of king Hiram.

Its dimenſions.

The foundation was ſunk to an aſtoniſhing depth, and compoſed of ſtones of ſingular magnitude, and ſo hard a quality, as to reſiſt the worm and the inclemency of the weather: and being cloſely mortiſed into the rock with great ingenuity, they formed a baſis adequate to the ſupport of the intended ſtructure. The temple was ſixty cubits high, and ſixty cubits alſo in length, and the breadth

* The wiſdom of this king, in determining the caſe between the harlots, is ſcarcely to be paralleled. He diſcovered a great penetration into the hidden receſſes of the heart, and the diſcovery made in conſequence proved it to be genuine.

† If it ſhould be aſked, why Solomon did not begin the building of the temple ſooner? it may be anſwered, that the materials his father had provided lay rude and unfaſhioned, and at a conſiderable diſtance: this time was therefore requiſite to form them into exact ſymmetry and order; eſpecially as the very ſtones, which made the foundation, were probably vaſt blocks of marble or porphyry, and all poliſhed in the moſt exquiſite manner. Abarbinel tells us, that Solomon would not make uſe of what his father had prepared; and therefore four years cannot be reckoned an unreaſonable time, to gather gold and ſilver ſufficient to defray ſo vaſt an expence.

was twenty cubits; above this, was another ſtage, of equal dimenſions, ſo that the height of the whole ſtructure was one hundred and twenty cubits. The walls were compoſed entirely of white ſtone: and the front of the building was towards the eaſt. The porch was twenty cubits in length, ten in breadth, and one hundred and twenty in height. Round the outward walls were erected thirty cells, or ſmall houſes, communicating with each other, and forming galleries, and at the ſame time anſwering the purpoſes of buttreſſes, by ſupporting the walls. Theſe cells were each five cubits broad, and of the ſame length, and twenty cubits high. Over theſe were two other floors of the ſame proportion, and the uppermoſt of the cells were on a level with the lower ſtory of the fabric. They were faſtened together by large beams, ſo diſpoſed as to make them appear of one piece, and as if they gave additional ſtrength to the walls. Under the beams was a variety of carving, gilding, fret-work, and other curious ornaments. The walls and cielings were lined with cedar, and the wainſcots were embelliſhed with a profuſion of ſplendid ornaments of the pureſt gold. The fabric was compoſed of ſtones poliſhed to the utmoſt degree of excellence, and put together with ſuch ingenuity, that the ſmalleſt crevice was not to be perceived. The whole, in ſhort, was ſo wonderfully executed, that it appeared to be the effect of divine providence, rather than of human art.

The ſecond ſtory had not, like the lower part, a large door towards the eaſt, but ſeveral ſmall doors were made to enter from the ſides. The king cauſed winding ſtairs to be cut in the wall, which ſtairs led to the upper part. The temple was intirely lined with cedar, and the timbers were joined by iron cramps, whereby great ſtrength and ſolidity were given to the building. Solomon cauſed the temple to be divided into two parts, the more inward of which was a ſpace of twenty cubits ſquare, called the holy of holies, and declared to be inacceſſible, being particularly conſecrated to the Almighty. The other ſpace of forty cubits was called the holy temple, and deſtined to the uſe of the prieſts. In the wall dividing the temple a large cedar door was made, and it was richly gilt and carved, and before it hung a veil of the fineſt ſilk and linen, curiouſly embroidered with hiſtorical and other repreſentations in purple, ſcarlet, and a variety of other colours, in the higheſt perfection.

The cherubims. The king cauſed two golden cherubims to be made, and he placed them in the holy of holies, and dedicated them to the Lord. They were each five cubits in height, and their wings, which were five cubits long, being ſtretched out, touched the walls on the north and ſouth ſides; and the other wings, joining each other, formed a covering for the holy ark. The ſuperb and curious workmanſhip of theſe cherubims, is beyond the power of deſcription. The doors were twenty cubits broad, and of a proportionable height, and overlaid with beaten gold; with which precious metal even the floor of the temple was entirely covered. Before the entrance of this place was hung a rich curtain. In ſhort, nothing was omitted which could add ſplendor and magnificence to this aſtoniſhing ſtructure.

Solomon being informed that a man in Tyre, named Chyram, was highly celebrated for his ſkill in the manufacture of metals, ſent thither to engage him. This man was alſo an ingenious architect. The father of Chiram was an Iſraelite by extraction, and his mother was of the tribe of Naphtali. The moſt difficult and curious work was aſſigned to this artificer, who caſt two hollow pillars, the braſs of which was four fingers thick; they were eighteen cubits high, and twelve in circumference. Upon the top of each of theſe pillars was formed a chapiter of braſs, five cubits high. Theſe were overſpread with a kind of braſs net-work; below them were lilies of the ſame device, and under theſe, two rows of pomegranates depended, an hundred in each row. The pillars were fixed in the entrance of the porch of the temple, and that on the right hand ſide was called Jachin, and the other Boaz.

Chiram made a veſſel of molten braſs, bearing ſome reſemblance to a globe ſevered in the middle, and from its extraordinary magnitude it was called the ſea. It meaſured ten cubits from ſide to ſide, and the metal was four fingers thick. It was ſupported by a twiſted pillar, meaſuring one cubit in circumference. At the baſe of this pillar were placed the figures of twelve bulls and oxen, ſo diſpoſed, that three faced the eaſt, three the weſt, three north, and three ſouth. The veſſel called the ſea*, would contain three thouſand baths; and each bath is eſtimated to be nearly equal to ten Engliſh pottles. He made ten braſen baſes, of equal dimenſions, with ſquare ſides: the length of them was five cubits each, the breadth four, and the height ſix. To each baſe were made four pillars or ſupporters, and the parts which were ſeparately caſt, were ſo nicely compacted and incorporated, that each baſe and its pillars appeared to be one entire piece of work. The figures of a bull, a lion, an eagle, and other repreſentations, were wrought upon the baſes; the pillars, and the plates of the borders were adorned with correſponding images. The whole was mounted on a carriage of four wheels, each a cubit and a half over; the wheels, ſpokes, nave, and every other part being caſt, and put together with ſurpriſing ingenuity. Emboſſed work was introduced, in repreſentation of hands, ſhoulders, the paws of lions, talons of eagles, and branches of palm-

The braſen ſea.

* In Hebrew, the word baijom is uſed to ſignify any great collection of waters; and in this place the word baijom [ſea] ſignifies a large veſſel containing a great quantity of water. In 1 Kings vii. 26. we read, that this ſea contained two thouſand baths: now a bath was the ſame with the ephah, and contained eight gallons; ſo that, according to this computation, the ſea here mentioned held ſixteen thouſand gallons.

trees, for the purpoſe of making good the angles; and reſts were formed for receiving the lavers. To each of theſe baſes was made a laver of the ſame metal, being four cubits high, and of an equal meaſure in diameter. The lavers, each of which would contain forty baths, being placed on the baſes, were depoſited in the temple; five being diſpoſed on the north, and five on the ſouth ſide, facing the eaſt. The braſen ſea was alſo depoſited in the building; and it was aſſigned to the uſe of the prieſts, who were to waſh their hands and feet therein, previous to their approaching the altar. The lavers were made uſe of for cleanſing the entrails and other parts of the victims deſtined for the holocauſts.

The altar of braſs. He conſtructed a braſen altar, meaſuring twenty cubits long, twenty broad, and ten in depth, on which the burnt-offerings were made, and provided water-pots, fleſh-hooks, and boilers, of the ſame metal; and, in ſhort, all the utenſils appertaining to the religious ceremony. Solomon cauſed an immenſe number of tables to be made of various forms and ſizes, and of ineſtimable value; and one, which was larger than the reſt, was entirely compoſed of pure gold, and on this was placed the ſhew-bread; on the other tables were placed twenty thouſand veſſels and cups of gold, and forty thouſand of ſilver.

The candleſticks. In conformity to the injunction given by Moſes, Solomon provided twelve thouſand candleſticks, one of them, according to the direction of the law, held lights, which were kept conſtantly burning. This candleſtick was placed on the ſouth ſide, oppoſite the table for the ſhew-bread, which was on the north, and in the middle was the golden altar. The ark of the covenant was kept in the holy of holies, which was divided from the fore-part of the temple.

Cups, &c. Solomon alſo cauſed eighty thouſand wine cups, ten thouſand goblets, and other veſſels of various forms, to be made in gold, and twenty thouſand in ſilver. He alſo provided twenty thouſand of the golden meaſures, called the Moſaical Hin and Aſſaran, and forty thouſand of the ſame in ſilver; eighty thouſand golden diſhes and plates for ſteeping flour in upon the altar, and double that number in ſilver; twenty thouſand golden cenſers for incenſe, and fifty thouſand other cenſers for conveying fire from the great to the ſmaller altar.

Robes and muſical inſtruments. This great king further provided one thouſand ſacerdotal robes, with ephods, ſuits of precious ſtones and other appendages; but there was no crown except that on which Moſes had inſcribed the name of the Almighty: ten thouſand ſilken veſts, and a like number of purple girdles for the prieſts; two hundred thouſand trumpets, agreeable to the directions of Moſes, and the ſame number of ſilver ſtoles, for the uſe of the Levites, whoſe office was to chant hymns ſacred to the praiſe of God; and four hundred thouſand harps, pſalteries, and other muſical inſtruments for accompanying the voice, which were formed of a compoſition of gold and ſilver: in ſhort, nothing was omitted which wealth and induſtry could add to this glorious work, to manifeſt the zeal of the founder towards the Almighty, and inſpire others with correſpondent affections. That part of the temple wherein the prieſts only were to be admitted, was guarded by a fence three feet high: the ſpace which was for the reception of ſuch of the public as came with the purity and qualification required by the law, was a quadrangular court, with ſpacious galleries, and four ſuperb gates opening to the eaſt, weſt, north, and ſouth; and theſe gates were plated with gold.

For the purpoſe of erecting this temple, the moſt aſtoniſhing hollows were filled up; for the earth was raiſed four hundred cubits, in order to form it on a level with the ſurface of the rock on which the building was raiſed. The edifice was environed with a double cloiſter, ſupported by two ranges of pillars, each of which was hewn, in an intire piece, from the rock. Theſe cloiſters were wainſcotted with cedar, the doors were compoſed of ſilver, and the roof was fret-work. This ſtupendous undertaking was completed in ſeven years; and, conſidering the magnificence and ingenuity ſo aſtoniſhingly diſplayed, it may juſtly be ſaid to have been the work of ages compriſed within that period.

A general ſummons of the people to Jeruſalem. The temple being brought to a ſtate of perfection, Solomon diſpatched letters to the elders of Iſrael, and the principals of the different tribes, requeſting them to ſummon the people to Jeruſalem, in order to view the temple, and to aſſiſt in removing the Ark of Alliance thither. In the ſeventh month, which the Hebrews call Thuri, and the Macedonians Hyperberetæus, the populace aſſembled; and this was the time for celebrating the feaſt of the tabernacles, which was the moſt ſolemn feſtival obſerved by the Iſraelites. The holy ark, the tabernacle of Moſes* and the ſacred veſſels belonging to the altar, were conveyed into the temple by the prieſts, preceded by the king, the people, and the Levites, who ſprinkled the way with the blood of the victims for ſacrifice, and perfumed the air with incenſe, the fragancy of which extended to a great diſtance; and it was of ſo grateful and reviving a quality, that though the populace had danced and ſung all the way, they reached the temple without any ſenſation of fatigue; and they concluded that the Almighty had deſcended to conſecrate the temple, which was dedicated to his worſhip.

The ark, &c. conveyed to Jeruſalem. Having reached the holy of holies, the place deſtined for the reception of the ark, the people drew back, and left the prieſts to convey it into the oracle, where they fixed it under the two cherubims, which had been made with the points of their wings extending each to the other; ſo that the ark, which ſtood juſt beneath, appeared to be covered and protected thereby. In the ark were depoſited the two ſtone tables, which had the ten commandments engraven on them, as they had been delivered by God on mount Sinai. In the ſanctuary were alſo placed the candleſticks, table, and golden altar, diſpoſed in the ſame manner as they heretofore had been in the tabernacle, when daily ſacrifices were offered up. Directly oppoſite to the door was placed the braſen altar, that the grandeur of the worſhip on the other ſide might be the better ſeen. In the temple were likewiſe depoſited, all together, the remainder of the holy utenſils and veſſels.

The moſt reſpectful care having been taken to place the ark in a proper manner, and the prieſts being retired, a cloud deſcended, which ſo obſcured the view, that they ſcarcely ſaw each other: but its effects were ſo benign, that they appeared as not proceeding from a common cauſe, but an intimation of the divine pleaſure, and of the deſcent of God to dwell in the temple.

Prayer of Solomon.

As the people were deliberating on this event, Solomon aroſe, and with equal dignity and devotion, prayed as follows: "O God, who dwelleſt in eternity, thou who haſt created this world, the heavens, earth, air, and the ſea, from nothing; who filleſt all nature with thine unbounded and incomprehenſible greatneſs; look with compaſſion on us who have built a temple to the glory of thy name. May our prayers be heard, O God, and our ſacrifices accepted: though thou art omnipreſent, be particularly with thy ſervants. Nothing is hid from thee: from thine heavens, then, attend to our petitions. Have mercy upon us, O God, who heareſt thoſe that conſtantly worſhip thee, and reverently love and ſerve thee."

His addreſs to the people.

This prayer being ended, Solomon addreſſed the people on the providence and power of the Almighty, informing them how, in viſions and dreams, ſtrange things had been made known to David his father, reſpecting things paſt and to come, regarding himſelf, the name given him, his ſucceeding to the government, the raiſing the temple, his family being eſtabliſhed, and the welfare of the people at large: "And now, (ſaid he) as many of the prophecies are fulfilled, be you thankful to the Lord, not only for preſent enjoyments, but for future promiſes; and conſider the bleſſings beſtowed, as a prelude to greater yet to come."

Solomon's humble invocation and prayer to God.

Thus ſaying, Solomon lifted up his hand, and looking towards the temple, exclaimed, "What, O God! are the moſt ſplendid works of man, compared with the leaſt of thy bounties! How ſhalt thou, who wanteſt not our ſervices, be requited by thoſe who have nothing to beſtow! All we can offer is the tribute of our thanks and gratitude, a diſtinction by which men are honoured above thy other creatures; which thanks I now render, for myſelf, my family, and my people, for thy bleſſings heaped upon us. Accept, then, the words of our mouths, as the only preſent method of expreſſing our duty, for thy mercy to my late father, who was raiſed by thee from the ſheepfold to the throne, and for thy bounty to myſelf, in the ratification of thy moſt gracious promiſes and predictions. Continue to us, as to a choſen race, thy bleſſing; may the government remain uninterrupted in our family, for a ſucceſſion of ages, agreeable to thy promiſe to my father David. Grant this, O God; and may my people poſſeſs thoſe virtues that may make them acceptable to thee. Condeſcend, O God, to make this temple the place of thy peculiar reſidence. I am ſenſible that the heavens and earth are too confined for thy majeſty; much leſs can a building of wood and ſtone, the work of mortal hands, be worthy of it: yet I cannot refrain from imploring thy protection of it. Preſerve it, O God, from the attacks of our enemies, and let thy poſſeſſion of it be its peculiar defence *: and if, in future time, the ſins of this people ſhall call aloud for thy judgments, let their humble ſupplications, and unfeigned repentance, in this thy houſe, be accepted as an atonement for their crimes. And I implore this mercy, O God, not only for the Hebrews, but for all people who ſhall worſhip thee in this place. Thus ſhall the world know that we are thy choſen people, and that this is thine habitation; and it will be ſeen that the Hebrews are devoutly anxious for a general diſtribution of thy mercies."

Teſtimony of God's approbation of Solomon's prayer, worſhip, and ſacrifices.

Solomon having ſaid this, bowed to the ground, and having worſhipped God, aroſe and offered a variety of ſacrifices, of the acceptance of which proof was given, by a flaſh of fire which deſcended to the altar, and conſumed the ſacrifices. The multitudes who ſaw this, conſidered it as a token that God acknowledged the temple, and approved the worſhip;

* God is repreſented in the ſacred writings both as the tutelary deity and the ſupreme magiſtrate of the Jews; in conſequence of which he governed them by an equal, or rather an extraordinary providence. This extraordinary providence is repreſented as adminiſtered, 1. Over the ſtate in general: 2. Over private men in particular. And ſuch a repreſentation we ſhould expect to find from the nature of the republic; becauſe as an extraordinary providence over the ſtate neceſſarily follows God's being their tutelary deity, an extraordinary providence to particulars follows as neceſſarily from his being their ſupreme magiſtrate. As to this providence over the ſtate, it would be abſurd to quote particular texts, when the whole Bible is one continued hiſtory of it. In this dedication of the firſt temple Solomon addreſſes a prayer to God, that the covenant between him and the people might remain firm and inviolate, and the old œconomy be ſtill continued. Solomon in this petition, which with reſpect to the given covenant we might properly call a petition of rights, ſpeaks the language of one who extended the temporal ſanction of the law to particulars and individuals: for he deſires God, according to the terms of the covenant, "To render unto every man according to all his ways." But when is it that he prays for the exertion of this extraordinary providence to particulars? At the very time when it is adminiſtering to the ſtate in general: "If there be in the land famine," &c. The neceſſary conſequence is, that as ſure as Solomon believed an extraordinary providence exerciſed to the ſtate in general, ſo ſurely did he believe it exerciſed to individuals in particular.

which so transported them, that they joined in one general adoration of the Deity. Solomon now returned thanks for so perfect a testimony of God's favour, in which he intreated the people to join him. He then recommended constant prayer to God, that they might still experience his grace, by living righteous and holy lives, according to the laws of Moses; which would certainly render them the most happy of all people. He reminded them, that their happiness could be only secured by what had acquired it, the practice of justice and religion. He farther said, it was not so easy to keep what they had obtained, as to procure what they wanted; and urged them not to forfeit, by misconduct, what their virtue had acquired.

Offerings. Solomon having finished his exhortations, dismissed the people, after an offering of twelve thousand calves, and 120 thousand lambs; on which all the Israelites, with their wives and children, were entertained, being the first blood shed in the temple. Exclusive hereof, the The feast of tabernacles. feast of tabernacles was celebrated, at Solomon's expence, before the temple; which was very splendid and magnificent, and continued for a fortnight.

The hurry of public business being ended, every one thought of returning home, after acknowledging the benevolence, good conduct, and wisdom of the king, and offering prayers for his continued life, and the happiness of his people. They returned rejoicing, singing, and praising God: and the tediousness of their journey was alleviated by the joy of their hearts, and the mutual good humour of the company.

God appears to Solomon in a vision. Soon after this, God appeared again to Solomon in his sleep, when he heard a voice intimating, that his prayers and sacrifices were accepted; and that God would preserve him, and dwell in his temple, while himself, his subjects, and their posterity, continued faithful in worship, as his father David had done. On this condition it was promised, that he should reach the utmost sublunary happiness; that the possession of the throne should remain in his family; and that the sceptre should for ever be swayed by a prince of the tribe of Judah: on the contrary, that if they should depart from their present worship, and seek strange gods, they should be cut off from the face of the earth, and be no more a distinct people; but being harrassed by war, and other calamities, should wander as exiles and vagabonds through the world. Solomon learnt from the voice of God, that, if his people apostatised, the new building should be destroyed, and burnt by barbarians, and Jerusalem laid in ashes by an unrelenting foe; so that amazement should arise from the extremity of the distress, that a people lately so favoured of heaven, and so distinguished by their riches and splendor, should at once sink to such utter contempt: to which themselves would answer, that the forsaking their God, and abandoning the religion of their forefathers, and their country, had brought that judgment upon them.

The royal palace. The temple being completed, Solomon began to build a royal palace, which was thirteen years in completing. He was not so anxious respecting the latter, as the former, which (as we have heretofore said) was finished in seven years, owing to the particular aid and blessing of God. The court of Solomon was greatly inferior to the temple, as the latter was designed for the immediate worship of God, the other for the residence of an earthly monarch: but it was adapted to its design, and a credit to the prince and people who built it.

Repair of the walls of Jerusalem. Solomon now repaired the walls of Jerusalem, to which he added towers and other securities. He likewise built, in the land of the Philistines, the cities of Asar, Magedon, and Gazara. This last city, Pharaoh, king of Egypt, had heretofore taken, razed it to the ground, and destroyed all the inhabitants; but afterwards gave it to his daughter, on her marriage with Solomon, who caused it to be rebuilt as a city of strength. He also built Betachora, Baleth, and other places of pleasing retirement, distinguished for good water, and pure air. Having taken possession of the entrance of the desert towards Syria, he there erected the fortified city of Thamadora, by which name the Syrians still call it; but the Greeks call it Palmyra. The city having several springs and fountains, was intended for a watering place to those who passed through the desert. It was six days journey from Babylon, two from Upper Syria, and one from the Euphrates.

The Canaanites made tributary. Between mount Libanus and the city of Amathe, there yet dwelt a number of Canaanites, who refused submission to the king of Israel; but at length, Solomon compelled them to pay an annual tribute of a fixed number of slaves, who were to till the land, and to do other laborious exercise; for the Hebrews engaged in no servile offices, it being thought dishonourable for those who had subdued so many nations, to do the work of captives. The disposition of the Israelites was turned to arms, military exercises, the use of horses, chariots, &c. The Canaanites were kept to constant work, and six hundred persons were appointed to superintend them, and to see they did their duty.

The king's navy. At Ezion-Geber, a bay of Egypt on the Red Sea, the king constructed a number of ships. This port is now named Berenice, and is near the city of Elan, formerly deemed to be in the Hebrew jurisdiction. King Hiram greatly assisted king Solomon in preparing his navy, sending him mariners and pilots, who conducted Solomon's officers to Ophir, called the Land of Gold, where they collected four hundred talents of gold, which they carried to Solomon.

The queen of Ethiopia visits Solomon. So great a character had Solomon now obtained for his virtue and knowledge, that Nicaulis, queen of Egypt and Ethiopia, who was also distinguished for her wisdom, was desirous of visiting him, doubtful if the reports concerning him had not exceeded the fact. When she had deliberated deliberated ſome time on the matter, ſhe came to a reſolution, and deſpiſed the inconvenience and danger of a long voyage, that her judgment might be convinced of the truth of what ſhe had heard. Thus reſolved, ſhe proceeded towards Jeruſalem with a moſt ſumptuous equipage, having in her train many camels laden with precious ſtones, gold, and perfumes. When ſhe arrived, Solomon received her with all the diſtinction due to her high rank; and ſo eaſily reſolved the difficult queſtions ſhe put to him, that ſhe was loſt in wonder to find the reality ſo much exceed the report. The ſplendor of the royal palace, the order and regularity of the edifice, and the king's ſagacious management of the building of it, were all matter of aſtoniſhment to her. The grove of Lebanon, which was deemed the maſter-piece of the building, charmed her highly; nor was ſhe leſs pleaſed with the œconomy of the houſehold, the regularity of the entertainments, and the ſingular grace which accompanied all that Solomon did. The ſight of the daily ſacrifices, and the devotion with which the prieſts and Levites performed their worſhip, afforded her great pleaſure. This matter was conſtantly in her thoughts; and when ſhe had pondered on the ſubject a long time, ſhe addreſſed the king to the following purport:

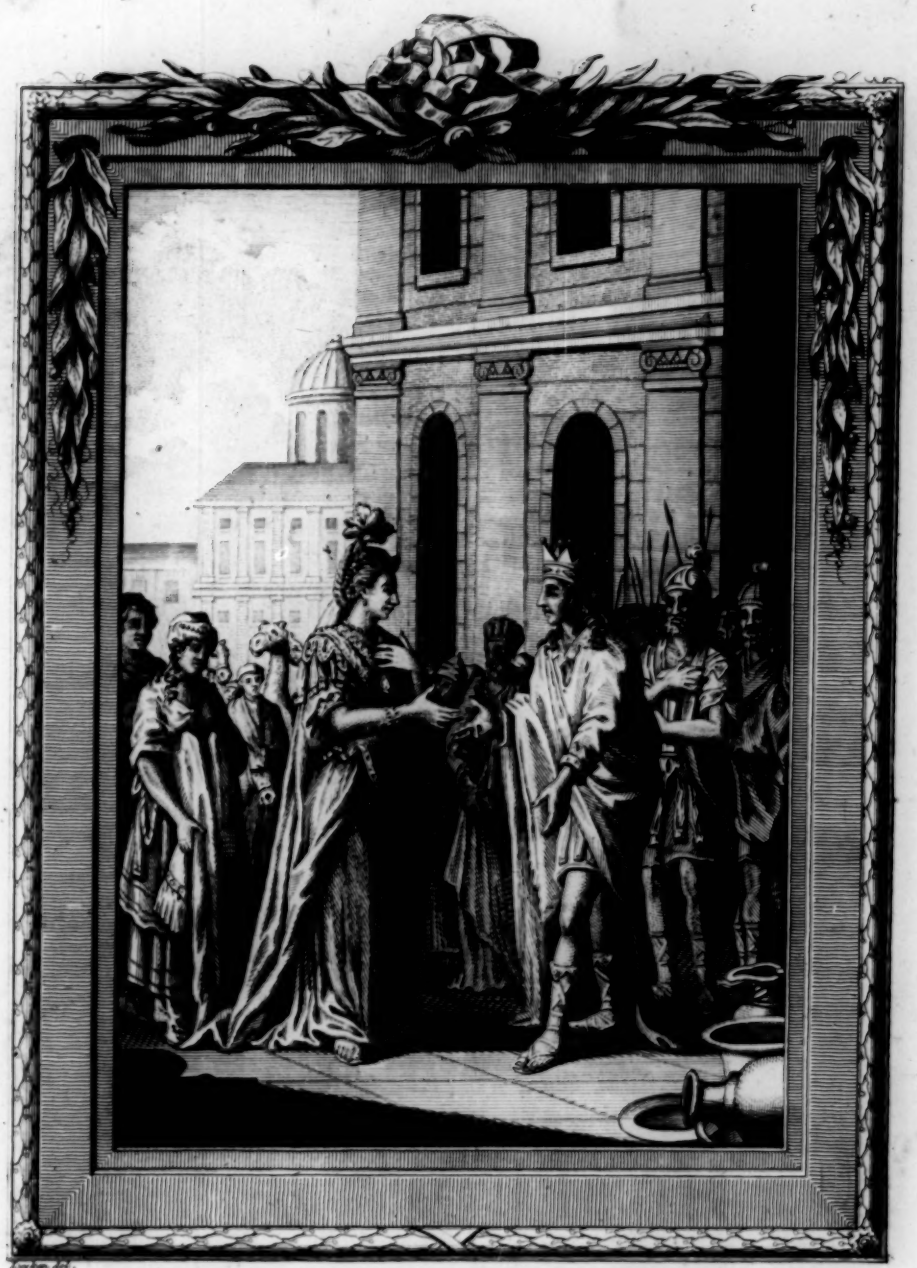
"Illuſtrious ſovereign! There is ſo much of doubt and uncertainty in common report, that when this report verges on the extreme of good or evil, we are conſtrained to with-hold our aſſent to it; but in reſpect to your intellectual faculties and diſtinguiſhed glory, common fame, ſo far from having exceeded the fact, hath fallen far ſhort of it; and I am this day a witneſs of that real dignity, which I thought had been heretofore exceeded in deſcription. The Hebrews are bleſſed, the friends and ſubjects of Solomon are bleſſed, who are continual witneſſes of his wiſdom; and all praiſe be rendered to God, for ordaining ſo worthy a prince to rule over this nation*."

This ſpeech being delivered, the queen preſented to Solomon twenty talents of gold, beſides precious ſtones, ſpices and perfumes, to a great amount. Tradition likewiſe reports, that ſhe gave him a root of balſam, the firſt of the kind that had ever been brought into Judea, where it has ſo greatly thrived ſince that time. Solomon was not deficient in making proper returns to the queen of ſuch preſents as he thought might pleaſe her, and he even prevented her wiſhes in every thing that he conceived would yield her ſatisfaction. The queen returned to her own country, ſoon after this mutual exchange of preſents.

Gold brought by ſea from Ophir.

At this period, Solomon's ſhips arrived from Ophir (named the Land of Gold), bringing rich ſtones, and great quantities of pine-wood; which laſt was uſed, partly to ſupport the palace and temple, and partly in the conſtruction of pſalteries, harps, and cymbals, on which the Levites ſung and played to the glory of God. For ſize and beauty, Solomon had never ſeen ſuch wood before; but it ſhould be remembered, that this is not what is uſually called pine, being more gloſſy and white, and having ſome reſemblance in the grain to that of a fig-tree.

Solomon received by this fleet, ſix hundred and ſixty-ſix talents of gold, excluſive of preſents from the kings and governors of Arabia; and the merchants had their uſual adventures. The king ordered two hundred targets to be caſt of this gold, which weighed each ſix hundred ſhekels, and were hung up in the principal hall in the grove of Lebanon. Even the cups that Solomon drank out of were made of beaten gold, adorned with ſtones of value; and of this rich metal, his common utenſils were made. In the above traffic, no money paſſed; Solomon ſending his own ſhips from the ſea of Tarſus, and receiving in exchange negroes, gold, ſilver, ivory, apes, &c. This voyage, the going and returning, uſually took up three years.



Solomon's magnificence, and preſents from foreign potentates.

The fame of Solomon's wiſdom and grandeur was now ſo extended, that the ſovereigns of many kingdoms wiſhed to ſee him; and loſt no opportunity of teſtifying their regard by the preſents they ſent him, which conſiſted of gold, ſilver, purple robes, perfumes, and ſpices, with chariots, horſes, and mules, the laſt of uncommon ſtrength and beauty. The king had now a thouſand chariots, and twelve thouſand horſes, which were rode by young men admirably ſkilled to manage them. Theſe youths were all dreſſed in purple, and when the ſun ſhone on their hair, which was intermixed with threads of gold, it had a moſt beautiful effect. Solomon uſed to ride, dreſſed in white, in a chariot, attended by theſe men, having arms and quivers, to a pleaſant houſe he had near the city, in which he much delighted, for the beauty of its gardens, walks, and fountains.

Solomon was of ſo quick a penetration, that it may be ſaid he ſcarcely ſuffered the moſt minute improvement, either for uſe or ornament, to eſcape him. He cauſed all the public roads leading to the palace at Jeruſalem, to be regularly paved with a black ſtone; and to this he was induced by the double conſideration of diſplaying his own magnificence, and contributing to the convenience of the public. He kept but few chariots at Jeruſalem, but diſperſed great numbers at different towns, which were called the Chariot-towns, and at theſe places they were kept free of expence. The profuſion of ſilver which was at Jeruſalem is not to be deſcribed; and cedars, which had before been known only in Judea, were now to be met with as frequently as mulberry trees. He commiſſioned certain Egyptian merchants to purchaſe a number of chariots, with two horſes to each, at the rate of ſixty ſilver drachmas for every carriage and pair of horſes: and theſe he ſent as preſents to the king of Syria, and other ſovereigns beyond the Euphrates.

* That the government of the Jews was only a vice-royalty, may be inferred from this circumſtance: The throne and kingdom of Judea is all along expreſsly declared to be "God's throne" and "God's kingdom." Thus the queen of Sheba, who viſited Solomon to be inſtructed in his wiſdom, and doubtleſs had been informed by him of the true nature of his kingdom, compliments him in theſe words: "Bleſſed be the Lord thy God, which delighted in thee to ſet thee "on his throne," to be king "for the Lord thy God;" as it is read, 2 Chron. ix. 8.

His diſobedience to the divine commands.

It is indiſputable that Solomon was greatly ſuperior to any monarch who had graced a throne, in piety, wiſdom, juſtice, power, and other eminent qualities: but it is equally certain, that by acting contrary to the law of Moſes, and the religious and legal inſtitutions of his anceſtors, he blaſted the hopes which his exemplary conduct in the early part of life had inſpired. His ungovernable attachment to women was ſuch, that, not contented with thoſe of his own country, he took the Tyrians, Sidonians, Ammonites, and others, in direct violation of the law of Moſes. The prohibition of the Hebrews intermarrying with foreign women, was made on the wiſe conſideration that women profeſſing an idolatrous religion might ſeduce men from the true God. Solomon contracted marriage with no leſs than ſeven hundred women, who were deſcended of the moſt exalted families, and one of them was daughter to the king of Egypt; and he had three hundred concubines. So infatuated was he by theſe women, that, to prove his tenderneſs and affection, he yielded to their impious examples.

He lapſes into idolatry.

As his age increaſed, the powers of his mind were impaired in proportion to thoſe of his body; and as he became indifferent in his duty to Almighty God, he was induced with the leſs difficulty to adopt the abominable mode of worſhip, which was exerciſed and recommended by his women *.

His conduct, in regard to the other ſex, was not his firſt breach of duty, for he tranſgreſſed the law by cauſing the figures of the twelve bulls to be placed round the pedeſtal of the braſen ſea, and afterwards cauſing the lions to be fixed on the ſteps of the throne. In his own family he had an an inſtance of the moſt eminent piety, honour, and virtue, in the perſon of his father, whoſe diſtinguiſhed qualities were recommended as an example, by a divine viſitation during his ſleep, to which he was inſtructed to adhere, on the penalty of incurring the divine vengeance. He diſregarded theſe inſtructions, and the conſequence was an ignominious death.

Prophecy of the revolt of the ten tribes.

After this, the Almighty, by the agency of a prophet, communicated to Solomon that he ſhould meet a retribution for his iniquities: but that, in conſideration of the promiſe given to his father, by the Almighty, he ſhould not be deprived of the government, which ſhould be tranſmitted to his ſon, who ſhould, however, be puniſhed for the crimes of his father: the prophet farther ſaid, that ten of the tribes ſhould revolt from his ſucceſſor, but that from a regard to his grandfather, and the temple at Jeruſalem, the other two ſhould preſerve their allegiance. The king became exceedingly diſtreſſed, in the idea of being removed from the eminence of temporal grandeur and felicity, to the extremity of miſery.

Adad becomes an enemy to Solomon.

Not long after this meſſage had been pronounced by the prophet, the Almighty was pleaſed to create a powerful and vindictive enemy to Solomon, in the perſon of Adad, who was a native of Idumæa, and a deſcendant of the royal line. When the Iſraelites conquered Idumæa, Joab, whom David had appointed to the command of the army, cauſed all the males capable of bearing arms, who could be found within the ſpace of ſix months, to be put to death. Adad, who was at this time very young, eſcaped to the dominions of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, who gave him a gracious reception, and, beſides houſes and lands, appointed him a revenue: and he conceived ſo high an eſteem for him, that, in proceſs of time, he gave him in marriage to his ſiſter Taphines, who bore to him a ſon, whom Pharaoh cauſed to be brought up with his own children. Upon intelligence being brought into Egypt that David and Joab were deceaſed, Adad requeſted the permiſſion of the king to return to his native country; where he intended to foment an inſurrection, in revenge for the cruel maſſacres perpetrated in the early part of his life. Pharaoh repeatedly urged him to relate the motive of his deſire to relinquiſh the protection of his beſt friend, but was not able to obtain a ſatisfactory reply.

The iniquities of Solomon now calling aloud for vengeance, the Almighty inclined Pharaoh to yield to the ſolicitation of Adad; who repaired to Idumæa with a reſolution to raiſe a rebellion againſt Solomon: but, obſerving the garriſons to be exceedingly ſtrong, and the whole country in an excellent ſtate of defence, he judged that he could not effect his purpoſe by ſurpriſe; and adjourned to Syria, where he united with a man named Rezon, the leader of a deſperate banditti, who was a fugitive from his maſter, Adadezer, king of Zobah. In conjunction with this man, he ſubdued that part of Syria, and having cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king, he committed great ſlaughter upon the Iſraelites, and obtained immenſe booty, during the reign of Solomon.

Ahijah predicts Jeroboam's reign over the ten tribes.

Jeroboam, the ſon of Nebat, was left at an early age to the direction of his mother: and as he advanced towards manhood, being obſerved by Solomon as a

* Had we not the authority of the ſacred hiſtorian, as well as others, it would hardly be credible that Solomon, who built the temple, and conſecrated it by the fineſt prayer that ever came from the mouth of a mere man; who had ſuch frequent viſions of the Almighty, and was favoured with ſuch inconteſtable evidence of the nature of the divine Being; we ſay, after ſuch favours and qualifications beſtowed on this man, it almoſt exceeds belief that he ſhould fall into idolatry through any ſnare or temptation. Surely, all his recollection muſt have failed him, and his memory muſt have totally deſerted him, before he could be guilty of ſuch monſtrous ingratitude and wickedneſs! Hence we may ſee, how frail, how impotent, the brighteſt and wiſeſt of men are, when left to themſelves!

youth of a generous diſpoſition, he appointed him ſuperintendent of the improvements making to the walls of Jeruſalem; and as a reward for the punctual diſcharge of his duty in this office, the king inveſted him with the military command of the tribe of Joſeph. As he was departing on ſome occaſion from the city, he was met by the prophet Ahijah, the Shilonite, who having called him to a retired ſpot, took hold of his garment, and rent it in twelve parts: he ordered him to take ten of the pieces, according to the will of the Lord, who, as a puniſhment for having attached himſelf to prohibited women and ideal gods, had determined to take the government from Solomon; adding, that in conſideration of the promiſe to David, two of the tribes would continue their allegiance to the ſon of Solomon. The prophet exhorted Jeroboam to the rigid obſervance of the laws, and the pious example of David, and carefully to avoid thoſe iniquities which had produced the reprobation of Solomon, as the certain means of eſcaping a ſimilar fate.

This prediction of the prophet much elated the ſpirits of Jeroboam, who being naturally of a turbulent and ambitious temper, immediately declared his intentions, and endeavoured to ſpirit up the army to an inſurrection; but Solomon being early appriſed of theſe practices, gave orders for apprehending him; whereupon Jeroboam judged it prudent to decamp, and he took refuge in the dominions of Shiſhack, king of Egypt.

It is indiſputable that Solomon was the richeſt, and, if we except the crimes he was led into, in the decline of life, by his violent paſſion for women, the wiſeſt ſovereign upon earth. Having reigned eighty years, he expired at the age of ninety-four, and was interred at Jeruſalem *.

CHAP. III.

SOLOMON is ſucceeded in the Government by his Son REHOBOAM. Ten Tribes eſpouſe the Cauſe of JEROBOAM, by whom they are ſeduced to the Worſhip of Idols. REHOBOAM alſo becomes an Apoſtate from the ALMIGHTY.

Rehoboam ſucceeds Solomon as king.

REHOBOAM, the ſon of Solomon, by Naama, an Ammoniti ſh woman, ſucceeded to the throne. Upon the deceaſe of the king, ſome of the principal people ſtrongly urged the return of Jeroboam, who ſpeedily repaired to Sichem; to which place Rehoboam had alſo adjourned for the purpoſe of declaring himſelf the ſucceſſor to the throne, under the ſanction of the unanimous ſuffrages of the people. Jeroboam joined divers of the princes and leading people in an application to Rehoboam, whom they adviſed to adopt a mild government; obſerving that, in ſome inſtances, Solomon had been rather oppreſſive; and that inſtead of rendering himſelf an object of terror to his ſubjects, his ſafety and happineſs required him to regulate his conduct in ſuch a manner as to obtain an acquieſcence to the meaſures of his government, from an unfeigned affection to his perſon, rather than a dread of his power. Rehoboam delayed making a reply for three days: and this circumſtance was the foundation of a jealouſy among the people, who conſidered that an immediate compliance with ſo reaſonable a requeſt, would not have been refuſed by a prince diſpoſed to promote the happineſs of his ſubjects. They reflected, however, that the ſuſpenſion did not imply an abſolute denial, and waited the event with favourable expectations.

He commits a fatal error by preferring the counſel of young men.

Rehoboam ſummoned the counſellors and friends of his late father, and requeſted their advice as to the reply he ſhould make. They recommended him to behave with a gracious humility on this occaſion; obſerving, that ſuch conduct would have a more favourable influence than a rigid obſervance of the formalities of ſtate. But ſo infatuated was this young prince by the charms of his new ſtation, that, rejecting the wholeſome counſel he had received, he applied for the ſentiments of ſome perſons of his own age and diſpoſition. They adviſed him to anſwer, "That they ſhould feel more weight from his little finger, than they had done from the loins of his father; that if they had been oppreſſed before, the oppreſſion ſhould be increaſed; and that if whips were the inſtruments of chaſtiſement made uſe of by his predeceſſor, he would himſelf inflict a more painful diſcipline by chaſtiſing them with ſcorpions †. In the utmoſt anxiety of hope and fear, the people aſſembled on the third day: when the king delivered the anſwer, preciſely in the words which the young men had recommended. Thus, by the providence of the Lord, was the prediction of the prophet Ahijah fulfilled. The people unanimouſly cried out, "We renounce all allegiance to the houſe of David. If it is his deſire, let the king poſſeſs the temple which was conſtructed by his father, but we are no longer the ſubjects of Rehoboam."

Revolt of the ten tribes.

This was the prelude of a general ſedition, which became ſo violent, that upon an officer of the king's treaſury being ſent forth to appeaſe the multitude, by attributing the cauſe of the revolt to the raſh advice of ſome inconſiderate young men, without permitting him to urge any exculpatory arguments, they ſtoned him to death. The king apprehending that

* Our author's account differs widely from that given in ſcripture of the reign and age of Solomon: the ſacred hiſtorian informs us, that he reigned forty years; which, added to nineteen, the time when he ſucceeded to the throne, makes his age to be no more than fifty-nine. 2 Kings xii. 42.

† They adviſe him to acknowledge that his father had greatly oppreſſed them, and at the ſame time to declare that he would act in a far more tyrannical and oppreſſive manner. But it was ſtill worſe, to acknowledge that his father had treated the Iſraelites like beaſts of burden, but he would uſe them in a far more cruel manner; and inſtead of common whips, uſe thoſe full of thorns or pieces of iron, which would tear their very fleſh in pieces.

his life was in danger, mounted his chariot, and made all poſſible expedition to Jeruſalem. The tribes of Judah and Benjamin continued in allegiance to him, but the others revolted to Jeroboam, and declared that they would never again acknowledge the ſovereignty of a deſcendent of David. Rehoboam muſtered one hundred and eighty thouſand men, and with this force he propoſed to proſecute a war againſt the ten tribes who had deſerted his cauſe, till he ſhould compel them to obedience. During the preparations for this intended enterprize, a prophet of God exhorted him not to engage in a civil war, urging, that the defection of the tribes was an event, which for juſt ends had been produced by the providence of the Almighty.

Jeroboam eſtabliſhes idolatry at Dan and Bethel.

Jeroboam conſtructed a palace at Sachem, where he eſtabliſhed his reſidence, and he afterwards built another at Penuel. On the approach of the feaſt of the tabernacles, he reflected, that if his people ſhould repair to Jeruſalem to celebrate that feſtival, the ceremonies of religion might ſo far operate on their minds, as to induce them to acknowledge allegiance to their late ſovereign, whereby both his life and government would be in imminent danger. On theſe conſiderations he determined to erect two temples, one at Bethel, and the other at Dan, which is ſituated near the head of the Leſſer Jordan. Having conſecrated the golden image of a calf in each of theſe buildings, he aſſembled the ten tribes under his command, ſeduced them into their idolatrous worſhip, and, by this act of diſobedience to the commands and laws of God, Jeroboam was the primary cauſe of the civil wars, bondage and other calamities, which they experienced, and alſo of the deſtruction of his own family.

Acts of Rehoboam.

The cities of Bethlehem, Etan, Tekoa, Bethzar, Shoca, Adullam, Ipa, Mareſha, Ziph, Adoraim, Lachiſh, Azekah, Zorah, Ajalon, and Hebron, were built in the tribe of Judah by Rehoboam, beſides many other towns of equal conſideration within the tribe of Benjamin. He appointed governors and eſtabliſhed garriſons in theſe places, which he amply ſupplied with corn, wine, oil, and every other neceſſary for defence and maintenance. The intolerable oppreſſion of Jeroboam occaſioned great numbers of the prieſts, Levites, and the laity, to repair to Jeruſalem, for the advantage of paying adoration to the true God, inſtead of the golden calves which their king had compelled them to worſhip: and in the courſe of three years, the power of Rehoboam was augmented in a very conſiderable degree. The firſt wife of Rehoboam was his kinſwoman, and by her he had three children. He married another relation named Maachab, who was daughter to Thamar, the daughter of Abſalom; ſhe bore to him Abijah. He had eighteen wives, and thirty concubines; and theſe women bore to him twenty-eight ſons and ſixty daughters. He intended that Abijah ſhould ſucceed him in the government; and to his care he entruſted his treaſure, and appointed him to ſuperintend his ſeveral places of ſtrength. It generally happens, that proſperity produces a corruption of manners; and this was the caſe with Rehoboam: for as his power increaſed, he gave additional latitude to the practice of vice. As it is uſual for the multitude to be influenced by the conduct of their ſuperiors, the licentious example of Rehoboam ſeduced his ſubjects into a profanation of the commandments of God.

CHAP. IV.

JERUSALEM is beſieged and taken by SHISHAK King of EGYPT. The Temple plundered. The Death of REHOBOAM, after whom his Son ABIJAH aſcends the Throne. Terrible denunciation of the Prophet AHIJAH againſt JEROBOAM, and his Houſe.

Shiſhak invades Judea, takes Jeruſalem, and ſpoils the temple.

SHISHAK, king of Egypt, was choſen by the Almighty as an inſtrument of vengeance upon Rehoboam; and not Seſoſtris, as Herodotus aſſerts. When Rehoboam was in the fifth year of his reign, Shiſhak marched againſt him with a numerous army, chiefly compoſed of Ethiopians and Africans, and ſuppoſed to contain twelve hundred chariots, ſix thouſand horſe, and forty thouſand foot, with which he attacked and ſubdued the Iſraelites; and having eſtabliſhed garriſons in ſeveral fortified towns, which had ſurrendered to him, he laid ſiege to Jeruſalem, where Rehoboam and his people were blocked up.

In this exigency Rehoboam earneſtly ſupplicated the Almighty to grant him victory over his enemies, but his prayers were rejected: and to increaſe his terror, the prophet Sameas informed him, that the Lord had determined to withdraw his protection from ſuch as were degenerated into a ſtate of apoſtaſy. The prophet's words had ſuch an effect on the king and the people, that they acknowledged their ſins, and that their puniſhment was juſtly inflicted. Thus reduced to the moſt deſponding ſituation, the king was aſſured by the prophet that their penitence would be ſo far regarded by God, that he would not ſuffer them to be totally ruined, but that the Egyptians ſhould hold them in bondage, in order that they might be convinced whether ſerving God or man was attended with the greater advantage. Terrified by this declaration, Rehoboam ſurrendered the city upon certain conditions: but, diſregarding the articles of the ſtipulation, Shiſhak plundered the temple, and made prize of all the plate and other treaſure which was dedicated to God, as well as that which belonged to the king: he likewiſe ſeized the golden ſhields and bucklers of Solomon: the golden quivers which had been taken from the king of Sophena by David,

David, beſides gold and ſilver to an immenſe value*.

When Shiſhak had returned into the land of Egypt, Rehoboam cauſed a number of ſhields and bucklers to be made in braſs, and ſubſtituted them in the place of the golden ones which had been taken away. The ſucceeding part of the reign of Rehoboam was not interrupted by any remarkable event: and he died at the age of fifty-ſeven years, ſeventeen of which he held the ſovereign rule. He was a man of weak intellects and haughty diſpoſition, and ſuffered his kingdom and himſelf to be ruined by not following the good advice given him. He was interred among the kings at Jeruſalem, and ſucceeded by his ſon Abijah, in the eighteenth year after the ten tribes had ſubmitted to his government.

Death of Jeroboam's child foretold by the prophet.

Let us return to Jeroboam, whoſe wickedneſs exceeded all bounds. He daily fixed up altars in the high places, and from the loweſt claſſes of the people cauſed prieſts to be ordained; for which inſults, God cauſed a merited judgment to fall heavily upon him and his family. At this period his ſon Obimes was afflicted with ſickneſs, and he ordered his wife to dreſs herſelf as a perſon in a private ſtation, and go to the prophet Ahijah, who had formerly predicted that he ſhould himſelf obtain the royal dignity. Go to the prophet (ſaid he) and enquire whether the boy will be freed from his illneſs. She followed her huſband's directions, and departed for Shilo, where the prophet then dwelt. During the time ſhe was upon her journey, Ahijah, whoſe ſight was much impaired by age, was addreſſed by a voice from heaven, informing him that the woman was coming to his houſe, and upon what occaſion; what queſtions ſhe would put to him, and what anſwers he ſhould return. When ſhe approached the door, he ſpoke to her as the wife of Jeroboam, and told her not to attempt to conceal who ſhe was, for that the power who had given him previous information of her arrival, and inſpired him with what he was about to ſay, could not be deceived. Return (ſaid he) to your huſband, and aſſure him that the Almighty hath thus ſpoken: "As I deprived the houſe of David of the regal authority, and from a mean ſtation in life exalted thee to the dignity of a throne; and as thou haſt, with the greateſt ingratitude, deſerted me, and impiouſly put up gods of thy own invention, made by the hands of men, and preferred them before the Creator of the univerſe, I will, therefore, immediately extirpate thee and thy houſe from the face of the earth, and give your carcaſes to be eaten by the dogs, and the birds of the air; and another king ſhall be in thy ſtead, who ſhall not ſuffer one man of thy family to remain alive; nor ſhall the people themſelves avoid puniſhment, for they ſhall be driven out of the happy land they inhabit, and be ſcattered beyond the Euphrates, for imitating thy wickedneſs, and worſhipping thy gods in ſcorn of me and what I have commanded. Haſten to your huſband, and inform him what I have now related: and as to the child, it ſhall expire the inſtant you enter the city. He ſhall be interred with a public ſolemnity, and lamented as the only part of Jeroboam's family who had not merited reprobation."

Terrified at what Ahijah had ſaid, ſhe departed with the utmoſt ſpeed, and on her arrival, ſhe was exceedingly afflicted to find the words of the prophet verified in regard to the child. She related to her huſband a circumſtantial account of what Ahijah had communicated†.

CHAP. V.

JEROBOAM King of ISRAEL, is ſubdued by ABIJAH King of JUDAH. The Death of ABIJAH, who is ſucceeded by ASA. JEROBOAM dies; and after him his Son NADAB reigns. NADAB is killed by BAASHA, who exterminates the Family of JEROBOAM.

NOTWITHSTANDING all theſe puniſhments, Jeroboam ſtill continued to raiſe great forces, and offered battle to Abijah, who, in his father's right, then reigned over the two tribes. As this prince was but little practiſed either in civil or military affairs, Jeroboam entertained the utmoſt confidence of victory. But far from being diſmayed, Abijah manifeſted a conduct which ſcarcely could be expected at his early time of life, and immediately

* Theſe prodigious treaſures, which David and Solomon had amaſſed, were a great incitement to Shiſhak to undertake this expedition; and in five years after Solomon's death, they were all carried into Egypt. Hence we may learn what little dependence can be laid on riches, when the poſſeſſors of them turn their backs upon God the giver of them, and reject his worſhip and ſervice.

† The reaſon why Jeroboam ſent his own wife to conſult the prophet at Shiloh, was to keep the whole tranſaction an inviolable ſecret; for had it been divulged, his whole government might have been in danger: becauſe, if his ſubjects came to underſtand that he put no confidence in the golden calves, but had recourſe to the worſhippnig of Jehovah, they would forſake theſe ſenſeleſs idols, and return to the true worſhip of the God of Iſrael, whom they had ſo imprudently forſaken. The queen then was the only perſon he could place this confidence in. As a mother, he knew ſhe would be diligent in her inquiry; and, as a wife, faithful in her report. But there were many reaſons why he might deſire her to diſguiſe herſelf: for though Shiloh lay within the confines of Ephraim, yet there is ſufficient reaſon to think it was ſubject to the houſe of David. It was certainly nearer Jeruſalem than Shechem, and therefore Jeroboam thought it not ſafe to venture his queen in a place under his rival's government, without her putting on ſome diſguiſe. He knew alſo, that the prophet Ahijah was offended at the groſs idolatry he had introduced; and therefore he thought that her being diſguiſed would be the only means of making the prophet ſpeak without the leaſt reſerve. He thought, indeed, that ſhe might paſs upon him, when diſguiſed, for another perſon. But how groſsly was he miſtaken! It is ſurpriſing he could be ſo far infatuated as to think that the perſon who was capable of foretelling the fate of his ſon, ſhould not at the ſame time be able to ſee through this fraud and diſguiſe.

collected a body of soldiers from the two tribes, and marched towards mount Samaron, where he established his quarters, and prepared for battle. His army contained four hundred thousand men; and double that force formed the army of Jeroboam.

Jeroboam's army defeated with great slaughter.

A detachment from the army of Jeroboam privately marched in the rear of Abijah's troops, who were greatly alarmed by the event: but their leader encouraged them to preserve their fortitude, exhorting them to depend on the protection of the Almighty, who would render abortive the most consummate treachery levelled against the righteous cause which they were engaged to support. This revived their courage, and they addressed themselves to prayer, till the signal was given; when with loud shouts they attacked the enemy, whom they totally defeated, committing a more dreadful carnage than is recorded either in the Greek or Barbarian annals. Five hundred thousand soldiers fell upon the field of battle. Bethel and Ithen, and all their best fortified towns, were conquered and pillaged. This stroke so weakened Jeroboam, that he was not in condition to renew his attempts during the life of Abijah, who not long afterwards died, after having reigned three years; and he was interred in the sepulchre of his forefathers at Jerusalem. He had, by fourteen women, two and twenty sons, and sixteen daughters, all of whom survived him.

Death of Jeroboam.

Jeroboam died in the twenty-second year, after being invested with the sovereignty of the ten tribes, and in the second year of the reign of Asa. He was succeeded by his son Nadab, who possessed the kingdom for two years only, during which time he endeavoured to exceed his father in every kind of wickedness. He levied forces, and marched against Gabathon, a city belonging to the Philistines, imagining that he could conquer the place by siege. While this intended enterprize was in agitation, he was treacherously murdered by Baasha, the son of Machel. Baasha assumed the government, and extirpated the whole house of Nadab, agreeable to the prediction of the prophet, that such of the race of Jeroboam as should die in the city the dogs should devour, and the fowls of the air those who should perish in the fields*. These punishments justly fell upon Jeroboam and his house, for deserting the Lord, and for their other impieties.

CHAP. VI.

Amiable Character of ASA, King of JUDEA. He gains a complete Victory over ZARÆUS, King of ÆTHIOPIA. The King of DAMASCUS enters into a Confederacy against BAASHA, King of ISRAEL, whom CREON kills, and ZIMRI murders his Son and Successor ELAH.

ASA, son of Abijah, and now king of Judea, pursued a conduct very different from that of Jeroboam king of Israel, and his immediate successors; inasmuch as he paid the most rigid observance to every institution both divine and moral. He introduced the most wholesome laws for the better regulating his government, and directed his attention towards correcting the abominable vices which had been introduced among the people. He had three hundred thousand chosen men of the tribe of Judah, whose arms were lances and shields; and from the tribe of Benjamin, two hundred and fifty thousand, provided with bows and bucklers.

In the tenth year of the government of Asa, Zaræus, king of Æthiopia, led against him a body of forces, consisting of one hundred thousand horse, nine hundred thousand foot, and three hundred chariots. On his arrival at Maresa, a city of Judah, Asa encamped his army in the valley of Saphatha, at a small distance from the city, and prepared for battle.

Observing the formidable power of the enemy, Asa invoked the aid of the Almighty, declaring, that he had taken up arms only through the confidence he reposed in him, and that his assistance would more than compensate for the inferiority of numbers, and every disadvantage. God attended to the intreaties of Asa, and, by a sign, gave him to understand that he should prove victorious With this assurance, he proceeded to the encounter, gained an absolute victory, and pursued the enemy with great slaughter to the plain of Gera.

Asa defeats the Ethiopian army.

Having obtained immense booty from the plunder of the town of Gerar, and the camp of his adversary, Asa directed his march towards Jerusalem, near which place, the prophet Azariah, having ordered him to halt, spoke to the following effect: "It hath pleased the Almighty, on account of your virtues, to give you this signal victory; and if you proceed in a similar discharge of your duty, you may be assured that success will attend all your future undertakings; but if otherwise, you will suffer the most dreadful calamities; and a period will arrive, when there will not be a priest qualified for the holy office, or a true prophet to be found amongst you. Your cities will be razed, and your people dispersed through the earth, without any fixed place of residence. Exercise yourselves, therefore, in acts of piety, before it is too late, and unanimously offer up your thanks to God for the happiness you at present enjoy." Asa, and all his army, received great comfort from these words; and they continued particularly careful in paying the strictest attention to their religion and laws. To enforce the latter

* There is a remarkable similarity between Jeroboam and Baasha in their lives and in their deaths, in their sons and in their family: for as Nadab the son of Jeroboam reigned only two years, so Elah the son of Baasha reigned no more; and as Nadab was killed with the sword, so also was Elah.

Aſa appointed proper officers throughout the kingdom.

Baaſha uſurps the kingdom of Iſrael.

Baaſha, who murdered Jeroboam's ſon, and uſurped the kingdom, reigned four years. His palace was at Tarſhiſh, and he far exceeded both Jeroboam and his ſon in every kind of wickedneſs. He was guilty of the greateſt tyranny and oppreſſion, and ſet even the Almighty at defiance. Jehu, the prophet, therefore, by the command of God, informed him, that he was reſolved to extirpate him and his whole race, as he had the family of Jeroboam; for as he followed the wicked example of Jeroboam, it was proper he ſhould equal him in his ſufferings. Notwithſtanding theſe threats, Baaſha ſtill perſiſted in his iniquitous courſes, as if he had expected a reward for his ſins, rather than a puniſhment: at length he advanced with ſome forces to Ramath*, which is about forty furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem, and a place of ſome conſequence. This city he fortified, conſidering it as an advantageous ſituation for making incurſions into the kingdom of Aſa; who, being rather apprehenſive of his intentions, and reflecting on what ill conſequences might attend his people, by ſuffering ſo numerous an army near them, immediately ſent an embaſſy, with large gifts to the king of Damaſcus, intreating him to become his ally, from a regard to that affection which their families had always entertained for each other. The preſents of Aſa, and the requeſted alliance, were accepted by the king of Damaſcus, who detached himſelf from Baaſha, attacked his towns, and burnt and plundered ſeveral of them, among which were Achion, Dan, and Abelmaen. As ſoon as Baaſha was informed of theſe proceedings, he left Ramath, and returned to the care of affairs in his own kingdom. From the materials left at the departure of Baaſha, two ſtrong towns were built by Aſa, who called one of them Gaba, and the other Maſpha. After this, Baaſha never more entered the field, for he was murdered by Creon, and interred in the city of Arſanes. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Elah, who after he had reigned two years, was, while he was drinking with Oſa, his houſhold ſteward, killed by Zimri, one of his maſters of horſe, during the abſence of his guards, who were then laying ſiege to Gabatha, a city belonging to the Philiſtines.

His towns attacked and burnt, and himſef afterwards murdered.

CHAP. VII.

ELAH, King of ISRAEL, being murdered by ZIMRI, OMRI is choſen King by the Army. ZIMRI deſtroys himſelf and the Palace by Fire. OMRI is ſucceeded by AHAB, whoſe Ruin is predicted by ELIAS. JEHU aſcends the Throne of ISRAEL, and HAZAEL becomes King of ASSYRIA. JEZEBEL cauſes NABOTH to be ſtoned.

Elah, Zimri, and Omri, reign ſucceſſively.

AFTER the murder of Ela, Zimri became king of Iſrael, and totally exterminated the family of Baaſha, according to Jehu's prophecy. As ſoon as the king's death was known to the army, which was then before Gabathon, and that Zimri had uſurped the kingdom, they immediately elected Omri, the captain of the guards, to reign over them. After raiſing the ſiege, he marched directly to Tirzah, which he took by ſtorm. Zimri perceiving there was no guard in the city, retired into one of the apartments of the palace, to which he ſet fire, and conſumed the whole building, himſelf periſhing in the flames, after a reign of only ſeven days. Every thing was now in the moſt embarraſſed ſtate; and the nation formed itſelf into two parties, the one faction ſupporting the intereſt of Omri, and the other that of Thaman: but the former ſucceeded, for Thaman was killed, and Omri enjoyed the whole kingdom. Aſa had now reigned thirty years, Omri filled the throne twelve years, half of which time he reigned at Tirzah, and the remainder at Mareon, which is called Samaria by the Greeks. The mountain on which it was erected, was purchaſed of a man whoſe name was Samar, from whom Omri called it Samareon. He excelled all his predeceſſors in wickedneſs; and, like them, by daily acts of impiety, turned the affections of his ſubjects from the duty they owed their Creator. God therefore made all theſe kings the inſtruments of deſtroying each other, till at length they were totally extirpated. Omri died at Samaria, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Ahab. We have here an excellent proof of God's goodneſs, in directing the affairs of men, of his making the good happy, and totally deſtroying thoſe who diſobey him; for Aſa, who reigned over Jeruſalem, and the two tribes, was the only one who enjoyed felicity: and in conſequence of his uniform integrity, he poſſeſſed the favour of his Creator to a very advanced time of life. He died after he had reigned forty-one years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Jehoſhaphat, whom he begat upon Abidah, and who inherited his father's virtues, and regulated his conduct by the example of David, his intrepid and pious anceſtor.

Ahab reigns wickedly, and promotes idol worſhip.

Twenty-two years did Ahab, king of the Iſraelites, reſide in Samaria, where every alteration he made in the government was an injury thereto. He copied the vices of predeceſſors, particularly thoſe of Jeroboam, whoſe golden calves he worſhipped, beſides committing other enormities. Having married Jezebel, daughter of Eth-baal, king of Tyre and Sidon, ſhe ſeduced him to worſhip the gods of her country.

* This city was in the tribe of Benjamin, ſouth of Jeruſalem. It was fortified and garriſoned to prevent the Iſraelites from going to worſhip at Jeruſalem, as they had been permitted in the former reign; and thereby this politic king thought he ſhould guard againſt any inſurrection or revolt of his own ſubjects.

This woman was raſh, violent, and ungovernable. She cauſed a temple to be built, in honour of Baal; and had groves of trees planted, in which prieſts and falſe prophets performed ſervices of idolatry. Theſe proceedings gratified Ahab, who took delight in the prieſts, and their extravagant worſhip.

Elias foretells a drought of three years duration.

At this time a prophet, named Elias, a native of Gilead, waited on the king, and ſaid, that "on his leaving him, neither rain nor dew ſhould fall in the province, till his return." Having thus ſaid, he departed, and travelled towards the ſouth, till arriving at a river, he there remained for the convenience of the water, and was ſupplied with meat by ravens. The drought increaſed till the river was dried up, when Elias was directed by the Almighty to go to a town between Tyre and Sidon, called Sarepta, where he would meet with a widow woman who would ſupply his neceſſities.

The widow's meal and oil miraculouſly increaſed.

Hereupon he ſet forward, and when near the place, beheld the woman picking up ſticks, whom he aſked for water; and, as ſhe was going for it, bid her bring bread alſo. She ſaid, a handful of meal, and a little oil, was all ſhe had to keep herſelf and ſon from ſtarving, and ſhe was now gathering ſticks to bake it into a cake. The prophet encouraged her to let him partake of it, on the aſſurance that, when they were all ſatisfied, her barrel ſhould be conſtantly ſupplied with meal, and her cruiſe with oil, till the earth ſhould be repleniſhed with rain by the goodneſs of God. She obeyed the prophet; and, though they conſtantly fed, found her ſtock as conſtantly repleniſhed, till the dry ſeaſon ended.

Elias reſtores to life his hoſteſs's child.

The ſon of the woman who had entertained Elias, falling very ill, ſhe attributed the misfortune to him; ſaying, "This man whom I have fed has brought this judgment upon me, on a diſcovery of my ſins." At length, when the child was thought to be dead, the prophet ſaid, "Give him to me, and I will recover him to life;" and taking him to his chamber, he placed him on the bed, and prayed that God would reſtore him; for that the death of the ſon, while he remained in the family, would appear to be a ſevere requital of the mother's goodneſs to him. The prayers of Elias were heard; God reſtored the child; and the mother was all gratitude, and confeſſed that the Spirit of God directed the actions of the prophet *.

Rain is promiſed.

Soon after this, Elias was commiſſioned to acquaint Ahab, that rain would ſpeedily fall. By this time the famine raged to ſuch a degree, that the people were on the point of ſtarving; nor was there food for the cattle. Obadiah, who ſuperintended the royal ſtables and fields, was now ſent for by the king, who ordered him to ſeek near the rivers and ditches, for graſs for the horſes and other cattle, and alſo to find the prophet, who had been long ſought for in vain. Now Obadiah was a righteous man, who had heretofore hid in caves and ſupported one hundred prophets, during Jezebel's perſecution of them.

Obadiah meets Elias.

Obadiah had no ſooner left the king, than he met Elias, who bid him tell his maſter that he was coming to him. "Wherefore (ſaid Obadiah) ſhould you diſpatch me with ſuch a meſſage, who am ſent in ſearch of you, that the king may inflict a tormenting death on me? When I am gone, the ſpirit by which you are governed may lead you another way, and then my life will pay the forfeit. Have more concern for my ſafety. You know my zeal for your fraternity, by my preſervation of the hundred prophets, whom I ſtill ſupport in the caves." The prophet, however, inſiſted on his going, and ſolemnly ſwore to attend Ahab. When the king found he was coming, he haſtened to meet him, and in a rage exclaimed, "Is it not you that are the plague of the Iſraelites? Is it not you to whom this drought and famine are owing?" The prophet replied, that Ahab and his houſhold occaſioned their own diſtreſſes, by the introduction of falſe gods, and departing from the true religion. Elias now demanded an aſſembly of the people on mount Carmel, and that Jezebel's prophets, and the prophets of the groves, might be preſent. Ahab aſſembled them; and Elias ſtanding in the midſt, ſaid, "Wherefore heſitate you betwixt two opinions? If you think ours the true God, worſhip him, and keep his commands: or if you prefer the worſhip of falſe gods, the choice is your's." No reply being made, Elias proceeded thus: "Here am I, a ſingle prophet, againſt three hundred: if you would aſcertain which is the true religion, I will place an ox on a pile of wood, but not ſet it on fire: let the other prophets do the ſame, and implore their gods to inflame the pile; by which the true worſhip will be diſtinguiſhed from the falſe." This mode of determination being acceptable to the multitude, Ahab's prophets laid their ox on the pile; and when they had offered their incantations a long while, Elias ridiculed them, bidding them ſpeak louder, for their gods might be aſleep, or on a journey. From morning till noon they continued their exorciſms, cutting and flaſhing their bodies; but the effect was not produced. Elias being now to ſacrifice, bid the people draw near, and obſerve that no fire was ſecretly conveyed to his pile. Having taken twelve ſtones †, that is one for each tribe, he made an altar of them, round which a deep ditch was cut: then placed his wood on the altar, and on it the ſacrifice, throwing four veſſels of clear water on the altar, which filled the ſurround-

* Though the woman had before ſufficient reaſon to believe that Elijah was a prophet, yet upon his not curing her ſon when he lay ſick, her faith began to fail. But upon ſeeing him raiſed from the dead, her faith revived with her ſon; and, through the joy of having him reſtored, ſhe conſidered this laſt miracle as much greater than the former.

† This, as obſerved above, being in alluſion to the number of tribes, was probably intended alſo to ſhew, that all the Iſraelites, though now divided into two nations, ought to be united by the ſame band of love and unity, and to adopt one and the ſame mode of worſhip; namely, that of the true and living God, whoſe temple was at Jeruſalem.

ing ditch. All being prepared, the prophet called on God to convince the unbelievers; and, while he was yet ſpeaking, fire deſcended from heaven, burnt up the ſacrifice, and dried the water. This miracle aſtoniſhed the Iſraelites, who bowed to the ground in adoration of the only living and true God. Elias then ordered all the falſe prophets to be put to death, which being done, the people departed.

The prophet foretells a great fall of rain.

The prophet now aſcended mount Carmel, and, ſitting on the ground, with his head on his knees, commanded his ſervant to climb a rock near the ſea, and look out for a cloud. After ſix fruitleſs attempts, he ſaid he ſaw ſomething about the ſize of a man's hand in the air, of a blackiſh colour. Elias hearing this, ſent to bid Ahab haſten to the city, or a violent ſtorm of rain would overtake him; and indeed a great rain fell, and the whole atmoſphere was clouded, by the time that he had reached Jezreel, to which city Elias, by God's immediate ſupport, ran before his chariot.

Elias, on Jezebel's menaces, flees to Beerſheba.

Jezebel hearing of the deeds of Elias, and how he had cauſed the death of her prophets, ſent and threatened his deſtruction. Hereupon, he fled to Beerſheba, where leaving his ſervant, he departed into the wilderneſs, and laying down on the ground, wiſhed for death. "I am no more worthy, O God (ſaid he), than thoſe who have preceded me; nor have I any deſire to live." Having ſlept under a tree, he found himſelf awakened by an inviſible agent; when riſing and looking round him, he ſaw meat and drink, with which he refreſhed himſelf, and then repaired to mount Sinai, where he found a cave, into which he went, with an intention of reſiding in it. In this place he heard a voice, demanding why he left the city, and wandered thus in the deſert; to which he replied, that the queen had threatened his life, for having occaſioned the death of the falſe prophets, and declared the only true God to whom worſhip was due. The voice now inſtructed him to leave the cave on the following day, and act as he ſhould be directed. On his quitting the place next day, there was an earthquake, and then a blazing fire in the air, which was ſucceeded by a ſhort ſilence, and that by a ſtill voice, which bade him be of good courage, for his enemies ſhould not triumph over him: it likewiſe directed him to return by the way of Damaſcus, where Hazael ſhould be anointed king of Aram, and Jehu, the ſon of Nimſhi, king over Iſrael, by his hands; he was alſo to anoint Eliſha, of Abel, prophet in his ſtead; for the divine wrath would cut off the wicked from the land, and Hazael ſhould deſtroy thoſe that eſcaped the ſword of Jehu. Hereupon the prophet departed; and finding Eliſha, the ſon of Shaphat, with other people, plowing with twelve yoke of oxen, he threw his cloak over him: on which Eliſha immediately propheſied, and prepared to follow Elias, but firſt requeſted permiſſion to bid farewell to his parents, which being done, he attached himſelf to Elias, as his diſciple and companion.

He anoints Hazael king of Aram, and Jehu king over Iſrael.

Adjacent to the gardens of Ahab, king of Samaria, lay a vineyard, belonging to Naboth, of Jezreel, which vineyard Ahab wiſhing to add to his gardens, frequently aſked Naboth to ſell him, or accept other land in exchange for it; but this Naboth refuſed, as it was a poſſeſſion which had been the particular gift of providence. Ahab was ſo chagrin'd at the refuſal, that he became melancholy, abſtained from his food, and neglected to bathe according to cuſtom, and fell ſick. On this alteration, Jezebel became anxious to know the cauſe of it; and, on her repeated urgency, Ahab recited the ſtory of Naboth, and expatiated on the rudeneſs of his behaviour. "I intreated him (ſaid he) with fair words; and deſcended below the dignity of a king in my addreſs to him; and all I could gain by this conduct, was an abſolute refuſal." The queen gave him all poſſible encouragement to recover his ſpirits, and to be no longer anxious on the ſubject, for ſhe would take care that Naboth ſhould be puniſhed for the inſult. Having ſaid this, ſhe wrote letters to the elders and principal men of Jezreel, in the name of Ahab, importing that a faſt ſhould be proclaimed and an aſſembly convened, in which a place among the chiefs of the people ſhould be given to Naboth. That three witneſſes ſhould be provided, who ſhould ſwear that he had blaſphemed God, and ſpoken evil of the king: and that on this evidence, Naboth ſhould be convicted, and his ſentence be, that the people ſhould ſtone him to death.

Ahab covets Naboth's vineyard.

The queen's orders were obeyed in every particular: Naboth was convicted, and received ſentence, which was ſpeedily executed on him. Intelligence of theſe tranſactions being carried to Jezebel, ſhe repaired to the king, and informing him that Naboth was diſpatched, ſaid he might take poſſeſſion of the vineyard without farther ceremony. This news gave Ahab ſo much ſatisfaction, that he immediately ſet forward on a journey towards the ſpot thus dearly purchaſed: but the prophet Elias was ſent by God, to repreſent the ſin of his taking poſſeſſion of the vineyard, which was acquired by the murder of the right owner. Ahab ſeeing the prophet advancing, went to him, confeſſed what had been done, and offered to make reparation. By the order, and in the name of the Almighty, Elias acquainted him, that "where the blood of Naboth had been licked by the dogs, they ſhould likewiſe lick the blood of Ahab and Jezebel; and that the crime of taking away the life of an innocent man, by perjury, ſhould be puniſhed by the extirpation of their whole race." Ahab was ſo affected by the denunciation of this judgment, that he became deeply penitent for his ſins; cloathed himſelf in ſackcloth, faſted, went barefoot, and gave every other teſtimony of unfeigned ſorrow. Hereupon the prophet was commiſſioned by God to acquaint him, that, in conſideration of his contrition, the judgment which had been threatened ſhould be poſtponed during his life, though it ſhould certainly take place in that of his ſon: and hereupon the prophet departed.

Naboth murdered at the inſtance of Jezebel, who, with Ahab, are threatened with the divine vengeance.

CHAP. VIII.

AHAB being beſieged in SAMARIA by ADAD, or BENHADAD, the latter is repulſed. In the following Year, ADAD is conquered in Battle, and applies for Mercy to AHAB, who grants it, and diſmiſſes him in a friendly Manner, for which he is reproved by the Prophet.

Adad, king of Syria, invades Ahab's dominions, and lays ſiege to Samaria:

THUS ſituated were the affairs of Ahab, when Adad, king of Syria and Damaſcus, raiſing a large army, and thirty-two kings from beyond the river Euphrates uniting with him, they jointly marched againſt Ahab; who, fearing to encounter ſo immenſe a multitude in the plains, retired to fortified places, to defend himſelf. Samaria, a place ſtrong by nature, and being defended by a garriſon, walls, and other works, was the particular retreat of Ahab. Againſt this place Adad brought his army, and made preparations for the attack; but firſt ſent a herald to Ahab, to require leave to ſend embaſſadors with his demands. This being agreed to, the embaſſadors repreſented, that the wives, children, and riches of Ahab were at the diſpoſal of his enemy, who, however, would raiſe the ſiege, and withdraw his army, if Ahab would acknowledge his power, and give him leave to take what he thought proper. To this Ahab replied, that himſelf and his poſſeſſions were all at the ſervice of Adad *: but the latter ſent other embaſſadors, demanding, that his ſervants and officers might, on the following day, ſearch the houſes, lodgings, &c. of the king and his domeſtics, and carry off whatever they thought proper.

On this, Ahab determined to call a council of his friends, whom he thus addreſſed: "Adad has ſent me two propoſals, by the firſt of which he agreed to raiſe the ſiege, on my acknowledging myſelf, my wives, and my children, to be at his diſpoſal; which I conſented to, becauſe I would not let any intereſt of my own ſuperſede the public good: but his ſecond propoſal is, that they be permitted to make a general ſearch, and carry off what they pleaſe, which is only a pretence to widen the breach between us. They thought, doubtleſs, that I ſhould remain firm to the firſt contract: but now they demand a delivery of my people and country, which they may be aſſured I ſhall not comply with; and that a war will be the conſequence: but I am determined to abide by your advice." On this all the council reprobated the inſolence of Adad, and voted for war. The anſwer then given the embaſſadors was, "That the firſt demand would yet be complied with by the king; but that the honour and ſafety of the citizens required that he ſhould refuſe the ſecond." This anſwer ſo mortified Adad, that he ſent a third meſſage, importing that Ahab ſhould not truſt in the ſtrength of his fortreſs, for he would raiſe works above his walls, which he could do by each of his ſoldiers contributing a handful of earth. To this Ahab ſent anſwer, "That not with their tongues, but with their ſwords, men of courage ſhould debate." When this meſſage arrived, Adad was at ſupper with the thirty-two kings, and he gave inſtant orders to prepare for the ſiege. In the interim, Ahab and his people were in the utmoſt deſpondency; but a prophet going to him, aſſured him, that God would grant his people a victory over their numerous enemies. Ahab was anxious to know the immediate inſtruments of the victory; when the prophet ſaid, he ſhould himſelf be at the head of the ſons of the nobles. Theſe being ſummoned, and Ahab having learnt that his enemy was indulging in the height of luxurious revelry, the city gates were thrown open, and they ſallied out. Adad hearing hereof, ſent a party, with directions to conduct them, bound, into his preſence. At this time the army of Ahab was ready within the walls, to iſſue forth when neceſſary. The valiant young nobles having attacked the guards, many of whom they killed, and purſued the reſt to their tents; Ahab and his army ruſhed out, attacked and routed the enemy, who were moſt of them drunk and unarmed. Thoſe who could, eſcaped by flight; among them was Adad, who was ſaved by the ſpeed of his horſe. The Syrians being purſued, ſuch as were overtaken were killed. The plunder, in gold, ſilver, equipages, and Adad's own chariot and horſes, was very great, and was conducted to the city by the conquerors.

Defeat of the Syrian army.

Notwithſtanding this victory, the prophet told Ahab that his enemy would be ready to attack him in the ſpring, and bid him prepare for it; which he did with vigour. Adad having collected his ſhattered army, his friends adviſed him not to engage again in the mountains; ſaying, that the god of the Iſraelites was the god of the mountains; but they would have loſt the battle in the plains. They alſo adviſed the diſmiſſing of the thirty-two kings, but to keep their troops, over whom experienced officers might be appointed, and that recruits of horſe and foot ſhould ſupply the place of the ſlain. This advice pleaſed the king, who complied with it; and on the approach of ſpring, encamped in a large plain near the city of Apheca. Ahab advanced with his forces, and pitched oppoſite the Syrians, though greatly inferior in number. During this poſture of affairs, the prophet, in the name of God, aſſured the Iſraelites of victory, for the God of the mountains was likewiſe God of the vallies. During ſix days the armies lay thus encamped, and on the ſeventh advanced to battle. The conteſt was at firſt obſtinate: but the Syrians unable to ſtand the ſhock, turned, and fled, the enemy purſuing them

Adad makes a ſecond expedition againſt Ahab, and is again overcome.

* Ahab ſeems not only to have complied with the inſolent demand of Benhadad, but likewiſe to have made a greater ſubmiſſion than he could expect; which ſhewed ſo much abjectneſs, that Benhadad increaſed his demands, and augmented his inſolence in proportion to the puſillanimity of Ahab.

cloſely. Many were ſlain in the purſuit; ſome killed in the flight by their own chariots and fellow-ſoldiers; ſome trod to death, and ſome torn to pieces. A few only, their numbers conſidered, reached Apheca, their only place of refuge. Under the walls of that city, it was calculated that twenty-ſeven thouſand were buried; and thoſe killed in battle were eſtimated at one hundred thouſand.

He applies for mercy to Ahab, who ſpares his life.

Adad having ſecreted himſelf in a cave, with ſeveral of his faithful adherents, ſome of them extolled the natural generoſity of the Iſraelites, and adviſed the king to ſubmit to the mercy of Ahab, which they were confident would be extended to him. Adad agreeing hereto, a number of people were choſen to ſupplicate mercy; for which purpoſe they were dreſſed in ſackcloth, with halters round their necks; and in this guiſe they went to Ahab, to ſolicit the life of Adad, who acknowledged himſelf his priſoner, engaging that he would always think himſelf ſuch. To this Ahab ſaid, "I rejoice at his ſafety; and you may aſſure him, in my name, that my own brother could not be more welcome to me than he ſhall be."

An oath being ſworn that the perſon of Adad ſhould be ſafe, the ſupplicants departed to the cave, and brought him to Ahab, who was ſitting in his carriage. When he ſaw the royal captive, he extended his right hand, ſaluted him, ſeated him by his ſide, and pledged his honour for his ſafety *. Adad acknowledged this goodneſs, which he ſaid ſhould be gratefully remembered: that the lands which had been taken from the Iſraelites ſhould be reſtored; and that Ahab ſhould be as welcome a gueſt at Damaſcus, as the father of Adad had been at Samaria. A league was now made betwixt the parties, and Adad being loaded with preſents, took his leave.

Ahab's ill-timed clemency reprehended by the prophet.

Soon after this event, a prophet named Micaiah requeſted an Hebrew to ſtrike him on the head, as an act of obedience to the will of God. The party refuſed; on which the prophet ſaid he ſhould be torn by a lion; which happened accordingly: and the prophet applied to another man, who ſtruck him ſo that his head ſtreamed with blood. Micaiah, binding up the wound, repaired to the king, and told him that he was a ſoldier, to whom an officer had committed the care of a priſoner, who having eſcaped, he himſelf was obliged to fly for fear of puniſhment. Ahab approving the ſaid officer's ſeverity, the prophet uncovered his head, and made himſelf known. This device was intended to impreſs on the mind of Ahab the impropriety of letting ſo vile a wretch as Adad go at large: "And (added the prophet) the time advances when yourſelf and your army ſhall be deſtroyed by this Adad whom you have permitted to eſcape." The prophet's freedom ſo affronted Ahab, that he ordered him into priſon; but the reflection on the prophecy ſat heavy on his mind.

CHAP. IX.

JEHOSHAPHAT's great Power, exemplary Virtues, and Happineſs. JEHORAM eſpouſes the Daughter of AHAB, King of Iſrael, whom JEHOSHAPHAT ſupports in the War againſt ADAD.

Eminent qualities of Jehoſhaphat.

JEHOSHAPHAT greatly extended his territories, and eſtabliſhed garriſons and governors in the ſeveral cities within his dominions, as well as thoſe which had been obtained from Jeroboam by his grandfather Abijah. His life was a continued ſeries of piety and juſtice, and he was rewarded by the bleſſing and protection of the Almighty. His riches and fame were conſiderably augmented by the gifts of neighbouring monarchs, whoſe munificence bore teſtimony to their approbation of the irreproachable integrity of his life.

He ſets about a reformation in religion.

Jehoſhaphat aſſembled the prieſts and elders, in the third year of his ſovereignty, and directed them to nominate commiſſioners for the purpoſe of preſerving a ſtrict adherence to the duties of religion, and the legal inſtitutions delivered by Moſes. This attention to the important articles of religion and law proved ſo ſatisfactory to the people, that they became emulous to exceed each other in executing the king's commands. Beſides the advantage of a perfect ſtate of domeſtic tranquillity, he enjoyed the ſatisfaction of living upon terms of amity with the neighbouring princes. The uſual tribute was regularly paid by the Philiſtines, as was the annual ſtipend of ſix hundred and thirty lambs, and an equal number of kids by the Arabians. As a ſecurity againſt invaſions, he kept his places of ſtrength in a ſtate of defence, and a well-diſciplined body of troops in conſtant pay. Edra was appointed to the command of three hundred thouſand ſhield-bearers, ſelected from the tribe of Judah: and Johannon had the command of two hundred thouſand. The ſame officers alſo commanded two hundred thouſand archers belonging to the tribe of Benjamin. Under another leader named Ochobat, were one hundred and eighty thouſand men, armed with bucklers.

Marriage of Jehoram to Ahab's daughter.

A marriage was celebrated between Jehoram, the ſon of Jehoſhaphat, and Gotholia, daughter of Ahab, who reigned over the ten tribes. Ahab provided a magnificent entertainment at Samaria for Jehoſhaphat

* The lenity of Ahab on this occaſion was very remarkable: to call a perſon brother (ſee 1 Kings xx. 32.) who had determined his deſtruction, was a great pitch of humanity; and to forgive one, who had been guilty of the moſt atrocious blaſphemy againſt God, ſhewed in it an indolence of mind which was unworthy of pity, and a diſregard for the ſafety of his nation, which would naturally cauſe its ſubverſion. This ill-timed humanity, ſo inconſiſtent with his character as the father of his people, the ſervant of the true God, and his vicegerent in the throne, juſtly deſerved the ſentence denounced againſt him by the prophet.

and the troops by whom he was attended. Having meditated the recovery of Ramoth-Gilead, which had been conquered by the king of Syria, Ahab requeſted the aſſiſtance of Jehoſhaphat, who conſented to unite his endeavours towards effecting the intended enterpriſe, and ſummoned his troops from Jeruſalem to Samaria. Theſe kings proceeded to a certain diſtance from the town, and, each being ſeated on a throne, they reviewed and paid their forces. A peace having ſubſiſted for the ſpace of three years between Ahab king of Iſrael, and Adad king of Syria, Jehoſhaphat recommended that, if any prophets could be found, their advice ſhould be taken as to the expediency of commencing hoſtilities.

The falſe prophetsdeclaring in favour of Ahab, Micaiah is ſent for by Jehoſhaphat.

The king of Iſrael called an aſſembly of his falſe prophets, the number of whom amounted to about four hundred, and he directed them to make enquiry whether an attempt to recover the city of Ramoth would be attended with ſucceſs. They unanimouſly perſuaded him to proſecute the war, ſaying, Adad would be vanquiſhed, and a ſecond time made priſoner. A ſuſpicion being conceived by Jehoſhaphat that theſe men were not favoured of God, he inquired of Ahab, whether he had not other prophets to whom he could apply. He was anſwered by Ahab, that there was one other, named Micaiah, who was the ſon of Imla, but that he deteſted the man for having predicted only unhappy events, and had ordered him to priſon for having attempted to perſuade him that he would forfeit his life in the approaching war. Jehoſhaphat adviſed that Micaiah might be called into the preſence of Ahab; and an eunuch, who was an attendant of the bed-chamber, was diſpatched to conduct him from the gaol. During the progreſs of their journey, the meſſenger related, that the prophets had declared the event of the war would prove favourable to Ahab. Micaiah ſaid, that whatever the inſpiration of the Almighty ſhould dictate, he would, without prevarication or reſerve, report to Ahab. The king put the queſtion to him, enjoining him neither to extenuate or aggravate the truth. He ſaid that he had ſeen the people of Iſrael, like ſheep without a ſhepherd, diſperſed and purſued by the Syrians; and that by this repreſentation the Lord had intimated, that only the king ſhould fall in the engagement. Ahab, having heard this prophecy, aſked Jehoſhaphat, whether he was not now convinced that he had not wrongfully accuſed the man. Upon which Micaiah ſaid, "I have no enmity towards you: the prediction was the effect of an inſpiration from the Almighty, by whoſe expreſs command it was faithfully delivered to you: but by the flattering impoſitions of the falſe prophets, you are perſuaded to engage in a war which will prove your deſtruction."

He predicts Ahab's defeat and death in the expedition.

The king became much diſturbed by the firmneſs with which Micaiah perſiſted to ſupport this prediction.

Zedekiah diſſuaded the king from paying the leaſt regard to what Micaiah had ſaid, declaring the whole to be a palpable fiction; and in confirmation of this, he ſaid, that he had ſpoken in direct contradiction to a prophecy of Elias, who had aſſerted that the king's blood ſhould be licked by the dogs, in the field where they had licked the blood of Naboth. "I will now (ſaid he) ſtrike this man on the face, and if he be a prophet of God, may my arm wither as did that of Jeroboam, when he lifted it againſt the prophet Jadon." He ſtruck Micaiah, and as no judgment enſued, Ahab was confirmed in the deſign of engaging in a war with the king of Syria. Zedekiah now preſented the king with horns of iron, ſaying, that under the ſemblance of theſe horns, it was intimated by the Lord that he ſhould puſh the Syrians to extremity and finally deſtroy them. Micaiah told Zedekiah, that he would be ſhortly called to a very ſevere account for the impoſitions he had been guilty of, and driven to ſeek his ſafety in hiding places *. The king being highly incenſed againſt Micaiah, commanded Apion, the governor of the city, to confine him in priſon, and allow him no other ſuſtenance than bread and water, till his return from the war.

The battle being joined, Ahab is ſlain.

The confederate kings led their forces toward Ramoth, whence Adad came forth to meet them. In order to avoid the event which had been foretold by Micaiah, the king wore the dreſs of a private man, and he was perſonated by a native of Jeruſalem, habited in the royal robes. Adad charged his officers to direct their arms againſt the king of Iſrael, without regard to his ſubjects. Obſerving Jehoſhaphat at the head of the troops, the Syrians preſſed upon him, but diſcovering their miſtake, they retired. A domeſtic of Adad, named Aman, ſhot a random arrow, which paſſing through the joints of Ahab's armour, penetrated his lungs. Apprehending that this unfortunate circumſtance might depreſs the ſpirit of the troops, the wounded monarch ordered his charioteer to remove a ſmall diſtance from the army; and having remained in his chariot nearly till ſun-ſetting, he expired. The armies took the field in the morning, and continued harraſſing each other the whole day, but Ahab was the only man ſlain. On the approach of night, the Syrians retired to their tents: and when an herald had proclaimed the death of Ahab, the people diſperſed. The remains of the king were interred at Samaria; and upon waſhing the blood from the chariot, at a neighbouring fountain, the dogs licked it up, according to the prophecy of Elias. This fountain was afterwards uſed as a bath for common women.

Prophecy of Elias fulfilled.

* Zedekiah had uſed Micaiah with great indignity, and by his queſtion to him would have inſinuated that he was a falſe prophet; but in puniſhment of his abuſe, and in vindication of Micaiah's divine miſſion, he was again inſpired with a ſecond prophecy; which being fulfilled, as well as that denounced againſt Ahab, was a farther illuſtration of Micaiah's integrity, and Zedekiah's falſehood.

BOOK IX.

Containing the JEWISH HISTORY, from A. M. 3048, to 3224.

CHAP. I.

The MOABITES and their Confederates, conquered by JEHOSHAPHAT. The Death of AHAZIAH, agreeable to the Prediction of ELIAS. He is ſucceeded by JEHORAM, who being joined by JEHOSHAPHAT and the King of IDUMÆA, they conquer the MOABITES.

Jehoſhaphat reproved for joining with Ahab.

JEHU, the prophet, meeting Jehoſhaphat on his return to Jeruſalem, after his junction with Ahab, againſt Adad, told him how much the Almighty was offended at the alliance; but ſaid, that for his former obedience to the law of God, he would find pardon, and deliverance from his foes. Hereupon the king ſought his peace with God by prayer, offering ſacrifice, and ordering that the people throughout his dominions ſhould be inſtructed in the laws of Moſes, and in the antient religion. He likewiſe appointed magiſtrates of the cities and large towns, who were ordered to diſtribute juſtice to all ranks of people without favour or partiality. Good order being ſettled among the two tribes, the king repaired to Jeruſalem, where, from among the prieſts and Levites, he ſelected judges, who were inſtructed to act uprightly; and directed, that when matters of conſequence were brought before them from the adjacent cities, they ſhould not determine but on the cooleſt deliberation; ſince a deficiency of juſtice in the city where the temple of God and the palace of the king were erected, would be highly diſhonourable. Ahaziah, the prieſt, was appointed to preſide in holy matters, and Zebediah in civil.

The Moabites, &c. invading Judea, Jehoſhaphat convenes an aſſembly, and prays for divine aid.

About this period, the Moabites, Ammonites, and Aramites, having hired great numbers of troops, advanced to the city of Engedi, near the lake of Aſphaltites, about thirty-eight miles from Jeruſalem, with a view of giving battle to Jehoſhaphat; who no ſooner learnt that they had paſſed the lake, than he convened an aſſembly, and ſtanding before the temple, implored the protection of heaven againſt the enemy.

They are encouraged by a prophet.

During their devotions, Jahaziel, a prophet, ſtood up, and ſaid, that their prayers were heard, and God would grant them victory in the defence of their religion. He adviſed him to march the next day, and they ſhould find their enemies encamped on a hill called Sis (ſignifying an eminence) between Jeruſalem and Engedi: where God would fight the battle for them, while they might only look on, as ſpectators of the action. When the prophet had ended, Jehoſhaphat and his people fell on the ground in adoration, while the hymns and muſical inſtruments of the Levites accompanied their devotions.

The king's ſalutary advice and meaſures.

On the following day the king roſe early, and going into the deſert near the city of Tekoa, told the people to rely on God by believing his prophet, and not to form in battle array. He directed the prieſts with their trumpets to advance, followed by the Levites and ſingers, as on a day of victory and triumph. This advice being obeyed, the Almighty ſtruck ſuch a terror into the enemy, that they attacked each other, and fought with ſuch incredible fury, that they all fell ſacrifices to their mutual rage. On a view of the valley, Jehoſhaphat found it covered with dead bodies, and triumphantly rejoicing in a victory obtained without bloodſhed, permitted the ſoldiers to make booty of all the ſpoils, which were ſo conſiderable as to take three days to carry them off.

He gives thanks to God for his miraculous interpoſition on his behalf.

At the end of four days the people aſſembled in the valley of Beracha, where they offered thanks to God for the merciful exertion of his power. From this circumſtance the place was called the Valley of Bleſſings, which name it ſtill retains. Hence the army proceeded to Jeruſalem, where feaſts and ſacrifices employed ſeveral days. This ſignal victory impreſſed all foreign princes and nations with a high opinion of the piety of Jehoſhaphat, as a perſon peculiarly favoured of heaven; and this ſentiment attended him through life. In the mean time Jehoſhaphat was in friendſhip with Ahaziah ſon of Ahab, in conjunction with whom he fitted out ſhips for the gold trade; but the whole project failed, all the ſhips being loſt, partly through tempeſtuous weather, and partly from the veſſels being ill adapted to the ſeas they were to navigate *.

Tranſlation of Elias.

In the reign of Ahaziah, king of Iſrael, Elias was tranſlated, and no account was ever Jehoram ſucceeding his brother in the government, determined to go to war with Meſha, king of the Moabites, on his refuſal to pay an annual tribute of two hundred thouſand unſhorn ſheep, in conſideration of what had been heretofore paid to Ahab his father; and he gained a complete victory over them. Some little time after this, Jehoſhaphat lived in an eaſy retirement, and then died in Jeruſalem, in the twenty-fifth year of his reign, and the ſixtieth of his age; and was interred in a moſt pompous manner.

CHAP. II.

JEHORAM ſucceeds JEHOSHAPHAT. Miracles wrought by ELISHA. ADAD beſieges SAMARIA. The Siege miraculouſly raiſed. ADAD murdered by HAZAEL, who aſſumes the Government. JEHORAM, for his great Wickedneſs, is threatened by ELISHA.

Jehoram ſucceeds his father Jehoſhaphat.

JEHORAM, the eldeſt of ſeveral ſons of Jehoſhaphat, ſucceeded his father in the ſovereignty. He was named after his mother's brother, who was lately returned from the war againſt the Moabites, and had brought with him Eliſha the prophet, of whom many things are mentioned in holy writ, which are well worthy of regard. Eliſha was applied to by the wife of Obadiah, ſteward to Ahab, who hinted that he was acquainted with the rage of Jezebel againſt the prophets; and of her huſband having ſupported an hundred of them in the cave, by which he had ſo greatly involved himſelf in debt, that herſelf and children were likely to become ſlaves to the creditors: on which ſhe begged the prophet's aſſiſtance, in conſideration of her huſband's merit. Hereupon Eliſha demanded what her houſe afforded; and on her ſaying only a little oil in a cruſe, he directed her to borrow a number of empty veſſels and pots of her neighbours, and, making faſt her chamber-door, to pour a little oil into each, and they would be filled by the power of God. She did ſo; and having returned to the prophet with an account of her proceedings, he bid her ſell the oil, and diſcharge her debts, and ſhe would have ſomething left for her family. By this means ſhe experienced a very ſeaſonable deliverance.

Miracles performed by Eliſha, who multiplies the oil.

Eliſha being informed of a conſpiracy againſt Jehoram, and that Adad meant to attack him in a particular place when he went to hunt, adviſed the king not to go, by which his life was preſerved. Adad was ſo enraged hereat, that he charged his ſervants with infidelity, in diſcovering what themſelves only could know. One of them replied, that he ought not to ſuſpect them, while his enemy had ſo faithful a ſpy as Eliſha, who was able to divine his moſt ſecret thoughts. Hereupon the king ſent a party to enquire after Eliſha, who learnt he was at Dothan; on which chariots and horſemen were ſent to take him into cuſtody. They ſurrounded the town in the evening, ſo that no perſon could go in or out; and the prophet's ſervant haſted to him in the morning, to acquaint him with what had happened. The prophet bade him be of good courage, and rely on the Providence of God; and inſtantly prayed for ſome token of his protection, to confirm the faith of the ſervant. In conſequence hereof, a number of chariots and horſes appeared about Eliſha, as a guard, and were viſible to the ſervant; upon which all his fears were diſſipated.

Eliſha leads the blinded Syrian army into Samaria.

Eliſha now implored the Almighty to blind his enemies to ſuch a degree, that they ſhoud not know him from any other perſon; which petition being complied with, he went among the troops, and demanded who and for what they were ſearching. "For the prophet Eliſha" (ſaid they), on which he bid them follow him, and he would direct them to the place where he was. Now their intellects being as much clouded as their eyes, they followed him to Samaria, and were no ſooner within the city, than he deſired Jehoram to make the ports faſt, and confine them. The prophet now prayed once more, that the Syrians might be reſtored to ſight; and his prayers being heard, they were aſtoniſhed to find that they were within the walls of the enemies city, and wholly at their mercy.

The affrighted Syrians were doubting how to act in this ſituation, when the king adviſed that they might be put to death*; but to this the prophet objected, as a diſhonourable proceeding, except towards perſons conquered in war: "Theſe men (ſaid he) had no hoſtile intention againſt this country, and appear to be mere agents in the hand of Providence." The prophet, therefore, adviſed that they ſhould be treated hoſpitably, and left to their own liberty, after they had been properly entertained. Hereupon Jehoram, in purſuance of the prophet's advice, entertained them liberally, and diſmiſſed them. On their return, they gave the king their maſter a minute account of what had happened, which greatly affected him, and convinced him that this miracle was wrought by the immediate hand of Heaven, and that the prophet was divinely his pernicious example, ſtill ſeducing the people, and provoking the God of Iſrael by his abominable idolatries. The author of the book of Chronicles informs us, that his impiety was ſo provoking, that God had abandoned him, and would not proſper the naval expedition of Jehoſhaphat, becauſe he joined the fleet of this vicious prince. And the wickedneſs of Ahaziah, ſo great in itſelf, was highly aggravated by his making the people to ſin. By his evil example and authority he corrupted their worſhip, and juſtly drew upon himſelf the guilt of their tranſgreſſions.

divinely inſpired when he delivered the prediction in the name of God. Adad reſolved that, henceforward, he would never ſeek to injure the king of Iſrael in a treacherous manner: but, confiding in his numbers and ſtrength, would engage him in open war.

Adad renews hoſtilities againſt Jehoram.

Thus reſolved, Adad collected a numerous army, with which he marched againſt Jehoram; who thinking his forces inadequate to the riſk of a battle in the plains, remained within the walls of Samaria; which being ſtrongly fortified, Adad heſitated whether he ſhould attack him in form, or endeavour to reduce it by famine. At length the place was beſieged, and the garriſon was ſo reduced for want of proviſions, that the head of an aſs was ſold for eighty pieces of ſilver, and five pieces was the price of a pint of pigeon's dung, as the ſauce for it. In this diſtreſs Jehoram was apprehenſive, that ſome perſon might inform the enemy how greatly the famine had reduced them; for which reaſon he daily walked round the fortifications, had an eye upon the guards, and was very attentive that no ſpy ſhould enter the city in a private manner.

A grievous famine in Samaria.

While the king was thus employed, a woman demanded his aſſiſtance. He ſuppoſed ſhe came to beg of him, and ſaid, "How can I aſſiſt you, who have neither barns nor wine-preſſes?" Hereupon the woman ſaid, ſhe aſked not for food but for juſtice, and wiſhed he would determine a debate between another woman and herſelf. The king aſking her meaning, ſhe told him that her neighbour and herſelf being both ready to periſh for food, having each a male infant, agreed to kill their children in turn, to prevent themſelves from ſtarving. She ſaid her child was killed and dreſſed on the preceding day, and the other woman had a ſhare of it; but now that ſhe ought to partake of the other child, the woman had departed from her promiſe, and concealed it. This narrative almoſt diſtracted Jehoram, who tore his garments, and exclaimed, that he was never completely wretched till that moment: "And this, (ſaid he) would not have happened, if the prophet had applied to God in my favour; but his life ſhall pay the forfeit:" and, in the firſt impulſe of his rage, he ſent an officer to cut off the head of the prophet.

The king threatens to put Eliſha to death.

Eliſha was not unacquainted with this reſolution of the king, and while he was in company with his diſciples, he told them, that Jehoram had commiſſioned an officer to head a party who were to deſtroy him. "Therefore, (ſaid he), keep an eye on them, and when they approach, ſhut the door till the king comes; for he has altered his intention, and is now on the way to counteract what he ordered." Theſe directions were obeyed, and the party was ſhut out till the arrival of Jehoram, who had made all poſſible haſte to prevent his commands reſpecting the life of the prophet being executed.

Eliſha promiſes plenty the next day.

The king had no ſooner arrived, than he began to revile the prophet, who could ſuffer them to endure ſuch extreme diſtreſs, without offering one prayer to God on their behalf. In anſwer hereto the prophet ſaid, that by the ſame hour on the day following, proviſions ſhould be ſo cheap in Samaria, that the market price of a meaſure of fine flour ſhould be only a ſhekel, and the ſame ſum for two meaſures of barley. This prediction was credited by the king and his attendants, who had heretofore had ſufficient proofs of the prophet's veracity. Hereupon they had as much faith in the prophecy as if it had been already accompliſhed: but one of the king's favourite officers who commanded a third of the army, and was then in familiar converſation, leaning on the king, ſaid, "What you have now declared is as credible as that it ſhould rain flour and barley from heaven*; and I ſhould as readily aſſent to it." To this the prophet replied, that what had been foretold ſhould infallibly happen, and that he ſhould be a witneſs of it, without partaking of the benefit: which accordingly came to paſs.

Behaviour of the lepers.

At this time four leprous perſons lived without the gates of Samaria, and it was not cuſtomary to admit any ſuch within the walls. The famine raged ſo violently in the city that no proviſion could be hoped for from that quarter, and to remain where they were, threatened equal deſtruction: on which they reſolved to ſubmit to the mercy of the enemy, who would either ſpare their lives, or deſtroy them in a more eligible way than ſtarving. Being all of the ſame ſentiment, they departed by night to the camp of the Syrians, who, on the inſtant, were ſtruck with an imagination that they heard the trampling of horſes, and the noiſe of armed men invading them; on which they repaired in haſte to Adad, and acquainted him that Jehoram and his allies were on the march within hearing. This ſtory was the more readily believed by Adad, becauſe his own imagination had painted the ſame ſcene: wherefore every man began to ſhift for himſelf, and the whole army retired in confuſion, each anxious to ſave his own life, and leaving horſes, carriages and treaſure, behind them. The lepers arriving at the tents of the Syrians, and finding all quiet, refreſhed themſelves with eating and drinking, and then carried away gold and other rich effects, which they buried in a hole they had dug for that purpoſe. Having four times loaded themſelves in this manner, and finding the enemy quite retreated, they conſidered that they ought, on themſelves, and implore our mercy. Beſides the humanity and charity of this action, it was both prudent and politic, as it was the beſt natural means to mollify the hearts of theſe Syrians.

* In deſcribing a large ſhower, or great fall of rain, the ſacred writers uſe the phraſe of "opening the windows of heaven;" ſee 2 Kings vii. 2. This unſeaſonable ridicule, therefore, implies that the nobleman thought that ſuch a ſudden tranſition from famine to plenty, predicted by the prophet, deſerved no credit, and was as improbable as to expect that it ſhould rain corn.

the firſt diſcovery, to have acquainted Jehoram, and the people in the city, with this event: on which they haſtened back to Samaria, and arriving at the walls of the city, called aloud to the watch that the camp was abandoned by the enemy. They likewiſe, at the ſame time, ſent notice hereof by the king's guards: on which a council was ſummoned, to whom Jehoram delivered his ſentiments, that it was an artifice of the enemy to draw his ſubjects into an ambuſh. "Probably, (ſaid he), they deſpaired of ſtarving us, and have therefore had recourſe to this ſtratagem. Now, for this reaſon, I would be guarded againſt this treachery, and not embark in an affair that may totally ruin our cauſe." Hereupon one of the council, premiſing that his majeſty had formed a right judgment, hinted that it would be proper to ſend two horſemen as far as Jordan to learn the truth: that if they ſhould be made priſoners, the loſs would not be great, and it might ſerve as a caution to others. The king acceded to this propoſal, and diſpatched the meſſengers, who ſoon returned with an account that not an enemy was to be ſeen; but that there was plenty of corn and arms, and abundance of things which the Syrians appeared to have left in their hurry. This intelligence induced the king to ſend out people to pillage the camp of Adad, where they obtained an immenſe booty in gold, ſilver, horſes, and other cattle, and an amazing quantity of corn; ſo great, indeed, that the former ſcarcity was forgotten in the preſent plenty; and, agreeable to Eliſha's prophecy, a meaſure of flour and two of barley, were ſold each for a ſhekel; containing a buſhel and a half, Italian meaſure: but the officer before-named, who commanded a third of the army, received no benefit thereby, for, being ſtationed at the gate, by the king's command, he was cruſhed to death by the crowd.

which is pillaged by the Israelites.

Adad, being taken ill, ſends a meſſenger to Eliſha, to inquire concerning the iſſue.

By this time Adad had retired in ſafety to Damaſcus; and having learnt that the haſty retreat from the camp was the conſequence only of their own fears, he conſidered it as the immediate judgment of heaven, and fell ill through the anxiety of his mind. Eliſha now advanced towards Damaſcus, which Adad being informed of, ſent Hazael with rich preſents to the prophet, and bade him enquire whether the king would ſurvive his diſeaſe. Forty camels being loaded with valuable effects, Hazael proceeded on his commiſſion, and meeting the prophet, ſaluted him with the moſt profound reſpect, produced his preſents, and aſked him, in the king's name, what would be the iſſue of his diſorder. Eliſha ſaid, the king would not live; but bade him conceal the intelligence from him. Hazael was ſhocked at this news; and Eliſha wept extremely, in conſideration of the future diſtreſſes of the people. Hazael demanding of the prophet the cauſe of his grief, he replied, "I weep to think what miſery you will occaſion to the Iſraelites. Their principal men ſhall be put to the ſword by you, who ſhall likewiſe deſtroy the cities by fire, kill their children by daſhing them againſt the ſtones, and rip others from the mothers' wombs." Hazael aſked how he could be the author of ſuch diſtreſs? to which the prophet ſaid, "God has declared to me that you are to reign in Syria." Hereupon Hazael departed, and told Adad he ſhould recover of his diſorder: but viſiting him on the following day, he took a wet cloth*, with which he ſtrangled him, and uſurped the government.

Eliſha foretells the death of Adad, and advancement of Hazael.

CHAP. III.

The ARABIANS ravage ISRAEL. JEHORAM's deplorable Death. He is ſucceeded by his Son AHAZIAH.

Invaſion of the Arabians.

NOT long after the prediction of Eliſha concerning Hazael, the Arabians on the confines of Ethiopia, in company with other barbarians, aſſembled, and forced their way into Jehoram's kingdom. Having laid waſte the country as they went, they entered the royal palace, and ſtripped it, and ſtabbed all the wives and children of the king, except only his ſon Ahaziah, who with great difficulty eſcaped from their rage. This misfortune was ſucceeded by Jehoram being ſeized with the diſorder which the prophet had predicted, which was ſo peſtilential, that it was juſtly deemed the conſequence of the immediate wrath of God; his bowels daily falling from him in his own view. His ſubjects even triumphed in his diſtreſs, and conſidered it as due to his execrable wickedneſs. When he died, his corpſe was denied the honour of a royal funeral, for they would not place it in the tomb of his father. His reign was eight years, and his age forty; and Ahaziah his ſon ſucceeded him in the government of the people of Judah.

Jehoram wounded by a Syrian at Ramoth-Gilead.

The death of Adad afforded a proſpect to Jehoram, king of Iſrael, of the recovery of Ramoth-Gilead, for which purpoſe he raiſed a large army, and marched towards that city. An arrow ſhot by a Syrian wounding him, on the firſt attack, he was obliged to retire to Jezreel, to obtain a cure; leaving his army under the command of Jehu, who ſoon compelled the town to yield. It was Jehoram's intention to wage war againſt the Syrians, as ſoon as he ſhould be recovered. In the interim, Eliſha diſpatched one of the diſciples to Ramoth, to anoint Jehu with holy oil, and pronounce him king, by the divine authority. This meſſenger was likewiſe ordered to leave the place with expedition, and to keep his buſineſs a ſecret from every one. Finding Jehu with his officers, he begged to ſpeak to him in private; and Jehu retiring with him to his cloſet, was anointed king, with directions to deſtroy the houſe of Ahab, and revenge the death of the prophets whom Jezebel had cauſed to be inhumanly murdered. The meſſenger ſaid farther, that as Jehoram the ſon of Nebat, and all the family of Baaſha, had fallen ſacrifices to their vices, ſo the whole race of Ahab ſhould be utterly demoliſhed. Having delivered his commiſſion, he retired as privately as poſſible, and Jehu returned to his officers. Theſe were anxious to know the buſineſs of the meſſenger, whom they thought was not in his ſenſes. "No (ſaid Jehu), he ſpoke like a madman*." This only excited their curioſity to know the particulars; on which Jehu told them, he had declared him king, by the command of God. Hereupon, the officers taking each his cloak, piled them one on another, to form a kind of temporary throne; on which Jehu being ſeated, they ſounded horns and trumpets, congratulated him on his ſucceſſion, and ſaluted him as king. At this time Jehoram was at Jezreel, to be cured of the wound he had received at Ramoth: and Ahaziah, his ſiſter's ſon, was likewiſe there on a viſit to him. Hereupon Jehu marched his army to Jezreel, where he propoſed to ſurpriſe them both: but he gave ſtrict orders to his ſoldiers, not to ſend the leaſt intelligence to Jehoram, as the teſt of their loyalty to himſelf.

Some copies of our author read a net, δικτυον, and others σημα, a coverlid, which commentators endeavour to reconcile by aſſerting, that the coverlid was made of network. But as the meſhes would have given the king room enough to perſpire through them, their opinion ſeems more agreeable to the context who think it was either a coverlid of goat's hair, or elſe a thick cloth, which would imbibe a large quantity of water.

Jehoram and Ahaziah killed by Jehu.

The army immediately obeyed the orders of Jehu, ſtationing themſelves upon the paſſes towards Jezreel, and effectually prevented any intelligence being communicated to the enemy. In the mean time, Jehu mounted his chariot, and, being attended by a party of choſen troops, proceeded towards the city. This party being obſerved by a ſpy, related his diſcovery to Jehoram, who immediately ordered a horſeman to go up to the party, and learn of whom it was compoſed. The man obeyed; and upon his making enquiry relative to the ſtate of the army, Jehu ordered him, without concerning himſelf about the troops, to fall into the rear and join the march. The ſpy having given notice that the meſſenger had joined the party which was advancing towards the town, another courier was diſpatched, and he was alſo detained by Jehu: upon which the king mounted his chariot, and being accompanied by his kinſman, Ahaziah, the king of Judah, went forth towards Jehu, who continued his march at a regular and moderate pace. Upon his arrival in the field of Naboth, Jehoram queſtioned Jehu concerning the ſituation of his troops. Inſtead of giving an anſwer, Jehu ſaid he might boaſt of an abandoned proſtitute, in the perſon of his mother. Upon this, Jehoram obſerved to the king of Judah, that it was evident his deſtruction had been conſpired: and as he was providing for his ſafety by flight, Jehu let fly an arrow, which penetrating his heart, he fell from his chariot; and Jehu recollecting that he had heard Elijah pronounce that Ahab and his whole race ſhould periſh in the field which he had uſurped from Naboth, ordered Bidkar, who commanded a third part of his forces, to caſt the body of Jehoram into that field. Ahaziah apprehending himſelf to be in danger, turned into a private road, but being purſued and wounded by an arrow which was pointed at him by Jehu, he diſmounted from his chariot, took horſe, and fled to the city of Megiddo, where he ſoon fell a victim to the wound he had received. His remains were interred at Jeruſalem. He reigned one year, during which period he proved himſelf to be a man of more iniquitous principles than his predeceſſor.

CHAP. IV.

JEHU puts JEZEBEL to Death, extirpates the Race of AHAB, with the idolatrous Prieſts, and demoliſhes the Temple of BAAL.

Death of Jezebel.

WHEN Jehu made his entry into the city of Jezreel, queen Jezebel being ſumptuouſly apparelled, placed herſelf at a turret window, in order to view the proceſſion; and as he was paſſing, ſhe ſaid, "A faithful ſubject that, who kills his ſovereign!" This being noticed by Jehu, he demanded who the woman was, and ordered her to deſcend; but, as ſhe did not comply, he commanded the eunuchs† by whom ſhe was attended, to caſt her down. They obeyed: and the walls of the tower, againſt which ſhe ſtruck in falling, were ſtained with her blood. Jehu and his followers proceeding to the palace, rode over the body, and trampled it under foot. After having remained a ſhort time in the palace, Jehu gave orders that, from a reſpect to the exalted ſtation of Jezebel, her domeſtics ſhould cauſe her remains to be buried with the honours due to her rank: but only a part of the ſkull, the palms of her hands, and ſoles of her feet, could be found, the reſt having been devoured by the dogs. This circumſtance gave the new king

* The ſacred hiſtorian (2 Kings, ix. 11.) makes the imputation of madneſs in the prophet to proceed from the other officers, who inquired of Jehu, "Whence came this mad fellow to thee?" and indeed, the abruptneſs of his addreſs, the terror painted on his countenance, the haſte with which he fled, the general contempt which men of a military life have for the prieſthood, joined to the contempt which idolaters have for the prophets of the true God, might all coincide to make the reſt of the captains look on the prophet in this unfavourable light.

† Theſe perſons, in the Eaſtern countries, attended upon queens in their chambers, and, by their great care and diligence, were often promoted to places of great truſt and profit; as appears from the Hebrew word, which is ſometimes uſed to ſignify a great officer of ſtate, who dwells in the palace, and is near the perſon of the ſovereign.

additional veneration towards the prophecies of Elijah, who had foretold that in Jezreel the flesh of Jezebel should be eaten by dogs.

The seventy sons of Ahab resided at this time in Samaria. In order to be convinced of the disposition of the people towards him, Jehu wrote letters to the governors of the young princes, and the principal magistrates of the town, saying, that as they possessed numerous fortified towns, and other places of strength, and were abundantly provided with troops, chariots, and every implement of war, it would be acting a commendable part to select from the youths one who should be most worthy to assume the regal dignity, and under his command to avenge the death of their late sovereign. These letters being taken under consideration, the result was, that it would be a highly impolitic and dangerous procedure, to dispute the power of a man who had already vanquished two powerful kings: they therefore informed Jehu, that they would acknowledge the sovereignty of no other man than himself, and declared that they would implicitly submit to his commands. Jehu wrote again, requiring them, as a testimony of their obedience, to send him the heads and hands of the sons of Ahab. Hereupon a conference was held between the magistrates and the governors of the princes, and they came to a resolution of complying with the requisition of Jehu. He was at supper when intelligence was delivered, that the heads and hands of the princes were arrived: he ordered them to be placed in heaps, one on each side of the palace gate. Going forth the following morning to view them, he said to the multitude, "It is true that I killed the king my master, but by whom have his sons been slain?" He applied himself to convince the people, that the sacrifice of the house of Ahab was agreeable to the will of the Almighty, and the prediction which he had dictated to his prophet. Having put to death all the persons he could discover of the family of Ahab, he departed for Samaria. On his way, he joined company with forty-two of the relations of Ahaziah, king of Jerusalem, who informed him, that the purpose of their journey was to acknowledge allegiance to Jehoram and Ahaziah: for they were ignorant that those princes had been slain by Jehu. He caused all these persons to be put to death. He afterwards met with Jehonadab, a man of strict integrity, who applauded his zealous endeavours for extirminating the race of Ahab. Inviting him to take a place in his chariot, and to accompany him to Samaria, Jehu said he should bear witness, that he would put all the apostates to the only true God to the sword; and that men of virtue derived satisfaction from inflicting a just punishment upon the wicked. They repaired to the city, where Jehu caused the relations of Ahab to be put to death, as fast as they could be discovered. To prevent the escape of the false prophets and idolatrous priests, he suggested the following stratagem; he declared himself determined to observe a more scrupulous attention to the worship of Baal than had been paid by Ahab, and that he meant to offer a great sacrifice to the idol; on which occasion he required the attendance of the priests and prophets, on the penalty of forfeiting their lives. On the appointed day they assembled at Samaria, and were presented with vestments, in which they habited themselves preparatory to their religious ceremonies. Jehu, accompanied by Jehonadab, repaired to the temple of Baal, and caused all persons to evacuate the building, who were not servants to the idol, under the pretext of not suffering the ceremony to be profaned by the presence of unqualified persons. When the apostates were on the point of commencing their abominable worship, Jehu gave a signal to a party of fourscore men, who were stationed near the entrance, upon which they rushed in upon the priests and prophets, and put them all to death. They were enjoined not to spare the lives of either prophets or priests, on pain of being themselves put to death. Further, to purify the city from the most abominable sacrilege, Jehu's men set fire to the royal palace, which was intirely consumed. Baal was the idol of the Syrians, to which Ahab had dedicated an altar, in compliment to his father-in-law, Ithobal, king of Tyre and Sidon; and besides appointing priests and prophets, provided every requisite for their religious ceremonies. Though Jehu still permitted the adoration of the Israelites towards the golden calves, the Almighty, in consideration of the severities he had inflicted upon the apostates, was pleased to intimate, by the agency of a prophet, that his posterity, till the fourth generation, should reign over the people of Israel.

ATHALIAH conspires the Destruction of the Line of DAVID. JOASH, the Son of AHAZIAH, is preserved by JEHOIADA, the High-Priest, and anointed King at JERUSALEM.

ATHALIAH, daughter of Ahab, king of Israel, and widow of Jehoram, king of Judah, being informed of the devastation which Jehu had made in the iniquitous family of her father, formed a determination of revenging the deaths of her brother Jehoram, Ahaziah, her son, and other kindred, by so effectually exterminating the line of David, as not to suffer a man to escape her vengeance, who should boast an hereditary claim to the throne of Judah. She accordingly gave orders, that the sons of Ahaziah should be slain: but the nurse of Joash, who was then a year old, concealed the infant among the bodies of his deceased brethren; and upon Jehoshabeth, sister of Ahaziah, and wife of Jehoiada, the high-priest, entering the palace, she perceived the child, and secretly conveyed him to her dwelling, and thence into the temple, where, without the circumstance cumſtance being known to any perſon except her huſband, ſhe carefully nouriſhed him during the ſix years of Athaliah's reign over the two tribes in Judea *.

Joaſh anointed king by Jehoiada the high-prieſt.

Jehoiada, in the ſeventh year, produced the child to five captains, and prevailed upon them to unite their endeavours towards inveſting him with the regal dignity. Having bound themſelves by an oath of fidelity and ſecrecy, the captains departed, in order to ſummon the prieſts, Levites, and the principal men of the tribes, in the name of the high-prieſt, to aſſemble at Jeruſalem. Being arrived, Jehoiada informed them that, on condition of engaging in an oath of ſecrecy, he would communicate to them a matter of the higheſt importance to the public weal, wherein he ſhould have occaſion to requeſt their aſſiſtance. He adminiſtered the oath, and then pointing to Joaſh, ſaid, "Behold your king: he is the only ſurviving branch of the houſe of David, whoſe poſterity it was the pleaſure of the Almighty to promiſe ſhould continue to reign over us. It is my advice, that you form yourſelves into three parties; one to guard the king in the temple; another to poſſeſs themſelves of the ſeveral avenues to the buildings; and the third to guard the open gate leading to the palace. Such as are unprovided with arms, may follow their inclinations, as to remaining in the temple, or otherwiſe: but no perſons bearing weapons muſt be admitted to the building, except they be prieſts." He appointed certain prieſts and Levites to remain near the king, as the guard of his perſon, keeping their ſwords conſtantly unſheathed, and to ſlay any man who ſhould attempt to force into the temple with arms; and to employ the utmoſt vigilance towards the perſonal ſafety of the new ſovereign. The perſons aſſembled on the occaſion, unanimouſly approved the conduct of the high-prieſt; whoſe next buſineſs was to open a magazine, and deliver to the centurions, prieſts, and Levites, arrows, lances, and other implements of war, which had been depoſited in the temple by David. The arms being diſtributed, the centurions, prieſts, and Levites, ſtationed themſelves without the temple, which they intirely ſurrounded: and as they ſtood ſo near as to be able to take each other by the hand, none could obtain admiſſion whom it was judged expedient to exclude. Joaſh, wearing a royal crown, was now produced; and being anointed with the holy oil, the high-prieſt, with the uſual formalities, proclaimed him king. The ceremony was accompanied with reiterated acclamations; and the perſons who attended on the occaſion, joined in wiſhes that Joaſh might enjoy a long and happy reign, and prove victorious over his enemies.

The ſhouts of the people reached the palace, and proved terribly alarming to Athaliah, who ſummoned her guards, and repaired to the temple, where ſhe gained a ready admittance, but her attendants were not ſuffered to accompany her. Perceiving Joaſh ſeated on the throne, and wearing a crown of royalty, ſhe vehemently called for the uſurper to be deſtroyed. Jehoiada ordered her to be taken into cuſtody, and to be put to death at the brook of Kidron, ſaying that the temple was not to be polluted, by the blood of a perſon ſo abandoned to wickedneſs. The officers appointed to execute the commiſſion, were directed to put any man to death who ſhould attempt a reſcue.

Athaliah ſlain.

The ſentence pronounced by Jehoiada being executed upon Athaliah, he aſſembled the populace in the temple, and adminiſtered the oath of allegiance to the new king. Joaſh now bound himſelf under the ſolemnity of an oath, to a faithful diſcharge of the religious duties, and a rigid obſervance of the commandments of God, which had been tranſmitted to us by Moſes. Theſe ceremonies being concluded, the people haſted to the temple, which, with a view to ingratiate themſelves in the favour of Ahab, Athaliah, and her huſband Jehoram, had built and dedicated to the idol Baal: this building they intirely laid in ruins, and put to death a prieſt of Baal, named Mattan.

Jehoiada reſtores the worſhip of God.

Agreeable to the inſtitution of David, the holy temple of Jeruſalem was committed to the care of the prieſts and Levites; and, according to the law of Moſes, Jehoiada appointed a ſolemn ſacrifice and incenſe to be offered each day: and he ſelected a number of the Levites, to prevent the temple being polluted by unpurified perſons gaining admittance. Joaſh was now conducted from the temple to the royal palace; and being ſeated on the throne, was again declared king, amidſt the univerſal ſhouts and acclamations of the people. The death of Athaliah, and the ſucceſſion of Joaſh to the ſovereignty, were events ſo agreeable to the multitude, that they employed ſeveral days in feaſting and merriment. The mother of Joaſh was a woman of Beerſheba, named Zibiah. During the life of Jehoiada, Joaſh ſtrictly adhered to the duties of religion and the laws of his country. On his arrival to a ſtate of manhood, he obtained the approbation of the high-prieſt to eſpouſe two women, by each of whom he had iſſue.

JEHU dies, and is ſucceeded in the Government of ISRAEL by his Son, JEHOAHAZ. The Degeneracy of JOASH, who cauſes ZECHARIAH to be ſtoned to Death. The Siege of JERUSALEM by HAZAEL. JOASH dies.

* The terrible fate of theſe royal families cannot be read without horror. The whole offspring of Ahab was cut off for their idolatry, and the kings of Judah having contracted an affinity with the houſe of Ahab, were ſo deſtroyed by three ſucceſſive maſſacres, that there was but one left.

A Deſperate

A Deſperate war was proſecuted by Hazael, king of Syria, againſt Jehu, king of the Iſraelites, in the courſe of which an immenſe tract of land, eaſtward of the Jordan, was laid waſte, great havock was committed upon the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half-tribe of Manaſſeh, and the cities of Gilead and Batanæa were vanquiſhed and plundered. Theſe places were entirely conſumed by fire, and the inhabitants, without diſtinction of age or ſex, were put to the ſword: and theſe enterpriſes were accompliſhed with very little oppoſition on the part of Jehu, who held the religion and laws of God in contempt *. In the twenty-ſeventh year of his reign over Iſrael, Jehu died; and his remains were buried at Samaria. Jehoahaz, the ſon of Jehu, ſucceeded to the throne of Iſrael.

Degeneracy of the king and people.

After the deceaſe of Jehoiada, Joaſh, and the principal people of his dominions degenerated into an utter contempt of the holy religion. The Almighty ſent prophets to expoſtulate with them on their abominable apoſtacy: but the vengeance denounced againſt them, and the example afforded them in the fate of their predeceſſors and families, upon whom the judgment of heaven had been inflicted, as a puniſhment for the enormity of their crimes, were not ſufficient to effect a reformation. Zechariah, the ſon of Jehoiada, exhorted the king and the people to repentance, as the means of avoiding the dreadful judgments which would inevitably be the conſequence of perſiſting in their iniquity. The king, regardleſs of all the ſervices which had been rendered him by his father, cauſed Zechariah to be ſtoned to death in the temple. With his dying breath, he appealed to the Almighty, as his judge and witneſs, that he ſuffered for having adminiſtered good counſel, and for being ſon of a man who had effectually laboured in the ſervice of the king. Soon after this, Hazael ſubdued and plundered the city of Gath, and then led his troops towards Jeruſalem. Terrified at the approach of the Syrian army, Joaſh entered into a compoſition with Hazael, to whom he ſurrendered the immenſe treaſure contained in the temple, as a conſideration for his raiſing the ſiege. A ſhort time having elapſed, Joaſh fell ſick; and this circumſtance was taken advantage of by the friends of Zechariah, who attacked him by ſurpriſe, and took away his life. He lived forty-ſeven years. He was interred at Jeruſalem: but his impious courſes had rendered him ſo obnoxious, that his body was denied a place in the royal ſepulchre.

* Strange that a man ſo jealous of the honour of the Lord of Hoſts, as to ſlay the whole race of Ahab, and utterly deſtroy all the prieſts, prophets, and principal worſhippers of Baal, ſhould himſelf depart from the obſervance of the holy commandment, and as the hiſtorian informs us, ſhould hold the laws of God in contempt, and become a worſhipper of ſtocks and ſtones.

† This was an information by action, whereby the prophet informed the king of the victory he ſhould gain over the Aſſyrians, to conſole him on account of his own approaching death. His ſhooting the arrow eaſtward, was explained by the prophet to ſignify his deliverance from the Syrians; and his ordering him to ſhoot the other arrows againſt the ground, had not the king been very dull of apprehenſion, or very far gone in infidelity, muſt have been underſtood by him to ſignify a repetition of theſe victories. To ſtop, therefore, when he knew beforehand what this action meant, was an inſtance of the higheſt degree of ſupineneſs; and, as ſuch, juſtly excited the indignation of the prophet, who could not but grieve at the calamities which threatened his country, on account of the incredulity or remiſſneſs of their king.

Amaziah ſucceeds his father Joaſh.

THE government of Judah deſcended to Joaſh, from his father Amaziah; and when Joaſh had reigned near twenty-one years, Jehoahaz, the ſon of Jehu, began a reign, which laſted ſeventeen years, over the people of Iſrael, in Samaria. His conduct was very different from that of his father, ſince, by his diſregard to every thing that was praiſe-worthy, he imitated the worſt of his anceſtors. In the interim, the great force of the king of Syria, who had over-run many of his cities, and deſtroyed numbers of the inhabitants, was reduced to ten thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe. Eliſha had predicted this misfortune to the Iſraelites, in informing Hazael that he ſhould deſtroy his lord, and take on himſelf the government of Damaſcus and Syria. At this unhappy period, Jehoiada humbled himſelf before the Lord, intreating relief from the oppreſſions of Hazael; and God being pleaſed to hear his prayers, peace and happineſs were reſtored to his dominions.

Joaſh, king of Iſrael, viſits Eliſha.

Joaſh, the ſon of Jehoahaz, ſucceeded to the government of Iſrael and Samaria, in the thirty-ſeventh year of the reign of his name-ſake Joaſh, king of Judah. He reigned ſixteen years, and was in all reſpects the reverſe of his father, being a man of moſt exemplary character. At this time, Eliſha, the prophet, was very old; and being on his death-bed, Joaſh made him a viſit, wept over him, and treated him as the father and friend of his country. He ſaid, that while the prophet lived, his prayers and predictions would defend them againſt their enemies, to whoſe mercy he ſhould be left when he was departed: "Wherefore (ſaid he) I would rather die with you, than live without you."

Emblematical prediction of the prophet.

The prophet was much affected with this generous ſorrow, and ordering a bow and arrows, bid the king ſhoot them †. After ſhooting three times, he left off; on which the prophet ſaid, if more ſhafts had been diſcharged, he ſhould have over-run the whole kingdom of Syria; but as he had ſhot only thrice, he ſhould gain three victories

victories over them, in which the lands they had taken from his father, ſhould be recovered. Hereupon the king left Eliſha, who ſoon afterwards died. The prophet was highly celebrated for the uprightneſs of his character, and the many miracles he wrought, an account of which is ſtill preſerved on the records of the Hebrews. He was buried in a moſt magnificent manner, agreeable to the merit of ſo illuſtrious a man. A little time afterwards ſome thieves having murdered a traveller, threw the body into the tomb of the prophet; but it had no ſooner touched him, than the man came to life. Thus his miracles laſted even after his death.

Death of Hazael.

The death of Hazael ſoon happening, the ſon of Adad ſucceeded of courſe to the government of Syria; and Joaſh now obtained three victories over him, by which the Iſraelites recovered the country of Syria, as Eliſha had foretold. Jeroboam ſucceeded to the government, on the death of Joaſh his father.

The AMALEKITES, EDOMITES, and GABILITES, defeated by AMAZIAH. He is conquered and taken Priſoner by JOASH. He ſaves his Life by giving up JERUSALEM. He is murdered by his Subjects, and ſucceeded by his Son UZZIAH.

Character of Amaziah king of Judah.

AMAZIAH was advanced to rule over the tribe of Judah, in Jeruſalem, in the reign of Joaſh king of Iſrael. Jehoadan, a native of Jeruſalem, was his mother. From his youth he was remarkable for his love of integrity; and the firſt thing he did was to puniſh the murderers of his father, who were all brought to juſtice; but he puniſhed not their children; following herein the ſentiments of Moſes, who held it wrong to chaſtiſe children for the crimes of their parents. Amaziah now enliſted, and appointed centurions over ſuch of the men of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, as were about twenty years of age. Having determined to wage war againſt the Amalekites, Edomites, and Gabilites, he agreed to pay one hundred talents of ſilver to the king of the Iſraelites, for twenty thouſand of his forces. When he was ready to march againſt his enemies, a prophet adviſed him to diſcharge the Iſraelites, for they were an abandoned people, whoſe deſtruction would attend that of thoſe who were concerned with them; beſides, with God's help, his own army was ſufficient to deſtroy his enemies. As the king had already paid for his forces, he did not much like this advice; but being reſolved to ſubmit to the will of God, as expreſſed by the prophet, he diſmiſſed them, ſaying, "he would freely give that as a bounty, which had been received as wages." When theſe troops were gone, he advanced with his own forces, and conquered his enemies, ten thouſand of whom he killed in one battle, and drove the other ten thouſand to the extremity of a mountain which overlooks Arabia, down which they were thrown, and killed; after which, Amaziah returned with immenſe treaſure. In the interim, the twenty thouſand diſcharged troops were ſo enraged at the rejection of their ſervices, that they invaded the king's dominions, waſted the country quite to Bethſemere, killed three thouſand of the inhabitants, and drove off great numbers of cattle.

Lapſes into idolatry.

This victory ſo elevated Amaziah, that he forgot the God of battle, and departed to the worſhip of the idols of the Amalekites. Hereupon the prophet went to him, and expreſſed his aſtoniſhment at his worſhipping thoſe gods, who, ſo far from protecting others, were unable to defend themſelves, but were carried, with the reſt of the booty, by the Hebrews to Jeruſalem. The king bade him ſay no more, at his peril; to which the prophet only replied, that he would deſiſt; but that the vengeance of heaven would be the certain conſequence of ſuch a horrid ſuperſtition.

Sends a haughty challenge to Joaſh.

Notwithſtanding this, Amaziah was ſo fluſhed with his late ſucceſs, that, regardleſs of the intervention of Providence, he wrote to Joaſh, king of the Iſraelites, a letter, requiring ſuch ſubmiſſion from him and his people, as had heretofore been paid to David and Solomon, his anceſtors; and threatened that the ſword ſhould decide the difference, in caſe of refuſal. To this haughty letter, Joaſh ſent an anſwer to the following purport: "A thiſtle that grew on mount Lebanon ſent, on a certain time, to a cyprus-tree growing on the ſame ſpot, ſaying, give thy daughter in marriage to my ſon: on which a wild beaſt trod the thiſtle to the ground *. Learn hence to lower your ambition, nor aim at things ſo much above you. Be cautious leſt your pride, on having conquered the Amalekites, ſhould lead you to ſuch actions as may produce the loſs of your kingdom and life."

He is defeated, and taken priſoner, by Joaſh, who takes Jeruſalem and plunders the temple.

Amaziah was now much more enraged than before, and Providence leaving him to the influence of his own paſſions, he prepared for battle: the forces were drawn up on each ſide; but the troops of Amaziah no ſooner ſaw the enemy, than they precipitately fled, and left the king to be taken priſoner. The opponents refuſed him quarter, but on the condition that the gates of Jeruſalem ſhould be thrown open to them. Neceſſity and the fear of death prevailed; and a breach of three hundred cubits wide being made in the wall, Joaſh entered the city in a triumphal chariot, with Amaziah his priſoner preceding him. Joaſh having made prize of the gold, ſilver, holy utenſils, and other treaſure found in the palace and temple, gave the king his liberty, and retired with his booty to Samaria. It was in the fourteenth year of the reign of Amaziah that this misfortune happened to Jeruſalem, the people of which conſpiring againſt him, he fled to Lachiſh; but thither they purſued, and deſtroyed him. His body being carried to Jeruſalem, was interred with regal honours. Thus ended the life of a king, who owed his misfortunes to his departure from the true religion. He died at the age of fifty-one, having governed twenty-nine years; and Uzziah, his ſon, ſucceeded to the throne.

He is murdered by PEKAH, who reigns in his ſtead, and is invaded by TIGLATH-PILESER. JOTHAM, King of JUDAH; a pious Prince, in whoſe Reign the Deſtruction of NINEVEH, and the ASSYRIAN Empire, is foretold by NAHUM.

Reign of Jeroboam over Iſrael.

JEROBOAM, the ſon of Joaſh, became king of Iſrael in the fifteenth year of the reign of Amaziah. He reigned forty years, and held his court in the palace of his forefathers, at Samaria. He was addicted to idolatry, and was of a mind utterly depraved; and many were the judgments againſt the Iſraelites, in conſequence of his wicked courſe of life. The prophet Jonah had predicted of him, that he ſhould conquer the Syrians, and extend his dominions to the city of Hamath northwards, and ſouthward to the lake Aſphaltites, which had been formerly allotted by Joſhua as the bounds of the land of Canaan. This prophecy ſo elated Jeroboam, that he ſeized from the Syrians the lands thus deſcribed, and annexed them to his own dominions; thereby verifying the prophet's prediction.

Hiſtory of Jonah.

Jonah was inſtructed by God to go to Nineveh, and there to preach deſtruction to that wicked city, and the kingdom: but, unwilling to be the author of ſuch bad news, he took his paſſage at Joppa, on board a ſhip which was bound to Tarſhiſh, in Cicilia. During the voyage, the wind blew ſo tempeſtuouſly, that the commander, ſeamen, and even the pilot, deſpaired of ever making land. While ſome of the crew were at prayers, and others labouring to ſave the ſhip, it was obſerved that Jonah lay on his face, without lending any aſſiſtance. The ſtorm becoming more violent, it was conceived that this judgment aroſe from the guilt of ſome perſon on board, and they agreed to caſt lots to diſcover the offender. This being done, the lot fell on Jonah; upon which they enquired who and what he was; to which he anſwered, "I am an Hebrew, and a prophet of God; but I have occaſioned this ſtorm, and you muſt throw me overboard, if you mean to ſave yourſelves and the ſhip." At firſt they thought it extremely inhuman, thus to devote to certain deſtruction a man who had put himſelf under their care; but at length his authority, their own fears, and the urgent neceſſity of the caſe (for the ſhip was juſt ſinking), determined them to caſt him overboard; and in that moment the ſtorm ſubſided. We are farther told, that he was ſwallowed by a great fiſh, which threw him up, three days afterwards, alive, and unhurt, on the coaſt of the Euxine Sea*. The prophet having beſought and procured God's pardon for diſobeying his commands, proceeded to Nineveh; where having exalted himſelf ſo as to be properly heard, he foretold that the empire of Aſia was nearly at a period: and departed, when he had thus fulfilled his commiſſion.

Uzziah, for uſurping the office of high-prieſt, is ſmitten with leproſy.

Uzziah, on the day of a ſolemn feſtival, having cloathed himſelf in the dreſs of a prieſt, went to the temple, to offer incenſe on the golden altar; on which, the high-prieſt, Azariah, and eighty other prieſts, haſtily repairing to the temple, proteſted againſt ſuch an aſſumption of the ſacerdotal rights, which had ever been the peculiar privilege of the prieſts of the houſe of Aaron. Azariah enjoined him to deſiſt from ſuch profanity; but the king bidding them depart, at their peril, an earthquake ſhook the temple, and opened the roof of it, through which a ſun-beam darting, ſtruck the impious prince with leproſy. Another miracle ſucceeded this: not far to the weſt of the city, at a place called Eroge, the ſame earthquake divided a mountain in the middle, and part of it rolling half a mile, ſtopped on the eaſt ſide of an oppoſite mountain, cloſed up the highway, and covered the royal gardens with part of its contents. The king being a leper, the prieſts adviſed him to depart the city, as one unfit for ſociety; and his ſpirit was ſo broken by his illneſs, that he obeyed them. His ſon Jothan aſſumed the government, and the king having languiſhed awhile in retirement, died, and was buried in his gardens, in a tomb erected on the occaſion. He reigned near fifty-two years, and was near ſixty-eight years of age.

Shallum murders Zechariah, and uſurps the government; but is ſlain by Menahem, who ſucceeds to the throne.

About this time, Shallum, ſon of Jabeſh, a domeſtic of Zechariah, king of the Iſraelites, murdered his maſter, before he had reigned ſeven months, and aſſumed the government: but news hereof reaching Menahem, who commanded an army at Tirzah, he marched to Samaria, when Shallum had governed only thirty days, routed him in battle, put him to the ſword, and appropriated to himſelf the enſigns of royalty. Menahem returned with his army to Tirzah, but the citizens refuſing him admittance, he ravaged the adjacent country, and, with unheard-of cruelty, cauſed all the men, women, and children, to be deſtroyed: and his reign of ten years over Iſrael, was of a piece with this commencement. Soon after the above maſſacre, Pul, king of Aſſyria, threatened to invade him; but he compounded the matter, by paying a thouſand talents of ſilver, at the rate of fifty ſhekels a head. This prince was buried at Samaria, and ſucceeded by his ſon Pekahiah, whoſe inhuman diſpoſition equalled that of his father. When Pekahiah had reigned two years, he was murdered at a public feaſt by Pekah, ſon of Remaliah, who reigned about twenty years, and died with a character equally diſtinguiſhed by his impiety to God, and his want of common juſtice to his fellow-creatures.

Pekahiah ſlain by Pekah, who reigns in his ſtead.

The Iſraelites captivated by the Syrians.

Tiglath-Pileſer, king of Aſſyria, made incurſions on the Iſraelites during the reign of the above-mentioned Pekah, and having conquered the land of Gilead, the country beyond Jordan, and the adjacent part of Galilee, with Aſſora, and Cydida, made captives of the inhabitants, whom he conveyed to his own country*.

Jotham, a pious and virtuous ſovereign over Judah.

The tribe of Judah, in Jeruſalem, was now governed by Jotham, the ſon of Uzziah, by Jeruſhah, a native of the city. This prince was diſtinguiſhed by his devotion, juſtice, and public ſpirit. He rectified all abuſes, and kept every thing in proper order. The galleries and porches of the temple were repaired by him, and the city walls prevented from going to decay. He built large and ſtrong towers; ſubjected the Ammonites to the payment of one hundred talents, and thirty thouſand meaſures of wheat and barley annually. He raiſed his kingdom to a ſtate of ſplendor; and while his people were dreaded abroad, they were happy at home.

Nahum's prophecy.

The prophet Nahum, who lived in this king's reign, predicted the deſtruction of Nineveh, and the Aſſyrian empire, in words to this purpoſe: "Nineveh ſhall reſemble a fiſh-pool, the waters of which are agitated by a violent wind. The ſtorm ſhall occaſion the people to fly, and cry one to another, Take with you your gold and ſilver; but this will be diſregarded, as life ſhall be held more valuable than riches. Divided in ſentiments, they ſhall run weeping and lamenting among each other, their knees trembling under them, and deſpair in their countenances. They ſhall aſk what will become of the habitations of the lions, and the dams of the lions whelps; and the Lord ſhall reply, that Nineveh ſhall be cut off from the face of the earth, and the devaſtations of the wild beaſts ſhe has ſent into the world ſhall ceaſe." This prophecy was fulfilled at the end of one hundred and fifteen years.

Infamous character of Ahaz, who ſucceeds his father.

Ahaz ſucceeded to the throne of his father Jotham, who died in the ſixteenth year of his reign, and the forty-firſt of his age. Ahaz was diſtinguiſhed by his imitating the kings of Iſrael in their idolatry, and by his violation of the laws of his country, beyond any prince who had preceded him. He raiſed altars in Jeruſalem, on which he ſacrificed to idols, and even offered his ſon, as a burnt-offering, according to the cuſtom of the Canaanites; and committed other acts equally atrocious. During this conduct, Rezin king of Damaſcus, and Pekah king of the Iſraelites, uniting their armies, marched and beſieged Jeruſalem; which, however, was ſo fortified, that they were compelled to deſiſt from the attack.

In the mean time, the king of Syria took poſſeſſion of the city of Elath, near the Red Sea, deſtroyed all the inhabitants, and ſupplied their places by a colony of Syrians. Soon afterwards he ſeized on ſeveral caſtles and fortreſſes, ſlaughtered the Hebrews in a dreadful manner, acquired great plunder, and then retreated to Damaſcus with his victorious army. The king of Jeruſalem having learnt that the Syrians were departed, advanced his army againſt the king of Iſrael: but ſuch was the diſpleaſure of God againſt him for his impiety, that he loſt one hundred and twenty thouſand men in the battle; in which, Amiah, the ſon of Ahaz, fell in perſonal conteſt with Zechariah, general of the Iſraelites; who likewiſe killed Azica, captain of the guards, and took priſoner Elkanah, general of the Hebrew forces.

This being done, Ahaz ſeized the gold and ſilver in the royal treaſury, and in the temple, together with the rich preſents, and carried the whole to Damaſcus, where he delivered it to the king of Aſſyria, in gratitude for his aſſiſtance, and returned to Jeruſalem.

His ſhameful departure from the true worſhip.

Ahaz was ſo deſtitute of all ſenſe of true religion, that he worſhipped the gods of the Syrians, in the hope of their favouring his arms; on the contrary, when he had been overcome, he paid adoration to the Aſſyrians' gods; ſo that any kind of idolatry was equal to him; but he deſpiſed the worſhip of the true God, according to the religion of his forefathers*, which brought on him the vengeance of heaven. Such was his contempt for the worſhip of the true God, that having robbed the temple of all its moſt valuable effects, he ordered the doors to be kept faſt, to prevent others from offering up their devotions there.

Death of Ahaz.

After a continued courſe of impiety, he died in the ſixteenth year of his reign, aged thirty-ſix years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Hezekiah. At this period, by the treachery of Hoſea, a favourite at court, Pekah, king of Iſrael, was deprived of his government and life, Hoſea continuing nine years in poſſeſſion of his uſurped authority. His life and conduct proved that he believed not in God, and was one of the moſt abandoned of men. Being attacked by Salmanezer, king of the Aſſyrians, he was conquered, and obliged to become tributary, being rejected by that God whom he had deſpiſed.

Hezekiah ſucceeds Ahaz his father, and effects a thorough reformation in religion.

Hezekiah became king of Jeruſalem in the fourth year of Hoſea's reign. He was a prince of ſuperior abilities, and celebrated for his regard to equity and piety. On his firſt advancement to the throne, he determined to adjuſt the great buſineſs of religion; and thereupon ſummoning his prieſts and Levites, he addreſſed them to the following purport: "It is unneceſſary for me to remind you of the misfortunes conſequent on my father's ſins, in your refuſing the worſhip due to God, and uniting with him in the adoration of his idols: but as experience hath now taught you how dreadful a thing it is to trifle with heaven, I recommend that all paſt failings may be buried in oblivion; that you, and the prieſts, and the Levites, cleanſe yourſelves from former pollutions; then opening the doors of the holy place, purify it by ſacrifices and conſecrations; on which you may hope for future proſperity, as well as preſent pardon." The royal advice was ſo acceptable, that the prieſts immediately repaired to the temple, which they ſtripped of its impurities, prepared their holy veſſels, and placed ſacrifices on the altar, agreeable to the cuſtom of the Jews. In the interim, the king diſpatched meſſengers throughout his territories to demand the attendance of the people to the feaſt of the unleavened bread, which, through the impiety of former kings, had been long neglected. The meſſengers alſo warned the Iſraelites to ceaſe all ſuperſtitious worſhip, and return to that of the God of truth; promiſing, in the king's name, that they ſhould be equally free as his own people, to paſs to and from this feaſt: they were alſo told that their intereſt, rather than that of the king, gave riſe to this invitation, and it was hoped they would find their advantage in it. The Iſraelites, however, treated the meſſengers with contempt, and inſulted the prophets; who recommended a return to their duty, and told them what miſery would reſult from their diſobedience: nay, they even ſeized and put to death ſeveral of the prophets, and proceeded from one impiety to another, till the vengeance of God yielded them up a prey to their enemies, as will be hereafter ſeen. Of the tribes of Zebulon, Manaſſeh, and Iſſachar, however, multitudes attended to the words of the prophets, and repaired to Hezekiah, at Jeruſalem, to offer up their devotions.

His meſſage to the Iſraelites treated with diſdain.

The concourſe being aſſembled, the king, accompanied by the princes and people, proceeded to the temple, where Hezekiah offered, of bulls, rams, and goats, ſeven each, on his own account. Having firſt placed his hands on the heads of the beaſts, the prieſts cut their throats, and then burnt without dividing them; while the Levites made a circle, and ſang divine hymns to muſical inſtruments, the other prieſts forming the chorus. This ended, both king and people worſhipped God with their faces bowed to the ground. Excluſive hereof, the king ſacrificed ſeventy bullocks, a hundred rams, and two hundred lambs; and likewiſe gave, as a feaſt for the multitude, ſix hundred bullocks, and three thouſand other cattle. The prieſts having ended their ceremonies, the king and people feaſted together, and combined in the praiſe of God.

Offerings in the temple revived.

Now approached the feaſt of unleavened bread, and during the preparation for it, ſacrifices were made for ſeven days, and Hezekiah gave the multitude two thouſand bulls, and ſeven thouſand cattle of various kinds. The king's example was followed by the princes, who gave a thouſand bulls, and fourteen hundred other cattle; ſo that ſo ſumptuous a treat had not been known ſince the days of Solomon.

Feaſt of unleavened bread.

This feſtival being ended, and Jeruſalem being purified from the idols which had diſgraced its wor-

* The covenant which God had made with his people was, that he ſhould be their tutelary deity and king; but not worſhipped in the ſame manner as the tutelary deities of the neighbouring nations, who adored the tutelary gods of other nations in conjunction with their own. On the contrary, the God of Iſrael reſtrained all their worſhip to himſelf by expreſs laws, and ſtill ſtrengthened this part of their conſtitution by aſſuming the character of their king; for as the ſeparate characters of king and God centered in one object, they could not be guilty of idolatry without being guilty of rebellion at the ſame time. So admirable was the conſtitution of the theocracy, under which the Iſraelites were!

ſhip, a general purification took place throughout all the country. Hezekiah now ordered daily ſacrifices to be offered out of his own poſſeſſions, and directed the people to preſent tenths and firſt-fruits to the prieſts and Levites; ſo that their attendance on the altar was not interrupted by other affairs. He likewiſe built granaries and ſtore-houſes, in which corn and fruit were kept for the uſe of them and their families: ſo that all things began now to run in the ancient channel.

His ſucceſs againſt the Philiſtines.

After this reſtoration of good order, Hezekiah waged war againſt the Philiſtines, and united to his own dominions all their cities from Gath to Gaza. In the interim the king of Aſſyria required the tribute of him which had been heretofore paid to his father, and threatened an invaſion in caſe of refuſal: but Hezekiah paid no regard to theſe threats; relying on the mercy of Heaven, the conſciouſneſs of his own integrity, and the aſſiſtance of the prophet Iſaiah, whom he knew would inform him of ſuch things as were to come to paſs.

CHAP. XI.

SAMARIA taken by SALMANAZAR, who ravages the Kingdom of ISRAEL, takes King HOSEA Priſoner, and tranſplants the People. A Colony of CHUTHITES placed in ISRAEL.

Capture of Samaria, by Salmanezer, who ravages the country, and takes Hoſea priſoner.

IN the ſeventh year of Hoſea, king of Iſrael, Salmanezer, king of Aſſyria, having learnt that Hoſea was combined againſt him with So, king of Egypt, he advanced his army againſt the city of Samaria, which, having reſiſted his attacks for more than two years, was taken by aſſault, in the ſeventh year of the reign of Hezekiah, king of Jeruſalem. The kingdom of Iſrael was deſtroyed by the capture of this place, Hoſea being taken priſoner, and the inhabitants removed into Media and Perſia: Salmanezer bringing people from the borders of Chuthah, a river of Perſia, to ſupply the place of the Iſraelites in the land of Samaria.

Captivity of the ten tribes of Iſrael.

It was about nine hundred and forty-ſeven years from their departure from Egypt, eight hundred from the time of Joſhua, and two hundred and forty from Rehoboam's revolt, that the ten tribes were thus tranſlated. Such was the wretched fate of a people, who diſdained ſubjection to the laws, and deſpiſed the admonitions of the prophets, who forewarned them that a continued courſe of impiety would certainly end in their ruin*. Theſe misfortunes aroſe from the revolt of the Iſraelites, and their advancing to the regal dignity Jeroboam, who ſetting up idolatry in defiance of the laws of God, and inducing his people to follow ſuch a bad example, juſtly provoked the wrath of the Almighty. The above-named Salmanezer, who ranſacked and triumphed over all Syria and Phœnicia, is mentioned by Menander, in his hiſtory of the Tyrians.

The Chuthites in Samaria being plagued for their idolatry, ſend for an Iſraelitiſh prieſt.

The people newly planted in Samaria were called Chuthites†, from the river Chuthah in Perſia, whence they were brought by Salmanezer. They conſiſted of five nations, each worſhipping their own gods, which they brought with them: on which the wrath of heaven deſcended on them for their idolatry, and afflicted them with a peſtilence that nearly deſtroyed them. All human methods of relief being fruitleſs, the Oracle adviſed them to pay adoration to the true God, as the only means of having their evils redreſſed. Hereupon they diſpatched meſſengers to the king of Aſſyria, entreating him that ſome of the prieſts, who had been made priſoners with the Iſraelites, might be ſent to them. This was complied with; and on the arrival of the prieſts, the Chuthites deſired them to read the law of Moſes, which they did, and likewiſe expounded it, ſhewing the reaſonableneſs of the worſhip: whereupon the Chuthites began the ſtudy and practice of the true religion, and the plague ceaſed in a ſhort time. The Hebrews ſtill call theſe people Chuthites, but Samaritans is the name they bear among the Greeks. They are a moſt unprincipled people, ſtill adapting their conduct to the change of circumſtances. When the Jews are in a proſperous ſituation, they claim a kindred to them; but when misfortunes ſurround them, they ſay, "We are ſtrangers, who came from a diſtant country, and have no connections with you."

* The main cauſe of theſe calamities is very properly accounted for by the ſacred penman, who obſerves (2 Kings xvii. 14.), that they did not believe in the Lord their God;" or, in other words, they did not believe the prophets of the Lord, when they foretold them the conſequences of their ſins; for they never rejected his worſhip entirely, but worſhipped him in conjunction with idols.

† The tranſplanting theſe people into the dominions of the Iſraelites, occaſioned a corrupt mixture of religions; for the ſacred hiſtorian, (ſee 2 Kings xvii. 29, 30, 31.) inform us, that "every nation made gods of their own;" there were, Succoth-benoth, Nergal, Nibhaz, and Tartak.

As the words Succoth-benoth ſignify the tabernacle of daughters, they probably refer to thoſe infamous places in which young women proſtituted themſelves in honour of the goddeſs Mylete, or Venus. Cuth was a province of Aſſyria, and perhaps the ſame which Moſes tells us is encompaſſed by the river Gihon, and therefore the ſame with the country which the Greeks call Suſiana; and which is, to this day, called by the inhabitants Chuſeſtan. With regard to the god Nergal, we may infer that, as the word ner ſignifies a lamp, theſe Cuthites, who were afterwards called Perſians, adored fire; and, we are informed that, in honour to the ſun, they kept a perpetual flame burning on their altars. The city here mentioned was ſituated in a province of Syria, lying on the Orontes. But what idol is here meant by the word Aſhima? As it is well known that the Syrians adored the ſun, and as aſuman, or ſuman, in the Perſian language, ſignifies heaven, it is probable that the Syrians derived from thence the name of their god, who was repreſented by a large ſtone pillar, of a conical or pyramidal form, the hieroglyphic of fire. Nibhas, or nibehas, both in the Hebrew and Chaldee, with a ſmall variation, denote quick, ſwift, rapid, &c. and tartak, in the ſame language, ſignifies a chariot.

BOOK X.

HISTORICAL OCCURRENCES from the YEAR of the WORLD 3224 to 3425.

CHAP. I.

SENNACHERIB leads a powerful Army towards JERUSALEM, and besieges it. The Prophet ISAIAH assures HEZEKIAH of the Assistance of the Almighty.

Jerusalem besieged by the Assyrian army.

SENNACHERIB, king of Assyria, in the fourteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah, having subdued all the cities of Judah and Benjamin, led his army towards Jerusalem, whence an embassy was dispatched to propose terms of accommodation, and to offer him tribute. He accepted the proposals, and bound himself with the solemnity of an oath to decline hostilities, on condition of being paid thirty talents of gold and three hundred of silver. Hezekiah paid the stipulated sum, in confidence that the enemy would evacuate his dominions: but, regardless of the treaty which he had sworn to observe, he appointed his lieutenant-general Rabshaketh, with Tharata and Anacharis, to direct the war against Jerusalem, himself taking the lead of an army against the Egyptians and Ethiopians. The commissioners who had been deputed by Sennacherib, having caused the camp to be removed within sight of the walls of Jerusalem, dispatched a courier to demand a parley with Hezekiah. Judging it unsafe to go in person, he ordered Eliakim, his deputy-governor, and Shebnah and Joah, the keepers of the records, to repair to the Assyrian army. Rabshaketh, in a peremptory voice, bade them enquire of their master, wherefore he had presumed to dispute admitting the army into the city, and hesitated to acknowledge submission to the great and powerful Sennacherib. He said that Egypt was not in a condition to withstand the Assyrian army, and therefore if Hezekiah flattered himself in the hope of assistance from that quarter, he would be deceived; for he would be trusting to a broken reed*, which would wound the hand that pressed it. He desired them to inform Hezekiah, that the present expedition was undertaken by the direction of the Lord, who had already granted Sennacherib a complete victory over the Israelites, and would certainly render him equally successful in the war against Jerusalem. Rabshaketh spoke in Hebrew, in which language he was well versed; and Eliakim, apprehending that his address being generally understood might have an unfavourable effect upon the multitude, requested him to proceed in the Syriac tongue: but being apprised of the motive on which a change of language was advised, he exalted his voice, and continued his harangue in Hebrew.

Rabshaketh's insolent speech to the Jews.

The purport of his discourse being communicated to Hezekiah, he cloathed himself in sackcloth, according to the custom of the country, to denote his humiliation, and falling prostrate on the ground, fervently prayed for the assistance and protection of the Lord. He charged a number of his select friends to accompany some of the priests to the prophet Isaiah, whom they were to entreat to exert his endeavours, by prayers and sacrifices, for obtaining the assistance and protection of the Almighty, and for humbling the power and pride of the enemy. Isaiah yielded to the request made to him on the part of Hezekiah; and was authorised by the Oracle to declare to him that, without proceeding to an engagement, the Assyrians should be compelled to make a shameful retreat, with the loss of a considerable part of the army; that Sennacherib should not succeed in the war against the Egyptians; and that, on returning to his kingdom, he should die by the hands of his two sons.

Hezekiah, in an humble manner, craves the divine aid.

At this time Hezekiah received letters from the king of Assyria, expostulating on the dangerous policy of attempting to maintain a defence against a monarch who had reduced so many warlike nations to subjection, and menacing a general slaughter of men, women, and children, if the gates of the city were not thrown open to his army. Hezekiah having reposed an absolute confidence in the truth and power of the Almighty, paid no regard to these letters, which he folded up and laid in the temple. He continued to offer up supplications in favour of the people, till the return of Isaiah, who reported to him the following answer: "That his petition having prevailed, no injury was to be apprehended from the enemy; and that the period was approaching, when the people would be restored to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions."

Sennacherib's threatening message to Hezekiah.

The king of Assyria, on his return from the war in Egypt, found, that in the night after the siege had been commenced against Jerusalem, his army had sustained Judicial pestilence in Sennacherib's army.

* This comparison is excellently adapted to denote an ally, that is not only weak and unable to help, but also dangerous to those who rely on him for succour: and his representing the power of Egypt to be as brittle as the reeds growing on the banks of the Nile (for to these doubtless the Syrian orator alludes), is a great beauty in the similitude.

a dreadful havock; general officers, tribunes, and private ſoldiers, amounting to one hundred and eighty thouſand, having fallen a ſacrifice to the judicial vengeance of heaven*. Sennacherib conſidered the peſtilence as an effect of the divine wrath; and dreading that the mortality would prevail among his remaining people, he led them with the utmoſt expedition to the city of Nineveh, at which place he held his court. Some time after his return, he was murdered in the temple dedicated to the idol Araſcus, by Adramelek, and Sharezar, his two eldeſt ſons, who took refuge in Armenia. Eſarhaddon, the third ſon of Sennacherib, ſucceeded to the throne.

CHAP. II.

The Life of HEZEKIAH prolonged for Fifteen Years. A Treaty of Alliance concluded between BALAD, King of BABYLON, and HEZEKIAH. ISAIAH predicts the Captivity of the ISRAELITES, and the Calamities to be inflicted upon HEZEKIAH and his Poſterity. HEZEKIAH dies.

Hezekiah's dangerous ſickneſs.

CONSCIOUS that his preſervation had been effected by the intervention of Divine Providence, in cauſing a judicial plague to prevail in the Aſſyrian army, Hezekiah now humbled himſelf in prayer and thankſgivings to God. While he was occupied in this holy buſineſs, he was afflicted with ſo grievous a diſtemper, that his phyſicians entertained no expectation of his recovery; and, in this extremity, he fervently prayed to the Lord to prolong his life till he ſhould become the father of a ſon, to whom the ſovereignty might be tranſmitted. On the conſideration that being deſtitute of an heir to the government, proved the ſource of greater affliction than he experienced from being deprived of the grandeur and other advantages of a throne, the Almighty accepted his ſupplications, and commiſſioned the prophet Iſaiah to aſſure him, that his afflictions ſhould be removed in three days; that fifteen years ſhould be added to his life, and that he ſhould beget a ſon who ſhould ſucceed him in the government. The meſſage from the Lord was of ſo extraordinary a nature, that Hezekiah could not avoid entertaining a doubt of its authenticity; and he therefore deſired the prophet to afford a proof of the divine commiſſion by the performance of ſome miracle. Being aſked what evidence he required, the king ſaid, that the moving of the ſhadow on his dial ten degrees backwards, would give him perfect ſatisfaction. This prodigy was wrought, and Hezekiah being ſoon afterwards reſtored to perfect health, repaired to the temple, where he devoutly prayed to, and worſhipped God.

His life is miraculouſly prolonged.

About this period the Medes obtained a conqueſt over the Aſſyrian empire. Balad, the king of Babylon, diſpatched embaſſadors charged with preſents for Hezekiah, to whom they were authoriſed to propoſe terms of alliance. Theſe embaſſadors were graciouſly received, and after Hezekiah had magnificently entertained them, ſhewn them his armoury, and the immenſe treaſures which he poſſeſſed in gold and ſilver, he diſmiſſed them with gifts of value for king Balad. Iſaiah queſtioned Hezekiah reſpecting the embaſſadors; and he anſwered, that they had been ſent to him by the king of Babylon, and that he had ſhewn them the treaſures of his palace, that they might be enabled to make a juſt report of his wealth and power to their maſter. Upon this, the prophet ſaid, "I am commiſſioned to inform you, that in a ſhort time your treaſures ſhall be conveyed to Babylon; and that many of your poſterity are deſtined, after being deprived of virility, to ſerve as eunuchs in the court of Babylon. Theſe events will inevitably tranſpire, for they have been predicted by the Lord." This information deeply afflicted Hezekiah, both on his own account and on that of his family: and he ſaid, that ſince the judgment of heaven could not be averted, he had only to ſupplicate, that he might paſs the remainder of his life in a ſtate of tranquillity. Iſaiah and twelve other prophets faithfully committed their predictions to writing, that poſterity might be convinced of their acting under the ſanction of the divine commiſſion. Hezekiah died in the five and fiftieth year of his age, and in the twenty-ninth year of his ſovereignty.

CHAP. III.

The Iniquity of MANASSEH, the Son and Succeſſor of HEZEKIAH. The King of BABYLON conquers JUDEA, and takes MANASSEH Priſoner; but upon his Repentance, he reſtores him to his Government. The Death of MANASSEH, who is ſucceeded by his Son AMON. In the Second Year of his Reign, AMON is murdered, and his Son JOSIAH is proclaimed King.

Manaſſeh's wicked reign.

MANASSEH ſucceeded his father Hezekiah in the government; his mother's name was Hephzipah, a native of Jeruſalem. This prince acted on principles directly oppoſite to thoſe of his father. Influenced by the pernicious example of thoſe around him, and open to the flattery of ſycophants, who were averſe to the refor-

* This tremendous act forced him to retreat with ſhame and confuſion, and made it viſible to all the nations, eſpecially to the Jews, that JEHOVAH was a God "mighty in ſtrength and excellent in power;" that he was truly, what he ſtyled himſelf, "The Lord of hoſts;" and that "there was no other god that could deliver after this ſort."

mation eſtabliſhed by his pious predeceſſor, he ruſhed into the commiſſion of the moſt daring impieties, and thoſe abominable idolatries for which the Hebrews were on many occaſions ſeverely puniſhed. He even dared to profane the holy temple. He barbarouſly perſecuted men of the moſt exemplary piety; and the very prophets were ſacrificed to his inſatiable luſt of blood; ſcarcely a day paſſing, whereon ſome of theſe pious men were not made victims of his cruelty. The Almighty ſent prophets to exhort the king and the people to repent of their crimes, on the penalty of ſuffering puniſhments equal to what had been inflicted upon their brethren, the Iſraelites. Theſe admonitions were treated with contempt; and the king and people of Judæa continuing to purſue their uſual courſes of iniquity, the Almighty was pleaſed to ſtir up againſt him a powerful enemy in the king of Babylon and Chaldæa, whoſe forces obtained a complete victory over Manaſſeh, who was ſurpriſed and made a priſoner of war. His dominions being ravaged, and himſelf at the mercy of the conqueror, this unhappy prince fervently ſupplicated the Almighty to cauſe his enemy to treat him with clemency and tenderneſs. The Lord, in commiſeration of his ſufferings, liſtened to his prayers: and, after ſome time had elapſed, the king of Babylon reſtored him to his throne.

He repents, is pardoned, and reſtored.

Manaſſeh now exerted his utmoſt abilities to make every poſſible atonement for his former crimes. He purified the city, conſecrated the holy temple anew, and made it the buſineſs of his life to manifeſt a due reverence and gratitude towards his Creator. Conſcious that his former guilt had, in a great meaſure, been the cauſe of the miſeries which his people had endured, he endeavoured to effect a reformation among them, both by his example and authority. He cauſed an altar to be erected agreeable to the directions of Moſes, upon which daily oblations were made: and having reſtored the religious ceremonies to their original purity, he directed his attention towards improving the fortifications of the city. He made the neceſſary reparations in the old walls, and, as a further ſecurity, encompaſſed them with new ones. He erected divers ſtrong and lofty towers, and provided the out-works with all neceſſary proviſions and ſtores. During the remainder of his reign, his veneration to God ſuffered no abatement, and he was conſidered as one of the moſt happy ſovereigns. At the age of ſixty-ſeven, and in the fifty-fifth year of his reign, he died, and was interred in the royal garden. His ſon

Amon ſucceeds Manaſſeh, his father.

Amon, by Elmalſema, a native of the city of Jabat, ſucceeded to the throne. He followed the profligate examples which his father afforded in the early time of his life: and his mal-adminiſtration, induced ſome of his intimate friends and domeſtics to conſpire his death, which they effected in the twentieth year of his life, and in the ſecond of his government. The public puniſhed the murderers by death. The remains of this prince were depoſited in the ſepulchre of his father. Upon the deceaſe of Amon, Joſiah his ſon, who was at that time about eight years old, aſcended the throne.

CHAP. IV.

JOSIAH aboliſhes the worſhip of Idols, and makes excellent Regulations in religious and civil Affairs.

Excellent character of Joſiah, ſon and ſucceſſor of Manaſſeh.

THE mother of Joſiah was a native of Boſcath, and her name was Jehida. The new king was of a gracious diſpoſition, and naturally attached to virtue. He propoſed the truly excellent example of David as the rule of his conduct through life. Before he had compleated his twelfth year, he gave a ſignal inſtance of piety, by extirpating the abominable worſhip of idols, and reſtoring the people to the religion of the true God*. Such of the ordinances of his predeceſſors as he found productive of ill conſequences, he aboliſhed: ſuch inſtitutions as were expedient he retained; and to thoſe which required alterations, he made amendments, which would have conferred honour upon the moſt conſummate wiſdom, and the experience of advanced years. He cauſed all the groves and altars which his apoſtate predeceſſors had dedicated to the idolatrous worſhip, to be deſtroyed, and attached the people to a due reverence towards the worſhip of the living God. He appointed commiſſioners to ſuperintend the manners of the people, and determine on the merits of cauſes depending between individuals; and he rigidly adhered to the adminiſtration of public juſtice. He deputed commiſſioners to receive contributions of gold and ſilver for the purpoſe of repairing the temple; but, averſe to give cauſe of complaint, his ſubjects were at liberty either to promote or decline the ſubſcription. The contributions being depoſited in the treaſury, Amaſiah, governor of the city; Shaphan, the ſcribe; Joaſh, the recorder; and Hilkiah, the high-prieſt, were nominated to engage artificers, provide materials, and regulate the expences of the intended reparations. The rebuilding the temple proved a laſting monument of the exemplary piety of Joſiah.

He gives directions for reſtoring the true worſhip.

In the eighteenth year of his reign, Joſiah directed Hilkiah to apply what gold and ſilver ſhould remain, after defraying the expences incidental to the edifice, in

* The ſacred writings, on this part of the Jewiſh hiſtory, inform us, that ſo many and aggravating were the provocations of the Iſraelites againſt God in the preceding reigns, that all the piety of Joſiah, his great care and indefatigable induſtry to extirpate idolatry, were not ſufficient to obtain a revocation of the ſentence the Almighty had pronounced againſt Judah: for it ſeems, that though the people complied with the preſent reformation, yet their compliance proceeded principally from a fear of incurring the king's diſpleaſure, or of feeling the ſeverity of his juſtice.

the formation of cups, chalices, and other veſſels and utenſils for the ſervice of the holy religion; and he ordered that all the gold and ſilver depoſited in the royal treaſury, ſhould be manufactured into veſſels for the ſame purpoſe. Upon removing the treaſure, the high-prieſt diſcovered the ſacred books of Moſes; which he delivered to Shaphan, the ſcribe, who, after having peruſed them, repaired to the king, and informed him, that his commands had been obeyed; adding, that he had found the books of Moſes. Hilkiah read theſe books to the king, who, upon hearing their contents, in an agony of grief, tore his clothes, and called for certain particular friends. On their arrival, he deſired them to accompany the high-prieſt to the propheteſs Huldah, the wife of Shallum, who was a man of diſtinguiſhed reputation; requeſting that they would unite their endeavours, to prevail upon her to make interceſſion with the Almighty for pardon towards himſelf and his ſubjects; ſaying, there was great reaſon to apprehend, that the vengeance of heaven would be directed towards the preſent generation, as a puniſhment for the iniquities of their progenitors; and that without obtaining a reconciliation with the Lord, they ſhould be diſperſed over the face of the earth, and terminate their lives in miſery. Upon the king's order being communicated to the propheteſs, ſhe directed them to report this anſwer: "That the impious ſuperſtition of the people, and their contempt of the menacing predictions of the prophets, had incurred the wrath of heaven; that the people would be baniſhed from their native land, and be deprived of the bleſſings of life; and that no ſupplications could prevail, to avert the judgment which the Lord had irrevocably pronounced. However (continued the propheteſs), report to Joſiah, that, from a regard to his piety, the Almighty will not inflict theſe puniſhments during his life; but that immediately after his deceaſe, the divine vengeance will be executed upon the people in general, without diſtinction."

The books of Moſes found.

Huldah's prophetical denunciation.

Hereupon, Joſiah diſpatched meſſengers to the ſeveral cities within his dominions, commanding the prieſts, Levites, and his ſubjects in general, to repair to Jeruſalem: and upon their being aſſembled, the books of Moſes were read to them: after which, the king advanced to an eminence in the midſt of the multitude, and adminiſtered the oath of obedience to the laws of Moſes, and the holy worſhip and religion of God: and the people bound themſelves under this engagement with unanimous approbation. After the ſacrifices had been made, prayers were put forth for obtaining the bleſſing of the Almighty. The king enjoined the high-prieſt to take a particular ſurvey of the veſſels and other plate contained in the temple, and effectually to deſtroy ſuch articles as had been dedicated by his predeceſſors to the ſervice of the idolatrous religion. The king's commands were punctually obeyed, and the remnants of the utenſils were caſt away. In obedience to the command of Joſiah, all the prieſts who were not of the line of Aaron were put to death.

Joſiah cauſes the law to be read to an aſſembly of the people at Jeruſalem.

His efforts to extirpate idolatry.

The reformation of the city of Jeruſalem being effected, Joſiah made a journey through his kingdom, and deſtroyed every evidence which remained of Jeroboam's ſuperſtition and idolatry: and the bones of the falſe prophets, he cauſed to be burnt upon the altar which Jeroboam had erected. Thus, after the expiration of three hundred and ſixty-one years, was the prediction of the prophet verified; for he declared, that theſe events ſhould be accompliſhed by a man of the race of David named Joſiah. The king, in perſon, and by the agency of meſſengers, applied to the Iſraelites who had eſcaped from the captivity of the Aſſyrians, with a view to reclaim them from the abominable adoration of idols, and to inſpire them with a juſt ſenſe of their duty towards the eternal God. The figures of horſes dedicated to the ſun *, and placed over the porch of the temple, he cauſed to be deſtroyed; and he appointed officers to make ſtrict enquiry within the towns and villages of his dominions, for the relics of idolatry, which he commanded them utterly to deſtroy.

Burns the bones of the falſe prophets.

After this purification of his realm, he aſſembled the people at Jeruſalem for the purpoſe of celebrating the feaſt of unleavened bread, or the paſſover; and on this occaſion he gave from his own ſtore thirty goats, one thouſand lambs, and three thouſand oxen: the principal prieſt preſented to the others of the ſacerdotal order two thouſand ſix hundred lambs; and the chiefs of the Levites gave to their tribe five thouſand lambs, and five hundred oxen. A ſolemn ſacrifice was made of theſe victims, according to the precepts of Moſes: and the ceremony was performed under the direction of the prieſts. An exact conformity to the law and ancient uſage was obſerved on the celebration of this feſtival, which was the moſt ſolemn that had been known ſince the time of the prophet Samuel.

Having proceeded to Megiddo, a place subject to Josiah, the latter refused to let Pharaoh pass; on which he dispatched a messenger to tell Josiah, that his designs were not hostile to him, but he wished to march towards the Euphrates, and hoped the king would not compel him to force his way. Josiah, however, persisted to deny him a passage, as if hereby impelled by a kind of fatality to bring on his own ruin: for while he was riding to and fro, giving orders to his army, an Egyptian shot him with an arrow, by which he was so dreadfully wounded, that he gave orders for his army to retreat, and went himself to Jerusalem, where he expired, in the thirty-first year of his reign, and at the age of thirty-nine. He was interred with great solemnity, in the burial-place of his ancestors, and several days were devoted to public mourning for his death. Jeremiah, the prophet, wrote an elegy on this occasion, in which he foretold the near approach of the Babylonish captivity, and the misfortunes consequent thereon. This elegy is still in being. Ezekiel, the prophet, likewise left two books of prediction on this subject, in which he foretells the calamities which should follow this revolution. Both these prophets were of the line of the priesthood; Jeremiah dwelt at Jerusalem from the thirteenth year of Josiah's reign, till the city and temple were destroyed.

Jehoahaz succeeding, is soon after deposed by Pharaoh, who transfers the government to Jehoiakim.

Jehoahaz, who was twenty-three years old at the death of Josiah, now assumed the sovereign authority, and held his court at Jerusalem. His mother was named Hamutal; and he was a prince of a profane and irreligious disposition. When the king of Egypt returned from the wars, he dispatched a messenger to Jehoahaz to attend him at Hamath in Syria, when he deposed him, put him in chains, and transferred the government to his elder brother by the father's side, who was named Eliakim; but, on this occasion, assumed the name of Jehoiakim. The Egyptian made this prince his tributary, by taxing his country to the amount of one talent of gold, and one hundred of silver. Jehoahaz he took with him into Egypt, where he died, having reigned only three months and ten days. Zabida, of Raman, was the mother of Jehoiakim, who bore the character of a malicious, revengeful man, who neglected the worship of God, and had no compassion for his fellow-creatures.

CHAP. VI.

PHARAOH defeated by NEBUCHADNEZZAR, to whom JEHOIAKIM becomes tributary.

Pharaoh defeated by Nebuchadnezzar, who takes Jerusalem, and makes Jehoiakim captive.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR* proceeded with a large army to Carchabesa, near the Euphrates, in the fourth year of the reign of Jehoiakim, with a view to make war on Pharaoh-Necho, and reduce all Syria. Pharaoh raised a large army, and took the field to oppose him, and the armies engaging, on the banks of the Euphrates, Pharaoh was compelled to retire, with the loss of several thousands of his troops. After this, in the eighth year of Jehoiakim's reign, and the fourth of Nebuchadnezzar's, the Babylonians invaded Judea, and threatened destruction to its inhabitants, unless they paid a tribute, like the rest of the Syrians. Jehoiakim, terrified by these threats, purchased his peace, and paid contributions for three years; but in the fourth, hearing that the king of Egypt was advancing against the Babylonians, he refused to pay tribute. He was, however, misinformed; for the Egyptians were afraid to attack the Babylonians; which agreed with Jeremiah's prediction, that the Egyptians would be no better than a broken reed to depend on. This prophet likewise foretold, that the Babylonians should soon destroy Jerusalem, and take Jehoiakim captive. These predictions were generally despised; and there were a few persons who advised the exhibiting articles against the prophet, as a promoter of sedition. This being done, the majority of the council would have punished him with death; but others were for dismissing him; alledging, that other prophets, among whom was Micah, had predicted the same calamities; and instead of being punished for it, were highly honoured as the prophets of God. Attention being paid hereto, the prophet was dismissed.

Jeremiah's book of prophecy torn and burnt by the king's order.

Jeremiah now reduced his prophecies to writing; and in the ninth month of the fifteenth year of Jehoiakim's reign, on the assembling of the people in the temple, on a solemn fast, he publicly read his book, containing predictions of the misfortunes to the people, city, and temple. On hearing the contents, the princes took the book from the prophet, and advised him and Baruch, his scribe, immediately to secrete themselves. They then took the book to the king, who ordered his secretary to read it; but was so enraged at it, that he tore and burnt it; commanding that Jeremiah and Baruch should be instantly brought before him, to receive sentence of punishment: but they had previously absconded.

Nebuchadnezzar, being admitted into Jerusalem by Jehoiakim, perfidiously puts him to death.

Jehoiakim, soon after the above events, being terrified by the predictions of Jeremiah, admitted Nebuchadnezzar and all his army into the city, on friendly terms, without having taken any measures for his own security, or even thought of excluding the Babylonians; who had no sooner got footing in the city, than he violated the rights of friendship, by putting the king to the sword, with all the principal young men of Jeruſalem. He then ordered the body of the king to be thrown into the fields without the walls of the city, and advanced his ſon Jehoiachin to the government of the city and country. He made priſoners of about three thouſand perſons of diſtinction and eminence, whom he carried to Babylon in captivity; among whom was Ezekiel the prophet, then a very young man. Thus ended the life of Jehoiakim, at the age of thirty-ſix years, after a reign of eleven years. The mother of his ſucceſſor, Jehoiachin, was named Nehuſhta, who was a native of Jeruſalem.

The Aſſyrian army enter Jeruſalem, and, ſeizing Jehoiachin, &c. ſend them priſoners to Babylon.

Nebuchadnezzar having revolved the former proceedings in his mind, repented his having placed Jehoiachin on the throne; conſidering that the young king would not eaſily forget the murder of his father, but would ſeek for the moſt favourable opportunity to revenge his death. Theſe reflections produced a reſolution to ſend an army to attack Jeruſalem; and Jehoiachin, who was a prince of a mild diſpoſition, and a lover of equity, agreed with Nebuchadnezzar's officers to ſurrender the place, on the condition that both it, and the inhabitants, ſhould remain uninjur'd: and for the ratification of this treaty, the king's mother and relations were given up as hoſtages. At the end of one year, however, Nebuchadnezzar broke his agreement, and ordered his officers to ſeize the young men of the city, with artificers of all kinds, and convey them to him in fetters. This being done, ten thouſand eight hundred and thirty-two perſons were made captives, and confined in priſon, among whom were Jehoiachin, his mother, and relations.

Zedekiah raiſed to the throne.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR having impriſoned Jehoiachin, elevated his uncle Zedekiah to the government, binding him, by a ſolemn oath, neither to make innovations, or take part with the Egyptians. When Zedekiah began to rule, he was twenty-one years old; and he had a brother, by the ſame mother, named Jehoiakim. The above prince was deficient in all virtues, and aſſociated with young men as abandoned as himſelf: ſo that Jeremiah the prophet frequently conjured him to the practice of religion; adviſed him not to liſten to flatterers and falſe prophets, who filled his imagination with ideas that the Babylonians would not again attack Jeruſalem †; and that whenever the Egyptians fought, they ſhould conquer them; which the prophet ſaid would not happen. Zedekiah would liſten to, and appeared convinced by the arguments of Jeremiah; but no ſooner did he mix with his old companions, than all the good advice was forgotten.

Prophecies of Ezekiel and Jeremiah.

At this time, Ezekiel, who reſided at Babylon, predicted the deſtruction of the temple, and ſent his prophecy to Jeruſalem. The two prophets agreed that the city ſhould be taken by force, and Zedekiah carried into captivity: Jeremiah ſaid, that the king ſhould convey him priſoner to Babylon, while Ezekiel predicted that he ſhould not ſee that city. This apparent inconſiſtency in the prophecies led Zedekiah to doubt the truth of the whole: but it will hereafter be ſeen, that he was miſtaken in his conjecture.

Zedekiah, for his treacherous conduct, puniſhed by Nebuchadnezzar.

At the end of eight years, Zedekiah violated his oath to Nebuchadnezzar, by taking part with the Egyptians; thinking that, jointly, they could ſubdue the king of Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar immediately marched, ravaged Zedekiah's country, ſeized his cattle and fortreſs, and proceeded to the ſiege of Jeruſalem. Pharaoh learning how Zedekiah was preſſed, advanced to his relief, with a view to raiſe the ſiege. Nebuchadnezzar having intimation hereof, would not wait his approach, but proceeded to give him battle, and, in one conteſt, drove him out of Syria. This circumſtance ſuſpending the ſiege, the falſe prophets repreſented to Zedekiah how abſurd it was to fear that the Hebrews would be carried captive to Babylon: whereas it was more probable, that the priſoners already taken would be brought back, and the plate and treaſure, which had been carried from the temple, reſtored. In contradiction hereto, Jeremiah charged the falſe prophets with being impoſtors; ſaid, that no good was to be hoped for from the Egyptians; but that they ſhould be firſt conquered, and then the army of Babylon return to the ſiege: that thoſe who eſcaped death by ſword and famine, ſhould have their houſes ranſacked, their goods ſtolen, and the city and temple plundered, while themſelves ſhould be carried into captivity. The people in general paid great attention to what the prophet ſaid; but the moſt eminent people, and the unprincipled in general, conſidered and treated him as a mad-man. Jeremiah having proceeded twenty furlongs from Jeruſalem, in the way to Anathoth (his birth-place), he was met by a magiſtrate, who confined him, on pretence that he was deſerting to the king of Babylon. He urged in vain that they charged him falſely: he was hereupon hurried be-

† Jeremiah, by God's command, made him bonds and yokes, which he ſent by the embaſſadors of the princes who congratulated Zedekiah on his acceſſion to the throne, with this meſſage from God, "that he had given all their countries to the king of Babylon, and therefore their wiſeſt courſe would be, to ſubmit to his yoke; which if they refuſed, both they and their countries would moſt certainly be deſtroyed." This prediction was afterwards verified.

Jeremiah's ill uſage from the princes.

In the tenth month of the ninth year of Zedekiah's reign, the king of Babylon again beſieged Jeruſalem with a large army, and, for a year and a half, exerted all his art and ſtrength to conquer it; but the city, though enfeebled by famine and peſtilence, did not yield. At this time Jeremiah, who was in priſon, called to the people to open the gates, and admit the Babylonians, as the only means to prevent their deſtruction: he ſaid, thoſe who remained in the city would be deſtroyed by famine or ſword; but the enemy would ſpare ſuch as fled out to them. Hereupon the princes went to the king, and repreſented the prophet as one whoſe idle tales would delude the multitude; inſinuating, that the people appeared reſolute to defend the city to the uttermoſt, till their courage was abated by his predictions. The diſpoſition of the king would not have led him to extremities; but urged as he was, and unwilling to diſoblige perſons of their rank, he permitted them to diſpoſe of the prophet as they pleaſed. Hereupon they repaired to the priſon, and taking out Jeremiah, lowered him with a rope into a pit, where they left him up to the neck in mud, that he might be ſuffocated. An Ethiopian, one of the king's favourite ſervants, informing his majeſty of his ſituation, he ordered him to ſelect thirty men who could be depended on, who ſhould take ropes, and inſtantly releaſe him. This being done, the prophet was privately introduced to the king, who aſked him if he could relieve his diſtreſs by the interpoſition of heaven. Jeremiah replied in the affirmative; "but (ſaid he) your people will neither credit me, nor take my advice. Thoſe who call themſelves your friends, are my foes: they conſider me as an hypocrite, and are now combining my deſtruction: but where are now thoſe deceivers, that perſuaded the people no danger could ariſe from the Babylonians? However, ſir, my life may pay the forfeit, if I tell you the truth." On this the king ſwore to the prophet that his life ſhould be ſafe; whereupon the latter ſaid, "Deliver up the city to the king of Babylon. This is the only method to be ſafe from perſonal harm, to avoid the dangers which threaten you, ſave the temple from being burnt, and the city from being raſed to the ground. If you neglect this advice, I declare in the name, and by the order of God, that all kinds of misfortunes will ſurround you; and to you will be attributed the deſtruction of yourſelf, family, and people." Zedekiah told him, he inclined to purſue his advice, for the public good; but he was apprehenſive that ſome of his people, who had gone over to the Babylonians, would adviſe the king to deſtroy him. The prophet told him to be eaſy on this head; for, on giving up the city, himſelf, his wives, and children ſhould be ſafe, and the temple ſhould ſuſtain no injury. Hereupon, he bade the prophet depart, enjoining him not to divulge a ſingle ſyllable of what had paſſed, even to the princes: and if any one ſhould inquire reſpecting the viſit, he ſhould ſay he had been to ſolicit his liberty of the king. The prophet complied in all reſpects with theſe injunctions.

He is taken out of the dungeon by the king's order.

Jeruſalem taken.

THE ſiege of Jeruſalem went on vigorouſly. The Babylonians compleated their works, having raiſed towers all round the city, ſo as to drive the invaded parties from its walls. The place, though a prey to the plague and famine, was obſtinately defended; every ſcheme of protection being oppoſed to that of attack, during the ſpace of a year and a half: but at length, want of proviſions and forces, compelled its ſurrender, when Zedekiah had reigned eleven years, three months and nine days. It was delivered at midnight to Nergelaer, Aremantus, Emegar, Nabaſaries, and Encharampſaris, officers of Nebuchadnezzar. Zedekiah ſeeing the troops enter the temple, abſconded, by a narrow paſs, to the deſert, with his wives, children, officers, and friends *: but advice of this being given to the Babylonians, they purſued them early in the morning, and ſurrounded them near Jericho. The friends of Zedekiah flying to ſecure themſelves, he and his wives and children, with a few adherents, were eaſily made priſoners, and conducted to the king, who no ſooner ſaw, than he reproached Zedekiah, ſaying, "Had I not your promiſe to conduct, for my advantage, the power I inveſted you with? I made you a king in the ſtead of your brother Jehoiakim, and you have endeavoured to repay me, by uſing your intereſt to my ruin. But you are now become my priſoner, through the juſtice of God, for the puniſhment of your ingratitude." The king having thus ſaid, ordered his wives and children to be put to death in the ſight of himſelf and the other priſoners; and then directed Zedekiah's eyes to be put out, and himſelf conducted to Babylon in chains.

* It is difficult to conceive how the beſieged could make their eſcape, by any narrow paſs, ſeeing their enemies the Chaldeans had encompaſſed the city. The Jews think there was a ſubterraneous paſſage from the palace to the plains of Jericho, and that it was through this they retired. But as no ſuch ſubterraneous paſſage is mentioned by the ſacred hiſtorian, it ſeems more probable, that the Chaldeans being now making their aſſault in the oppoſite part of the city, this was left unguarded.

Agreement of the two prophets.

Thus were the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel verified; the former ſaying he ſhould be made priſoner, ſpeak with, and ſee the king, and be carried to Babylon: the latter, that he ſhould be carried to Babylon, and not ſee the king there; which he could not do, ſince his eyes were firſt put out. By this we may ſee the wiſdom and power of God, and the regularity of the operations of his counſels. We may learn to reverence the preſcience of the Deity, and to know that all events are ordered by his providence, and come to paſs according to his will. It is likewiſe a remedy againſt that incredulity which prevents our knowledge of threatened evils.

The race of kings deſcended from David was now extinct, after a ſucceſſive reign of twenty-one princes, and during a ſeries of five hundred and fifteen years ſix months and ten days; but this includes the reign of Saul for twenty years, who was of a different tribe.

Jeruſalem, with the palace and temple, ranſacked and burnt.

After the above ſignal victory, Nebuchadnezzar diſpatched his principal officer, Nebuzar-Adan, to Jeruſalem, to ranſack and burn both palace and temple, to raſe the city to the ground, and conduct the captive inhabitants to Babylon. Nebuzar-Adan executed his orders in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, taking all the gold and ſilver veſſels from the temple, the braſen pillars, the tables and candleſticks of gold, and Solomon's large laver: after which he burnt the city, palace, and temple, to the ground. This happened in the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign. The temple had been built four hundred and ſeventy years ſix months and ten days. It was one thouſand and ſixty-two years ſix months and ten days from the Iſraelites leaving Egypt, and three thouſand five hundred and thirty-five years ſix months and ten days after the creation of the world.

Priſoners of eminence.

Nebuzar-Adan took the following priſoners, namely, Seraiah, the high-prieſt; Sepheniah, next in rank; three principal keepers of the temple; ſeven of the king's friends; the chief eunuch of the bed-chamber; the ſecretary to the king, and other perſons of diſtinction, in all about threeſcore, and conducted them to the king, at the city of Reblathis in Syria. The king ordered the high-prieſt, and others of the firſt rank, to be beheaded there: but the majority of the priſoners were carried to Babylon with Zedekiah, among whom was Jehozadock the high-prieſt, who was ſon to the above-named Seraiah.

Death of Zedekiah.

On the king's return to Babylon, Zedekiah was thrown into priſon, where he expired; and he was buried with regal honours. The king gave Jehozadock his liberty, aſſigned dwellings for the priſoners in Babylon, and dedicated to his idols the holy veſſels which had been taken from the temple. The general Nebuzar-Adan had committed the majority of the captives to the command of Gedaliah, a man diſtinguiſhed by his juſtice and benevolence, who allowed to each man a certain portion of land for his ſubſiſtence, on paying the king a tribute. Jeremiah was releaſed from priſon: and the governor having received the king's orders to treat him well, Gedaliah offered him either to go to Babylon, or, if he choſe another place of reſidence, he would write to the king reſpecting the matter. Jeremiah anſwered, that he would rather live among the ruins of his native land. This being told to Nebuzar-Adan, he directed Gedaliah to provide properly for him, and ſent the prophet ſome valuable preſents. Jeremiah having obtained the liberty of his ſervant Baruch, choſe him for his companion, and fixed on Mizpah for his reſidence. Baruch was the ſon of Neriah, nobly deſcended, and a great maſter of his native language.

Jeremiah favourably treated.

Gedaliah was very kind to thoſe who fled during the ſiege, and this benevolence to the fugitives ſo raiſed his credit among the ſurrounding nations, that numbers came to him, and formed a large ſettlement, having lands aſſigned them, for which they paid the king of Babylon a fixed tribute. Gedaliah's goodneſs to the ſettlers ſo engaged the eſteem of Johanan and the other principal men, that having intelligence of a conſpiracy forming againſt him, by Iſhmael and the king of the Ammonites *, they informed him that the former wiſhed to deſtroy him, and reign over the Iſraelites. To counteract this plan, they requeſted his permiſſion to deſtroy Iſhmael; for they thought the Iſraelites would be ruined by the continuance of the plot. Gedaliah ſaid, he deemed it impoſſible that any man could ſo far deviate from all ſenſe of moral obligation as to ſeek the deſtruction of his preſerver: but if this was the caſe, he would not ſo far violate the laws of hoſpitality as to take the life of the man who had ſheltered himſelf under his protection. On this declaration, Johanan and his friends departed.

Gedaliah and his friends barbarouſly ſlaughtered.

A viſit being made about a month after this, to Gedaliah, by Iſhmael and ten of his friends, they were moſt hoſpitably treated. The glaſs having gone round, till Gedaliah, and his party were ſomewhat elevated, the others treacherouſly murdered them all. This happening at midnight, they ſallied into the ſtreets, deſtroying Jews and Babylonians indiſcriminately. The following day a party of eighty men came from the country, with preſents for Gedaliah, but were unacquainted with the preceding murders. Iſhmael invited them in, as to Gedaliah; but cloſing the doors, cauſed them to be murdered, and thrown into a pit: but ſome of them were ſpared, on a promiſe of diſcovering where corn, cloaths, and other effects, were hid in the earth: but the men in general of Mizpah, with the women and children, were carried off; among whom were Zedekiah's daughters, who had been left under Gedaliah's protection, by Nebuzar-Adan.

* The words in ſcripture (Jer. xi. 14.) are, "Baalis, king of the Ammonites hath ſent Iſhmael," &c. Now it is neceſſary to obſerve, that the word "Baalis" is rather a name of office than a proper name, by which we may underſtand the Queen-mother, who was guardian of the king of the Ammonites during his minority. Iſhmael, mentioned in this verſe, was a Jew, and a deſcendant from David, who ſeems to have had ſome pretenſions to the throne at this time, and to have made an alliance with the queen-mother of the Ammonites, to render his deſigns more ſucceſsful.

Iſhmael flees to the king of the Ammonites.

This being done, Iſhmael repaired to the king of the Ammonites with the news; but Johanan, and the other principal people, having heard of the death of Gedaliah, and the cruelties at Mizpah, combined their forces, and purſued Iſhmael, whom they came up with near the fountain of Hebron. The captives, ſeeing the purſuers, ran to them in rapture; while Iſhmael and eight of his followers, haſtened to the king of the Ammonites. In the interim, Johanan, with the eunuchs, women, children, and others, who had fled from Iſhmael, proceeded to Mandra, where they reſted one day, doubting if they ſhould depart to Egypt, leſt the Babylonians ſhould attack them, in revenge of the murder of Gedaliah. But reſolving to conſult Jeremiah, they bound themſelves by an oath to follow his directions. The prophet promiſed them an anſwer; and at the end of ten days he was viſited by the Almighty, who directed him to tell Johanan and the other chiefs, that "if they remained in their preſent ſituation, they ſhould be ſecure againſt the Babylonians; but if they went into Egypt, they muſt expect judgments ſimilar to thoſe which had befallen their brethren." Inſtead of giving credit to this meſſage, they thought it was an invention of Jeremiah, in favour of his ſervant Baruch, and calculated to leave them a prey to the Babylonians: on which Johanan and his adherents ſeized on Jeremiah and Baruch, and departed into Egypt; where being arrived, the prophet had a viſion from heaven, which informed him that an army ſhould be brought into Egypt by the king of Babylon, the country conquered, part of the people ſlain, and the reſt carried captives to Babylon: and this the prophet was to declare to the people. This prediction was verified in the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, who making an incurſion into Cœlo-Syria, ſubjected that country, then went againſt the Ammonites and Moabites, whom having ſubdued, he penetrated into Egypt, killed the reigning king, advanced another in his ſtead, and carried priſoners to Babylon ſuch of the Jews as he found in the country.

Jeremiah enjoins the Jews not to go to Egypt; but they diſobey, and are again captivated.

Thus the Hebrews were twice carried priſoners beyond the Euphrates. The Aſſyrians, in the reign of Hoſea, firſt carried away the ten tribes; and Nebuchadnezzar, on the conqueſt of Jeruſalem, made captives of the other two. Salmanezer removed the Chuthites from Media and Perſia into the land of the Iſraelites, where they took the name of Samaritans; but the king of Babylon left no ſettlers in the room of the two tribes he carried away. Hence it happened, that, for the ſpace of ſeventy years, Judea, Jeruſalem, and the temple, were totally abandoned. One hundred and thirty-ſix years ſix months and ten days elapſed, between the captivity of the ten tribes and the departure of the other two.

Salmanezer tranſplants the Chuthites to Samaria.

Some of the fineſt young men among the Jews being ſelected for Nebuchadnezzar's particular ſervice, had tutors appointed to inſtruct them in the learning of Chaldæa: and ſome of them were caſtrated, agreeable to the cuſtom of the country. Among them were four relations of Zedekiah, viz. Daniel, Ananias, Miſhael, and Azariah; but their names were changed to Belteſhazzar, Shadrach, Meſhach, and Abed-nego. The king was equally pleaſed with the goodneſs of their tempers and ſtrength of their judgments, and directed proviſions to be ſent them from his own table: but Daniel, conſidering that ſuch elegant viands ſuited not their ſituation, applied to Aſchanes, the eunuch, and begged that, inſtead of the king's proviſions, they might eat pulſe or dates, or any homely food †. The eunuch expreſſed a readineſs to gratify them; but ſaid, that if they ſhould grow lean on ſuch food, and decline in health and complexion, the king might ſuſpect what had happened, eſpecially if their companions looked better than they did, which might endanger his life. However, they urged the eunuch to make the experiment, ſaying they could return to their former food, if this was found not to agree with them. The trial being made, the eunuch found they increaſed in health of body and vigour of mind; on which he kept to himſelf the king's allowance. A courſe of this temperance ſo ſtrengthened their faculties, that they rapidly increaſed in Hebrew and Chaldæan learning; particularly Daniel, who became a proficient in their arts, undertook to expound dreams, and had ſometimes viſions of his own.

Nebuchadnezzar treats Daniel and his companions with ſingular reſpect.

Nebuchadnezzar, two years after the conqueſt of Egypt, had a dream, and its interpretation, which he forgot in the morning; on which he ſent for the Chaldæans, magi, and prophets, and told them what had happened, but demanded their interpretation. They told him this was impoſſible; but if he would recite the dream,

The king's remarkable dream.

† It was the cuſtom of moſt nations, before their meals, to make an offering of ſome part of what they were to eat or drink to their gods, as a thankful acknowledgment, that every thing they enjoyed was their gift; ſo that every entertainment had ſomething in it of the nature of a ſacrifice. This practice generally prevailing, made Daniel and his friends look upon the proviſions coming from the king's table as no better than meats offered to idols, and, by ſuch offering, became polluted and unclean. He was likewiſe prohibited eating particular meats by the law of Moſes, and theſe very meats might have been in vogue among the Babylonians.

they would explain it. Hereupon the king demanded their compliance, which they ſaid was out of their power; on which he ordered them to be put to death. Daniel hearing of the intended execution, went to Arioch, the captain of the guards, to enquire the cauſe; on which the captain informed him they were to die, becauſe they could not explain a dream which the king had forgot. On this Daniel requeſted they might be reſpited for one night, and he hoped God would enable him to interpret the dream. The captain acquainting the king with this circumſtance, the execution was ſuſpended. The friends of Daniel retired with him to his chamber, where they ſpent the night in prayer, that God would be pleaſed to reveal to Daniel the dream which the king had forgotten. Their prayers were heard, and God made known to Daniel both the dream and its interpretation. He aroſe early in the morning, and repairing to the men under ſentence of death, bade them be of good courage, for he was certain of delivering them. They returned their joint thanks to heaven, and then Daniel went to Arioch, deſiring to be introduced to the king, whoſe dream he could now interpret.

Daniel, being ſent for, interprets it.

Daniel no ſooner ſaw the king, than he ſaid he did not approach him from motives of vanity, or a pretence of poſſeſſing more wiſdom than the Chaldæans and magi; but that God, in pity to the unfortunate, had permitted him to explain the king's dream. "I conſult (ſaid he) your honour, in the endeavour to ſave the lives of thoſe worthy men, whom you would deſtroy, for not being able to reveal a ſecret which it was not in the power of human wiſdom to diſcover. Your dream was to the following purport: having reflected on the fate of your dominions after your deceaſe, you dreamt that you ſaw a ſtatue ſtanding upright, the head of which was gold, the arms and ſhoulders ſilver, the belly and thighs of braſs, and the legs and feet of iron. To your ſight a ſtone then broke from a mountain, and falling on this ſtatue, overthrew it, and cruſhed it ſo, that the duſt of the gold, ſilver, braſs, and iron, was blown by the wind to the uttermoſt part of the earth, while the ſtone increaſed to the ſize of a mountain. The interpretation of your dream is, that yourſelf and the preceding kings of Babylon are meant by the golden head: the hands and ſhoulders ſignify, that your empire ſhall be deſtroyed by two kings: the braſs imports that a king from the weſt, cloathed in braſen armour, ſhall overturn their empire: and a man clad in iron, which is ſtronger than gold, ſilver, or braſs, is to ſubdue this laſt king." Daniel likewiſe explained the meaning of the ſtone †, which I omit, as I write of paſt, not of future events. The curious, however, may refer to the book of Daniel in the Holy Scriptures.

Struck with aſtoniſhment, Nebuchadnezzar owned the above to be his dream; and, bowing to the ground, worſhipped Daniel, beſtowing on him the name of his god Belteſhazzar. He likewiſe commiſſioned Daniel, in conjunction with ſome of his relations, to rule over the whole province. Daniel and his friends were much envied for this promotion, which ſeemed to threaten their lives, as appears by the following narrative.

A golden image erected for worſhip.

Nebuchadnezzar fixed up, in the plain of Babylon, a golden image, ſixty cubits high, and ſix broad. On the dedication of this image he ſummoned a meeting of the princes, officers, &c. throughout his dominions, and cauſed proclamation to be made by the ſound of trumpet, that all ſhould proſtrate themſelves, and worſhip the image, on pain of being thrown into the fiery furnace. The trumpet being ſounded, all the people fell down in adoration, except Daniel and his kinſmen, who refuſing thus to violate the laws of their country, information was laid againſt them, and they were thrown into the fire. The providence of God now ſo interpoſed on their behalf, that they remained unhurt amidſt the flames, which had not even the power to ſcorch them. This circumſtance ſtruck the king with ſuch an idea of the goodneſs of God in the preſervation of his ſervants, that he ever afterwards held them in great honour and eſteem.

Nebuchadnezzar's ſecond dream, and its interpretation by Daniel.

Soon after this event Nebuchadnezzar had a ſecond dream, which was that, "after being driven out from his kingdom, and living ſeven years among the beaſts of the foreſt, he ſhould be reſtored to his former rank and ſplendor." On this dream alſo the king conſulted his wiſe men, but Daniel alone could interpret it; and agreeable to his explanation it happened, that after Nebuchadnezzar had ſpent ſeven years in abſolute ſolitude, during which no perſon attempted to ſeize his government, it pleaſed God to reſtore him to the regal power. He died in the forty-third year of his age; having been diſtinguiſhed for his vigilance, and a better fortune than attended any of his predeceſſors.

EVILMERODACH ſets JEHOIAKIM at Liberty. BELSHAZZAR beſieged in BABYLON, by CY-

† This ſtone is repreſented as "cut out of the mountain without hands:" the kingdom of Chriſt was firſt ſet up, while the Roman empire was in its full ſtrength with "legs of iron." This great empire, deſcribed in its ſtrong and flouriſhing ſtate, with "legs of iron," was afterwards divided into ten leſſer kingdoms, the remains of which are ſtill ſubſiſting. The image is ſtill ſtanding upon its feet and toes of iron and clay: the kingdom of Chriſt is yet "a ſtone of ſtumbling and a rock of offence;" but the ſtone will one day ſmite the image upon the feet and toes, and deſtroy it utterly, and will itſelf "become a great mountain, and fill the whole earth;" or in the words of the apoſtle (Rev. xi. 15.), "The kingdoms of this world ſhall become the kingdoms of our Lord," &c. We have therefore ſeen the kingdom of the "ſtone," but we have not yet ſeen the kingdom of the "mountain." Some parts of this prophecy ſtill remain to be fulfilled: but the exact completion of the other parts will not ſuffer us to doubt of the accompliſhment of the reſt alſo, in due ſeaſon.

RUS and DARIUS. A Vision expounded to BELSHAZZAR by DANIEL. CYRUS takes BABYLON. DANIEL becomes the Favourite of DARIUS. His wonderful Predictions.

Jehoiakim set at liberty.

EVIL-MERODACH succeeding his father Nebuchadnezzar, gave liberty to Jehoiakim, king of Jerusalem, made him various presents, reposed great confidence in him, and committed the government of the palace at Babylon to his care.

Evil-Merodach reigned eighteen years, and was succeeded by his son Niglisar, who, having reigned forty years, the kingdom devolved to his son Labosardochus, who died at the end of nine months, when the sovereign rule descended to Belshazzar, who was called Naboandel by the Babylonians. Against this prince, Cyrus, king of Persia, and Darius, king of the Medes, waged war; and when they were besieging Babylon, an astonishing vision appeared to Belshazzar.

Belshazzar's vision.

While he was surrounded by his courtiers and concubines at supper, the table being decorated with vessels of silver, he profanely called for the sacred vessels, which Nebuchadnezzar, after the ransack of Jerusalem, had deposited in the temple, though he never applied them to vulgar uses. Belshazzar being elevated with liquor, was talking profanely of the true God, when looking towards the wall, he beheld a hand, writing some words thereon, which terrified him to such a degree, that he instantly assembled his wise men and Chaldæans, to discover the meaning of the words. Having consulted together, they declared their total ignorance of the whole.

Hereupon the king, utterly distressed in mind, ordered proclamation to be made throughout his dominions, that whoever could interpret the writing, should receive as a reward a royal purple robe, and a gold chain, and should rank as third man in the kingdom; on which the wise men once more assembled, each anxious to develop the secret; but their labours proved altogether fruitless. This second disappointment made the king perfectly miserable; on which his grandmother informed him, that among the prisoners whom Nebuchadnezzar had brought from Jerusalem, there was a man of great wisdom and penetration, who appeared to be actuated by a divine spirit in the resolving abstruse questions; and she, therefore, advised him to send for Daniel, question him respecting the writing, and offer him every encouragement to speak the truth, however disagreeable that truth might be.

Belshazzar confessed he had heard of Daniel's wisdom, and took her advice in sending for him*. When he approached the royal presence, the king assured him, that all which he had promised in his proclamation should be made good, if he could resolve the question, which would extend his fame wherever the affair should be heard of. Daniel declined accepting either presents or honourable distinctions, saying, "Wisdom is the gift of heaven, not to be purchased or corrupted by bribes, but ever disposed freely to assist those who want her advice. The writing predicts that your death is near. You ought to have been warned by the fate of your great predecessor, for his contempt of heaven, and regulated your conduct by the principles of religion. Nebuchadnezzar, as you well know, was driven from the society of men, and obliged to herd with beasts; till, on his humble penitence, God was pleased to re-instate him in his government; a blessing he ever afterwards acknowledged with the most devout gratitude. But so little are you influenced by his example, that you openly blaspheme God, and, in the company of your harlots, profane the vessels of his holy altar. This impious conduct hath brought on you the vengeance of God; and this writing is predictive of your fate. By MENE is implied number; which portends, that the days of your life and reign shall be few. TEKEL signifies weight; and intimates, that your concluding reign is weighed in the balance. PERES imports a fragment; and declares, that the Medes and Persians shall divide your kingdom." Dejected as the king was at this interpretation, which foretold his destruction, yet he conferred on Daniel all that had been promised; for he considered that, however fatal the news might be to him, the prophet had acted the part of a conscientious man, in telling him the real truth.

Expounded by Daniel.

Soon after this, the city of Babylon fell into the hands of Cyrus, who took it in the seventh year of the reign of Belshazzar, who is deemed the last king of the family of Nebuchadnezzar. Darius was sixty-two years old when Babylon was taken, by the aid of his kinsman, Cyrus, the son of Astyages. Cyrus took Daniel with him to Media, where he promoted him to the rank of one of the three chief governors, under whom were three hundred and sixty others, as Darius had originally modelled the government. Darius had such veneration for Daniel, that he seldom engaged in any business of consequence without his advice, which drew on him the envy of the other favourites at court: but Daniel was particularly cautious not to fall into their snares. He was wholly above receiving a bribe, and took only a legal acknowledgment for a favour conferred: yet this did not deter his enemies from combining his destruction, which they attempted in the following manner.

Cyrus takes Babylon and promotes Daniel.

As Daniel regularly prayed to God three times every day, his opponents sought to entrap him from this circumstance; on which they made application to Darius, in the name, and by order of the officers of state, to issue an order, that whosoever should solicit any thing, from God or man, for thirty days, should be thrown into Conspiracy against Daniel.

* Though his grandfather Nebuchadnezzar had promoted Daniel to considerable places of honour, yet Belshazzar knew but little of him; which argues his being a weak, vicious prince, according to the character which historians give of him, leaving the care of public business to his mother.

the lions den. Darius unaware of their intentions, paſſed the decree. This circumſtance ſhocked all the people except Daniel, who continued to worſhip God publicly, as if the order to the contrary had never iſſued. His enemies had now a pretence for their proceedings, and immediately waiting on the king, informed him that Daniel was the only perſon who deſpiſed the royal proclamation, by continuing his worſhip; which, they ſaid, was not done from a motive of religion, but in mere contradiction to the king's authority *. Their malice was the more violent, from an apprehenſion they entertained, that the king's partiality for Daniel might induce him to pardon the ſuppoſed offence: on which they preſſed him for immediate juſtice on the delinquent, whom they inſiſted ſhould be caſt into the lions den.

Who is thrown into the lions' den, and miraculouſly preſerved; but his enemies deſtroyed therein.

Darius, compelled to yield to their importunities, told Daniel he had no doubt but the life of ſo good a man, would be protected by the immediate interference of divine Providence. Daniel being put into the den, the mouth of it was made cloſe by a large ſtone, and Darius having ſealed the door with the royal ſignet, returned to his palace. The king was ſo troubled, that he could neither eat nor ſleep during the night; and in the morning early, he repaired to the den, where he found the ſeal unbroken, and every thing as he had left it. Darius looking through the grate, called Daniel by his name, to enquire if he was ſafe and well, on which the prophet anſwered in the affirmative: on which the king ordered him to be ſet free; but the enemies of Daniel denied that this was a providential deliverance; inſiſting, that the reaſon why Daniel remained unhurt, was, that the lions had then no appetite. Darius was ſo enraged at this palpable malice, that he ordered the lions to be fed till they were perfectly ſatisfied, and then that the accuſers of Daniel ſhould be put in among them; ſaying, "If the lions touch them not, it is becauſe they are filled; but if they deſtroy them, the preſervation of Daniel muſt be aſcribed to Providence." They were no ſooner thrown in, than the Providence of God was manifeſted by their being torn to pieces.

Darius publicly acknowledges the true God.

Soon after this wonderful deſtruction of Daniel's enemies, Darius cauſed proclamation to be made throughout all his dominions, that his ſubjects ſhould acknowledge the God of Daniel as the only true God. He likewiſe made the prophet his moſt particular favourite, and advanced him to the higheſt honours. Daniel having now acquired univerſal eſteem, built a magnificent edifice at Ecbatane, the capital of Media, which is equally wonderful for its beauty and ſtrength.

Daniel highly favoured of God and man.

The life of Daniel is pregnant with many remarkable circumſtances worthy of notice. Excluſive of the gift of prophecy, he was happy in the enjoyment of the higheſt reputation both with prince and people; and his writings ſtill extant, prove that he was admitted to the immediate converſation of God, who revealed to him not only future events, but the particular time when thoſe events ſhould happen. Other prophets generally foretold misfortunes, by which they made enemies both of princes and people; but Daniel poſſeſſed the eſteem of both, from the good news he had the happineſs to reveal. It was alſo univerſally allowed, that his predictions were infallible, which may be alſo judged from the works which he has left us.

His viſions.

Daniel relates, that as he was enjoying the air with his friends, at Suſa, the capital of Perſia, they were ſuddenly ſurprized by an earthquake, on which his friends fled, and left him aſtoniſhed on the ground. In this ſituation ſomebody ſeemed to touch him, bid him riſe, and he ſhould ſee what would happen to his countrymen in future ages. On his getting up, he ſaw a ram with ſeveral horns, one of which was higher than the reſt: looking weſtward, he beheld a goat paſſing through the air, which attacked the ram, beat him twice down, and trod on him. Then a large horn grew from the forehead of the goat, which being broke, four more aroſe in its ſtead, directed to the four quarters of the heavens. The prophet writes, that from one of theſe came forth a ſmall horn, which, on its increaſe, was to make war againſt the Jews, deſtroy Jeruſalem, and aboliſh the ceremonies of the temple, and all ſacrifices, for 1296 days. Daniel thus expounds this viſion. The Medes and Perſians are intimated by the ram: their following kings by the horns, and the laſt of their ſovereigns, by the laſt horn, as his wealth and power was to exceed the reſt. A king of Greece, who ſhould deſtroy the Perſian empire, is meant by the goat. The horn on the goat's forehead, means the firſt of their kings, and the four budding horns, their ſucceſſors, who, though not allied to them, ſhould divide their dominions; that theſe ſhould reign many years, and from them a king ſhould ariſe, who ſhould wage war againſt the Jewiſh nation, aboliſh the laws, deſtroy their commonwealth, plunder their temple, and prevent for three years all worſhip and ſacrifice. This misfortune happened under Antiochus Epiphanes.

His prophecies reſpecting events of Providence.

Daniel wrote many wonderful predictions concerning the Roman empire, and its inroads on the Jews, which he has left in writing as a proof of their divine authority, by their accompliſhment †. This ought to confound

* In order to aggravate his fault, they added, that he was a foreigner, one of the children of the captivity, and, though brought thither as a captive, dared to offer a public affront to the laws of a king whoſe favour and protection he enjoyed. Daniel, on the other hand, pleaded in his defence, that his having diſobeyed the king's decree, was not done out of contumacy, but purely to preſerve a good conſcience, which is the only true principle of loyalty and obedience. See Dan. vi. 13. 22.

† What was revealed to Nebuchadnezzar concerning the four great empires of the world, was again revealed to Daniel, with ſome additions and enlargements, about forty-eight years after. But what was repreſented to Nebuchadnezzar in the form of a great image, was exhibited confound the Epicureans, who deny an over-ruling Providence, and contend that all things happen without divine direction; which is as abſurd, as it would be to turn a ſhip looſe to the mercy of the winds and waves without a pilot. When I reflect on the prophecies of Daniel, I am aſtoniſhed at the ignorance and irreligion of thoſe people who deny a Providence; for how could it happen, that things predicted in one age, ſhould be punctually fulfilled in another, if all things were left to mere chance?

exhibited to Daniel in the ſhape of great wild beaſts. The reaſon of this difference might be, that this image appeared with a glorious luſtre in the imagination of Nebuchadnezzar, whoſe mind was wholly taken up with the admiration of worldly pomp and ſplendor; whereas the ſame monarchies were repreſented to Daniel under the ſhape of fierce wild beaſts, as being the great ſupporters of idolatry and tyranny.

BOOK XI.

OCCURRENCES from the YEAR of the WORLD 3425 to 3635.

CHAP. I.

CYRUS commands his Officers and Governors to aſſiſt the JEWS in rebuilding the City and Temple at JERUSALEM.

Zeal of Cyrus in behalf of the Jews.

IN the ſeventieth year of the captivity of the Jews in Babylon, and in the firſt year of the reign of Cyrus, the Almighty accompliſhed the prediction which he made by the prophet Jeremiah, previous to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, that, "After a bondage for the ſpace of ſeventy years, under Nebuchadnezzar, and his ſucceſſors, the Hebrews ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed in their former ſtate of happineſs and ſplendor." The Lord was pleaſed to incline Cyrus to circulate letters throughout Aſia, purporting, that the God adored by the Iſraelites was the eternal Being, through whoſe bounty he enjoyed the regal dignity; and that he had found himſelf honourably mentioned by the prophets of ancient date, and repreſented by them as the man who ſhould cauſe Jeruſalem to be rebuilt, and reſtore the Hebrews to their former ſtate of grandeur and independency. Cyrus had read the prophecies of Iſaiah, which had been written two hundred and ten years previous to his birth; and which included a revelation from the Lord, that he would create a man named Cyrus, who ſhould reign over many powerful nations, and give the Hebrews poſſeſſion of their native land. This prediction was delivered one hundred and forty years before the deſtruction of the temple. Cyrus entertained a due veneration towards the prophecies reſpecting himſelf; and having ſummoned the principal people among the Jews to Babylon, he informed them, that he would grant paſſports to ſuch of their nation as ſhould be inclined to return to their native country; and that they ſhould be at liberty to rebuild the city and temple of Jeruſalem; adding, that he would command his governors, and other officers on the confines of Judæa, and provide them with gold, ſilver, and other materials for conſtructing the edifice, and likewiſe beaſts for ſacrifice; and he obſerved, that the bleſſing of the Lord would certainly attend the righteous undertaking. The principal people of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, with the prieſts and Levites, immediately departed for Jeruſalem: but many of the Jews determined to remain at Babylon, rather than relinquiſh the poſſeſſions they had obtained in that city*.

Their contributions for ſupporting the work.

When the people who had accepted the propoſal of Cyrus for rebuilding the temple, arrived at Jeruſalem, great contributions were made in gold, ſilver, horſes, and other cattle. Numbers attended the ceremony of oblations, and the ancient forms of religious inſtitutions, with as great punctuality as was obſerved when the city was firſt erected. Cyrus had ſent to

* One reaſon why the bulk of the Jews (who were originally paſtors, and lovers of agriculture) might rather chuſe to live in the country than at Jeruſalem, was, becauſe it was more ſuited to their genius and manner of life: they might alſo be terrified from going thither, on account of the many enemies they ſhould be expoſed to. We do not read that Daniel took the advantage of the edict which Cyrus made in favour of the Jews; and therefore we may ſuppoſe, that as he did not return with them to Jeruſalem, the king might require his continuance with him; and Daniel might rather conſent to it, as having thereby a better opportunity to befriend his countrymen upon any exigence. For this purpoſe, it is highly probable that he attended the Perſian court, which, after the taking and defacing of Babylon, reſided in ſummer at Shuſham, or Suſa, and in winter at Ecbatana.

Jeruſalem the holy veſſels and other utenſils which had been taken from the temple, and conveyed to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar. Mithridates, or Mithradates, the king's treaſurer, being charged to deliver them to the care of Abaſſar, in whoſe poſſeſſion they were to remain till the temple ſhould be compleated, when he was authorized to depoſit them with the prieſts and magiſtrates.

The number of perſons who were releaſed by Cyrus from the captivity in Babylon, and returned to Jeruſalem, was forty-two thouſand four hundred and ſixty-two.

The Jews applied themſelves with the greateſt induſtry to form the foundation of the temple; but they had made no conſiderable progreſs, when application was made by the neighbouring nations, requeſting the princes and governors, who had been appointed to ſuperintend the work, to prevent farther proceedings. The moſt ſtrenuous oppoſers of the intended ſtructure, were the Chuthites, whom, after he had expelled the Jews, Salmanaſſer, king of Aſſyria, led to repeople Samaria. Conſiderable bribes and flattering promiſes prevailed upon the commiſſioners to neglect the execution of the important undertaking: and Cyrus being at this time engaged in the war againſt the Maſſagetes, was entirely unacquainted with the ſuſpenſion of his commands. He at length fell a victim to the rage of war; and the government was aſſumed by his ſon Cambyſes, who, ſoon after his return from the conqueſt of Egypt, died in the city of Damaſcus, after he had reigned ſix years. The government was transferred to the Magi, who held the adminiſtration one year, at the expiration of which period, Darius, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, was advanced to the throne by the ſeven Satrapæ, or the heads of the ſeven principal Perſian families, and the unanimous ſuffrages of the people.

CHAP. II.

An Aſſembly of the JEWS convened by ZERUBBABEL and JESUS the High Prieſts, by whoſe Means the Foundation of the Temple is laid, and Part of the Superſtructure raiſed.

ZERUBBABEL, the leader, and Jeſus, the high prieſt, in the ſeventh month after the Jews had retired from Babylon, iſſued orders for an aſſembly of the people at Jeruſalem. Theſe orders being chearfully complied with, an altar was erected, according to the inſtitution of Moſes, on the ſpot where the altar had ſtood in former times. Hereupon the inhabitants of the neighbouring countries were greatly offended; and indeed they were enemies to the Jews, and inclined to obſtruct all their operations.

About this period, the feaſt of the tabernacles occurred, according to the order of the Moſaical law, and it was followed by the daily oblations, the ſacrifices of the Sabbaths, and the new moons and other ſacred feſtivals. From the firſt day of the ſeventh month people repaired to Jeruſalem in order to diſcharge ſuch vows as they had bound themſelves to perform.

The building was now commenced, and immenſe ſums were expended amongſt the various artificers, and in making the neceſſary proviſions for thoſe who were employed in the conveyance of materials. The Sidonians liberally aſſiſted in the undertaking: they conveyed vaſt numbers of cedar planks from Libanus, and framed a great number of boats, which they removed to the port of Joppa, agreeable to the directions of Cyrus, which Darius had confirmed and ordered to be carried into execution.

The foundation of the temple having been completed in the ſecond month of the ſecond year after the return of the Jews, they began to raiſe the ſuperſtructure on the firſt day of the third month; the direction of the work being entruſted to ſuch of the Levites who were twenty years of age and upwards, Jeſus, the high-prieſt, his ſons and brothers, Zolimiel, and others, who executed their ſeveral commiſſions with ſuch induſtry that a progreſs was made in the undertaking greatly ſuperior to the moſt ſanguine expectations.

The prieſts, habited in ſacerdotal garments, and provided with muſical inſtruments, repaired to the temple, and being joined by the Levites and the ſons of Aſaph, the ſacred hymns of David were ſung, agreeable to the original inſtitution. The prieſts, Levites, and others, who had been witneſſes to the aſtoniſhing magnificence of the former ſtructure, with violent exclamations of ſorrow, lamented the great inferiority of the new temple; but ſuch as were not qualified to judge of the diſproportion were perfectly ſatisfied.

Xerxes, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Darius, was the heir of his father's virtues. He confirmed to the Jews all the favours his predeceſſors had promiſed. At this time Joiakim, the ſon of Jehu, was high-prieſt; but the high-prieſt of the Jews was Eſdras, an inhabitant of Babylon, diſtinguiſhed by his piety, and honoured by the general eſteem. He was an adept in the law of Moſes, which rendered him a particular favourite with the king. Eſdras having reſolved to go to Jeruſalem, and to take with him a number of Babylonian Jews, requeſted the king to grant him a recommendatory letter to the governors of Syria; which favour was obtained, and the moſt happy conſequences enſued.

Eſdras reads the law to the people.

The feaſt of tabernacles having commenced, and the people being aſſembled in the eaſtern part of the temple, Eſdras, at their deſire, ſtood in the midſt of them, and read the law of God: which ſervice continued from morning till noon, to the great inſtruction of the audience, who learnt the laws of truth and uprightneſs*, and

* Ezra was not only famous for writing, but for explaining the things contained in the ſcriptures: for as ſepher ſignifies a book, ſo ſopher denotes one ſkilled and learned in that book; and as there was no book comparable to the book of the law, therefore, ſepher became a name of great dignity, and ſignified one that taught God's law, and inſtructed the people out of it; ſuch was Ezra, who is called ſophan mahir, a ready ſcribe, Ezra vii. 6.

were taught to reflect on the fate of their forefathers, in conſequence of the violation of thoſe laws, the obſervance of which would have enſured their happineſs. This reflection melted them into tears, which Eſdras obſerving, bade them go home and make themſelves eaſy: obſerving that the feſtival was rather profaned by their grief. He adviſed that they ſhould eat, drink, and rejoice, and regard the feſtival no farther than as it might prevent their being again guilty of their former error. They took his advice, and having ſpent eight days in feaſting, every man returned home, with acknowledgements to Eſdras for the reformation he had occaſioned. The hearts of the people of Iſrael were won by the conduct of Eſdras, who lived honourably: died at a great age, in Jeruſalem, and was interred in a moſt pompous manner. Nearly at the ſame time died Joiakim, the high-prieſt, who was ſucceeded by his ſon, Eliaſhib.

Nehemiah's meaſures for peopling the city.

The fortifications being compleated, Nehemiah and the people offered ſacrifice, and made a feaſt of eight days, which greatly chagrined the Syrians. Nehemiah conſidering that the city was but thinly inhabited, prevailed on the prieſts and Levites to reſide therein, promiſing to provide them houſes at his own expence. He alſo directed that the huſbandmen ſhould carry their tithes into the city for the ſupport of the prieſts and Levites, the duty of whoſe offices ought not to be interrupted by worldly cares. Theſe directions were readily obeyed, and the city ſoon became more populous. Theſe things happened in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of Xerxes. After many worthy actions, Nehemiah died in a good old age: and he will be ever remembered with gratitude, for his goodneſs in the reparation of the walls of Jeruſalem.

CHAP. III.

ARTAXERXES diſmiſſes his Wife VASHTI, and marries ESTHER, MORDECAI'S Neice. HAMAN adviſes the Deſtruction of the JEWS, and that MORDECAI be put to Death. HAMAN hanged on the Gibbet provided for MORDECAI, and the latter advanced.

Deſcription of the great feaſt of Artaxerxes.

ON the death of Xerxes, his ſon Artaxerxes ſucceeded to the government of the Perſians, and no ſooner commenced his reign, than he appointed governors over one hundred and twenty-ſeven provinces between Ethiopia and India. In his third year he ordered a grand entertainment at Suſa, at which his friends and great officers were entertained for one hundred and eighty days. The embaſſadors of other nations attended this entertainment for ſeven days, and the feaſt was conducted in the following manner. A tent was erected on pillars of gold and ſilver, covered with purple and fine linen, large enough to contain ſome thouſands of people. The wine was ſerved in veſſels of gold and ſilver, adorned with ſtones of great value. The attendants were directed (as uſual among the Perſians) that no one ſhould be compelled to drink more than he choſe; and proclamation was made, that a certain number of days ſhould be appointed as a feſtival for the general welfare of the kingdom. Vaſhti the queen had a ſeparate apartment where ſhe entertained her women. Her beauty was ſo great, that the king ſent for her, that his company might ſee her; but in obedience to the rigid laws of Perſia, (where a woman only ſees her domeſtics) ſhe refuſed to attend: the eunuchs were repeatedly ſent to ſummon her, but ſhe ſtill perſiſted in her refuſal. This ſo incenſed the king, that, when the feaſt was ended, he adviſed with the ſeven commiſſioners appointed to interpret the laws of Perſia, how he ſhould act in this caſe of his wife's refuſal. Mechæus, one of the commiſſioners, ſaid that the offence was not ſimply againſt the king, but of dangerous precedent to his ſubjects, whoſe wives might be taught diſobedience to their huſbands, if the queen's preſumption ſhould go unpuniſhed; wherefore he adviſed that the king ſhould iſſue a proclamation, importing that he had baniſhed Vaſhti for ever from his court and preſence, and would take another wife in her ſtead. The king's love for the queen pleaded ſo powerfully for his living with her, and the laws ſo much to the contrary, that he knew not how to act. While he was almoſt diſtracted with his own thoughts, his friends adviſed him to conſider the unreaſonableneſs of his attachment to one woman, when he had only to chuſe among the whole ſex, and fix on that wife who ſhould be moſt agreeable to him. They urged that the former wife would ſoon be forgotten, in the charms and converſation of a new one.

Vaſhti puniſhed for her imprudent conduct.

The advancement of Eſther.

In conſequence of this advice, perſons were deputed to ſearch through the king's dominions for ſome diſtinguiſhed beauty; and at length they found at Babylon a maid named Eſther, the elegance and grace of whoſe perſon rendered her the object of univerſal admiration. Her parents being dead, ſhe had been educated in the houſe of her uncle Mordecai, a man of great diſtinction, of the tribe of Benjamin. Eſther being committed to the care of the king's eunuchs, was attended with great reſpect, and furniſhed with perfumes, eſſences, and ſuch other things as ladies uſe, to improve their charms. She thus continued with four hundred other virgins, for ſix months, at the end of which the king received them alternately to his bed; but when Eſther's turn came, her converſation and behaviour ſo charmed the king, that he reſolved to marry her, and accordingly celebrated his nuptials in the month Adar, being the twelfth month of the ſeventh year of his reign. He diſpatched meſſengers to proclaim the marriage feaſt, which laſted a month, at which the king entertained the principal men of the Medes, Perſians, and other nations. When the queen entered the palace, the king put the crown on her head and thenceforward lived with her without inquiring reſpecting her country. In the mean time her uncle Mordecai removed to Suſa, and often enquired at the palace for the welfare of Eſther, whom he loved as tenderly as if he had been her father.

About this time the king iſſued orders, that when he ſhould ſit on the throne, no perſons ſhould approach him without being commanded to attend, on the forfeiture of their heads; and the officers attended with axes, to execute ſuch as diſobeyed *. But the king held in his hand a golden ſceptre, which he extended when he choſe to ſave ſuch as diſobeyed the order: and their touching this ſceptre, ſealed their pardon.

Mordecai diſcovers a conſpiracy againſt the king.

Bigthan and Tereſh, two of the eunuchs of the chamber, now plotted the deſtruction of the king; but Barnabaſus, a Jew by deſcent, who was ſervant to one of them, told Mordecai of the affair, who made it known to the king, by the means of Eſther; on which the conſpirators were ſeized, convicted, and executed. For this ſervice Mordecai was admitted a domeſtic in the palace, and the circumſtance was entered on record to his honour.

Haman, being promoted, is a great enemy to the Jews.

The king promoted Haman, the ſon of Hammedatha, an Amalekite, who was often at court, where agreeable to the king's pleaſure, both Perſians and ſtrangers paid him great homage. Mordecai alone bowed not to him, ſuch obedience being againſt the cuſtom of his country. This being remarked by Haman, he enquired who he was; and learning that he was a Jew, exclaimed at his inſolence in affronting him to whom the natives paid ſuch reſpect. Haman now conceived a ſcheme of revenge, not only againſt Mordecai, but the Jews in general, remembering that theſe people had formerly beaten his countrymen, the Amalekites, and driven them out of their land. Hereupon Haman repaired to the king, hinting that the Jews were a vile race, of bad tempers, diſagreeable manners, and ſuperſtitious in their ceremonies; who lurked about his dominions, and appeared to be the enemies of mankind by their general behaviour. He then beſought the king to oblige him in the higheſt degree, by ordering the utter extirpation of theſe people: "And (ſaid he) that your revenue may not ſuffer hereby, I will, out of my own eſtate, pay into your treaſury forty thouſand talents of ſilver; for I ſhall be happy in the loſs of part of my private fortune, ſo that theſe abandoned people are but rooted out of your dominions." In anſwer hereto, the king refuſed to take Haman's money, but bid him deal with the Jews as he thought proper; whereupon the latter gave orders for publiſhing throughout the king's dominions the following edict:

"ARTAXERXES the great King, to the one hundred and twenty-ſeven Governors of the Provinces of INDIA and ETHIOPIA, greeting.

Cruel edict for deſtroying the Jews.

"Foraſmuch as God hath given me the ſupreme rule over numerous nations, and as much command over the reſt of the world, as gratifieth my higheſt ambition: I am diſpoſed, therefore, not to tyranniſe over my ſubjects, but to rule them with a gentle hand, to ſecure them in peace and freedom, and to ſettle their tranquillity on a firm baſis. Theſe things I have maturely conſidered; and being informed by Haman, my favourite friend and counſellor, on whoſe allegiance, diſcretion and juſtice, I can depend, and who ſtands firſt in my eſteem, that a barbarous people have intermixed with my ſubjects, who preſume to govern themſelves by their own laws, and preſcribe a rule of conduct contrary to good order and ſubjection: a people, who in their manners and behaviour hold our monarchy and adminiſtration in defiance: you are therefore hereby commanded, that when Haman (whom you are to deem as a father,) ſhall give notice who are meant by this proclamation, that, in purſuance of this decree, you put all the ſaid people to the ſword, men, women, and children, without diſtinction: and I farther enjoin, that this be executed on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month of the preſent year; that one day may compleat the deſtruction of your enemies and mine, and our lives be ſpent in peace and ſecurity."

This order was ſoon circulated through all the towns of the empire, and the people prepared to deſtroy the Jews on the fixed day: nor was the diſpoſition at Suſa leſs violent againſt them, than in other places. In the interim, the king and Haman ſpent their time in feaſting and drinking; but the people of reflection were ſhocked at the approaching maſſacre.

Mordecai's lamentation, and injunction to Eſther to patroniſe them.

Mordecai no ſooner learnt the purport of the proclamation, than he rent his cloaths, covered himſelf with ſackcloth, threw aſhes on his head, and went through the city, proteſting againſt the deed; but ſtopped at the gate of the palace, which no man durſt enter in ſuch a dreſs: in all other places the Jews were likewiſe abandoned to grief. The queen learning that Mordecai was at the palace-gate in ſuch a habit, ſent and begged that he would change his dreſs: but he replied that he would not, till the cauſe of it was removed. The queen ſent Hatach, one of the king's eunuchs, to learn Mordecai's reaſon for ſuch an appearance; on which he told him the particulars of the king's order for the deſtruction of the Jews; and what a ſum of money Haman had offered for the grant. He gave Hatach a copy of the original order, to communicate to the queen; and begged his intereſt with the king to ſpare the lives of a whole people; entreating him not to heſitate, for Haman was perpetually traducing the Jews to the king, and would certainly ſucceed if not counteracted. The eunuch told this to the queen, who ſent word to Mordecai, that to interrupt the king on his throne, without orders to attend, was an offence puniſhable with loſs of life, except the king granted pardon by extending his ſceptre. Mordecai now urged the meſſenger to remind the queen, that not her perſonal ſafety only, but that of a whole people was to be regarded; cautioning her not to omit ſo charitable an office; and hinting that if ſhe did, Providence would preſerve the Jews, and ſhe and her family might hereafter lie at their mercy*. Eſther now directed the eunuch to tell her uncle that he ſhould aſſemble the Jews at Suſa, and order a faſt of three days for the queen's ſafety; ſaying, that herſelf and attendants would obſerve the ſame, and at the end of that time ſhe would go to the king at the hazard of her life. The queen's orders were obeyed by Mordecai, who faſted and humbled himſelf, beſeeching God to extend his mercy to penitent ſinners, and turn away the malice of their enemies; for that not their own crimes, but the pride of Haman, who expected ſuch adoration as was due only to God, had reduced them to that diſtreſs; by which a nation who refuſed to violate the divine laws, was to be rooted out. The Iſraelites prayed to the ſame purpoſe, beſeeching God to avert his judgments. The queen wore a mourning veil, according to the cuſtom of her country, proſtrated herſelf on the ground, and abſtained from food and all refreſhments for three days; and implored God to incline the king's heart in her favour, to render her perſon and words more acceptable than ever in his ſight, that their enemies might be confounded, and her unhappy countrymen eſcape the ſnare that had been laid for them.

* For the preſervation of royal dignity, it was enacted, in the reign of Darius king of Media, that no perſon ſhould be admitted into the kings's preſence; but that, if he had any buſineſs with him, he ſhould tranſact it by the intercourſe of his miniſters. This cuſtom paſſed from the Medes to the Perſians, though the reaſon of the law, at firſt, was not only to ſecure the king's perſon, but alſo to ſupport the power of ſome great officers of ſtate, by having only the privilege of ſpeaking to the king themſelves, and ſuch as they thought proper to introduce.

Eſther intercedes with the king in behalf of the Jews.

Three days being thus ſpent in humiliation, the queen dreſſed herſelf in her royal attire, took with her two handmaids, and advanced to the king, leaning on one, while the other bore her train. Dignity, elegance, and concern, were mingled in her appearance. The king was ſeated on his throne, moſt ſuperbly dreſſed in the royal robes, adorned with precious ſtones, gold, and pearl. The queen trembled at the grandeur of the ſight; and fanſying that the king looked diſpleaſed, fainted in the arms of one of her attendants. The king, ſhocked at this accident, deſcended from the throne, catched her in his arms, and aſſured her that, though ſhe came unſent for, no puniſhment ſhould follow, as the law was intended to reſtrain the ſubjects, and had no reference to her, who was his partner in the ſovereign authority. Thus ſaying, he laid the ſceptre lightly on her neck, and gave it into her hands; which diſſipated all her fears. Having recovered the uſe of ſpeech, ſhe ſaid ſhe could not account for her ſudden illneſs, but that her heart failed on the ſplendid appearance of the king. Theſe words were ſpoken in ſuch a weak and languiſhing tone, that the king, impreſſed by the idea of what ſhe ſuffered, ſaid, he would grant any thing, even to the half of his kingdom, to her petition. Eſther only begged he would that day bring Haman with him, and accept of a treat ſhe had provided. They both went, and when elevated with liquor, the king bade her only name her requeſt, and it ſhould be complied with: on which ſhe ſolicited, that he and Haman would attend her the following day, when ſhe would prefer her petition. This pleaſed the king, and enraptured Haman, who was not a little proud of this eminent diſtinction. In his way home, he met Mordecai in the palace, who paid him no reſpect; on which he went to his wife Zereſh, and ſeveral of his friends, whom he informed on what terms he was with the king and queen, with whom he had ſupped, and received a ſimilar invitation for the following day: "but yet (ſaid he) the inſolence of Mordecai chagrins me." Zereſh adviſed him to erect a gallows fifty cubits high, and obtain the king's permiſſion to hang Mordecai on it in the morning. He took her advice, and the gallows was put up within his own palace. But the providence of God defeated the hopes of Haman; for the king being unable to ſleep that night, aroſe, and ordered his ſecretary to bring him a number of ſtate papers for his peruſal. On reading them, the king found that great honours and riches had been beſtowed on one man for his valour; that the fidelity of a ſecond to his prince had made his fortune: at length, he came to the account of the conſpiracy of the eunuchs, Bigthan and Tereſh, of which Mordecai had made diſcovery. The king bade the ſecretary ſtop here, and aſked him if the party had been rewarded for his ſervices; to which the other ſaid, that no reward was mentioned in that account. The ſecretary was now ordered to enquire the hour; and bringing word that it was day-break, the king bade him ſee if any of his friends were at the gate of the palace. He there found Haman, with his petition againſt the life of Mordecai. The king being told that Haman waited, ordered him in, and ſaid, "As I eſteem you my beſt friend, I wiſh for your advice: but what honours, conſiſtent with my own dignity, and my affection for the party, ſhall I beſtow on the man who has conferred the greateſt obligation on me?" Haman, thinking this queſtion related to himſelf, ſaid, that the man thus to be diſtinguiſhed ſhould be cloathed in the royal apparel, be preſented with a chain of gold, and being mounted on the king's own horſe, his majeſty ſhould direct one of his confident friends to march before him through the city, and proclaim, "Thus ſhall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour." The king appearing pleaſed with this propoſal, ſaid, "Do you take the horſe, apparel, and golden chain, and having found Mordecai the Jew, dreſs him, ſee him mounted, and walk before him as the herald; for you, being my moſt worthy friend, are the moſt proper perſon to execute what you have adviſed. This honour ſhall be done to Mordecai, becauſe I owe my life to his zeal." Haman was confounded at this order, but obliged to comply; wherefore he took the horſe, the royal apparel, and chain of gold, and went in ſearch of Mordecai, whom he found cloathed in ſackcloth at the gate of the palace, and deſired him to put on the purple robes. Mordecai, ignorant of what had paſſed, thought Haman intended to ridicule him, and therefore treated him as one who meant to inſult the unfortunate. The matter being explained, Mordecai was convinced that the king intended him this honour, in reward of his preventing the effects of the eunuchs' conſpiracy; whereupon he put on the robes, inveſted him with the chain, and, getting on the horſe, rode through the city: Haman preceding him with this proclamation: "Thus ſhall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour." This ceremony being ended, Mordecai repaired to the king, while Haman went home dejected, and informed his wife and friends of what had happened: on hearing whereof they were convinced that they could not wreak their vengeance on Mordecai, who appeared to be protected by heaven.

Haman commanded to do honour to Mordecai.

During their converſation, ſome eunuchs came from the queen to ſummon Haman to ſupper: Sabuchadas, one of the eunuchs, ſeeing a gibbet in the court-yard, inquired who it was intended for; and being told for Mordecai, the queen's uncle, he ſaid no more. While they were at ſupper, the king again deſired the queen to make her demand, and it ſhould not be refuſed. On this ſhe recited the imminent danger of the Jews; lamented that herſelf and countrymen were devoted to deſtruction, and ſaid, that was the ſubject on which ſhe wiſhed to ſpeak to the king. She was unwilling to interrupt buſineſs of ſtate, and thought that if her countrymen had been only doomed to ſlavery, the ſentence might have been ſubmitted to; but ſhe implored his majeſty to put a ſtop to their total deſtruction. The king immediately aſked who had a deſign to deſtroy them? to which the queen anſwered that, in mere malice, Haman had given ſuch advice. The king being hurt by this diſcourſe, retired to the garden: and in the mean time, Haman, who ſaw the gathering ſtorm, beſought the queen's pardon for his errors, and threw himſelf on the bed by her, in a poſture of humiliation*. At this inſtant the king returned, and obſerving Haman in this ſituation, reproached him as a villain for attempting the honour of the queen; accompanying what he ſaid with ſuch violent action, that Haman was at a loſs to reply. Sabuchadas, the eunuch above-mentioned, now told the king of the gibbet erected in Haman's court, for the execution of Mordecai: hereupon the king gave orders that Haman ſhould be hanged on the very gibbet he had prepared for the other. Thus wonderful was the wiſdom of Providence, in bringing Haman to the very puniſhment he had deſigned for another.

The king highly incenſed at Haman.

Haman being executed, his eſtate was given to the queen, who had by this time informed the king of her affinity to Mordecai; on which the king ſent for him, and gave him the ring which had been heretofore entruſted with Haman, and the queen beſtowed on him the eſtates of the delinquent. She next reminded the king of the letters Haman had diſpatched through the empire; and begged that he would eaſe the Jews of their apprehenſions, ſaying that her own life was involved in the ſafety of her friends. The king aſſured her that nothing ſhould happen to the Jews without her conſent; and permitted her to write to them in his name, and the letters ſhould be delivered throughout his dominions, ſealed with the royal ſignet, which would give them ſufficient validity.

Execution of Haman.

Perſons were immediately diſpatched with the royal proclamation in favour of the Jews. In the mean time, Mordecai, coming out of the palace, dreſſed in the royal robe, gown and chain, the Jews triumphed in this circumſtance as a prelude to their happineſs; and the joy was extreme wherever the king's letters were publiſhed. People of other nations were likewiſe ſo affected, that many of them were circumciſed in order to eſcape as Jews. On receiving this letter, the princes, magiſtrates, and governors, dreading the reſentment of Mordecai, paid more than uſual reſpect to the Jews.

The publication of the edict cauſed the Jews of Suſa to deſtroy five hundred of their enemies; and the king informing the queen hereof, aſked her if ſhe had any thing farther to demand, for he ſhould not refuſe her requeſt. She begged that Haman's ten ſons might be hanged on the gibbet †, and that the Jews might be allowed one

Effects of the reſcindatory mandate.

* It is the univerſal cuſtom of the eaſtern nations to recline on a couch while they eat their meals; and while the queen was in this poſture, Haman proſtrated himſelf before her. It muſt be merely a pretence of Artaxerxes, to charge Haman with any indecent deſign, ſince all other circumſtances militated too much againſt him to admit of it, and conſequently prevented his forming any other project than that which tended to the preſervation of his life, which he now apprehended to be in danger.

one other day of revenge. This being granted, they assembled on the following day, and killed near three hundred more at Susa; and it was judged that seventy-five thousand more were destroyed throughout the empire. The slaughter at Susa was on the thirteenth; that in the country on the fourteenth of the twelfth month; which days are still celebrated as festivals among the Jews, agreeable to an order of Mordecai, for a perpetual remembrance to posterity, that the days intended for their destruction proved those of their deliverance: and these days are now called Purim, or feasts of Preservation*. Mordecai continued in great credit with the king and queen, and so directed public affairs, that the Jews flourished wonderfully during his administration.

CHAP. IV.

ELIASHIB, the High-Priest, succeeded by JUDAS. JESUS slain in the Temple, by his Brother JOHN. MANASSEH, Brother of JADDUS, the High-Priest, married to SANBALLAT's Daughter, NICASA.

Outrages committed by John, in the temple.

THE high-priest, Eliashib, being dead, was succeeded by his son Judas, and he, by his son John. This John caused the temple to be profaned by Bagoses, commander of Artaxerxes' troops, levying a fine on the Jews of fifty drachmas daily, for each lamb they sacrificed, to be paid before the offerings commenced. The cause of this fine was as follows. The brother of John was named Jesus, and Bagoses being his intimate friend, fought to elevate him to the priesthood. Jesus, presuming upon this distinction, quarrelled with his brother in the temple, and the latter, much enraged, attacked and killed him: a circumstance so dishonourable to religion, that heaven would not permit it to remain unpunished. The consequence was, that the Jews lost their liberty, and the temple was profaned by the Persians: for no sooner had Bagoses heard that the high-priest had slain his brother in the temple, than he exclaimed, in contempt of the Jews, "Abominable people! to turn your house of worship into a slaughter-house!" He now crouded to get into the temple, but some persons opposing him, he said, "Conceive you that my living body is more offensive than the dead within this place?" And thus saying, he forced his way. From this period his conduct over the Jews was very rigid, for about seven years: but John dying, was succeeded in the priesthood by his son Jaddus. Now Jaddus having a brother named Manasseh; and Sanballat considering how great a city Jerusalem was, and that the Syrians and Assyrians had been frequently routed by the kings thereof, gave his daughter Nicasa in marriage to Manasseh, as a testimony of the friendship which he intended to maintain with the Jews. This Sanballat was a Chuthite, and from him the Samaritans derive their origin; he having governed Samaria, under the last king, Darius.

Alexander the Great succeeds his father Philip.

Pausanias having about this time murdered Philip, king of Macedon, that prince was succeeded by his son Alexander, who passing the Hellespont, gained a great victory over the army of Darius, by the river Granicus. He then reduced Lydia and Ionia, marched through Caria, and arrived in the country of Pamphylia. On the other hand, the Persian monarch, receiving intelligence of Alexander's successes, and subsequent operations, assembled his forces, resolving to give battle to the Macedonians, and prevent their ravaging Asia, as they had proposed. Having passed the Euphrates, he disposed himself to battle on the other side mount Taurus, in Cilicia. Sanballat, pleased with this march of Darius, told known. The names of the sons of Haman make the 7th, 8th, and 9th verses of the 9th chapter of Esther; by which division of the names in a perpendicular course of verses, it is easy for the reader to consider them as divided into three columns, or as hanging upon three strings; three upon a string, one above another. The names in the Hebrew copies are much more exactly ranged for this way of considering them; particularly in the parchment copy for the service on this feast. The intention of which ranging or division, is to signify, that Haman's sons were hanged one above another in one perpendicular line.

* The day before the opening of the feast, the Jews observe as a fast, because on that day, say they, their fathers did so when they were threatened with the danger above-mentioned, and were assembled for their common defence. The two following days are Bacchanalian, or days of high feasting and mirth, particularly of high drinking. The Chassan reads the whole book of Esther, without pause or hesitation: it is kept for this service, fairly written on a large skin of parchment rolled on a cylinder of wood. Both sexes of all ages and conditions (except very young children) are enjoined, for the better preservation of the remembrance of the matters now commemorated, to read or assist at the reading of that whole book. When the parchment is unfolded, the Chassan says, "Blessed be God, the King of the world, who hath sanctified us, and commanded us to read the Magilla" (a Talmud treatise so called, which treats of the feast of Purim.) "Blessed be God, who in those days, at this time (so runs the Hebrew) wrought miracles for our fathers." As often as, in the course of the reading, he names Haman, the auditory says, "Let his name be blotted out; may the name of the wicked rot!" The boys, at the same time, clench their fists and strike them together, and hissing at the name of Haman, make a great and clamorous noise. The names of the ten sons of that proud Persian are read with one and the same breath, because, say the Jews, they were all hanged, and all expired, at the same moment of time.

When the Chassan has finished the reading, every one says, "Cursed be Haman; blessed be Mordecai; cursed be Zeresh (the wife of Haman); but blessed be Esther; Cursed be all idolaters; but blessed be all the Israelites; and blessed likewise be Harboneh (one of the king's chamberlains), by whose hands Haman was hanged."

On this feast, they send presents to one another (the men to men, and women to women); and give to the poor. And, for the promotion of mirth, men put on the apparel of women, and women put on the apparel of men. This is forbidden in the law of Moses: but the Jews say, 'tis no sin on this occasion, because it is done only to heighten the festivity.

Manasseh,

Manaſſeh, that on the king's return he would ratify all his promiſes; as he had no doubt, but the Macedonians would be routed on the firſt encounter. In this, however, he was miſtaken; for Darius was defeated, his army being chiefly cut off, his mother, wife, and children made captives, and he obliged to ſave himſelf by a precipitate flight. In the mean time, Alexander marched into Syria, made capture of Sidon and Damaſcus, and beſieged Tyre. He now wrote to the high-prieſt of the Jews, claiming the aſſiſtance heretofore given to Darius, and demanding that his army might be ſupplied with neceſſaries, which ſhould be paid for punctually. The high-prieſt returned a ſhort anſwer, intimating that they had ſworn not to bear arms againſt Darius, during their lives. This anſwer enraged Alexander, who, however, proceeded in his attack of Tyre, but vowed that, when he had conquered it, he would attack the high-prieſt, and teach his people not to violate their oaths. Alexander ſoon conquered Tyre, and then proceeded to reduce the Perſian government at Gaza.

Sanballat revolts from Darius to Alexander, who permits him to build a temple at Gerizim.

Sanballat, finding that Alexander lay before Tyre, repaired to him with eight thouſand men, thus abandoning his faith to Darius. Alexander received him graciouſly, and bid him ſpeak freely; on which he ſaid that his ſon-in-law, Manaſſeh, brother to Jaddus, high-prieſt of the Jews, was following him with a great concourſe of people, who requeſted leave to erect a temple in that province. Sanballat intimated likewiſe how much Alexander's intereſt was concerned in this permiſſion, as the Jews, who were very numerous, might be as troubleſome to him, as they had heretofore been to the Syrians. The requeſt was granted, and they began to build the temple, of which Manaſſeh was to be the high-prieſt, and his deſcendents, by Sanballat's daughter, to ſucceed to that honour. At the end of nine months, Sanballat died, and Alexander having made a conqueſt of Gaza, proceeded towards Jeruſalem. Jaddus the high-prieſt was now confounded to think how he ſhould behave to a prince whoſe former commands he had diſobeyed: on which he ordered prayers and ſacrifices for the general proſperity of the people. On the following night it was revealed to Jaddus in a dream, that he ſhould adorn the city with garlands and flowers, open the gates, and let the people, dreſſed in white, go out to meet Alexander; himſelf and the other prieſts preceding, in their proper habits. In the morning, Jaddus, highly rejoiced, told the citizens what had been revealed, and proceeded to make the neceſſary preparations for meeting the king. Learning that he approached, Jaddus, with the prieſts and people, went on to a place called Sapha, (or the place of proſpect) from its commanding a view of the city and temple. The Chaldæans and Phœnicians thought to deſtroy and plunder the high-prieſt and people; but it happened otherwiſe: for Alexander, ſeeing the people walking in white, the prieſts in ſilk robes, and the high prieſt in purple, embroidered with gold, wearing his mitre, and having on his forehead a golden plate, with the name of God on it, advanced alone, paid homage to the inſcription, and complimented the high-prieſt*. Hereupon the Jews gathered in crouds, and proclaimed the praiſe of Alexander. This behaviour aſtoniſhed the kings of Perſia and others; and Parmenio aſked Alexander how it happened that he, whom almoſt every man worſhipped, ſhould bow to a prieſt of the Jews. Alexander replied, "I worſhip not this man; but his God. Some time ſince I ſaw this very perſon, in the ſame habit, at Dion, in Macedonia. I was debating how to conquer Aſia, when he bade me conduct my army over the river, and I ſhould ſubdue the empire of Perſia. On ſeeing him in this habit, the idea of my dream recurs, and I am ſure this is the perſon who encouraged me to this expedition: thus convinced of the divine interpoſition, I have no doubt of ſucceſs againſt the Perſians." Having ſaid this, the king ſaluted Jaddus, and the other prieſts eſcorting him into the city, he advanced to the temple, and offered ſacrifice. Alexander paid great reſpect to the high-prieſt, who, on the concluſion of the ceremony, ſhewed him a prophecy of Daniel, which predicted that in future time, a Greek ſhould conquer the empire of Perſia. Alexander preſuming that this meant himſelf, was highly gratified, and diſcharged the people till the following day, when they were to make known what they deſired he ſhould do for them: On their meeting, the high-prieſt ſaid, they wiſhed to enjoy their own laws, to be freed from a tribute paid once in ſeven years; and to poſſeſs the ſame privileges as the Jews of Media and Babylon; all which Alexander granted, and ſaid farther, that if any of them choſe to enliſt in his army, they ſhould have the free exerciſe of their religion; on which many of them engaged in his ſervice.

Jaddus meets Alexander, by whom he is graciouſly received.

Alexander having adjuſted affairs at Jeruſalem, proceeded to different places, and was well received in them all. The city of Sichem, near the mount Gerizim, was at this time the chief reſidence of the Samaritans, who retained their own diſpoſition of being friends to the Jews in proſperity. Alexander was met by the Sichemites (accompanied by the troops Sanballat had ſent), who, with apparent joy, begged he would honour their city and temple with a viſit. The king ſpoke kindly to them, and promiſed a viſit on his return, They then aſked a remittance of the ſeventh year's tribute. Alexander demanded of what nation they were; they anſwered Hebrews, but the Sidonians called them Sichemites.

The Samaritans of Sichem apply to Alexander, for exemption from tribute.

* This account does not materially differ from that given by Stackhouſe, who relates, that Jaddus went out in his pontifical robes, with the prieſts attending him in their proper habits, and, upon an eminence, waited the coming of Alexander; whom ſeeing at ſome diſtance, he moved towards him in this ſolemn pomp; which ſtruck the king with ſuch an awe, that, as he drew near, he bowed down to him, and ſaluted him with a religious veneration, to the great ſurprize of all who attended him.

They

The conſideration of their requeſt poſtponed.

They were then aſked if they were Jews; but they anſwered in the negative; upon which Alexander ſaid, "The favour you aſk I have granted to the Jews; and when I return, and am better informed, I ſhall indulge you in what may be thought reaſonable." Saying this, the king diſmiſſed the Sichemites; but took Sanballat's troops with him to Egypt, where they had lands allotted them; but they were afterwards placed in garriſon in Thebes, where they had the ſame indulgence.

Death of Alexander and Jaddus.

Alexander dying, his empire was divided among his ſucceſſors. The temple of Gerizim remained untouched. When the Jews at Jeruſalem violated their laws, by a breach of the ſabbath, or eating meats that were forbidden, they uſed to take ſanctuary with the Sichemites, pretending that they were falſely accuſed. Jaddus, the high-prieſt, died at this period, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Onias.

CHAP. I.

The MACEDONIAN Empire divided into Principalities, after the Deceaſe of ALEXANDER. PTOLEMY obtains Poſſeſſion of JERUSALEM.

Partition of the Macedonian empire.

ALEXANDER died, after having obtained an intire conqueſt over the Perſian empire, and eſtabliſhed divers regulations in Jeruſalem, as we have already mentioned; and his kingdom was divided among the chiefs of his army. Antigonus aſſumed the command of Aſia; Seleucus, that of Babylon and the bordering countries; the Helleſpont was under Lyſimachus; Caſſander reigned over Macedon; and Ptolemy, the ſon of Lagus, over Egypt. Theſe princes ſeverally aimed at univerſal ſovereignty, and the conſequence was a war of long duration, in the courſe of which great numbers of people were ſacrificed, and many capital cities utterly deſtroyed. The country of Syria was particularly affected by theſe contentions, during the reign of Ptolemy, who was called the ſaviour: but no man leſs deſerved that honourable diſtinction*.

Ptolemy gets poſſeſſion of Jeruſalem by treachery, and takes many of the Jews priſoners.

This Ptolemy, under the pretext of a religious motive, obtained admittance to the city of Jeruſalem on the ſabbath, and gained poſſeſſion of the place, without oppoſition, the Jews being prohibited the uſe of arms on that ſacred day. In his hiſtory of the ſucceſſors of Alexander, Agatharchides, the Cnidian, ſays, "The people called Jews, inhabiting the ſtrongly fortified and populous city of Jeruſalem, ſubmitted to the intolerable oppreſſion of Ptolemy, from a ſuperſtitious regard to their ſabbath, by which they were with-held from taking up arms to repulſe the invader." Ptolemy made captives of a great number of Jews from Jeruſalem, Samaria, and mount Gerizim, and tranſplanted them into Egypt. The anſwer of the Jews to Alexander, after he had vanquiſhed Darius, convinced Ptolemy that they were a people who paid a ſacred obſervance to an oath; and on this conſideration, having firſt ſworn them to fidelity to himſelf and his ſucceſſors, he entruſted them to defend ſeveral places of ſtrength, appointed them to offices of conſiderable truſt, and admitted them to the ſame privileges in Alexandria which were enjoyed by the Macedonians. The liberality of Ptolemy, and the fertility of the country, induced great numbers of Jews to repair to Egypt. The ancient laws and cuſtoms were a continual ſource of diſſenſions among the Jews and Samaritans; the former declaring the temple at Jeruſalem to be the only holy place, and the others as poſitively inſiſting in favour of the temple at Gerizim: and in theſe conteſts many lives were loſt.

The captive Jews reſtored to freedom.

Philadelphus ſucceeded his father Ptolemy (who was called the ſaviour) in the government of Egypt. On the following

* Ptolemy was a man intirely given up to his luſts and voluptuous delights. Drinking, gaming, and laſciviouſneſs, were the whole employments of his life. Agathoclea his concubine, and Agathocles his brother (who was his catamite) governed him abſolutely; and when Arſinoe (who was both his ſiſter and wife) complained of the neglect which, by means of theſe two favourites, was put upon her, this ſo offended the king and his catamite, that orders were given to have her put to death: but he did not long ſurvive her; for, having worn out a ſtrong conſtitution by his intemperance and debaucheries, he ended his life before he had lived out half the ordinary term allotted to man.

occaſion he reſtored to freedom one hundred and twenty thouſand Jews who were captives in Egypt. Demetrius Phalereus, who was appointed to the care of the royal library, with remarkable induſtry laboured to procure all the books which were deſerving a place in the king's ſtudy. Being aſked by Philadelphus how many books he had collected, Demetrius replied, that the number amounted to two hundred thouſand volumes, which he hoped ſoon to increaſe to five hundred thouſand, having learnt that the Jews poſſeſſed a vaſt number of manuſcripts on the ſubject of their laws, ceremonies and cuſtoms, which would prove a valuable acquiſition to the royal library; he obſerved, that though the characters and language of the Hebrews bore ſome affinity to the Greek, yet there were many niceties peculiar to each tongue, which would contribute to render the tranſlation a work of difficulty, but that it might notwithſtanding be accompliſhed if the king ſhould judge it expedient to incur the expence of the undertaking. Philadelphus expreſſed an entire approbation of what had been intimated by his librarian: and diſpatched a letter to the high-prieſt of the Jews, requeſting his aſſiſtance towards the intended acquiſition. Ariſtæus, whoſe wiſdom and modeſty had obtained him a diſtinguiſhed place in the king's eſteem, had long cheriſhed the hope of reſtoring the Jews to freedom; and determining to avail himſelf of the favourable opportunity which now offered, he applied to Soſibius, Tarantinus, and Andræus, captains of the guards, entreating them to join their intereſts for effecting the deſired purpoſe. Having received their promiſe of aſſiſtance, he thus addreſſed the king:

Ptolemy Philadelphus orders a tranſlation of the Jewiſh laws to be made into Greek, by ſeventy-two elders.

"Your majeſty having been pleaſed to ſignify a deſire of having a tranſlation of the laws of the Jews, I humbly apprehend that the buſineſs cannot be fairly executed while ſo many of the people from whom you expect aſſiſtance remain in bondage. To relieve their diſtreſs is an act worthy your exalted ſtation and character, ſince we all worſhip the Almighty God under the ſeveral names of Jove, Jupiter, à Juvando. From a veneration of the univerſal Creator, you may be inclined to reſtore the miſerable captives to the land aſſigned them by Providence. I do not preſume to eſpouſe the cauſe of theſe people on account of a family alliance, but entirely on the conſideration that we are the ſervants of the ſame God, to whom the ſolicited clemency will prove highly acceptable."

The king's great liberality on behalf of the Jews.

The king inquired of Ariſtæus what number of Jews were in bondage; and he was informed by Andræus, that they amounted to about one hundred and twenty thouſand: upon this, the king aſked Ariſtæus whether he thought he had requeſted a moderate favour. It was obſerved by Soſibius, and others, that compaſſion towards the miſerable was worthy the royal character, in gratitude for having been advanced to the ſovereignty. Philadelphus was perfectly ſatisfied with the conduct of the perſons who had interceded in favour of the captives, and ordered that, on the enſuing pay-day, his ſoldiers, excluſive of their uſual ſtipend, ſhould receive an hundred and twenty drachmas in lieu of every Jew whom they held in ſlavery; promiſing further to extend his clemency in compliance with the requeſt of Ariſtæus, or rather with the decrees of Providence, and that the whole ſhould be ratified by a proclamation emancipating the Jews who had been made priſoners during his father's reign, as well as thoſe who had fallen into captivity before and ſubſequent to that period. He was informed that the deliverance of theſe people would incur an expence of at leaſt forty talents: and he ſaid that notwithſtanding the ſum was conſiderable, his promiſe ſhould be punctually fulfilled.

The king ordered Demetrius to publiſh the particulars concerning the tranſlation of the books and records of the Jews. Upon a regiſter was inſerted a tranſcript of the petition of Demetrius, a liſt of the donations towards the undertaking, with the names of the ſeveral ſubſcribers, and the letters which had paſſed on the occaſion; ſo that the munificence of the king, and the liberal aſſiſtance afforded towards perfecting the work, might be apparent on the firſt view. His munificence, and the many valuable preſents which he made to the temple, were beyond deſcription ſplendid, and exceeded every thing done by former monarchs; I mean thoſe who were not deſcendents of Abraham, but raiſed up by the Almighty to ſhew favour to the people of Iſrael.

CHAP. II.

The Liberality of the King of ASIA towards the JEWS. CLEOPATRA, Daughter of ANTIOCHUS the GREAT, married to the King of EGYPT.

SO celebrated were the Jews for their faith and their military ſkill, that Seleucus, ſurnamed Nicanor, admitted them to the immunities of Antioch, and his ſeveral cities throughout Aſia and Lower Syria; and to this day they enjoy the privileges granted to them, in common with the Greeks and Macedonians. The Jews being prohibited the uſe of foreign oil, the Olympic officers had it in commiſſion from the government, to allow them, in lieu thereof, a portion of money. In the following war, the people of Antioch inſiſted upon the Jews being abridged of this privilege; but Mutianus, governor of the province of Syria, would not comply with their requiſitions. The people of Alexandria urged the diſfranchiſement of the Jews, during the reign of Veſpaſian and his ſon Titus: the Romans honourably oppoſed the meaſure, which the above-mentioned princes could not be induced to countenance. Notwithſtanding the provocation of an obſtinate war and rebellion, they nobly declined a gratification of their paſſions, and rejected the interceſſion of two powerful nations, on the conſideration that the privileges of the Jews could not be abridged without a violation of juſtice. Their former former deserts prevailed over their present offences; and the princes said, that private interest should not seduce them to take mean advantages. They urged, that such of our people as had taken up arms against the Romans, had been sufficiently punished in the course of the war; and to abridge the sacred rights of those who had not committed offence, would be equally contrary to the principles of reason and justice.

The generosity of Marcus Agrippa towards the Jews stands on record. He defended them against their enemies, and entered into various leagues with the neighbouring princes for their common defence.

Antiochus perfected a bond of friendship with Ptolemy, by marrying his daughter Cleopatra. For a marriage-portion he received half of Cœlo-Syria, Phœnicia, Judea, and Samaria, which being let to hire to the principal people of the provinces, the rents were paid into the royal treasury.

The pride of the Samaritans now induced them to insult the Jews, several of whom they made captives. This happened in the time of Onias the high priest, who was so weak and covetous that he refused the usual tribute of twenty talents, which his predecessors had constantly paid to the king. Ptolemy Euergetes, the father of Philopater, was so affronted at this conduct, that he sent an ambassador to Jerusalem to demand the payment, and threatened to fix a plantation there, and quarter an army on the country, in case of a refusal. The Jews were extremely terrified at this message; but Onias, whose ruling passion was the love of money, was determined to abide the consequence.

Joseph's advice to Onias rejected.

Joseph, a young man, nephew of Onias the high-priest, was remarkable for his prudence and integrity. Being at Phichola, his mother sent him notice of the above message; on which he went to Onias, and reproached him with his disregard to the welfare of the public, to whom he owed his promotion; saying that, at least he should go to the king, and endeavour to obtain a remittal of part of the tribute. This Onias absolutely declined; on which Joseph desired to go in his place, which was granted. Joseph therefore assembled the people in the temple, told them he would wait on the king, and hoped his uncle's remissness would have no ill consequence. They thankfully left the business to him; on which he invited the king's commissioner to a splendid treat, which lasted several days, made him rich presents, and told him he would follow him to his master. The commissioner returning into Egypt, spoke of the ingratitude of Onias; but mentioned Joseph (who would soon be there) in terms of such high respect, that the king, and the queen Cleopatra, wished to see him.

Goes on an embassy to Ptolemy, with whom he has an interview.

Joseph now sent to his friends in Samaria, to raise money to furnish his equipage, which cost near twenty thousand drachmas, in cloaths, horses, carriages, plate, &c. On his road to Alexandria, he fell in company with some of the princes and nobles of Syria and Phœnicia, who were going to the king, to purchase his revenue, which was annually sold to the best bidder. These people ridiculed the appearance of Joseph and his retinue; but he proceeded to Alexandria, where learning that the king was at Memphis, he went forward, and met him in his chariot, with the queen, and Athenion, the very commissioner whom Joseph had treated at Jerusalem. Athenion no sooner saw him, than he told the king that was the young man of whom he had spoken so highly. On this, Ptolemy took him into his carriage, and mentioned how ill he had been treated by Onias. Joseph replied, "An old man is a second time a child; impute nothing to Onias beyond what his age will excuse: for us who have youth, and the power of our faculties, we will give proof of our dutiful attachment." This speech so pleased the king, that he gave orders that Joseph should be lodged in the palace, and treated him at his own table; a circumstance that gave great disgust to the Syrians.

Joseph is treated with singular honour and respect.

The day arriving when the branches of the revenue were to be sold, the nobles above-mentioned offered eight thousand talents for the duties of Cœlo-Syria, Phœnicia, and Samaria; on which, Joseph bid double the sum; which pleased the king, who asked him what security he could give. Joseph said his securities were undoubted; and the king bidding him name them, he replied he had no doubt that the king and queen would be mutually bound for his integrity. Hereupon the king trusted him with the receipt of the revenue, without other security; a circumstance that extremely mortified the intended purchasers.

He is appointed receiver-general of the revenue.

Thus commissioned, Joseph solicited a guard of two thousand soldiers, to aid him in levying the duties; which being granted, he borrowed five hundred talents in Alexandria, and proceeded towards Syria. On his arrival at Askalon, the people not only refused to pay the tribute, but insulted him; whereupon he punished twenty of the ringleaders, and raised a thousand talents from their forfeited estates, which he sent to the king, with an account of his proceedings. This so pleased the king, that he left him wholly to his own conduct; and the rest of the Syrians, struck by the above example, paid their taxes without hesitation. The people of Scythopolis following those of Askalon in refusing to pay the tribute, Joseph dealt with them as with the others, applying the forfeitures to the use of the king. In the course of business, Joseph procured many valuable presents both to the king and his ministers.

Circumstances preceding the birth of Hyrcanus.

Twenty-two years Joseph lived in prosperity, during which he had seven sons by one wife, and one, named Hyrcanus, by the daughter of his brother Solymius, whom he married in consequence of the following incident. Journeying to Alexandria with his brother, to find a Jew of rank proper to marry his daughter, Joseph, being at supper with the king, fell in love with a maid who was dancing to entertain his majesty. He told the secret to his brother, wishing, that that as he could not lawfully marry her, he would privately introduce them to each other. The brother promiſed, but put his daughter to bed; and Joſeph, having drank too freely, diſcovered not the deception. This deceit was repeatedly practiſed, till Joſeph, wholly enamoured, lamented to his brother the improbability of the king's permitting the match. Solymius bade him be at reſt; ſaid he might lawfully enjoy the woman as his wife, and revealed the whole ſecret: ſaying, he permitted this affront to his daughter, rather than that his brother ſhould commit a heinous offence. Joſeph was all gratitude for this inſtance of friendſhip, and married the daughter, who was the mother of Hyrcanus. At thirteen years old, Hyrcanus was ſuch a miracle of good ſenſe and benevolence, that he became the object of envy to all his elder brothers.

His extraordinary talents.

Joſeph, willing to make proof of the abilities of his children, placed all of them, except Hyrcanus, under experienced maſters; but they made no proficiency. He then ſent Hyrcanus a journey of ſeven days into the deſert, with three hundred pair of oxen, to plow and ſow; firſt privately taking away the lines that were to faſten the yoke to the plough. The youth, on his arrival, miſſing the lines, ſome huſbandmen adviſed him to ſend to his father for them; but, unwilling to loſe ſo much time, he gave orders for ten yoke of oxen to be killed, the fleſh of which he diſtributed among his workmen, and had the ſkins cut into thongs, with which he faſtened the oxen to the ploughs, did his buſineſs, and returned to his father. Joſeph was enraptured at this prudence of his ſon, and embraced him in token of his approbation of ſuch conduct: but the brothers hated Hyrcanus for his ſuperior abilities.

Hyrcanus appointed to congratulate Ptolemy on the birth of a ſon.

Soon after this, Joſeph heard that the queen was brought to bed of a ſon, and that the princes and great men of Syria were haſtening to court, to congratulate the king on the occaſion. Joſeph's age prevented his attendance; but he ſeverally aſked his ſons to go; one of whom ſaid he ſhould not chooſe to appear before the king; a ſecond was unacquainted with the ways of the court, &c. but they united in wiſhing Hyrcanus might be ſent. Hereupon, Joſeph called him, and aſked him how he would conduct himſelf if ſent on this buſineſs. Hyrcanus ſaid he ſhould think it an honour to be ſo employed, and would not put his father to much expence; hinting that ten thouſand drachmas would defray the charge. Joſeph pauſed, admiring his moderation, when the ſon ſaid, "I would not recommend the ſending from this place any preſents to the king; but write to your agent at Alexandria to furniſh me with proper gifts." On conſideration, Joſeph thought that ten talents might make the neceſſary purchaſes; on which he gave his ſon letters of credit to Arion, who had then three thouſand talents in hand, Joſeph uſing to remit the collections in Syria to him, to be tranſmitted to the royal treaſury. Hyrcanus immediately went to Arion with his letters, while his brothers ſecretly laboured to deſtroy him. Arion aſking what ſum would be ſufficient, Hyrcanus ſaid, "A thouſand talents." "What! (ſaid the former) to be waſted in luxury; no, ſir, your father's fortune was made by induſtry, and you would do well to follow his example: I will give you only ten talents, and thoſe I will ſee expended in the preſents." He proceeded in this manner, till Hyrcanus had him committed to priſon. At this time, Arion's wife, who was on good terms with the queen, carried the news to her miſtreſs, and the queen told it to the king, with reflections on the young man's conduct. Hereupon, the king ſent a meſſage to Hyrcanus, wondering that he did not fulfil his father's commiſſion, and ſtill more that he had impriſoned the agent; ordering him to attend immediately, and clear himſelf of the charge alledged againſt him. Hyrcanus bade the meſſenger tell the king, that by the laws of the Jews no man was to eat the fleſh of any ſacrifice, who had not himſelf firſt offered ſacrifice in the temple: that his caſe was ſimilar, and he could not wait on the king till he had procured the preſents which his father had provided as a teſtimony of his duty and gratitude; and that with regard to puniſhing a refractory ſervant, he thought himſelf juſtified: for the ill example of an inferior might at length reach the king himſelf; as where authority is deſpiſed, the precedent is dangerous. The king was charmed when he heard of this dignity of ſentiment in ſo young a man.

His vindication to the king.

By this time Arion found he had no intereſt with the king; on which he compounded for his liberty, by paying the thouſand talents to Hyrcanus, who immediately went to court, and was admitted to the royal table. Hyrcanus now privately bought of the merchants one hundred fine young men, and the ſame number of accompliſhed girls, at a talent each. Himſelf and other perſons of diſtinction, being invited to dine with the king, the maſter of the ceremonies placed Hyrcanus at the bottom of the table, on the ſcore of his youth. The company agreed to lay their bones on Hyrcanus's plate, and then introduced Tryphon, the king's jeſter, to ridicule him; which he attempted, by bidding the king notice the circumſtance, and ſaying, that ſo had Hyrcanus's father picked the bones of all Syria. The king, ſmiling, aſked Hyrcanus how he came by ſo many bones? "Sir (ſaid he, looking on the company,) dogs eat bones as well as meat; but men put the bones aſide." This pleaſed the king, who praiſed him, and recommended him to general reſpect. On the following day, Hyrcanus privately inquired of the ſervants, what their maſters intended to preſent the king on the birth of the prince: ſome ſaid twelve talents, and others more or leſs; while Hyrcanus pretended to be uneaſy that he could give only five talents. The ſervants told this to their maſters, thinking the youth would be diſgraced in the king's opinion, by the ſmallneſs of his preſent. On the following day, the higheſt gift was twenty talents, except that of Hyrcanus, who gave the hundred boys and girls, and with each a talent beſides. This gift aſtoniſhed the king and his friends; but exclusive hereof, Hyrcanus gave gratuities to the king's officers, to counteract the plots of his brothers, who had fought his destruction. The conduct of Hyrcanus so struck the king, that he promised to grant any favour he should ask; on which he requested only letters to his father and brothers. Hereupon the king dismissed him honourably, made him princely presents, and gave him the requested letters to his family.

The brethren of Hyrcanus conspire against his life.

When the brothers of Hyrcanus learnt how the king and queen had received him, and how much his reputation was advanced by this expedition, they combined to meet him without the town, and put him to death: nor was their father (who was disgusted at the expence of the presents) wholly unapprised of this affair, though his fear of the king occasioned his concealing it. In fact, the brothers met, and attacked Hyrcanus, whose attendants killed two of them, and wounded several of their followers, the rest escaping to Jerusalem. Hyrcanus proceeded thither; but finding no respect paid him, he went over the river Jordan, where he collected the royal duties from the Barbarians, for the rest of his life. This happened when Seleucus, son of Antiochus the great, reigned over Asia. About this period, Joseph, the father of Hyrcanus, died, after having collected the public duties of Syria, Phœnicia, and Samaria, for twenty-two years; and bearing the character of a courageous and pious man. Near the same period died Onias, the uncle, who was succeeded in the priesthood by his son Simon, who likewise dying, was succeeded by his son Onias; who received, from Arius king of Lacedæmon, an embassy, the contents of which are as follow:

Death of Joseph. and Onias the priest.

ARIUS, King of LACEDÆMON, wishes Health to ONIAS.

Letter from Arius to Onias.

—"AN ancient manuscript having fallen into our hands, proving the relationship between our families, and that we are descended from the line of Abraham, it appears equitable that all possible good offices should be mutually done by persons so nearly related. We therefore offer you every service in our power; and shall henceforward deem your concerns as our own, and consider our interests as the same. Our faithful servant Demoletes will deliver you this letter, which is written on one page in quarto, and sealed with the white figure of an eagle, grasping in her talons a dragon."

Joseph being dead, there were violent disputes between his sons, the elder making war on the younger, and Simon the high-priest, with the majority of the people, taking part with the former. Hyrcanus remained beyond Jordan, engaged in perpetual war with the Arabians, of whom he killed, and carried into captivity, great numbers. In this country he built a wonderful castle, the walls of white stone, with figures of various animals curiously carved on them. A deep ditch or fish-pond was dug round the castle, and in a mountain opposite to it, passages were cut, in length several furlongs, but, for security sake, only wide enough at the mouth for one man to enter. Within the castle were lodging, dining rooms, and other places of entertainment, with stately buildings, courts, gardens, and fountains. This place is on the borders of Arabia, and Judea beyond Jordan, near the land of the Effebonites, and received the name of Tyre. During seven years, which Seleucus reigned in Syria, Hyrcanus held this government. Antiochus succeeded Seleucus: and about this time died Ptolemy king of Egypt, who left two young sons, named Philometer and Physcon. Antiochus being at this time very powerful, Hyrcanus dreading being called to answer for his severities to the Arabians, destroyed himself; and his possessions were seized by Antiochus.

CHAP. III.

ONIAS becomes High-Priest; repairs to ANTIOCH, and renounces Religion. ANTIOCHUS breaks into EGYPT, but is repulsed by the ROMANS.

THE high-priest Onias being dead, Antiochus Epiphanes promoted his brother Jesus to the priesthood, during the minority of his son: but the king being displeased with Jesus, deprived him of the dignity, which he bestowed on the younger brother Onias. Now Jesus took the name of Jason, and Onias that of Menelaus. Hereupon the people were divided into factions: Menelaus being supported by the sons of Tobias, and Jason by the people in general, who proving too powerful, Menelaus and his party retired to Antioch, declaring they would renounce the Jewish worship, and follow that of the Greeks; requesting permission to open an academy at Jerusalem for public exercises. This licence being obtained, they abandoned the laws and customs of the Jews, adhered to those of other nations, and became perfect Greeks in appearance, even when naked.

Ease, and the comfortable settlement of his people at home, induced Antiochus to penetrate into Egypt, encouraged hereto partly by the weakness of the sons of Ptolemy, and partly by ambition. Thus determined, he marched a large army to Pelusium, where he conquered Philometer. He then reduced Memphis and other places; and proceeded to Alexandria, in hope of conquering the king, and taking the place. But the Romans commanding him instantly to withdraw, he abandoned his conquests. Heretofore we have spoken only slightly of this king; but we now proceed to the particulars of his taking Jerusalem.

Antiochus, retreating from Egypt, proceeded immediately with his army to Jerusalem; and having gained over a party in the town, the gates were thrown open to him. Hereupon he plundered the city, put great numbers to the sword, and repaired to Antioch with his treasure. The barbarities barbarities of this outrage were ſuch, that even thoſe who opened the gates to the troops of Antiochus were not ſpared. The ſpoil of the temple was incredible: the holy veſſels, golden candleſticks, golden altar, table of ſhew-bread, curtains, ſilk and linen embroidery, and even the immenſe quantity of concealed treaſure were all carried away. The people were forbid to offer daily ſacrifices, the city was levelled with the ground, and moſt of the inhabitants, men, women, and children, were either killed or made priſoners. The enemy built a tower in the city, commanding a view of the temple, which they fortified, and filled with Macedonians and apoſtate Jews. They built an altar in the temple, on which they ſacrificed hogs, in deriſion of the Jews; whom they utterly diſtreſſed, becauſe they would not renounce the true God. They likewiſe built temples, and altars, on which they offered up ſwine's fleſh, in the other cities and towns. They laid penalties on the Jews for circumciſing their children, and kept people in pay to extort penalties, or to proſecute them; ſo that, in the end, moſt of the Jews ſubmitted to the king's commands: though ſome were found ſo courageous as to brave all dangers, rather than violate their laws and religion. Theſe were firſt ſeverely whipped, and then themſelves and wives crucified, thoſe of their children who had been circumciſed being hung about their necks. Orders were likewiſe given to deſtroy the holy ſcriptures: and that no perſon ſhould poſſeſs them on pain of death.

Duplicity of the Samaritans.

The Samaritans finding the wretched ſtate to which the Jews were reduced, now no longer claimed affinity to them, nor ſpoke of the temple of Gerizim as that of God. They now ſaid they were deſcended from the Medes and Perſians; and reſolved to renounce all connection with the wretched race of the Hebrews. They alſo dedicated their temple at Gerizim to Jupiter, the chief of the heathen deities.

CHAP. IV.

The Meſſengers, who would compel a falſe Worſhip, killed by MATTHIAS and his Sons. The dying Speech and Advice of MATTHIAS.

AT this period, Matthias, a prieſt, lived at Modim, a village of Judæa. He had five ſons, named Johannan, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan. Matthias would frequently lament to his ſons, the wretched ſtate of the Jews, whoſe city was laid waſte, and temple profaned; and he uſed to ſay how much more noble it would be to ſacrifice their lives in defence of their country, religion, and laws, than to live in ſo baſe and ſervile a ſtate.

When the king's officers came to execute the royal orders, they applied to Matthias, as a man whoſe conduct might influence others, and commanded him to worſhip as directed. This he refuſed, ſaying, that if every other perſon ſubmitted, he would not, and would adviſe his ſons never to abandon their ancient religion. While Matthias was thus ſpeaking, a Jew came forward, to ſacrifice according to the new edict; which ſo enraged Matthias and his ſons that they killed not only the Jew, but Apelles, the king's officer, with his guard, who were endeavouring to enforce the new worſhip. The altar was overturned in the conteſt; while Matthias exclaimed, "Follow me, you that regard your honour or religion!" Hereupon Matthias and his ſons retired to the wilderneſs, leaving their property behind them; and were ſoon followed by numbers of people, who reſided in caves a conſiderable time. News hereof being brought to the king's officers, they drew the troops from the caſtle of Jeruſalem, and advancing to the wilderneſs, adviſed the Jews to ſubmiſſion, to prevent the neceſſity of deſtroying them. To this the Jews turned a deaf ear; on which their opponents fixed on the ſabbath for deſtroying them, which they did by burning them in their caves, no reſiſtance being made; for ſuch was the reverence that the Jews had for the day, that, rather than profane it, they would periſh *. About a thouſand men, women, and children were thus ſuffocated underground: but numbers eſcaped, and united themſelves under Matthias. This venerable man now inſtructed them that, in caſe of neceſſity, they ought to defend themſelves on the ſabbath, as well as at other times; or their enemies would always take the advantage, and attack them when no reſiſtance was to be dreaded. They were hereby convinced of the propriety of uſing arms on the ſabbath on urgent occaſions; and the practice has continued to this day. Matthias now drew together all the people who had diſperſed themſelves, and lurked about in dread of the enemy; and finding himſelf at the head of a conſiderable army, deſtroyed the idol altars, put to the ſword ſuch apoſtates as could be found, ordered the circumciſion of children, and drove off ſuch of the king's officers as were appointed to reſtrain that practice.

At

* The modern Iſraelites are not leſs ſtrict (after their way), than their ancient idolatrous brethren were remiſs, in keeping the ſabbath. Buxtorf, in his Account of the religious Cuſtoms and Ceremonies of that people, has given us the following ſingular prohibitions, ſelected from among many others, which regard their obſervance of this holy day.

1. If, on the ſabbath, a Jew arrives at home, or elſewhere, on a horſe or aſs (as, by means of the privilege of the ſabbath-day's journey, he may) he is at liberty to eaſe his beaſt, when he puts him up, by looſing the girths; but it is a profanation to take off the ſaddle. If the beaſt ſhakes it off, all is well enough, ſay the Rabbins; for that is a thing the Jew hath no hand in. But in ſuch a caſe, the Jew muſt let the ſaddle lie, fall how it may.

2. If, on the ſabbath, he leads a horſe with a bridle, he muſt take care that ſuch a portion of the reins hang beneath his hand, or between his hand and the bit, as that he cannot be ſuppoſed, inſtead of leading the horſe, to aſſiſt only in carrying the bridle.

3. It is lawful on the ſabbath-day to leap over a ditch, but not to wade

At the end of a year from this period, Matthias finding that his death approached, ſummoned his ſons, and addreſſed them as follows: "My life is drawing to the cloſe; but ere I leave you, I charge you to be firm in the cauſe I have aſſerted. Remember my advice, and follow it. Maintain the laws and rights of your country, and, if poſſible, reſtore order to a nation almoſt buried in confuſion: nor aſſociate with thoſe who have betrayed it. Diſgrace not your father; but, deſpiſing all dangers, wade through the water, leſt, ſay the Rabbins, a neceſſity ſhould ariſe for profaning the day, by drying the ſtockings.

4. A Jew is not to wear a ſword, or any ſuch thing as a weapon or warlike accoutrement, on the ſabbath: nor is a taylor, at this time, to go out of his houſe with a needle ſticking on his clothes.

5. The paralytic, and the lame perſon, who cannot walk without a ſtick or cane, is permitted the uſe of one on the ſabbath: but the blind, who are not lame, muſt handle no ſuch thing. The uſe of ſtilts, for paſſing over water or dirt, is at this time unlawful; becauſe, ſay the Rabbins, very ſagaciouſly, though the ſtilts ſeem to carry a man, yet in fact 'tis the man who carries them: and no one muſt incumber himſelf with any thing, on the ſabbath, that hath but the ſmalleſt reſemblance to, or the leaſt nature of, a burden.

6. A plaiſter that is on a wound may be continued; but if it drops off, it is not to be put on again, nor any thing in its ſtead, till the ſabbath is gone.

7. A Jew ought not to carry either gold or ſilver, or any ſort of money about him on the ſabbath: and if at any time he finds a purſe of money, he is not to meddle with it.

8. While the dirt which is upon his coat, cloak, or ſtockings is moiſt, he may ſcrape it off with the nails of his fingers; but if it is dry, he muſt let it remain till the ſabbath is ended; becauſe, ſay the Rabbins, the ſcraping it off when it is dry, makes a duſt; which gives the matter the look of pounding or grinding. If his hands happen to be bedaubed with dirt, he may wipe them upon a cow's tail, or upon the mane or tail of a horſe, but not with a towel, or any linen whatever, leſt a neceſſity ſhould ariſe, of which he would be the cauſe, of waſhing it before the ſabbath is ſpent.

9. If a Jew ſpies a flea upon him on the ſabbath, he is not to catch it, unleſs it bites him; in which caſe he may lay hold of it, if he can, and throw it from him; but he muſt be ſure not to kill it; becauſe a flea, ſay the Rabbins, was created, like other creatures, out of the earth: but he may crack a louſe; becauſe, ſays the ſame learned gentleman, a louſe is generated, not of the earth, but of the ſweat of man's body. But in this latter caſe, the rabbinical body is oppoſed by Rabbi Eliezer, who in the Talmud maintains, that he who cracks a louſe on the ſabbath, is as guilty as he who on that day kills a camel. And there are many doubts upon the matter to this day.

10. A Jew is forbidden to climb a tree upon the ſabbath, leſt he ſhould rub or break any thing off; the ſtripping of the ſmalleſt twig at that time being judged a profanation.

11. If corn be thrown to poultry on the ſabbath, care muſt be taken that the feathered family pick it all up, or that it be thrown to them in a place to which no rain can come, leſt any of the grain ſhould take root and germinate; for, in ſuch caſe, this, ſay the Rabbins, would be ſowing on the ſabbath; a crime for which there is no expiation.

12. If, on the ſabbath, a Jew arrives from ſea at an harbour, he is not to go aſhore till the ſabbath is over, unleſs he is cloſely purſued, and his life is in danger.

We ſhall cloſe this ſubject, by adding a curious narrative concerning it, taken from a Jewiſh writer.

"Once upon a time three Jews, who were together upon a journey, being overtaken by the ſabbath in a wood, at a great diſtance from any houſe or cottage where they might lodge, one of them ſaid, What is to be done? The road is infeſted with robbers, and the wood is full of wild beaſts: is it not, therefore, more adviſeable for us to go forward, than to expoſe ourſelves to ſuch a hoſt of dangers, by ſtopping here, out of a ſcrupulous regard for the ſabbath? With two of them this queſtion paſſed in the affirmative; while the other ſaid, he was reſolved not to ſtir a ſtep further till the ſabbath was paſſed. "God," ſaid he, "who hath commanded us to reſt on the ſabbath, is able to preſerve me from danger in the very heart of this wood." And accordingly there he pitched his tent and ſtaid; while his companions purſued their way, and thereby violated the ſabbath.

"Being not without a viaticum and a little furniture for the table, he ſpread a napkin on the ground, and ſet out his ſupper; which having hallowed with the cuſtomary prayers and benedictions, he fell to with great chearfulneſs and appetite; when a fierce and frightful bear of monſtrous ſize preſented himſelf at the tree, and beheld him with ſuch looks of cruelty and famine, that the bones of the good Jew rattled with horror. But in an inſtant recovering his preſence of mind, and ſtrengthening his heart with this reflection, that God was able to preſerve him, he threw to the bear a lump of bread; and the bear ate it and kept his ſtation, without the leaſt attempt to plunder or moleſt him. The Jew, obſerving his viſitor to be ſo well diſpoſed, took courage, and finiſhed his ſupper without farther compliment; while the bear looked on, without any token of diſcoatent that he taſted no farther of the Jew's hoſpitality.

"Supper being over, the Jew betook himſelf to nocturnal prayer, and after that, to ſleep. The bear lay down by him, and the Jew ſlept ſoundly; and all went well during the whole night, the Jew not awaking till the morning; when finding the ſavage creature ſtretch'd at his repoſe hard by him, and conſidering how peaceably things had been carried, and the manifeſt tokens of friendſhip and good humour on the ſide of the bear, he lifted up his eyes to the heavens in raptures of gratitude, and betook himſelf with a joyful heart to the religious offices of the morning, praiſing God with a fervid boſom for ſo amazing an inſtance of his love and protection. In a word, there he dined and ſupped, and performed all the religious offices of the day; the bear attending him all the time as a guard, and behaving as upon duty, not once offering him the leaſt moleſtation.

"The ſabbath being over, the good Jew purſued his way; while the bear, who was not yet at the end of his commiſſion, marched behind him, keeping him company all that night. Before morning this bleſſed Iſraelite was met by his two fellow-travellers, who had left him in the wood, and who this night had fallen into the hands of villains who had robbed them of all they had. As ſoon as the bear beheld theſe violaters of the ſabbath, he flew upon them with all his fierceneſs, and tore them to pieces, to the great aſtoniſhment and terror of the good Jew, who now ſhook with apprehenſion that the bear would next fall upon him. While he was in this fright, he was accoſted by the villains who had robbed his companions. They aſked him who he was, and from whence he came? Truſting in God, and not being aſhamed of his nation or religion, he replied, that he was a Jew, and that he came from court (he meant the ſabbath, but they believed he meant the court of the ſovereign of the country). They then aſked him, how he came to be attended by the bear? for they obſerved the creature reſpected him. He anſwered, the king had commanded that the bear ſhould accompany him. Upon which, the robbers whiſpered to one another—This Jew muſt needs be a great favourite of the king, ſince his majeſty hath given him this bear for company. Let us, ſaid one of them, give him all our money, and ſee him ſafe out of the wood: it may be an obligation that will prevent his giving notice of us at court, and cauſing us to be apprehended." This being agreed to, they loaded the Jew with a preſent of all their wealth; and, having ſeen him ſafe out of the wood, they left him, as did likewiſe the bear, who then returned to his home. Valete et plaudite.

riſk your lives when your country demands them, aſſured that a reſtoration to your former liberty will be the recompence that God will beſtow. It is true, that our bodies are mortal; but great actions immortaliſe our memories; and to ſuch actions I would have you aſpire. I moſt earneſtly adviſe you to concord with each other, and to conſider how the abilities of each may beſt promote the intereſt of you all. For inſtance; Simon has a depth of judgment; let him be your counſellor. Maccabæus is diſtinguiſhed by his valour and military ſkill: appoint him your general. On the whole, attend to what you have in view, and rely on the ſupport of all men of honour and virtue."

This dying ſpeech of Matthias to his ſons being concluded, with his prayers that God would ſucceed their attempts to relieve their countrymen from their oppreſſions, he departed this life, and was interred at Modim. He was buried in a decent and honourable manner; and ſoon after his interment, the adminiſtration of affairs was placed in the hands of his ſon Judas, otherwiſe called Maccabæus, in the one hundred and forty-ſixth year from Seleucus the firſt. The brothers of Judas gave him ſuch aid, that they ſoon drove the enemy from the country, deſtroyed the principal delinquents, and cleared the land from all defilements.

The ſucceſſion of Judas to the command of the army being notified to Apollonius, governor of Samaria, he advanced againſt him: but Judas met and routed him, deſtroying great numbers of his people on the ſpot, killing Apollonius with his own hand, and carrying off his ſword. The ſpoil taken in the camp was very great.

Seron, governor of Cœlo-Syria, being informed of this victory, and that reinforcements were conſtantly coming to Judas, reſolved to give him battle; conſidering himſelf as bound to reduce thoſe whom he deemed rebels. Having joined a number of fugitive Jews with his own people, he marched and encamped at Bethoron, a village of Judæa. Judas prepared to defend himſelf: but finding his ſoldiers diſcouraged, addreſſed them as follows: "Brother ſoldiers; depend not on yourſelves, but on God for victory: confidence in him is ſuperior to that in multitudes of men. The hiſtory of our anceſtors confirms this truth; who, with ſmall numbers, have routed thouſands, in defence of their religion, freedom, laws, and families. Truth muſt prevail, and innocence ſhall remain unconquered." Thus ſaying, he led his people to the battle, in which they fought moſt courageouſly, killing Seron on the ſpot, and defeating the army of the Aſſyrians, who ſeeing their general fall, betook themſelves to flight; each man ſeeking his own ſafety. Judas purſued them to the plain, many eſcaping toward the ſea-ſide; but about eight hundred were ſlain in the field.

CHAP. V.

LYSIAS commands the Army of ANTIOCHUS. JUDAS MACCABÆUS defeats LYSIAS. JUDAS proceeds to JERUSALEM, and purifies the Temple. The GALILEANS demand his Aſſiſtance.

THESE repeated misfortunes induced Antiochus to raiſe an extraordinary army of his own people, joined with Greek forces, with which he propoſed to invade Judæa in the ſpring; but his natural benevolence, ſuperadded to the late troubles, had cauſed ſuch a deficiency in the ſupplies, that he found the expence of war would be more than proportioned to the revenue. Hereupon he reſolved to go firſt to Perſia, to collect caſh; and, during his abſence, left the command of the country between Ægypt and Euphrates, with the care of ſome of his troops and elephants, to Lyſias, a man of tried integrity; to whom he alſo committed the care of his ſon Antiochus, till he ſhould return: and he determined that when he had reduced Judæa, and ſold the inhabitants for ſlaves, the whole country ſhould be deſtroyed. On iſſuing theſe orders, he paſſed the Euphrates, in the year one hundred and forty-ſeven.

In order to execute this commiſſion, Lyſias placed Ptolemy, ſon of Dorymenes, with Gorgias and Nicanor, at the head of forty thouſand foot, and ſeven thouſand horſe, commanding them to march into Judæa. Having encamped on the plain of Emmaus, they were joined by numbers of Syrians, and thoſe of other countries, with vagabond Jews; likewiſe merchants, and traders, who brought fetters to ſecure their priſoners. Judas was provided with an army of force; but he bade them not truſt in their own ſtrength, but implore the protection of heaven, by wearing ſackcloth, by faſting and prayer. This being done, he divided his people into regiments, troops, and companies; having firſt diſmiſſed the men lately married, and ſuch as had made new purchaſes: Gorgias, with five thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, conducted by ſome apoſtate Jews, intended to ſurpriſe Judas at night. Hereupon he thought of counteracting the enemy, by attempting to burn the camp, when part of the troops had left it. To effect this, he ordered ſeveral fires to be made in his own camp, and then marched in the night towards Emmaus, where the enemy was encamped. In the interim, Gorgias finding the Jews' camp deſerted, ſuppoſed he had little elſe to do than to diſcover and deſtroy them. At day-break Judas, with three thouſand men, arrived at the enemy's camp, and found them well provided: whereupon he told them, that they might ſafely engage, even if unarmed, for the Providence of God was their ſpecial protection. Thus ſaying, he ordered the charge to be ſounded, broke in on them, and put numbers of them to the ſword, purſuing them to Gadara, while the reſt flew to the plains of Jamnia, Idumæa, and Azotus. About three thouſand were ſlain; but Judas would not permit his troops to touch the ſpoil, becauſe Gorgias was yet unconquered; but he ſaid, when his troops were conquered, they might ſeize the booty. He had ſcarce ſpoke theſe words when the ſoldiers of Gorgias, who were ſtationed on an adjacent hill, ſaw their camp ſmoaking, and their friends dead, while the enemy were ſtill able to renew the attack, on which they diſperſed in confuſion. The victory being thus eaſily obtained, Judas permitted his people to pillage the field, in which they found gold, ſilver, ſcarlet and purple veſtments, and other valuable booty, which they carried off in triumph, ſinging and praiſing God for the victory.

This defeat ſo mortified Lyſias, that in the following year he entered Judæa with an army of ſixty thouſand foot, and five thouſand horſe, and encamped at Bethſura. Judas, undiſmayed by ſuch numbers, advanced with only ten thouſand men, and having offered up a ſhort prayer for ſucceſs, attacked the enemy, forced their lines, and killed five hundred on the ſpot. The army of Lyſias was ſo ſtruck with this ſhock, that they determined to conquer or die: but the commander, marking this effort of deſpair, withdrew them to Antioch, where he obtained reinforcements, in hopes of greater ſucceſs on a future occaſion.

Animated by theſe ſucceſſes, Judas encouraged the Jews to rely on the continued protection of God, and to march to Jeruſalem, there to offer ſacrifices, and cleanſe the temple. Arriving there, they found the gates burnt, the temple abandoned, and weeds overſpreading the courts; ſo that they wept at the deplorable ſituation of the place. Judas ordered his people to attack the citadel, while he took care of the cleanſing of the temple; which he furniſhed with utenſils, veſſels, a candleſtick, a table, and an altar of incenſe, all of pure gold. He likewiſe ſupplied new doors, and put up veils and hangings on the walls. The altar, which had been profaned by ſacrifices and burnt-offerings to idols, was alſo removed; and a new one, of unhewn ſtone (agreeable to the directions of Moſes), placed in its ſtead. Lighted tapers were placed in the candleſtick, incenſe offered on the altar, ſhew-bread placed on the table, and burnt-offerings made, on the 25th of the month Caſleu, juſt three years after the temple had been profaned by Antiochus: and this ceremony of the purification was repeated on the ſame day, in the one hundred and forty-eighth year of the Olympiad, agreeable to a prediction of the prophet Daniel.

Judas continued this feſtival eight days, with ſacrifices, rejoicing, and feaſting, while the air reſounded with notes of thankſgiving and praiſe, and the people were indulged in all reaſonable gratifications. The public joy was ſo great on this reſtoration of religion and law, that an anniverſary, of eight days celebration, was appointed to be held for ever, and which is ſtill called the "Feaſt of Lights;" which, I preſume, alludes to that light which Heaven on this occaſion peculiarly granted. In the interim, Judas cauſed the walls of the city to be repaired, and fortified with towers; he alſo ſtationed a garriſon at Bethſura, and effectually fortified the place.

The increaſing power of the Jews inſtigated the neighbouring nations to do them every poſſible injury; and many of them they deſtroyed by artifice, while Judas did his utmoſt to defeat their machinations. At this period he attacked Acrabatan, where he got great booty, after deſtroying the Edomites, and blocking up the ſons of Baan (their commander) in fortified places, where they lay to attack the Jews; but theſe places were taken, and laid in aſhes, thoſe who protected them being deſtroyed. When Judas had routed theſe people, he attacked the Ammonites, commanded by Timotheus; conquered them, took the city of Jazar, ſet it on fire, made captives of the wives and children, and returned in triumph. As ſoon as he was gone, the people aſſembled at Galaad, and attempted to ſurpriſe the Jews in that diſtrict; who taking refuge in the fortreſs of Dametha, informed Judas that Timotheus meant to attack them, and begged his aſſiſtance. At this inſtant meſſengers from Galilee brought complaint to Judas, that a conſpiracy was formed againſt them by the inhabitants of Ptolemais, Tyre, and Sidon.

CHAP. VI.

GALILEE relieved by SIMON, Brother of JUDAS. A Victory obtained over the AMMONITES by JUDAS and JONATHAN. JUDAS tranſports the JEWS near GALAAD into JUDÆA. JUDAS takes EPHRON by Aſſault, and puts all the Men to the Sword. GORGIAS defeats JOSEPH and AZARIAS.

SIMON, the brother of Judas, was now ſent, with three hundred ſelect men, to aſſiſt the Jews at Galilee, while himſelf and Jonathan, his other brother, marched with eight thouſand, to Galaad; the reſt of the army being left to the care of Joſeph and Azarias, with orders not to fight till he came back again. When Simon arrived at Galilee he attacked the enemy, and deſtroyed three thouſand, purſuing them to the gates of Ptolemais. Having ſtripped the vanquiſhed, they redeemed the priſoners with the ſpoils, and returned to Jeruſalem with them.

Judas and his brother Jonathan having marched three days into the wilderneſs beyond Jordan, the Nabathites received them amicably, and informed them of the diſtreſs of their countrymen confined in Galaad, adviſing them to haſten to relieve them, by the way of the deſert. During this expedition they reduced the town of Baraſa, burnt it, and put to the ſword all who were capable of bearing arms. Night now advanced; but Judas proceeded to a caſtle, in which he had learnt ſome Jews were beſieged. Arriving there early in the morning, he found the enemy prepared to ſcale the place; on which he ſeparated his troops into three diviſions, and exhorted them to be valiant, in aid of their countrymen; whereupon, on the ſecond trumpet ſounding, the enemy was attacked in the rear. Timotheus finding that Judas was the commander, his men precipitately fled, being purſued by the Jews, who killed eight thouſand of them. During the purſuit Judas took the city of Mallam, which was deſtroyed by fire, all the male inhabitants being put to death. This fate likewiſe attended Caſphan, Boſor, and other places, of which conqueſt was made.

Timotheus aſſembling a large army, aided by a band of Arabians and other forces, paſſed the river, and encamped near Raphan, where he animated his troops to behave courageouſly, and prevent the Jews paſſing that river, on which, he ſaid, the iſſue of the war depended. Judas finding that Timotheus was prepared for battle, paſſed the river, attacked and routed him, his people ſeeking their ſafety in flight. Some of them repaired to the temple of Carnaim, in hope of protection: but Judas deſtroyed the town, put the inhabitants to the ſword, and cauſed the temple to be burnt.

He now collected the Iſraelites in Galaad, and carried them into Judæa, with their families and effects. As the city of Ephron was in his direct road, he aſked for permiſſion to paſs through it; but this being denied, he prepared his troops to attack it; and conquered it in one day and night, putting all the men to the ſword, reducing the place to aſhes, and marching his army over the bodies of the dead. Having paſſed the river Jordan, he proceeded through the plain of Bethſan to Judæa, the people offering ſacrifices, and ſinging ſongs and hymns of joy, in gratitude for their ſafety; for not a ſingle Jew was loſt in all this expedition.

Simon having marched into Galilee againſt the people of Ptolemais; Judas and his brother Jonathan being gone againſt thoſe of Galaad; Joſeph and Azarias, who had been left as a guard in Judæa, in the abſence of Simon, thought it diſgraceful not to diſtinguiſh themſelves; they therefore proceeded to Jamnia, where Gorgias, the governor, encountered them, killed two thouſand of them, and purſued their ſhattered forces to the confines of Judæa. This misfortune befell them, in conſequence of diſobeying their commander, whoſe orders were "not to fight till he came back again."

In the interim, Judas carried on a vigorous war againſt the Edomites; for, beſides the deſtruction of Hebron, they demoliſhed Mariſſa, and plundered Azotus, returning to Jeruſalem in all the pride of conqueſt.

At this time Antiochus, proceeding through his higher provinces, was informed of a rich city in Perſia, named Elymais, in which was a grand temple dedicated to Diana, containing ſumptuous preſents of all kinds, and, among the reſt, the ſhields and breaſt-plates of Alexander, ſon of Philip, king of Macedon. This information ſo ſtruck Antiochus, that he proceeded with his army to aſſault the place; but the inhabitants reſiſted bravely, drove him off, and purſued his forces even to Babylon, deſtroying numbers of them in the purſuit. While he was lamenting this defeat, news arrived that his other troops, who had been deſtined to attack the Jews, were diſcomfited, and that the ſtrength of thoſe people increaſed daily. Oppreſſed with theſe repeated misfortunes, he fell ſick; and finding himſelf near death, ſummoned his friends to attend him, and told them the cauſe of his diſorder. "My puniſhment (ſaid he) is but juſt, for profaning the temple of the Jews, and deſpiſing the God of heaven;" and having ſaid theſe words, he departed this life. I am aſtoniſhed at Polybius (otherwiſe a writer of credit) who aſcribes this judgment on Antiochus, to his deſign of rifling the temple of Diana: whereas his ſacrilege on the temple of Jeruſalem was actually committed; and the imputation of his calamities and death to that act, would have been therefore more reaſonable and juſt.

CHAP. VII.

ANTIOCHUS EUPATOR, Son and Succeſſor of ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, is proclaimed King by LYSIAS. JERUSALEM beſieged by JUDAS. ANTIOCHUS lays Siege to BETHSURA. The Death of ELEAZAR. JUDAS returns to the Siege of JERUSALEM. The Temple is bravely defended.

WHEN Antiochus found his death was approaching, he ſent for a confidential friend named Philip, to whom he committed the crown, royal robes, and ſignet, in truſt for his ſon Antiochus, then under age, adjuring him to ſuperintend the education of his ſon, and ſecure the crown till he ſhould be fit to govern. The event of his death, which happened in the year one hundred and forty-nine, was no ſooner announced, than Lyſias proclaimed his ſon king, by the name of Eupator.

Jeruſalem beſieged by Judas.

In the mean time, the Macedonians, who, with ſome revolted Jews, were ſtationed in Jeruſalem, ſallied out to prevent the Jews worſhipping in the temple, which was eaſily done, as it was commanded by the caſtle. Hereupon Judas ordered machines and battering-engines to be prepared, to aſſault the place; but while this was doing, ſundry perſons deſerted to Antiochus, and repreſented their unhappy ſituation, in obeying his commands, by which they were likely to become captives to Judas. On this the young prince ordered his troops to be collected, and diſciplined, and that new levies ſhould be raiſed, which ſoon produced an army of twenty thouſand horſe, one hundred thouſand foot, and thirty-two elephants. Thus provided, he marched from Antioch to Idumæa, and thence to Bethſura, a place fortified by art and nature. This place he aſſaulted in vain; for all his efforts were fruſtrated. In the interim Judas, hearing of his approach, raiſed the ſiege, marched to meet him, and pitched his tents about thirty furlongs from him, in the ſtreights of Bethzachariah. Antiochus leaving the Bethzarites, encamped near Judas, directing his army to march and arrange themſelves in order by day-day-light; but the narrowneſs of the place obliged them to go in defiles, one elephant preceding a thouſand foot and five hundred horſe; the elephants having on their backs caſtles filled with archers; while the other troops aſcended the hills, under the command of officers of experienced valour. They made the attack from this height with the loudeſt acclamations, ſo that the vallies re-echoed with the noiſe: but Judas received them undauntedly, and killed ſix hundred on the firſt attack. During the engagement, Eleazar, brother of Judas, obſerving an elephant more gaily capariſoned than the reſt, and preſuming that the king rode this beaſt, forced himſelf through the guards, killed ſeveral of his opponents, got under the elephant's belly, and wounded him mortally; but was himſelf cruſhed to death by the weight of the beaſt in falling.

Valiant exploit of Eleazar.

Antiochus takes Bethſura.

At length Judas, finding the number of the enemy too great for him, returned to the ſiege of Jeruſalem, while part of the army of Antiochus went to the ſame place, and the reſt to Bethſura. The number of troops, ſuperadded to the want of proviſions, ſo diſcouraged the people of Bethſura, that they agreed to deliver up the place, on condition that no violence ſhould be offered to them. As far as preſerving their lives, Antiochus kept his engagement, but drove the inhabitants naked from the town, and placed his own people in their ſtead. The temple, however, was obſtinately defended, every attack of the enemy being counter-worked: but the people were diſtreſſed for want of bread; for this happening when the ſtores of the laſt year were eaten, and in the ſeventh year, when the Jews, by their laws, could neither plow nor ſow, many of them abandoned the place in want of proviſions; ſo that very few were left to defend it.

He retires from the ſiege of Jeruſalem.

At this time the king, and Lyſias his general, received information that the government was uſurped by Philip, who was marching out of Perſia towards them, at the head of his army: on which they reſolved to abandon the ſiege, and attack him; but to keep their intention ſo ſecret, that neither officers nor ſoldiers ſhould judge of their deſign. To effect which, the king bade Lyſias repreſent to them the ſtrength of the place, and how tedious a buſineſs it would be to take it: that corn grew ſcarce; that the king was wanted in another place; and the beſt way would be to yield the people the uſe of their religion and laws, which being all they contended for, the king might depart at his pleaſure. This propoſal was highly acceptable to the army.

The temple delivered up to Antiochus, who breaks his engagement, and cauſes Onias to be ſlain.

This plan being laid, Antiochus ſent a meſſenger to offer peace to the beſieged, with full liberty of conſcience and the enjoyment of their rights, which he bound himſelf by oath to protect; on which they delivered up the temple: but he immediately, contrary to his engagements, levelled the walls with the ground, and carried the high-prieſt Onias (otherwiſe Menelaus) with him to Antioch. This was done in conſequence of the advice of Lyſias, who ſaid that Onias muſt be deſtroyed if ever he wiſhed to live at eaſe, or ſee the Jews in peaceable ſubjection, for he had inſtigated his father to compel them to a religion contrary to their opinion. Hereupon Onias was ſent to Berrhœa in Syria, where he was ſlain, by the king's order, after being high-prieſt ten years. Onias was a bad man, who, to ſecure himſelf in power, had cauſed the Jews to depart from their laws and worſhip. Alcimus, otherwiſe called Jacimus, was his ſucceſſor.

Philip having now aſſumed the government, Antiochus marched againſt, conquered, made him priſoner, and ordered his being put to death. The king having given the prieſthood to Alcimus, who was not of the ſacerdotal line, the young ſon of Onias departed to Ptolemy, king of Ægypt, and was received favourably by him and his queen Cleopatra, who gave him a port in Heliopolis, where he built a temple, modelled after that at Jeruſalem.

CHAP. VIII.

TRIPOLIS ſeized by DEMETRIUS. ANTIOCHUS and LYSIAS put to Death. JUDAS complained of to DEMETRIUS, by ALCIMUS. An Army ſent againſt JUDAS, and the Prieſthood ſettled on ALCIMUS. He puts the Friends of JUDAS to Death, and then flies for Support to DEMETRIUS.

Demetrius ſeizes on Tripolis, aſſumes the crown, and puts Antiochus and Lyſias to death.

ABOUT this time, Demetrius, the ſon of Seleucus, having fled from Rome, ſeized Tripolis, in Syria, aſſumed the crown, and invaded the country, the people of which readily ſubmitted, and delivered to him Antiochus and Lyſias as priſoners, whom he ordered to inſtant death. In the train of Demetrius were great numbers of profligate Jews, who had been baniſhed for various offences. Theſe were headed by Alcimus, the high-prieſt; they bitterly inveighed againſt the Jews in general, but particularly againſt Judas and his brethren, whom they accuſed of deſtroying numbers of the king's friends, and driving the complainants out of the country: they therefore deſired Demetrius to ſend ſome perſon to Judæa, to witneſs what devaſtation Judas had been guilty of.

Bacchides enſnares and ill-treats the Jews.

Hereupon Demetrius joined Bacchides, governor of Meſopotamia, in a commiſſion with Alcimus, and diſpatched them with an army, to attack Judas and his adherents. Bacchides marched from Antioch to Judæa, where he invited Judas to treat on terms of friendſhip: but his deſign was only to enſnare him. Judas reflecting that with ſuch an army he could not come as a friend, ſtood on his guard, and gave no credit to his profeſſions; but ſome of his people went over to the oppoſite party, preſuming that their countryman, Alcimus, Alcimus, would not injure them; eſpecially, as a ſolemn oath was ſworn that they ſhould be ſafe: but, in violation of this oath, Bacchides cauſed ſixty of them to be immediately ſlain; which perfidious act prevented any more from approaching him. This being done, Bacchides went to Bethſeth, where he cauſed ſeveral deſerters and other diſaffected people to be ſlain; and leaving part of his army to protect the province, he returned to Demetrius at Antioch, having firſt iſſued orders that Alcimus ſhould be obeyed in his abſence.

Alcimus inimical and cruel to the Jews.

During this period, the views of Alcimus were directed to ſecure himſelf in the office of high-prieſt; to effect which, he endeavoured to ingratiate himſelf with the people by fair words and obliging behaviour; by which he ſoon doubled the number of forces that had been left with him; but they conſiſted chiefly of renegades, deſtroying ſuch Jews as were friends to Judas, wherever they met them. Judas reflecting on this conduct of a ſet of abandoned wretches, had recourſe to the laws of retaliation againſt Alcimus, who finding himſelf unequal to the conteſt, retired haſtily to Demetrius, at Antioch, whom he irritated againſt Judas, ſetting forth the great miſchief he had already done, and the farther danger to be apprehended from him, unleſs an army was ſent to check his proceedings.

NICANOR ſent with an Army againſt JUDAS, and endeavours by Treachery to inveigle him. NICANOR's Army conquered by JUDAS, and himſelf ſlain. ALCIMUS dies ſuddenly. The People chuſe JUDAS for his Succeſſor. JUDAS forms an Alliance with the ROMANS.

Nicanor commiſſioned to attack Judas, and deſtroy his forces.

DEMETRIUS, uneaſy at the growing power of Judas, and fearful of its conſequences, gave the command of a large army to Nicanor, whom he commiſſioned to attack Judas, and afford no quarter to his troops. Nicanor proceeded on this commiſſion; but conſidering that his opponent might poſſibly be ruined by the arts of treachery, he ſent for Judas, to whom he ſaid. "Wherefore ſhould we riſk all on the uncertain chance of war, when we may better adjuſt matters by negociation? I pledge my moſt ſolemn oath for your ſecurity. Peace alone is my object; which you may imagine by the number of friends I have brought with me, to teſtify our maſter's goodwill and affection to all the Jewiſh race." This ſpeech had ſuch an effect, that Nicanor and his friends were received with frankneſs; on which Nicanor gave a hint to ſeize Judas: but the latter had the happineſs to diſcover the plot, and retreated in time to his own people. This detection of treachery put an end to all thought of treaty, and a battle was fought near Capharſalama, in which Judas was routed, and retired to the caſtle of Jeruſalem for refuge.

His treachery detected.

Nicanor happening to paſs near the temple, a number of prieſts and elders met him, and ſhewed him the ſacrifices they were going to offer for the happineſs of Demetrius. On this, Nicanor profanely ſwore, that if Judas was not delivered up to him, he would ſoon return, deſtroy the temple, and leave it in utter ruin. The prieſts, in great dejection, prayed that God would protect his temple and his miniſters from the fury of the foe. Nicanor now left Jeruſalem and encamped at Bethoron, where a great force from Syria joined him. In the interim Judas pitched his tents at Adaſi, about thirty furlongs from the enemy, having only a thouſand men under his command. He encouraged his troops by ſaying, that though the number of the enemy was great, they fought in the cauſe of God, whoſe power could cruſh multitudes; and adviſed them rather to think on their own valour, than the numbers they were to encounter. "Attack them courageouſly (ſaid he) and leave the reſt to heaven." A battle enſued, at firſt vigorous on both ſides; but Nicanor (after performing wonders of valour) being killed, and many of his forces, his people threw away their arms, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation. In the interim Judas purſued the fugitives, to whom he gave no quarter; proclaiming his victory by ſound of trumpet in all the cities and towns he paſſed through. This brought together the country people, who attacked the fugitives with ſuch fury, that not a man eſcaped of the whole army, which had conſiſted of nine thouſand. This happened on the thirteenth of the month Adar, in the memory of which we to this day celebrate an annual thankſgiving. After this victory, the Jews had ſome reſpite from war, and hope of future peace; but this was of ſhort continuance.

Nicanor killed, and his army routed.

Death of Alcimus, the high-prieſt, who is ſucceeded by Judas.

The high-prieſt, Alcimus, now gave orders for pulling down the old wall of the ſanctuary, and demoliſhing the whole works of the ancient prophets: but had no ſooner ſpoken than he dropped down ſpeechleſs to the ground, languiſhed awhile, and then died, after having been high-prieſt four years. On his death, the people unanimouſly choſe Judas to ſucceed him. The new high-prieſt was diſpoſed to enter into a league with the Romans, from their fame in conquering the Gauls, Spaniards, Carthaginians, &c. Hereupon he diſpatched his friends, Eupolemus the ſon of John, and Jaſon the ſon of Eleazar, as embaſſadors to Rome, requeſting that they might be received as allies, and that Demetrius might be applied to, not to trouble the Jews any farther. This propoſal proved agreeable to the ſenate, who conſented to the league, cauſed this conſent to be engraved on tables of braſs, depoſited the original in the capitol, and ſent a copy of it to Jeruſalem. The purport of the articles was, "That no people ſubject to the Romans ſhould hereafter make war on the Jews, or ſupply their enemies with money, ſhipping, corn, &c. and that the Jews ſhould be be held to the ſame terms, in caſe the Romans ſhould be attacked. That if the Jews demanded any future alteration of their agreement, the conſent of the whole people ſhould be neceſſary to ratify it." Eupolemus the ſon of John, Jaſon ſon of Eleazar, Judas the high-prieſt, and Simon his brother, commander of the army, regiſtered this reſolution of the ſenate. This is the firſt alliance which the Jews and the Romans made.

CHAP. X.

DEMETRIUS ſends BACCHIDES into JUDEA, with an Army. JUDAS encounters him with only eight hundred Men. The Magnanimity of JUDAS.

Bacchides ſent into Judea with an army.

DEMETRIUS hearing of the death of Nicanor, and the defeat of the army, diſpatched Bacchides again into Judea, with freſh troops. This general encamped at Arbela, a town of Galilee, where he forced many Jews from the caves to which they had retreated. Hence he repaired to Jeruſalem, where he learnt that Judas and his aſſociates were at Bethſeth, to which place he marched with twenty-two thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe; while Judas had only a thouſand men, two hundred of whom deſerted him. Thus diſtreſſed for men, and having no opportunity of recruiting his forces, yet Judas reſolved to hazard a battle, and encouraged his people to ſtand by him in all extremities. They repreſented to him how vain an attempt it would be, to engage againſt ſuch ſuperior numbers; and adviſed him rather to retreat with caution, and recruit his forces. To this Judas replied, "It ſhall never be ſaid of me that I turn my back to an enemy. If it be the will of God that we now fall, let his will be done; but let us not, by an ignominious death, deſtroy all the credit of a life of glory." His ſoldiers were ſo animated by this ſpeech that they reſolved to abide the conteſt.

Battle between Judas and Bacchides, in which the former nobly dies in defence of his country.

The army of Bacchides was diſpoſed in the following manner. The front was compoſed of light armed men and archers, ſupported by a body of Macedonians, while there were two wings of horſe, the right wing being commanded by Bacchides. In this diſpoſition they advanced towards the enemy, ſounded a charge, gave a loud ſhout, and began the attack. The forces of Judas ſuſtained the ſhock bravely. The battle continued from morning till near ſun-ſet, when Judas ſeeing Bacchides with his right wing preſſing hard on his men, relieved them with a band of courageous youths, who broke their line, and purſued them as far as Aza. The left wing of the enemy now purſued Judas ſo cloſely, that, ſeeing no chance of eſcape, he and his adherents determined to ſell their lives dearly, and fought their enemies till they were overcome through mere fatigue. Judas being killed in the battle, his troops fled; but his brothers, Simon and Jonathan, having prevailed on the enemy to give them his body, carried it to Modim, where it was interred with great pomp, in the family ſepulchre, and a public mourning of ſeveral days appointed in honour of his memory. Thus died Judas Maccabæus, a brave and benevolent man, who forgot not the injunction of his father Matthias, who commanded him to decline no danger in defence of his countrymen; in compliance with which injunction, he obtained great honour while he was three years high-prieſt; and by relieving his friends from the hands of the Macedonians.

Malice of the apoſtate Jews.

IMMEDIATELY after the death of Judas, the apoſtate Jews reſumed their ancient enmity, and perſecuted their honeſt countrymen with more malice than before. A general famine now ſpread over the land; ſo that through diſtreſs for bread on one hand, and the difficulty of defending themſelves againſt their enemies on the other, many of the Jews were in a manner compelled to adhere to the faction of the Macedonians. Bacchides now entrusted a principal share of the government to the apostate Jews, who seized the former friends of Judas, and delivered them to Bacchides, who tortured them to death. The Jews were never so deplorably miserable since the Babylonish captivity, as at this period: so that the late adherents of Judas entreated Jonathan to follow his brother's example, in risking his life for the liberties of his country; and besought him to assume the command, for without a leader they must be all lost. Jonathan replied, that he was ready to do or suffer any thing for the public welfare; on which he was elected general, by common consent.

Jonathan succeeding his brother Judas, Bacchides lays snares for him.

Bacchides hearing of this election, and considering that Jonathan was not less likely to give trouble to the Macedonians than his brother Judas, concerted how he might destroy him; but himself and his brother Simon having intelligence of such a design, collected what force he could, withdrew to a neighbouring desert, and pitched their tents near the pool of Asphar. Bacchides considering this retreat as a flight, marched his army after them, and encamped beyond Jordan. Jonathan being informed hereof, sent his brother John to the Arabian Nabathites, requesting permission to leave his baggage with them, till he had fought Bacchides; but the sons of Amaræus having notice of this embassy, sallied from Medaba, took the baggage and carriages, and killed John and all his people; but this outrage was afterwards properly revenged.

John, brother of Jonathan, slain by the enemy.

Jonathan attacked by Bacchides, whom he repulses.

Intelligence being given to Bacchides where Jonathan was encamped, he fixed on the sabbath to attack him, presuming that his people would not fight on that day; but Jonathan representing that, as the enemy was before, and the river behind, they had no chance of escape without fighting, they appealed to heaven for the success of their cause, and instantly attacked the enemy, of whom they killed great numbers. In the interim, Bacchides assailed Jonathan, and made a furious stroke at him, which he parried, and retreated with his people to the other side of the river, whither the enemy durst not follow them. Bacchides, having lost near two thousand men, retired to Jerusalem, which he fortified in the strongest manner, and kept in it as hostages the sons of the principal men of the country. He likewise fortified Jericho, Emmaus, Bethoron, Bethel, Thamnatha, Pharathon, Techoa, and Gazara; which places were supplied with garrisons, ready to make excursions on the Jews.

Jonathan and Simon fall upon the enemy, as they are celebrating a wedding.

About this time, Jonathan and Simon received intelligence of a pompous wedding to be celebrated between one of the sons of Amaræus, and the daughter of an Arabian of distinction. The wedding was to be attended by the sons of Amaræus, and the bride to be escorted from the city of Gabatha, in great splendor. This opportunity was seized to revenge the death of John; and the brothers, having placed an ambush in the mountains, hurried towards Madaba, to attack the people who were to attend the wedding. The bride and bridegroom, with four hundred friends, including wives and children, making their appearance, the party rushed out, destroyed them all, and carried off the whole booty; after which they retreated to their former station.

The apostates solicit Demetrius, that Jonathan and his party may be taken off.

Bacchides, having left garrisons in Judæa, returned home, and the Jews remained in some sort of peace for two years; a circumstance that gave great disturbance to the apostates, who solicited Demetrius to destroy Jonathan and his people, which they said might be effected by surprise in a single night. This proposition being acceded to by the king, he sent Bacchides on this business into Judæa, who, on his arrival, dispatched letters to the king's officers and friends in the country, to assist in making Jonathan captive. Hereupon they contrived how they might get him into their hands; but Jonathan having been forewarned, acted cautiously, so that several repeated trials failed; which so exasperated Bacchides, that he attributed the ill success of the undertaking to the treachery of the apostate Jews, who, he said, trifled with the royal orders; and he put fifty of their principal men to death, in the first transports of his rage. At length Jonathan and his brother, finding Bacchides too powerful for them, retired into the wilderness, and raised walls round the village of Bethalaga, to serve them for a retreat on an emergency.

Bacchides besieges Jonathan, in Bethalaga, who by stratagem defeats his design.

Bacchides being informed hereof, marched towards them with all his forces, and being joined by a body of Jews, began the attack of Bethalaga, which he continued for several days; during which it was obstinately defended. Matters being thus situated, Jonathan, having committed the defence of the place to his brother Simon, collected a number of forces in the neighbourhood, and marching privately in the night, attacked Bacchides in his encampment, killing great numbers of his people. Simon soon discovered that this havock was made by his brother; on which he sallied forth, burnt the enemy's works, destroyed many of their forces, and returned to his intrenchments. This double attack, and the failure of an attempt in which he thought himself sure of succeeding, almost distracted Bacchides; but he laid all the blame on the apostate Jews, who advised the king in this business. His only concern now was how to draw off his army without disgrace either to himself or his sovereign.

CHAP. II.

A League betwixt JONATHAN and BACCHIDES, the latter of whom quits JUDÆA. JONATHAN fixes on MACHMAS as the Place of his Residence.

Jonathan and Bacchides conclude a peace.

BACCHIDES was now deliberating how to act; when Jonathan having received an intimation of what was paſſing in his mind, diſpatched a meſſenger to him, with propoſals for a league of mutual friendſhip, on condition of the exchange of priſoners. Bacchides ſaw in this propoſal ſo fair an opportunity of his abandoning the ſiege without diſgrace, that he immediately acceded thereto: on which the priſoners were exchanged on both ſides, and the reſpective commanders bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath that no farther hoſtilities ſhould be committed. This agreement being ratified, Bacchides returned to Antioch to the king, and never again entered Judæa with his army. This ſtate of peace and ſafety was very acceptable to Jonathan, who retreated to Machmas, where he employed his time in the diſtribution of law and juſtice, and the other cares of government. He was zealous in aſſerting the laws, and clearing the country of falſe brethren, and falſe worſhip.

Alexander ſeizes Ptolemais in Syria, and Demetrius marches againſt him.

Alexander, the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes, aided by a confederacy of the ſoldiers in garriſon at Ptolemais in Syria, took poſſeſſion of that place, in the year one hundred and ſixty. This confederacy aroſe from an averſion the ſoldiers had to Demetrius, whoſe pride and indolence were ſuch, that he immured himſelf in one of his fortified caſtles near Antioch, where he was excluded from all viſitors, and ſpent his time in the moſt indolent manner, wholly neglecting the cares of the government, a circumſtance that produced him many enemies: but on this news of Alexander having taken poſſeſſion of Ptolemais, he aſſembled his army, and marched to give him battle.

Alliance between Demetrius and Jonathan.

On the occaſion above-mentioned, Demetrius diſpatched meſſengers with letters to Jonathan, propoſing a firm alliance between them. This was done to prevent Alexander being firſt in a propoſal of the kind, in reſentment of the inſults and injuries he had formerly ſuſtained. Theſe letters intimated that Jonathan ſhould raiſe men, provide arms, and ſet at liberty thoſe hoſtages who had been committed priſoners to the caſtle by Bacchides. On receipt of the diſpatches Jonathan repaired to Jeruſalem, where he read them publicly to the ſoldiers and the people. The fugitives and profligates in the citadel were ſurpriſed at this ſudden return of Jonathan to favour: but he proceeded to make his levies, and gave liberty to the hoſtages, with orders for them to return in ſafety to their friends. Jonathan now took up his reſidence at Jeruſalem, which he altered, repaired and fortified, erecting for its defence ſtrong walls, compoſed of ſtones of a prodigious ſize. On this alteration of Jeruſalem, thoſe Macedonians who had been ſtationed in different garriſons through the country, retired to Antioch: while the Jewiſh deſerters, and others, who were at Bethſura, and in the tower of Jeruſalem, remained in their preſent ſituation, not thinking it ſafe for them to retreat.

Jonathan repairs and fortifies Jeruſalem.

The character of Jonathan, his valour and courageous actions againſt the Macedonians, and the inſults that had been offered him both by Demetrius and Bacchides, were not unknown to Alexander; who having been informed of the late offers and pretenſions of Demetrius, aſſembled his friends, and repreſented to them that nothing could be more prudent than an alliance with Jonathan. The council being of the ſame opinion, Alexander immediately diſpatched an embaſſy with a letter to the following purport:

Jonathan made high-prieſt.

"ALEXANDER the King, to JONATHAN his Brother, greeting.

"HAVING long ſince been informed of thy character for honour, faith and courage, and deeming thee every way worthy our beſt regards, we have diſpatched embaſſadors to offer thee our friendſhip and alliance, and have commiſſioned them to treat of the ſame: and by theſe preſents, and our royal authority, we conſtitute and ordain thee high-prieſt of the Jews, and rank thee in the number of the king's friends; and we likewiſe preſent thee with a crown of gold and a purple robe: entertaining no doubt of a proper return being made by thee for this inſtance of our regard and eſteem."

On the arrival of this embaſſy, which happened on the day of the feaſt of tabernacles, Jonathan put on the robe of the high-prieſt; preciſely at the end of four years from the death of his brother Judas, during which time the office had been vacant: and from henceforward Jonathan was diligent to increaſe his troops, and provide more arms.

Battle between Alexander and Demetrius, in which the latter is killed.

At this period Alexander aſſembled a large army, partly compoſed of ſuch as had gone over to him from Demetrius, in Syria, and partly of his own troops, with which he advanced to attack the enemy. Soon after the battle commenced, the right wing of Alexander's forces was preſſed hard by the left of Demetrius, who puſhed their advantage even to the plundering of the camp: but Alexander's troops forced the oppoſite column, where Demetrius fought in perſon, till it was totally routed. Demetrius acted wonders, killing, and purſuing his enemies, and defending himſelf; till at length his horſe plunged into a bog, and being oppreſſed by multitudes, he was obliged to yield; which, however, he diſdained for ſome time to do, fighting on foot till his body was covered with darts and arrows. Thus died Demetrius, at the end of a reign of eleven years.

CHAP. III.

ONIAS propoſes to build a Temple in EGYPT, like that in JERUSALEM. A Diſpute between the JEWS and SAMARITANS, concerning the true Temple.

Temple. The matter referred to the King, who declares in favour of JERUSALEM.

Propoſal of Onias to build a temple in Egypt.

AT this time Onias, the ſon of Onias the high-prieſt, dwelt in a kind of exile with Ptolemy Philometer at Alexandria. This Onias, conſidering how Judæa had been ravaged by the Macedonians, and with a view to acquire fame to himſelf, determined to try to obtain permiſſion of Ptolemy, and his queen Cleopatra, to build a temple in Ægypt ſimilar to that at Jeruſalem, in which he propoſed that prieſts and Levites of his own family ſhould officiate. He was inſpired with this idea by a prediction of the prophet Iſaiah, of ſix hundred years ſtanding, intimating, that in future ages a Jew ſhould erect a temple in Ægypt to the glory of God.

The grant being made, Onias began immediately to build the temple, and raiſe the altar, on the plan of that at Jeruſalem, though the dimenſions were much leſs. When the building was finiſhed, he found a number of prieſts and Levites of his own ſentiments, to perform the ſeveral parts of divine worſhip.

Diſpute between the Jews and Samaritans, concerning their temples, referred to the king;

About this period a moſt violent diſpute happened at Alexandria, between the Jews and Samaritans, the latter of whom had built a temple at Gerizim, in the time of Alexander the Great. This diſpute, which regarded the temple, and the mode of worſhipping, ſtood as follows: the Jews inſiſted that there was no temple authorized by the laws of Moſes, but that at Jeruſalem; while the Samaritans were equally ſanguine for the temple of Gerizim. Both parties agreed to refer the diſpute to the deciſion of the king and his miniſters, with allowance that counſel might be heard on each ſide, and that the party in the wrong ſhould ſuffer death. Andronicus, the ſon of Meſſalan, was appointed to plead for the Jews, and Sabbæus and Theodoſius for the Samaritans. Both parties were bound on oath before God and the king, to offer nothing contrary to law. The Jews of Alexandria were uneaſy for their advocate, and grieved to think that any doubt ſhould be made of the ſacred authority of the temple of Jeruſalem, the nobleſt ſtructure in the univerſe. The king having ſummoned his counſellors to try the iſſue, a debate aroſe who ſhould ſpeak firſt; when Sabbæus and Theodoſius yielding that point to Andronicus, he began by ſtating the antiquity and ſanctity of the temple at Jeruſalem; proved the legality of its original foundation: diſplayed the regular order of the prieſthood through a ſucceſſion of ages; adverted to the ſplendor and dignity of the place, as it had been at all times celebrated; and ſpoke of the magnificent bounty of the kings of Aſia towards it; whereas the temple of Gerizim had been little more noticed than if no ſuch place had ever been built. Theſe pleadings determined the king in favour of the temple of Jeruſalem, and he accordingly gave ſentence of death againſt Sabbæus and Theodoſius.

Who decides in favour of that in Jeruſalem.

Marriage of Alexander with Cleopatra.

Demetrius being dead (as hath been heretofore mentioned) Alexander aſſumed the government of Syria; ſoon after which he wrote a letter to Ptolemy Philometer, propoſing a match between himſelf and his daughter; and intimating that there would be no diſgrace in an alliance, after the conqueſt of Demetrius, and the recovery of a kingdom which was his own in right of his father. This propoſal was highly ſatisfactory to Ptolemy, who ſent a letter to Demetrius, congratulating him on his late ſucceſs, promiſing to beſtow his daughter on him in marriage. He farther promiſed to meet him at Ptolemais, with his daughter, where the wedding ſhould be celebrated. Soon after writing this letter, Ptolemy took his daughter to the appointed place, where Alexander attending, the parties were married, and he received as a wedding portion, a ſum becoming the dignity of the father.

High honours conferred on Jonathan.

Alexander invited the high-prieſt Jonathan to the wedding, where both the monarchs received him in a diſtinguiſhed manner, and made him large preſents; Alexander particularly directing him to wear a purple robe on the occaſion, and take a ſeat next himſelf on the throne; and giving orders to his principal officers to attend him into the city, and proclaim that no man ſhould inſult, abuſe, or otherwiſe ill-treat him, on pain of abiding the conſequences. Some enemies of Jonathan had come to the place, with a view to defame him; but on this gracious declaration they abſconded, in apprehenſion of the ill conſequences that might ariſe to themſelves.

CHAP. IV.

An Army conducted into CILICIA by DEMETRIUS NICANOR. JONATHAN routs APOLLONIUS, whom he purſues to AZOTUS, and fires the Temple of DAGON. PTOLEMY marches to join ALEXANDER. PTOLEMY takes his Daughter from ALEXANDER, and marries her to DEMETRIUS. ALEXANDER defeated by PTOLEMY and DEMETRIUS. The Citadel of JERUSALEM beſieged by JONATHAN. The Army of the latter diſcharged, and their Affections loſt.

Demetrius enters Cilicia with an army.

DEMETRIUS the younger, being ſupplied with a body of troops that Laſthenes had hired, embarked and ſailed with them from Crete into Cilicia, in the year 165. This alarmed Alexander, who inſtantly marched from Phœnicia to Antioch, to ſecure his affairs before the arrival of Demetrius; but Alexander leaving the care of Cœlo-Syria to Apollonius, he marched an army into Jamnia, where he ſent a challenge to the high-prieſt, Jonathan, accuſing him for living at eaſe, and withdrawing himſelf from the public ſervice: defying him to meet him with his ſword in the open field, and putting the iſſue on their ſingle conteſt: boaſting, likewiſe, that he was at the head of a number number of the braveſt men in the empire, whoſe valour had frequently made the anceſtors of Jonathan yield.

Jonathan drives Apollonius from Joppa, and purſues him to Azotus.

On this defiance, Jonathan, with his brother Simon, and ten thouſand ſelect men, marched from Jeruſalem, and encamped at Joppa, the gates of which were ſhut by a garriſon of Apollonius, which ſoon ſurrendered, on Jonathan's preparing to attack the place. Apollonius hearing that Jonathan was in poſſeſſion of Joppa, marched, and encamped in the fields near that place. Hereupon Jonathan advanced, and purſued him towards Azotus; but when Apollonius found him on a particular ſpot, he faced about to engage, having firſt planted a thouſand horſe to attack Jonathan in the rear: but he being aware of this diſpoſition, formed his men in a ſquare figure, to fight every way. Jonathan ordered his brother Simon to charge the body of the enemy, while his own men ſhould only receive the darts and arrows which fell on their bucklers. In this ſituation they ſtood ſo cloſe, that nothing could penetrate them; and when the enemy was fatigued by this fruitleſs mode of attack, the troops of Simon broke in, and put the main body to flight. Jonathan purſued them to Azotus, killed numbers of the fugitives, and drove the reſt into the temple of Dagon, which he burnt to the ground: nor did he ſtop here; for he ſet fire to the city, and to ſeveral adjacent villages. It was reckoned that about eight thouſand men were either ſlain or burnt. Jonathan having defeated this army, advanced to Aſkalon, and encamped near that city, the inhabitants of which brought him preſents, as a teſtimony of their eſteem, which he gratefully received, and then went back in triumph to Jeruſalem, laden with ſpoils. Alexander pretended to be greatly pleaſed with this defeat of Apollonius, who, he ſaid, had undertaken the expedition againſt a friend and ally without his conſent; and in token of his approbation of Jonathan's conduct, he made him governor of Accaron, and preſented him with a golden buckle, a gift heretofore peculiar to the royal family.

He burns the temple of Dagon, and ſets fire to the city, &c.

Ptolemy kindly entertains Jonathan.

About this period Ptolemy Philometer arrived in Syria, with land and ſea-forces, to aſſiſt Alexander, his ſon-in-law. Agreeable to the king's order, he was received with univerſal reſpect, except at Azotus, where the people complained of the burning of the temple of Dagon, and reviled Jonathan, who had ravaged the country with fire and ſword. Jonathan met Ptolemy at Joppa, conducted him to the river Eleutherus, and then returned to Jeruſalem, having been received with great marks of diſtinction.

Alexander lays a ſnare for Ptolemy;

Ptolemy arriving at the city of Ptolemais, had nearly fallen a ſacrifice to the treachery of Alexander, on a plan concerted by Ammonius. The plot being diſcovered, Ptolemy wrote to Alexander, and demanded juſtice on the delinquent: but Alexander refuſed to deliver him, confeſſing that himſelf had a ſhare in the plot: on which Ptolemy conceived a mortal hatred to him. Ammonius afterwards loſt his life, while he was ſeeking his ſafety in the diſguiſe of a woman's dreſs.

who takes his daughter Cleopatra from Alexander.

The above-mentioned conduct of Alexander ſo diſguſted Ptolemy, that he took his daughter from him, and engaged in a league with Demetrius, on condition of being reſtored to his father's kingdom, and receiving the hand of Cleopatra in marriage. Demetrius was equally pleaſed with the wife, and the propoſed terms; but Ptolemy had no eaſy matter to procure the conſent of the people to receive, as a king, the man whom they deemed an enemy: but their hatred to Alexander was ſo great that they complied. Hereupon Ptolemy entered into Antioch, where the citizens and ſoldiers proclaimed him king of Aſia and Ægypt. He was a man of honour, diſcretion and temperance, and ſo conducted his affairs, as to afford ſatisfaction to his own people without giving diſguſt to the Romans. Having ſummoned a council of the people of Antioch, he adviſed them to receive Demetrius as king; hoped that all paſt enmity would be forgotten, on a ſenſe of the preſent obligation; ſaid that he would himſelf be bound for his faithful execution of the truſt repoſed, and that he would content himſelf with the government of Ægypt only. Theſe arguments procured the regal government to Demetrius, by conſent of the people.

Ptolemy and his ſon-in-law Demetrius overcome Alexander.

A vaſt army brought out of Cilicia, under the command of Alexander, was now ravaging Syria, and the country round Antioch, with fire and ſword. Hereupon Ptolemy and Demetrius attacked, routed him, and compelled him to fly to Arabia. During this battle, Ptolemy's horſe, being frightened by the braying of an elephant, threw him, and his enemies wounded him in many parts of the head, ſo that he muſt have died on the ſpot, but was reſcued by ſome of his guards. He lay ſpeechleſs four days; but on the fifth he began to recover, when the head of Alexander, which had been cut off by Zebelus, an Arabian prince, was preſented to him; but he died ſoon after he had pleaſed himſelf with the ſight. The above-mentioned Alexander reigned five years, and was ſucceeded by Demetrius, who appears to have been of a cruel diſpoſition, from his treatment of Ptolemy's ſoldiers, to whom he owed obligations on his marriage with Cleopatra. This conduct ſo diſguſted the ſoldiers, that they left their elephants behind them, and went to Alexandria.

Jeruſalem beſieged by Jonathan.

At this period, the high-prieſt Jonathan, having collected what forces he could in Judæa, laid ſiege to Jeruſalem, to expel the garriſon of Macedonians, and drive out the Jews who had taken ſanctuary. The people in the place at firſt defied Jonathan; but ſoon ſent out ſcouts to demand ſuccour of Demetrius, who inſtantly marched from Antioch, and arriving at Ptolemais, ſent to Jonathan to attend him. On this the latter took preſents of gold and ſilver, fine robes, and other valuable effects, which he gave to Demetrius, being attended by the prieſts and elders: but during this time the ſiege went forward as before. The king, equally gratified by the preſents, and the behaviour of thoſe who offered them, confirmed Jonathan in the office of high-prieſt; and was ſo far from paying regard to the calumnious inſinuations of the apoſtate Jews, that upon Jonathan's requeſting an abatement of three hundred talents for the tribute of Judæa, with the dependent provinces of Samaria, Joppa, and Galilee, he ſent away the following diſpatches:

"DEMETRIUS the King greets his Brother JONATHAN, and the reſt of the JEWISH Nation.

"YOU are hereby to underſtand that we have lately written a letter to our truſty and well-beloved couſin Laſthenes, a copy of which is herewith tranſmitted.

"DEMETRIUS the King, to his Father LASTHENES, greeting.

"SUCH is the ſenſe we entertain of the return that our friends, the Jews, have from time to time made to our good will, that we are reſolved to give them ſome diſtinguiſhing teſtimony of our eſteem. Wherefore we hereby command that the governments of Aphereima, Lydda, and Ramatha, with all the lands dependent on them, which were taken from the Samaritans, be aſſigned to the uſe of Judæa: and we exempt the prieſts at Jeruſalem from all taxes heretofore paid to our anceſtors, as well thoſe called crown taxes, and on ſalt-pits, as thoſe on corn and fruit: and we command that for the future nothing of the kind be demanded. Take care that a copy of this letter be ſent to Jonathan, and let it be hung up in a diſtinguiſhed part of the holy temple."

All things being now in a peaceable train, Demetrius diſmiſſed his army without giving them their full pay; and retained only a number of mercenary troops, which had been collected in Crete, and other adjacent iſlands. This diſcharge of the troops, without gratuity, alienated the affections of his people; for his anceſtors had been accuſtomed to keep them in pay, in peace as well as in war.

CHAP. V.

TRYPHON's Revolt, and treacherous Conduct. The Citadel beſieged by JONATHAN. ANTIOCHUS crowned by TRYPHON. DEMETRIUS defeated. He encamps before CEDASA. JONATHAN's Troops deſert him; but are rallied, and obtain the Victory. His Embaſſy to ROME and LACEDÆMON. Account of the PHARISEES, SADDUCEES, and ESSENES. ARSACES defeats DEMETRIUS, and takes him Priſoner.

THE uneaſineſs which prevailed among the troops of Demetrius, being remarked by Tryphon, a native of Apamia, and heretofore one of Alexander's officers, he applied to Malchus, tutor to Antiochus, ſon of Alexander, repreſenting the diſpoſition of Demetrius's troops, and offering to reſtore Antiochus to the throne of his father. Malchus heſitated: but was at length induced to comply, and committed Antiochus to the care of Tryphon. Tryphon offers to reſtore Antiochus to the throne of his father.

During this period, Jonathan was beſieging the city of Jeruſalem; he reſolved to expel the fugitive Jews from the garriſon, as well as from other fortreſſes in the country. On this occaſion he ſent meſſengers with farther preſents to Demetrius, requeſting him to withdraw his men from the fortreſſes. Demetrius anſwered, that he was willing to oblige him in that, and more important concerns, as ſoon as the war ſhould be ended; and intreated him, by the rites of friendſhip, to ſend him a ſupply of forces, as his own people had fled to the enemy. Jonathan ſent him three thouſand men, in conſequence of this requeſt. Jonathan reinforces the army of Demetrius.

Demetrius, both on his father's account, and his own, was now become extremely obnoxious to the people of Antioch: inſomuch that, on hearing of the aid from Jonathan, they aſſembled in arms, and ſurrounded the palace, as if with a view to attack it: but their intention was to ſeize him on his coming out. Hereupon Demetrius drew up his hired troops, and thoſe ſent by Jonathan, and attacked the aſſailants; but ſuperior numbers obliged them to retreat into the palace, from the battlements of which they threw darts and arrows at the enemy, which obliged them to take ſhelter in different houſes. The Jews now fired the city, the houſes of which ſtanding cloſe, and the buildings being chiefly of wood, burnt with great fury. The inhabitants fled from houſe to houſe, the Jews purſuing and deſtroying them. Their whole care now was to ſave their wives and children: but ſtill the Jews, taking advantage of the confuſion, in obedience to the king's order, killed great numbers, and obliged the reſt to lay down their arms, and ſurrender at diſcretion. Thus ended the battle; Demetrius pardoned the rebels, and gave the ſpoils to the Jews, whom he ſent back to Jonathan, with acknowledgements that the victory was owing to their valour: but he did not long continue in this diſpoſition; but threatened to attack Jonathan, if the ſame tribute which the Jews had formerly paid to his anceſtors, were not paid to himſelf. This threat would have been made good, but that Tryphon arriving with young Antiochus, placed the crown on his head, and being aſſiſted by the ſoldiers, from whom Demetrius had with-held their accuſtomed pay, attacked the latter, conquered him in a ſea-engagement, ſeized on his elephants, made capture of the city of Antioch, and compelled him to retreat to Cilicia for ſafety. The diſcontented Antiochians attempt to ſeize on Demetrius. The Jews burn the city. Ingratitude of Demetrius to Jonathan.

Antiochus

Jonathan greatly honoured by Antiochus.

Antiochus now ſent an expreſs to Jonathan, confirming to him the office of high-prieſt, putting him in poſſeſſion of the four governments annexed to Judæa, and giving the command of his forces, from Tyre to Sidon, to his brother Simon. He likewiſe enrolled him in the liſt of his friends, and ſent him ſeveral drinking cups of gold, with a gold buckle, purple robes, &c. commiſſioning him to wear theſe badges of dignity. Theſe marks of diſtinction ſo ſtruck Jonathan, that he ſent a joint meſſage to Antiochus and Tryphon, offering to unite with them againſt Demetrius as a common enemy.

He brings over ſeveral cities to eſpouſe his cauſe.

Jonathan being commiſſioned to raiſe forces, attempted it in Syria, Phœnicia, and the towns and cities adjacent; but though he was received with reſpect, he got no troops. Hence he went to Aſkalon, where he was received in form, and had preſents made him: here he repreſented to the people, that it was their intereſt to aſſiſt Antiochus againſt Demetrius: and they promiſed to take arms. Proceeding to Gaza, on the ſame deſign, the gates were ſhut againſt him, and the people reſolved to adhere to Demetrius. Hereupon Jonathan divided his army, aſſaulting the town with one part, while the country was burnt and laid waſte by the other. The inhabitants neither finding relief, nor having hope of any from Demetrius, and ſeeing no proſpect but of deſtruction before them, ſent deputies to make ſubmiſſion to Jonathan, who received them in the moſt friendly manner; accepted their propoſals, and ſent their hoſtages to Jeruſalem, while he proceeded towards Damaſcus.

Simon takes the fortreſs of Bethſura.

In the interim Demetrius had a large army encamped near Cedaſa, bordering on Tyre and Galilee, with a view to entice Jonathan out of his way: but he continued his route, leaving the care of Judæa to his brother Simon; who, aſſembling what force he could, marched and attacked the ſtrong fortreſs of Bethſura, then in poſſeſſion of the partizans of Demetrius. The people in the garriſon, apprehenſive that they ſhould all be put to the ſword, requeſted Simon's permiſſion to march unmoleſted to Demetrius: which he granted; and placed another garriſon in their ſtead.

Jonathan defeats the army of Demetrius.

By this time Jonathan was advanced into the plain of Aſor, where he had no idea of any oppoſition: but one of Demetrius's parties, having notice of his march, lay in ambuſh behind a mountain, while the main body advanced to attack him on the plain. Jonathan gave the beſt orders the ſhortneſs of the time would permit: but the Jews, ſeeing the ambuſh, were afraid of being ſurrounded by two parties, and precipitately fled. So general was the terror, that only fifty gallant fellows remained with Jonathan, and the two captains, Mattathias, the ſon of Abſalom, and Judas, the ſon of Chapſæus. Theſe charged the enemy in front, in ſo deſperate a manner, that the forces of Demetrius heſitated; on which thoſe who had deſerted from Jonathan returned, attacked them, killed near two thouſand, and followed the reſt even to their tents at Cedaſa.

His embaſſy to Rome and Lacedæmon.

This victory being obtained, Jonathan returned to Jeruſalem, whence he diſpatched embaſſadors to Rome, to renew former alliances, with directions to come back by way of Lacedæmon, on buſineſs of a ſimilar nature. The Romans received the embaſſadors with high reſpect, and diſmiſſed them with letters, recommending that ſafe paſſage might be granted them by the kings of Europe and Aſia.

Sects among the Jews.

At this time the Jews were divided into three ſects, called Phariſees, Sadducees, and Eſſenes. The opinion of the Phariſees was, that, in ſome inſtances, men were left to their own will, and in others over-ruled by a particular fate. The Sadducees held that a man's condition was in all caſes determined by his own conduct, without any interference of providence; while the Eſſenes contended that an irreſiſtible fate over-ruled every action.

Various manœuvres of the adverſe armies

Jonathan being informed that the forces of Demetrius, which were now augmented, were advancing towards him, haſtened to meet them at Amathis, reſolved to oppoſe their entrance into Judæa. He encamped about fifty furlongs from them, whence he ſent ſpies to diſcover their deſign; who taking ſome priſoners, learnt from them that it was intended to ſurprize him in his encampment. Hereupon he arranged every thing for his defence, fixed centinels at the out-poſts, and kept his men under arms all night, previouſly acquainting them with what was intended. Demetrius's commanders learning that their plan had been divulged, were puzzled how to act, for they were not able to make an open attack: wherefore they decamped in the night, covering their retreat by a number of fires. At day-break Jonathan marched to attack them; when finding the camp abandoned, he purſued them with all expedition; but in vain, for they had retreated to a ſecure place beyond the river Eleutherus. He now therefore purſued his courſe to Arabia, plundered the country of the Nabathæans, took multitudes of their cattle, and made many priſoners, which he took to Damaſcus, and ſold.

Joppa taken by Simon.

Mean time Simon proceeded through Judæa and Palæſtine, and fortified all defenſible places, even to Aſkalon: which being done, he went forward to Joppa, which he poſſeſſed himſelf of, and placed a garriſon in it, to prevent the place being delivered to Demetrius by the inhabitants.

The city and temple fortified.

When things were in this ſituation, Jonathan and Simon retired to Jeruſalem, and the people being ſummoned to the temple by the high-prieſt, were directed to repair the walls of the city, fortify them with towers, and to cut off the communication betwixt the city and caſtle by another wall: likewiſe to put the whole country in a ſtate of defence by proper garriſons. This advice being approved, Jonathan committed to his brother's care the country department, taking that of the city on himſelf.

Arſaces defeats Demetrius, and takes him priſoner.

By this time Demetrius had got into Meſopotamia, propoſing to ravage that country, and reduce Babylon. His plan was, to fix the ſeat of war in the upper provinces, provinces, the Greek and Macedonian inhabitants of which had invited him thither, with promiſes of obedience, and offers of aſſiſtance againſt Arſaces, king of Parthia. Encouraged hereby, and thinking that after he had beaten the Parthians, it would be eaſy to drive Tryphon out of Syria, Demetrius advanced towards them, and was chearfully received by a large army, at the head of which he attacked Arſaces, who totally routed him, took him priſoner, and deſtroyed almoſt all his forces.

CHAP. VI.

TRYPHON's Plot againſt JONATHAN, whom he infamouſly betrays, kills a Thouſand of his People, and makes him a Priſoner.

THE failure of Demetrius in the laſt attempt, induced Tryphon to abandon all allegiance to Antiochus, and reflect how he might poſſeſs himſelf of the crown; but as Jonathan was the firm and powerful friend of Antiochus, the ſcheme was to deſtroy him firſt. For this purpoſe Tryphon went to Bethſan, where he found Jonathan with forty thouſand men at his command. Finding his ſtrength unequal to the encounter of ſuch an army, he ſought to ſeduce him by preſents and compliments. He directed his officers to obey Jonathan as himſelf; and proceeded, with great artifice, from one ſubtlety to another. At length he inſinuated that, as the war was over, Jonathan might diſband his army, keeping only a proper body guard, and attend him to Ptolemais, which place, and all the adjacent fortreſſes, he was reſolved to put into his poſſeſſion. Lulled by theſe arguments and promiſes, Jonathan diſmiſſed all his army, except three thouſand men, two of which he left in Galilee, and went with Tryphon to Ptolemais, with the other thouſand. The inhabitants having been previouſly inſtructed, ſhut the gates on his firſt entering the town, killed all his thouſand men, and took him priſoner. Tryphon diſpatched a part of his army to Galilee, with a view to deſtroy Jonathan's two thouſand men left there; but theſe having information of the manner in which Jonathan had been treated, ſeized their arms, and effected their eſcape. Tryphon's troops were ſo convinced that theſe men would bid equal defiance to death and danger, that they returned without attempting to moleſt them.

Jonathan betrayed into Tryphon's hands.

The inhabitants of Jeruſalem were extremely afflicted on being informed of the maſſacre above-mentioned, and the impriſonment of Jonathan, for whom they had the ſincereſt regard; and in caſe of whoſe death, they apprehended the utmoſt danger from thoſe enemies of whom before they had no fear. Nor were they much miſtaken in their conjecture; for, upon the news that Jonathan was put to death (as will hereafter be mentioned), their neighbours combined againſt them, as men who had no commander; even Tryphon aſſembled an army to invade Judæa; but Simon, obſerving their fears, ſummoned them together, and addreſſed them to the following purport:

Grief at Jeruſalem on Jonathan's impriſonment.

"It is unneceſſary, friends and countrymen, for me to ſay that my father, brothers, and myſelf, have been always ready to expoſe ourſelves for the common liberty: the defence of law and religion, has been the buſineſs of our family; nor am I ſo loſt to the authority of example, as to think of preſerving my life by the forfeit of my honour. Seek not, therefore, for another commander, ſince I am willing to lead you wherever great and glorious actions ſhall call us. I count not myſelf greater than my brethren, nor value my life more than they did theirs. Never ſhall it be ſaid that I have departed from the dignity of my family. I have no doubt but God will, by my hands, avenge you of your enemies, deliver you, your wives and children, from thoſe who oppreſs you, and ſecure the holy temple from defilement. In a word, is it not becauſe you are conſidered as ſheep without a ſhepherd, that the preſent confederacy is in league againſt you?"

Simon ſucceeds Jonathan.

This ſpeech ſo animated the people, and diſpelled their fears, that they exclaimed, "Simon alone ought to ſucceed his brothers Judas and Jonathan: let Simon be our general, and we will obey his commands!" Simon now ordered the walls of the city to be repaired and fortified; which being done, he diſpatched his friend Jonathan, the ſon of Abſalom, to Joppa, to clear that town of its inhabitants, leſt they ſhould deliver it into the hands of Tryphon.

Tryphon marches to Judæa.

At this period Tryphon, at the head of an army, was marching from Ptolemais to Judæa, bringing Jonathan with him as a priſoner. Simon and his troops met him on a mountain that overlooks the plain, near the city of Addida. Tryphon finding that the Jews had elected Simon general, ſent him an expreſs, importing that, if he wiſhed his brother's releaſe, he ſhould ſend a hundred talents of ſilver, and two of Jonathan's ſons, as a ſecurity that, after he ſhould be ſet at liberty, he ſhould not ſeduce the people of Judæa from their allegiance. Simon had no doubt but a deception was intended; but he thought that if he refuſed the money as a ranſom, or the ſons as hoſtages, the death of his brother might be imputed to him: whereupon he ſummoned a council, to whom he intimated his ſuſpicion of treachery; but ſaid he thought it would be proper to diſpatch both the young men and the money, rather than be thought indifferent with reſpect to his brother's ſafety. Hereupon the hoſtages and money were ſent, yet Tryphon refuſed to give Jonathan his liberty, and continued to ravage the country with his army, till he arrived at Dora, a city of Idumæa, whence he propoſed to proceed to Jeruſalem: Simon ſtill cloſely watching his motions.

Intelligence was brought to Tryphon, while on his march, that the garriſon of Jeruſalem was diſtreſſed for proviſions, to the relief of which he was deſired to haſten; on which he ordered his horſe to be ready to march; but ſo deep a ſnow fell in the night, that there was no poſſibility of proceeding. He now, therefore, returned to Cœlo-Syria, and paſſed through Galaad, near the city of Baſca, in which country he cauſed Jonathan to be put to death, and having buried him, went forward to Antioch. Simon, however, had the remains of Jonathan removed to the ſepulchre of his father at Modim, public mourning being made on the occaſion, and a ſuperb monument of poliſhed white marble erected to the family. This was on an eminence, and encompaſſed with arched walks, and reſting on pillars each of an entire ſtone. Simon cauſed ſeven pyramids to be erected, viz. for his father, mother, four brothers, and himſelf; and theſe were ſo extraordinary, that they are ſtill celebrated for their beauty and magnificence.

Simon buries honourably his brother Jonathan, whom Tryphon had baſely murdered.

Jonathan had now governed, as prince and high-prieſt, four* years, and was ſucceeded by his brother Simon, as above-mentioned. Simon, in his firſt year, relieved the people from the tribute heretofore paid to the Macedonians; and he ſtood ſo high in their opinion, that they dated their writings, both public and private, from the years of his government, with the addition of "moſt worthy patron of the nation." Every public buſineſs flouriſhed in his hands. He obtained a victory over the common enemy; deſtroyed the cities of Gazara, Joppa, and Jamnia; levelled the citadel of Jeruſalem with the ground, and ſo ordered, that it could not afford a refuge for rebels and fugitives, nor be in a condition to annoy the city. To effect this, he adviſed the digging the mountain on which the caſtle ſtood, ſo that the temple ſhould be left on the higher ground. He aſſembled the people on this buſineſs, to whom he repreſented the miſchiefs already ſuſtained by this caſtle, and the probable conſequences, if an enemy ſhould get poſſeſſion of it. This argument had ſuch an effect, that they univerſally agreed to deſtroy the mountain; and the people worked on it for three years, day and night (relieving each other), till at length the temple had the advantage in point of ſituation.

Simon demoliſhes Gazara, &c.

CHAP. VII.

ANTIOCHUS murdered by TRYPHON, who ſucceeds to the Crown. His Soldiers deſert to CLEOPATRA, who married ANTIOCHUS SOTER. He attacks and conquers TRYPHON, who is ſlain at APAMIA.

DEMETRIUS Nicanor had not been long made priſoner, when Tryphon privately murdered Antiochus, the ſon of Alexander, and propagated a report that he loſt his life by an accident, which happened in his exerciſes. While the public were intent on this report, Tryphon exerted his utmoſt influence, and employed both money and friends, to induce them to chuſe him king. The friends of Tryphon urged that Demetrius was a captive with the Parthians; and that Antiochus would never forgive thoſe who had deſerted his brother. By theſe inſinuations Tryphon paved his way to the throne: but there did not need much artifice in the caſe; for the people readily combined towards his elevation, from an idea that they who voted for making him king, would be in a fair way to make their own fortunes; ſo that there was no difficulty in his advancement. Tryphon no ſooner became king, than he began to diſplay that turpitude of heart by which he had been diſtinguiſhed while a private man. His point was no ſooner gained, than he threw off the maſk, and proved that the name of Tryphon (which ſignifies a diſſolute wretch) very well became him. His diſpoſition proved ſo diſagreeable to the ſoldiers, that they deſerted, and fled to Cleopatra, the wife of Demetrius, who was at that time in retirement with her children at Seleucia, while Antiochus Soter (the brother of Demetrius) was ranging from place to place, the fear of Tryphon preventing almoſt every one from affording him aſſiſtance. Cleopatra, encouraged by advice of her friends, and the appearance of the ſoldiers who had deſerted from Tryphon, and urged by the fears ſhe had left the people of Seleucia ſhould deliver the place to the uſurper, diſpatched a meſſage to Antiochus, offering her kingdom to his diſpoſal, and herſelf in marriage. This propoſal being embraced by Antiochus, the people flocked to him in ſuch crouds, that he ſoon found himſelf at the head of a large army, with which he marched againſt Tryphon, conquered him in battle, drove him from Syria to Phœnicia, and at length pent him up in the ſtrong fortreſs of Dora. Antiochus now diſpatched embaſſadors to the high-prieſt Simon, on a treaty of friendſhip and alliance; and the propoſal being accepted, Simon ſent him money and proviſions towards the maintaining of the ſiege; articles at that time highly acceptable to Antiochus, who was very grateful for this inſtance of his friendſhip. After a while Tryphon eſcaped from Dora, and fled to a town called Apamia; but the place was taken, and himſelf put to the ſword, before the fourth year of his reign was ended.

Defeat of Tryphon's army.

His death.

Antiochus, being naturally covetous and ungrateful, was ſo far from making a proper acknowledgment of the favours Simon had conferred on him, that he ſent Cendebæus with an army to ravage Judæa, and take him priſoner. The idea of this diſhonourable perfidy ſo enraged the venerable man, that in deſpite of age and infirmity, and with all the ardour of youth, he aſſembled his army, and marched at the head of it to engage the enemy. Having diſpatched his ſon with a number of ſelect troops, he followed in a different direction with the reſt, ſtationing part of his forces in ambuſh at every proper place. Thus he had the advantage in every encounter, ſucceeded

SIMON treacherouſly murdered by his Son-in-law PTOLEMY. The Wife and Two of the Children of SIMON made Priſoners: but the Third Son, being appriſed of his Danger, eſcapes to JERUSALEM.

Simon murdered by Ptolemy.

AFTER Simon had held the government of Judæa eight years, he was invited to an entertainment by Ptolemy his ſon-in-law, and there cruelly murdered by him. Ptolemy made priſoners of the wife and two of the ſons of Simon, and employed ruffians to ſurpriſe and take away the life of John, the third ſon, who was called Hyrcanus; but receiving timely information of the treachery, he fled to Jeruſalem, where he experienced the moſt friendly behaviour from the people, who entertained a great veneration for the memory of Simon, and a deadly abhorrence of Ptolemy, whom they courageouſly repulſed upon his attempting to enter at one gate of the city, after Hyrcanus had gained admittance at another.

Hyrcanus beſieges Ptolemy in the caſtle of Dagon.

Ptolemy retired to the caſtle of Dagon, which was ſituated in the neighbourhood of Jericho. As the ſucceſſor of his father, Hyrcanus aſſumed the pontifical dignity. He marched to attack the caſtle to which Ptolemy had retreated. In the proſecution of this enterprize, the greateſt difficulty he had to ſurmount, was a natural tenderneſs towards his mother and brethren, whom Ptolemy cauſed to be whipped and otherwiſe publickly tormented upon the battlements, threatening, to caſt them down unleſs Hyrcanus immediately raiſed the ſiege. This terrible menace abated the reſolution of Hyrcanus, who judged, that if he proceeded in his firſt deſign, the conſequence would be an aggravation of cruelty to his relations. His mother obſerving his embarraſſment, called to him aloud, urging him, without conſidering the ſufferings of herſelf and her ſons, to avenge the injuries his family had received, and expreſſing a willingneſs to expire under the moſt excruciating torments, on condition that the barbarous and unnatural tyrant Ptolemy ſhould meet a puniſhment proportioned to the enormity of his guilt. This inſtance of generoſity and fortitude animated Hyrcanus to make a vigorous aſſault; but he obſerved, that in proportion to the force he exerted for reducing the fort, additional cruelty was exerciſed upon his mother; and his deſire of revenge yielding to filial tenderneſs, the ſiege was protracted, till the arrival of the ſabbatical year, which put a period to the war. Every ſeventh year, as well as every ſeventh day, is obſerved by the Jews as a time of reſt. Upon the concluſion of the war, Ptolemy put the mother and brothers of Hyrcanus to death, and then retired for ſafety to Philadelphia, the government of which place had been uſurped by the tyrant Zeno, who was ſurnamed Cotyla.

CONCLUSION of the HISTORY of the BIBLE.

CHAP. IX.

JERUSALEM beſieged by ANTIOCHUS, who grants a Truce of ſeven Days. HYRCANUS intercedes for a Compromiſe; the Siege is raiſed, and the Parties form an Alliance. The Death of ANTIOCHUS, and the Succeſſion of his Brother DEMETRIUS.

Antiochus lays ſiege to Jeruſalem, which he is compelled to quit.

STIMULATED by the diſgraces he had been ſubjected to by Simon, the father of Hyrcanus, Antiochus, in the fourth year of his reign, in the firſt of that of Hyrcanus, and in the hundredth * and ſecond Olympiad, made an incurſion into Judæa; and having committed great devaſtation in the country, obliged Hyrcanus to take refuge within the city, which he encompaſſed with his troops, divided into ſeven bodies. The great ſtrength of the walls, and the intrepidity with which the place was defended, prevented any conſiderable advantage being gained by the aſſailants for ſome time. During a ſhort interval the camp was diſtreſſed for water; but this inconvenience was removed by a plentiful fall of rain. The northern quarter of the city being judged the leaſt difficult of acceſs, againſt that part Antiochus directed his greateſt force. He erected an hundred turrets, each conſiſting of three ſtories, in which he ſtationed a great number of men for proſecuting the aſſault. To prevent a reinforcement or communication, he formed a double circumvallation of conſiderable extent. But notwithſtanding theſe operations, the troops made frequent ſallies from the fort to annoy the enemy, at ſuch times as they appeared to be the leaſt prepared for defence; and when theſe attempts were not likely to ſucceed, they had the advantage of a ſafe retreat into the city. Such of the inhabitants as conſumed the proviſions without bearing arms in ſupport of the common cauſe, Hyrcanus compelled to evacuate the city; and Antiochus preventing their retreat to the open country, many of them periſhed under the walls for want of food.

On the arrival of the feaſt of the Tabernacles, the above-mentioned miſerable people were again received into the town; and on occaſion of this feſtival, the people applied to Antiochus for a truce of ſeven days. This requeſt he granted with the utmoſt readineſs; and ſent them bulls with gilded horns, and other beaſts for ſacrifice, gold and ſilver cups repleniſhed with a variety of the moſt eſteemed perfumes and ſpices, beſides a large ſupply of proviſions. His conduct in every inſtance was contrary to that of Antiochus Epiphanes, who, upon conquering the city, proved his contempt of the inſtitutions and ceremonies of the Jews, by ſacrificing hogs upon the altar, and polluting the holy place with liquor in which the fleſh of thoſe animals had been boiled. This affront produced an irreconcileable animoſity. The piety of the preſent Antiochus obtained him the ſurname of the Pious, and he was held in the higheſt eſtimation by all ranks of people.

Hyrcanus ſends an embaſſy to Antiochus.

The generoſity of Antiochus encouraged Hyrcanus to diſpatch an embaſſy, requeſting that he would permit the Jews to live agreeable to the eſtabliſhed laws and cuſtoms of their nation. Antiochus, in oppoſition to the court-faction, complied, on the condition that the Jews ſhould lay down their arms, ſecure to him the tribute of Joppa and other cities, and admit a garriſon into Jeruſalem. The garriſon was objected to, on the plea of the neceſſary inconvenience of mixing with ſtrangers; and to compound this matter, an offer was made of five hundred talents, and hoſtages for a due performance of the treaty. Three hundred talents being paid in part, and the hoſtages, one of which was the brother of Hyrcanus, being delivered, the ſiege was raiſed.

An alliance concluded between them.

Hyrcanus cauſed to be opened the ſepulchre of David, a very rich and powerful ſovereign, and thence took three thouſand talents, whereby he was enabled to hire reinforcements to his army: he was the firſt among the Jews who entertained foreign troops. He now formed an alliance with Antiochus, and invited that king and his army into the city, where he received and entertained them with the utmoſt magnificence. As it is recorded by Nicholas Damaſcenus, he afterwards accompanied Antiochus to the Parthian war. This hiſtorian ſays, "After Antiochus had ſubdued the Parthian army under the command of Indates, he conſtructed a triumphal arch upon the banks of the river Lycus; and that at the interceſſion of Hyrcanus, a Jew, he remained at this place two days: the Jews being forbid by their laws to travel on the feſtival, which happened to occur at that time." This feſtival was the feaſt of Pentecoſt, which immediately followed the ſabbath; and on neither of thoſe days were the people of our nation allowed to travel.

Death of Antiochus.

Antiochus gave battle to Arſaces, king of the Parthians, and in this encounter he loſt both his life and his army. Upon his kingdom being invaded, Arſaces ſet at liberty his captive Demetrius, who ſucceeded his brother Antiochus in the government of Syria.

CHAP. X.

HYRCANUS conquers IDUMEA, and reconciles the Inhabitants to the Jewiſh Inſtitutions. He negociates a freſh Treaty with the ROMANS. The Army of DEMETRIUS being entirely routed, he flies to PTOLEMAIS for Shelter: He is ſeized at TYRE, and put to Death. ALEXANDER ſlain in Battle.

Idumea conquered by Hyrcanus.

UPON receiving information of the death of Antiochus, Hyrcanus led his army into Syria, expecting to find that country greatly depopulated; and this conjecture proved to be juſtly founded. After a ſiege of ſix months, he ſubdued Madaba; and he ſoon after made himſelf maſter of Samega, and other places in that neighbourhood; he then proceeded to the conqueſt of Sichem, Gerizim, and the land of the Chuthites, where one of the governors, named Sanballat, in compliment to his ſon-in-law Manaſſeh, the brother of Jaddus, the high-prieſt, having obtained the permiſſion of Alexander, conſtructed a temple on the model of that at Jeruſalem, as we have before related: this temple was deſtroyed about two hundred years after it had been built. He reduced Adora, Mariſſa, and other places of ſtrength in Idumæa, and proſecuted his ſucceſſes till he had ſubdued the whole province. He then iſſued a proclamation, enjoining the departure of thoſe who would not ſubmit to circumciſion. Rather than abandon the land, the people acquieſced in this, and every other Jewiſh inſtitution: and ſince that period, they have been numbered among the people denominated Jews.

The treaty with Rome renewed.

Hyrcanus, the high-prieſt now diſpatched an embaſſy to the ſenate of Rome, with letters on the ſubject of a renewal of the league of amity. In conſequence of theſe letters, Fanius, ſon of Marcus Prætor, aſſembled a ſenate in the field of Mars, on the eighth of the ides of March, Lucius Manlius, ſon of Lucius Mentina, and Caius Sempronius, ſon of Caius Falerna, being preſent to deliberate on the propoſed treaty, and other public buſineſs which Simon the ſon of Doſitheus, Apollonius ſon of Alexander, and Diodorous ſon of Jaſon, were commiſſioned to negociate with the ſenate. It was ſtipulated, that reſtoration ſhould be made of the city and ports of Joppa, Gazara, the fountains, and other places which, in violation of a decree of the ſenate, had been uſurped by Antiochus; that the king's troops ſhould not paſs through that or any other part of the Roman territories without permiſſion; and that commiſſioners ſhould be appointed for eſtimating the loſſes conſequent on his devaſtations, for which full reparation ſhould be made. On theſe conditions, the propoſed treaty was accepted by the ſenate, who aſſured the honourable deputies on the part of the Jews, that on the firſt opportunity an anſwer in form ſhould be returned, and that no injury ſhould in future be offered to them. Fanius was commiſſioned to ſupply the embaſſadors with money from the public treasury, for defraying the charge of their return; and they were likewise furnished with letters of recommendation to the governors and officers of the several places through which they were to pass.

from

Flight and death of Demetrius.

During these transactions, Demetrius was heartily disposed to commence hostilities against Hyrcanus: but he was not in a condition to effect this design, being generally detested by the Syrians and his own soldiers, who uniting in a confederacy against him, requested Ptolemy, otherwise Physcon, king of Egypt, to send to them a descendant of the house of Seleucus, whom they would invest with the sovereignty. Ptolemy sent Alexander surnamed Zebina, attended by a numerous army. An engagement ensued, and Demetrius being defeated, fled to Ptolemais, where Cleopatra, his wife, then resided: but being denied entrance into the city, he repaired to Tyre, where he was seized by his enemies, who, after keeping him some time in a miserable existence, deprived him of life.

Alexander slain in battle.

The kingdom of Syria being now under the sovereignty of Alexander Zebina, a league was formed between this new king and Hyrcanus, the high-priest, who soon after was engaged in hostilities with Antiochus Gryphus, son of Demetrius. Alexander supported his ally in this war; and when the armies joined battle, it was his fortune to be slain. Upon the death of Alexander, Antiochus succeeded to the throne of Syria: but he checked his desire of proceeding against the Jews, in consequence of intelligence being communicated to him, that his brother and name-sake Antiochus, who was surnamed Cyzicenus, was raising an army at the town of Cyzicus, for the purpose of opposing his operations. Antiochus Cyzicenus derived his last appellation from the place where he was educated; he was the son of Antiochus Soter, who was slain by the Parthians. We have before observed that Cleopatra was married to two brothers. Upon the arrival of Cyzicenus in Syria, an engagement ensued between him and his brother; and, indeed, they lived in a perpetual state of animosity and warfare.

Prosperous condition of Hyrcanus.

In the mean time, Hyrcanus enjoyed an uninterrupted tranquillity; for, upon the decease of Antiochus Soter, he no longer acknowledged himself to be either a subject or ally of the Macedonians. The affairs of Hyrcanus were in a flourishing state during the time of Alexander Zebina, but still more so in the sovereignty of the brothers; for while they were harrassing each other to destruction, Cyzicenus was committing devastations in the country, and the other having no assistance from Egypt, he enjoyed perfect ease and safety in Judæa, where he amassed immense wealth.

CHAP. XI.

SAMARIA besieged by HYRCANUS. ANTIOCHUS CYZICENUS marches to the Relief of the City, but is repulsed by ARISTOBULUS. SAMARIA is utterly destroyed. HYRCANUS abandons the Principles of the PHARISEES, and adopts those of the SADDUCEES. The Death of HYRCANUS.

Hyrcanus besieges Samaria.

THE people of Marissa, though subjects to the king of Syria, were inhabitants of Judæa, and in alliance with the Jews. The indignities they had received from the Samaritans so greatly incensed Hyrcanus, that he determined to direct the whole force of his arms against the strongly fortified city of Samaria: which was rebuilt, and called Sebaste, by Herod. He begirt the town with a ditch of considerable width, and a double wall of great strength, appointing his sons Antigonus and Aristobulus to prosecute the siege; which was conducted with such vigour, that in a short time a terrible famine raged in the city, the inhabitants being reduced to the necessity of supporting themselves on carrion. In this extremity they solicited relief from Antiochus Cyzicenus, who directly marched to their assistance; but was repulsed by Aristobulus, who being joined by Antigonus, they pursued him to Scythopolis.

Cyzicenus, attempting to release Samaria, is obliged to retire.

The brothers returned to Samaria, and renewed the siege; in consequence of which, the people again requested assistance from Cyzicenus; and he prevailed upon Ptolemy, surnamed Lathurus, to supply him with six thousand men. The grant of these troops so greatly offended the mother of Ptolemy, that he was in the most imminent danger of losing his kingdom. With these Egyptian forces Antiochus ravaged part of the country of Hyrcanus; his motive being to entice the troops from the siege by a diversion, as he was not in a condition to oppose the whole force of his antagonist. But, from desertions, many of his troops falling into ambushes, and other accidents, he despaired of success; and appointing Callimander and Epicrates to the conduct of the war, he retired to Tripoli. Callimander engaged in a rash expedition, wherein his army was destroyed and himself slain. The Jews bribed Epicrates to surrender Scythopolis and other places. After a siege which continued a year, Hyrcanus became master of Samaria, which he utterly destroyed, and by forming watercourses, and other measures, the appearance of the spot was entirely changed, and no vestige remained of the buildings. There is a surprising, and perhaps an incredible tradition respecting Hyrcanus. It is related, that being alone offering incense in the temple, a voice from heaven informed him, that his sons had obtained a victory over Antiochus Cyzicenus; and that he immediately went forth to the people, and communicated to them the revelation, which was soon after confirmed. This extraordinary incident is said to have happened at the precise time in which Cyzicenus was defeated.

Hyrcanus takes and destroys Samaria.

Not only the Jews of Jerusalem and Alexandria, but those also of Egypt, Cyprus, and other places were now in a flourishing situation: for in consequence of a disagreement between Cleopatra and her son ſon Ptolemy Lathurus, the queen had committed the command of her army to Chelcias, and Ananias the ſon of Onias, by whom a temple, after the model of that at Jeruſalem, had been built in the territory of Heliopolis. The queen was wholly influenced by the advice of theſe men. Strabo, the Cappadocian, ſays, "Great numbers of thoſe who came with us to Cyprus, as well as thoſe who were afterwards ſent thither by Cleopatra, abandoned the queen, and attached themſelves to the intereſt of Ptolemy; but the Jews of Onias's party continued in allegiance to her, in gratitude for the diſtinction ſhe had beſtowed upon their friends and countrymen, Chelcias and Ananias.

The ſucceſs of Hyrcanus attracted the envy of the Jews, and particularly of that ſect called Phariſees †. The influence of this faction was ſo great, as conſtantly to prevail over the multitude, even in oppoſition to the ſentiments of the king and the high-prieſt. Hyrcanus, who had been educated among the Phariſees, invited them to an entertainment; and when his hoſpitality had cauſed a circulation of good humour, he addreſſed them to the following effect: "Since I profeſs your own principles, it is ſcarcely neceſſary to obſerve, my friends, that my moſt ſanguine wiſh is to render myſelf acceptable to the Almighty, and to obſerve a ſtrict juſtice to my neighbour. If I have violated my duty, it is your buſineſs to admoniſh me, and it ſhall be mine to effect a reformation of my conduct." This ſpeech was received with great applauſe, which afforded Hyrcanus conſiderable pleaſure.

Hyrcanus renounces the Pharaſaic principles, and adopts thoſe of the Sadducees.

Soon after this, Eleazar, a Phariſee, having brought a falſe and ſcandalous charge againſt Hyrcanus, his friend Jonathan, who was a zealous Sadducee, took that opportunity to prejudice Hyrcanus againſt the whole ſect of the Phariſees, inſinuating, that they were all concerned in the defamation. The leaders of the Phariſees being conſulted, to know what puniſhment ſhould be inflicted on the calumniator, they gave it as their opinion, that impriſonment and ſcourging would be ſufficient. This anſwer fully convinced Hyrcanus, that what Jonathan had ſuggeſted was true; and therefore, being greatly incenſed againſt the Phariſees, he abrogated their traditional conſtitutions, ſubjected ſuch as ſhould obſerve them to ſevere penalties, and ever afterwards attached himſelf to the Sadducees. During the remaining part of his life, he enjoyed uninterrupted peace and happineſs, and died in the thirty-firſt year of his government, leaving five ſons. The Almighty was pleaſed to beſtow upon him three eminent diſtinctions, viz. the civil government, the high-prieſthood, and the ſpirit of prophecy. He predicted, by a divine revelation, that his two eldeſt ſons would not long enjoy the government; and the prophecy was verified, as will appear in the following chapter.

† Theſe diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their zeal for the traditions of the elders, which they derived from the ſame origin as the written word itſelf, pretending that both wete delivered to Moſes from mount Sinai, and were therefore both of equal authority. From their rigorous obſervance of theſe traditions, they looked upon themſelves as more holy than other men, and therefore ſeparated themſelves from thoſe whom they thought ſinners or profane, ſo as not to eat or drink with them; and hence, from the Hebrew word pharis, which ſignifies to ſeparate, they had the name of Phariſees, or ſeparatiſts.—Their pretences to extraordinary piety drew after them the common people, who held them in the higheſt eſteem and veneration. They held the exiſtence of angels and ſpirits; and a reſurrection from the dead, that is, of the ſoul only, by its tranſmigration into another body, and being born anew with it. See further concerning them in book xviii. c. 2.

CHAP. XII.

ARISTOBULUS eſtabliſhes a Monarchical Government. His Cruelty towards his Mother and Brethren. The Death of ARISTOBULUS.

A monarchical government eſtabliſhed by Ariſtobulus.

ARISTOBULUS, the eldeſt ſon of Hyrcanus, determined to aboliſh the principality, and eſtabliſh an abſolute government: and the period at which he effected this was four hundred and eighty-one years after the emancipation of the Jews from captivity in Babylon. He had a particular regard for his next brother, whoſe name was Antigonus, and he admitted him to ſome ſhare in the government; but his mother, whom he conſidered as his rival to ſovereignty, Hyrcanus having bequeathed to her all that was in his power to leave, he ordered into cloſe confinement, and his three younger brethren he conſigned to the ſame fate. So horribly unnatural was his cruelty, as actually to ſtarve his mother in her priſon, and, on ſome equally malignant and groundleſs inſinuations, to ſacrifice the life of his favourite brother Antigonus. It was ſome time before Ariſtobulus would attend to the malevolent ſuggeſtions againſt his brother. On the approach of the feaſt of the Tabernacles, Ariſtobulus was confined to his bed by ſickneſs: and at this time Antigonus came from the army in great martial pomp, and, attended by his guards, repaired to the temple, in order to ſupplicate heaven for the reſtoration of his brother's health. The enemies of Antigonus inſinuated to the king, that the magnificence and ſtate which his brother had aſſumed, was an evidence that he aſpired to the ſovereignty. Ariſtobulus did not give credit to all that was reported concerning his brother, but ſuppoſing there to be ſome foundation for a part, he determined to provide for his own ſafety, without appearing to be apprehenſive of his danger. The king ſtationed a guard in a ſubterraneous place in the tower, which has ſince received the name of Antonia, and commanded them, that if Antigonus came that way unarmed, they ſhould not moleſt him; but that if they obſerved him provided for defence, they ſhould take away his life. Ariſtobulus diſpatched a meſſenger to requeſt the preſence of Antigonus in his apartment, and ſtrictly to enjoin him to come unarmed: but the queen and other of his enemies prevailed upon the meſſenger to ſay, that the king deſired to ſee him equipped in an extraordinary fine ſuit of armour which, it had been told him, he poſſeſſed. Unſuſpecting the treachery, Antigonus immediately went forth completely armed; and he was ſlain by the ſoldiers poſted in the dark paſſage of the tower of Straton. Judas, whoſe prophecies had been conſtantly verified, upon obſerving Antigonus go to the temple, ſaid to his diſciples that he was weary of exiſtence, ſince his reputation as a prophet was entirely loſt; for that he had predicted the death of Antigonus ſhould happen on that day at Straton's tower; but that he was ſtill alive, the place fix hundred furlongs diſtance, and the day more than half elapſed. Preſently after this, news was brought that Antigonus was ſlain under the tower, according to his preſage. This tower was called Straton's tower, as well as that upon the coaſt, which was afterwards diſtinguiſhed by the name of Cæſarea.

Laſt illneſs and death of Ariſtobulus.

The ſevere upbraidings of conſcience for the barbarous murder of his brother greatly increaſed the diſtemper of Ariſtobulus, and a vomiting of blood enſued: as an attendant was conveying ſome of it away in a veſſel, he ſpilt a part, ſeemingly by the direction of Providence, on the ſpot where the marks of Antigonus's blood were yet to be ſeen. This event, which was ſuppoſed to have happened from deſign, produced ſome diſorder, the cauſe of which the king anxiouſly enquired; and having extorted it from his attendants by entreaties and threats, he ſaid, "The all-ſeeing Power hath detected my iniquity, and my brother's murder hath called down the vengeance of heaven upon me. How long ſhall I hold that life which is forfeited to the blood of a mother and a brother? Rather why do I not expire on a ſudden, than thus yield my life drop by drop, as if the ſevereſt puniſhment was inadequate to my guilt?" Upon uttering theſe words, Ariſtobulus, who was ſurnamed Philellen, ſignifying "a lover of the Greeks," inſtantly died, having reigned only one year.

His acts and character.

He ſubdued and annexed a conſiderable part of Ituræa to the territory of Judæa, and compelled the people to ſubmit to circumciſion and other Jewiſh inſtitutions, on the penalty of baniſhment: and he performed other important ſervices to his country. Excepting in reſpect to the matters already urged againſt him, he was conſidered as a man of modeſty and juſtice. On the authority of Timagenes, Strabo ſpeaks of him to this effect. "He was of a good diſpoſition, and in many inſtances proved himſelf a friend to the Jews: he extended their juriſdiction over a great part of Ituræa, and united the people in the common bond of circumciſion.

CHAP. XIII.

JANNÆUS ALEXANDER advanced to the Sovereignty: He puts one of his Brothers to Death, and lays Siege to PTOLEMAIS, but abandons the Enterpriſe. PTOLEMY of ASOCHIS takes the Town by Aſſault.

Jannæus, called alſo Alexander, made king.

SALOME, called Alexandra by the Greeks, reſtored the three brothers of Ariſtobulus, her late huſband, to liberty; and Jannæus, otherwiſe called Alexander, who was the eldeſt, and of a diſpoſition leſs violent than the others, ſhe raiſed to the throne. It was the fortune of Alexander to incur his father's averſion ſoon after his birth; and this is ſaid to be the reaſon of his diſpleaſure: Hyrcanus had a dream that the Almighty appeared to him, and that upon aſking who ſhould be his ſucceſſor, the reſemblance of Alexander was immediately repreſented to him. This circumſtance prejudiced him ſo much againſt Alexander, that he ſent him to be brought up in Galilee. Alexander cauſed one of his brothers to be put to death for attempting to ſupplant him in the government: but he made a generous proviſion for the other brother, who contented himſelf in a private ſtation.

He lays ſiege to Ptolemais.

Alexander led an army to Ptolemais, and gave battle to a body of the enemy's forces, whom he compelled to retreat into the city, where he kept them blocked up. Gaza, another ſea-coaſt town, remained at this time unſubdued, as did Dora and the tower of Straton, which were in poſſeſſion of Zoilus. Antiochus Philometer and his brother Antiochus Cyzicenus, were ſo exhauſted in the wars they had maintained againſt each other, that the people of Ptolemais expected no relief from them. Zoilus, who had been waiting for the opportunity of making advantage of the prevailing diviſions, afforded ſome relief to Ptolemais, but the force he ſent was not ſufficient to be of any conſiderable ſervice. The people of Ptolemais had no hope of relief but from Egypt, and their principal dependence was upon Ptolemy Lathurus, who having been compelled to evacuate his kingdom by his mother Cleopatra, had retired to Cyprus. They ſent to him an embaſſy, commiſſioned to ſolicit his aſſiſtance againſt Alexander, and to aſſure him there was every reaſon to believe the people of Gaza and Ptolemais would declare in his favour immediately upon his entering Syria, and that he would be ſupported by Zoilus, the Sidonians, and other neighbouring people. Ptolemy ordered all poſſible diſpatch in the equipment of a fleet for this enterpriſe.

The people refuſe to treat with him.

Ptolemy diſembarked at Sicamin, and thence marched, at the head of about thirty thouſand horſe and foot, to Ptolemais. On his arrival before the city, he diſpatched an embaſſy to the people, but they refuſed to receive the meſſage, and to hold any intercourſe with either the king or his agents. This diſappointment ſo greatly embarraſſed him, that he knew not what meaſures to purſue. Zoilus and ſome commiſſioners from Gaza repreſented to Ptolemy, that the Jews and Alexander were committing great devaſtations in their territories, and and requeſted his aſſiſtance, to repel them. Upon the appearance of Ptolemy, Alexander judged it prudent to raiſe the ſiege. He engaged in a ſecret treaty with Cleopatra to ſubdue Ptolemy, whom he, at the ſame time, treated as a friend and ally, offering him four hundred talents of ſilver, on condition of ſurrendering to him the uſurper Zoilus, and reſtored to the Jews the lands which he poſſeſſed, and had formerly belonged to them. Ptolemy readily embraced the propoſal, and ſeized Zoilus; but upon diſcovering that Alexander had privately made propoſals to Cleopatra, he conſidered the treaty to be violated, and therefore laid ſiege to Ptolemais. He appointed one part of his army to proſecute the ſiege, and led the other to ravage the country of Judæa. Alexander aſſembled an army, which ſome aſſert was compoſed of fifty, and others of eighty thouſand troops, to oppoſe the operations of Ptolemy, who, taking advantage of the ſabbath-day, reduced Aſochis, a city in Galilee, by aſſault, acquired an immenſe booty, and made about ten thouſand of the people priſoners.

Ptolemy takes Aſochis by aſſault.

CHAP. XIV.

ALEXANDER defeated by PTOLEMY LATHURUS. PTOLEMAIS ſubdued by CLEOPATRA, who enters into Treaty with ALEXANDER. The Siege of GAZA. APPOLLODOTUS murdered by LYSIMACHUS, who treacherouſly ſurrenders the City. ANTIOCHUS CYZICENUS vanquiſhed and put to Death by SELEUCUS. DEMETRIUS EUCÆUS aſcends the Throne of DAMASCUS. ANTIOCHUS ſlain by the PARTHIANS. He is ſucceeded by PHILIP and DEMETRIUS. Fifty Thouſand JEWS killed in a Rebellion.

Ptolemy defeats the army of Alexander, with great ſlaughter.

HAVING ſubdued Aſochis, Ptolemy made an aſſault upon Sopphoris, but in this attempt he was defeated, and ſuſtained great loſs. He then led his army againſt Alexander, whom he met with in the neighbourhood† of Aſſophus, adjacent to the river of Jordan, and pitched his camp oppoſite to that of the enemy. The van of Alexander's army was compoſed of eight thouſand of the ſoldiers called Hecatontomachi, who were provided with braſen bucklers. In the front of his forces Ptolemy had ſome warriors equipped in the ſame manner, but his followers were not in general ſo well armed as their adverſaries, and they were therefore the leſs anxious for an engagement. Philoſtephanus, an officer of great ſkill and experience, encouraged them to expect ſucceſs. They croſſed the river; and to this movement Alexander, who was ſtationed on the oppoſite ſhore, made no oppoſition, judging that he ſhould with leſs difficulty obtain a conqueſt if he could attack the enemy while they were in a ſituation from which the river behind them would render a retreat impracticable. The battle was ſuſtained with great bravery on both ſides: upon a body of Ptolemy's troops giving way, victory ſeemed to favour Alexander; but upon the arrival of Philoſtephanus with a reinforcement, the Jews were entirely routed, and purſued by Ptolemy till his ſoldiers were fatigued, and their weapons blunted by the havock they made. It is recorded, that thirty thouſand men were ſlain in the encounter; and Timagenes ſays, in his hiſtory, that the number was fifty thouſand. Great numbers were made priſoners, and the reſt eſcaped by flight.

Cruel act of Ptolemy.

After this terrible carnage, Ptolemy went to ſome villages belonging to the Jews, and commanded his ſoldiers to murder the women and children, and then to put the parts of their bodies into veſſels of water which were to be placed over fires. He had recourſe to this bloody ſtratagem, in order to ſtrike terror into thoſe who had eſcaped by flight, by inſpiring the idea that his army was addicted to feed upon the fleſh of an enemy. This ſhocking barbarity is mentioned both by Strabo and Nicolaus.

Cleopatra endeavours to check him.

Judæa being ravaged, and Gaza ſubdued, Cleopatra judged it neceſſary to give a check to the enterpriſing ſpirit of her ſon Ptolemy; and ſhe was farther induced to this, as he had already advanced to the gates of Egypt, and had formed a deſign of uſurping the government. She muſtered both her military and naval forces with all poſſible diſpatch, and appointed for her generals two Jews named Chelcias and Ananias. She tranſported her moſt valuable treaſure, her grand-children, and her laſt will, to the iſland of Coas. She ſent a ſtrong naval force and her ſon Alexander to preſerve peace in Phœnicia, in which province a revolt was threatened; and ſhe went herſelf to Ptolemais, where being refuſed admittance, ſhe ordered the city to be aſſaulted. Hereupon Ptolemy evacuated Syria, and repaired to Egypt, in the flattering expectation that he ſhould find that country in a defenceleſs ſtate: but in this attempt he was defeated; and in purſuing Ptolemy, Chelcias, one of the generals of Cleopatra, loſt his life in Cœlo-Syria.

Renews a league of friendſhip with Alexander;

The queen detached a body of troops in purſuit of Ptolemy, who was again driven out of his own country, and under the neceſſity of eſtabliſhing his winter quarters in Gaza. In the interim ſhe became miſtreſs of Ptolemais, which was taken by aſſault. The queen received preſents from Alexander, whom ſhe treated in a moſt gracious manner, conſidering him as a prince violently perſecuted, and as having no reſource for relief but in herſelf. The impolicy of ſuffering ſuch numbers of Jews to remain dependent on the will of one man was urged to Cleopatra, and ſhe was adviſed to ſeize Alexander and his kingdom: but this was oppoſed by Ananias, who pleaded the iniquity of the meaſure, which would render her an object of the moſt violent deteſtation to the honeſt part part of the Jewiſh people. The conduct of Ananias proved highly agreeable to the queen; and ſhe afterwards renewed a league of amity with Alexander, at a city of Cœlo-Syria called Scythopolis.

who beſieges and takes Gadara.

Alexander being no longer in dread of the power of Ptolemy, led his army againſt Gadara, in Cœlo-Syria, which after a ſiege of ten months he ſubdued; he then proceeded to Amathon, the ſtrongeſt fort on the river Jordan, where Theodotus, the ſon of Zeno, had depoſited his treaſure, and this place he reduced. Theodotus, in revenge for the injury he had received, attacked the Jews by ſurprize, deſtroyed ten thouſand of them, and made booty of Alexander's baggage. Notwithſtanding this misfortune, the king attacked and ſubdued the ſea-coaſt towns called Raphia and Anthedon, to which Herod afterwards gave the name of Agrippiades. Cleopatra had now returned to Egypt, as had Ptolemy from Gaza to Cyprus. Alexander availed himſelf of this opportunity to lay ſiege to the city of Gaza and ravage the country, in order to revenge himſelf upon the people for having formerly ſolicited Ptolemy to join in repulſing him. Appollodotus, attended by ten thouſand citizens and two thouſand mercenaries, made an intrepid ſally one night upon the camp of the enemy, who ſuppoſing Ptolemy had come to the relief of the beſieged were greatly diſconcerted: but when day-light diſcovered their miſtake, they rallied and charged Appollodotus with ſo much fury as to kill ten thouſand of his party. Notwithſtanding their defeat and being threatened by famine, the people of Gaza determined to encounter all difficulties rather than ſubmit to the enemy: and they were encouraged to perſiſt in this reſolution by Aretas, an Arabian king; but he did not afford the timely aſſiſtance he had promiſed them.

Gaza ſurrendered to Alexander, who makes great ſlaughter of the citizens.

Lyſimachus being envious of his own brother for the great reputation he had acquired, barbarouſly murdered him; and then with the concurrence of his adherents, treacherouſly ſurrendered the city to Alexander. Upon entering the town, he ſeemed inclined to moderation: but he ſoon gave his troops unlimited liberty for deſtruction, and a terrible carnage enſued, in which, however, as many of the Jews as of the people of Gaza were ſlain. Some of the inhabitants fired their own houſes, that they might not be plundered by the enemy; and ſome killed their wives and children, preferring that they ſhould die in freedom rather than live in bondage. The ſenators were in council when Alexander entered the city, and five hundred of them fled to the temple of Apollo for ſanctuary, but they were all ſlain, and the city was pillaged, and entirely deſtroyed. Alexander now returned to Babylon, after having employed a year in the expedition againſt Gaza.

Antiochus Gryphus dies, and is ſucceeded by Seleucus.

Nearly at this period Antiochus Gryphus fell a ſacrifice to the treachery of Heraclean in the nine-and-twentieth year of his ſovereignty, and in the forty-fifth year of his age. He was ſucceeded in the government by his ſon Seleucus, who commenced war againſt his uncle Antiochus Cyzicenus, whom he ſubdued in an engagement, and afterwards put to death. Some time after the deceaſe of Cyzicenus, his ſon Antiochus, ſurnamed Euſebes, was crowned at Arad. He declared war againſt Seleucus, whom he defeated and drove out of Syria. Seleucus fled to Cilicia; and notwithſtanding he was received in a moſt friendly manner, he impoſed upon the Mopſeates the moſt oppreſſive taxes, which ſo greatly incenſed them againſt him that they ſet fire to the palace, wherein Seleucus and his attendants were conſumed.

Antiochus Cyzicenus ſlain.

During the government of Antiochus Cyzicenus in Syria, a brother of Seleucus, who was alſo named Antiochus, declared war againſt him, in which Cyzicenus loſt his life. He was ſucceeded in the ſovereignty by his brother Philip, who reigned over a part of Syria. Hereupon Ptolemy Lathurus advanced Demetrius Eucærus, his fourth brother, to the throne of Damaſcus. Antiochus defended himſelf with ſingular bravery againſt his brothers: but he eſpouſed the cauſe of Laodice, queen of the Galadenes, in the war againſt the Parthians, by whom he was * ſlain in battle, after having manifeſted himſelf a man of great intrepidity. His own brothers, Philip and Demetrius, ſucceeded to the government of Syria, as before obſerved.

Alexander, being inſulted by the Jews, ſlays ſix thouſand of them.

About this time Alexander was highly enraged againſt the people under his command. On the celebration of the feaſt of the Tabernacles, it was a cuſtom among the Jews to march in proceſſion, carrying boughs of palm and citron. While Alexander was preparing to aſſiſt in the uſual ſolemnities, the people threw citrons at him, called him ſlave, and applied to him other inſulting terms. Highly incenſed at this conduct, he cauſed ſix thouſand of the multitude to be ſlain: and he had a partition of wood fixed up to keep the crowd from the altar. He entertained no eſteem for the Syrians, and judged it not prudent to rely on them: but he choſe the Piſidians and Cilicians as mercenaries for proſecuting his ſchemes. He ſubdued the Arabians, rendered the Moabites and Galaadites tributaries, and deſtroyed Amathus, without oppoſition from Theodorus. He declared war againſt Obed, king of Arabia, during which he was ſurprized by an ambuſh in the neighbourhood of Gadara, in Galilee, and forced into a craggy and narrow paſſage, whence, with infinite difficulty, he retreated to Jeruſalem. A rebellion now enſued, which continued for the ſpace of ſix years, in the courſe of which no leſs than fifty thouſand lives were loſt. The king became extremely deſirous to effect a reconciliation: but the more anxiety he expreſſed on the ſubject, the more averſe were the people to a compliance. At length he aſked, by what means he could ſatisfy them: and the reply was, that he would do it by cutting his own throat. They ſolicited the aſſiſtance of Demetrius Eucærus againſt Alexander.

CHAP. XV.

ALEXANDER is defeated by DEMETRIUS EUCÆRUS. ALEXANDER ſubdues BETHAMA. He maſſacres Eight Hundred JEWS with their Wives and Children. DEMETRIUS is carried Priſoner to PARTHIA, where he dies.

DEMETRIUS Eucærus led an army conſiſting of three thouſand horſe, and forty thouſand foot, including auxiliaries, and pitched his camp in the neighbourhood of Sichem. Alexander marched againſt him at the head of about twenty thouſand of his adherents, and about ſix thouſand Greek mercenaries. Alexander employed every ſtratagem his imagination could ſuggeſt, to ſeduce the troops of his adverſary to join him; and a like conduct was purſued by Demetrius towards the Greek mercenaries: but neither of them was able to ſucceed.

The army of Alexander overcome and put to flight by Demetrius.

The armies joined battle, and Demetrius proved victorious. Great havock was made on both ſides: and the auxiliaries of Alexander fought with aſtoniſhing bravery, every man of them yielding his life ſword in hand. Alexander fled to the mountains, and compaſſion for his misfortunes ſoon after induced ſix thouſand Jews to join him. This reinforcement proved ſo alarming a circumſtance to Demetrius, that he retired. The reſt of the Jews continued the war againſt Alexander, notwithſtanding they were vanquiſhed, and great ſlaughter was made among them in every engagement. At length they were compelled to ſeek refuge; and moſt of the Jews, and among them the principal men, fled to Bethama, where they were beſieged by Alexander, who, after he had ſubdued the town, carried them priſoners to Jeruſalem, where he exerciſed upon them the moſt ſhocking cruelty. He gave a treat to his concubines in a turret which commanded an extenſive proſpect, and for the entertainment of his company he cauſed eight hundred Jews to be crucified, and the throats of their wives and children to be cut at the ſame time. Thus were the tortures of theſe unhappy victims aggravated, by being witneſſes to the barbarity executed upon thoſe to whom they were connected by the tendereſt bonds. They had revolted againſt their lawful ſovereign, invited foreign powers to ſupport them in rebellion, put his crown and life to the moſt imminent danger, and drove him to the neceſſity of relinquiſhing the poſſeſſions he had obtained in the wars againſt the Moabites and Galaadites, as a gratuity to the king of Arabia, for declining to eſpouſe the cauſe of his refractory ſubjects: theſe, not to mention other circumſtances of a ſimilar kind, were certainly an high provocation to ſeverity of puniſhment: but yet by no means ſufficient to juſtify his unnatural rigour. The above inſtance of cruelty rendered Alexander ſo obnoxious to the Jews, that they diſtinguiſhed him by the appellation of * Thracidas. About eight-thouſand of the ſoldiers who had taken up arms againſt the king, eſcaped by night, and lived in retirement during the remaining part of Alexander's reign, which he enjoyed peaceably after the inſurrection above-mentioned had been quelled.

Demetrius beſieges Berœa; but is afterwards taken priſoner, and ſent to Parthia, where he dies.

From Judæa, Demetrius marched with ten thouſand foot and one thouſand horſe to beſiege his brother Philip in the town of Berœa. Straton, the friend of Philip, who held the government of the place, applied to Zizus, a prince of Arabia, and Mithridates Sinaces, king of Parthia, for aſſiſtance. They ſupplied a formidable army to repulſe Demetrius, whoſe people being greatly diſtreſſed for water, and perpetually annoyed by the darts and arrows of the confederate powers, at length ſurrendered, Demetrius being taken priſoner, and ſent as a preſent to Mithridates, king of Parthia. The Antiochians who were found in the camp were allowed to return to Antioch. Mithridates behaved to his priſoner with a degree of liberality and reſpect that acquired him great honour; but being ſeized with illneſs, Demetrius did not long ſurvive. In a ſhort time after Demetrius had been made priſoner, Philip repaired to Antioch, and aſſumed the government of the Syrian dominions. While he was engaged in an expedition againſt the Parthians, his brother Antiochus, otherwiſe called Dionyſius, procured himſelf to be inveſted with the ſovereignty of Damaſcus. Upon receiving intelligence of this event, Philip immediately repaired to the city, where he gained admittance by means of Mileſius, who was governor of the fort, and depoſed Antiochus. He offered no gratuity to Mileſius, leſt it ſhould be imagined that he had been admitted into the town through bribery, rather than the authority of his name and character: and for this neglect that officer ſeized an opportunity of revenge. While Philip was engaged in his uſual exerciſes and diverſions at the circus, Mileſius ſhut the gates of the city againſt him, and determined again to receive Antiochus; who upon gaining information of what had happened, marched out of Arabia, and entered Judæa with an army of eight thouſand foot, and eight hundred horſe. Hereupon Alexander cauſed a ditch to be cut of conſiderable depth, extending from Caparſaba, which is now called Antipatris, to the ſea of Joppa, which was the only paſſage whereby acceſs could be gained to the town. He alſo erected a wall of conſiderable length, and a number of towers, compoſed of wood. Antiochus ſet fire to theſe wooden fortifications, by which means he gained a paſſage into Arabia. He proceeded to engage the enemy, who gave way on his firſt attack; but they ſoon after advanced with ten thouſand horſe, and Antiochus encountered them with great vigour, and a bloody conteſt enſued. Antiochus had ſo greatly the advantage, that he conſidered himſelf ſecure of victory: but obſerving one of the wings in danger of being overpowered, he eagerly preſſed to its relief, but in the attempt it was his fortune to be ſlain. The troops were ſo diſpirited by the death of their leader, that they fled in confuſion to Cana, where the majority of them periſhed for want of food. Merely from a principle of oppoſition to Ptolemy, the ſon of Mennæus, the people of Damaſcus elected Aretus to ſucceed Antiochus Dionyſius in the government of Cœlo-Syria. He led an army into Judæa, vanquiſhed Alexander in the neighbourhood of Addida, and after having concluded a treaty with him, returned to Damaſcus.

Alexander ſubdues ſeveral places.

Alexander ſubdued the city of Dion by aſſault. After this enterprize he proceeded to Eſſa, where Zeno had depoſited all his valuable treaſure: he environed the place with three walls, after which he reduced it by aſſault. He then marched againſt Gaulana, Seleucia, the Vale of Antiochus, and the fortreſs of Gamala, which places he alſo conquered by ſtorm. Many accuſations of mal-adminiſtration having been exhibited againſt Demetrius, Alexander deprived him of the regal authority. After having employed three years in the above expeditions, Alexander conducted his army back to Jeruſalem; and the Jews received him with the warmeſt congratulations, expreſſing a perfect ſatisfaction in his conduct, which had brought their affairs into ſo proſperous a train.

Extenſive dominions of the Jews.

At this period the Jews were in poſſeſſion of many conſiderable places in Syria, Idumæa, and Phœnicia: as Apollonia, Joppa, Jamnia, Azotus, Gaza, Anthedon, Raphia, Roinocura, and the tower of Straton, on the ſea-coaſt. In the inland part of Idumæa, they had Adora, Mariſſa, Samaria, and the mountains of Carmel and Itabyr, Scythopolis, Gadara, Gaulanitis, Seleucia, and *Gabala: in the country of the Moabites, Eſſebon, Medaba, Lemba, Oron, Thelithon, and Zara: and in Cilicia, Aulon, and Pella. The laſt-mentioned city was deſtroyed in conſequence of the inhabitants having refuſed to adopt the laws and cuſtoms of the Jews, who poſſeſſed many places in Syria, which we have not particularized.

Alexander's ſickneſs and death.

Towards the concluſion of his reign, Alexander became violently addicted to intemperance, the conſequence of which was a quartan ague. He was afflicted with this diſtemper for three years, during which ſpace he ſtill continued his attention to the affairs of government and the army: but his exceſſes, and the cares annexed to his ſtation, at length produced his death, which happened on the frontiers of the Geraſens, during the ſiege of the caſtle of Ragaba, ſituated on the other ſide the river Jordan.

His queen's lamentation thereupon.

The queen Alexandra judging her conſort beyond the poſſibility of recovery, gave way to the violence of grief, and lamented the miſerable ſituation to which herſelf and children would be reduced by his death. "My beloved huſband, (ſaid ſhe) what will be the fate of your wife and children if we are deprived of your protection, and left to the mercy of your moſt inveterate foes!" To this Alexander replied, "I particularly requeſt that you follow the advice I am about to give: as the only effectual means to ſecure a peaceable ſucceſſion to yourſelf and children, keep my deceaſe profoundly ſecret from the army till the caſtle ſhall be ſubdued; then repair in triumph to Jeruſalem with the news of victory; and let your principal care be to ingratiate yourſelf into the eſteem of the Phariſees; for your character will receive its colour from the intereſt you form with that ſect, to whoſe opinions thoſe of the multitude are entirely ſubſervient. The popular clamour againſt me has been raiſed by an oppoſition to them. On your arrival at Jeruſalem, ſend for the principal men among the Phariſees, expoſe my corpſe before them, and ſay, that from a veneration of their piety and juſtice, you reſign the body either to be allowed the ceremony of interment, or be treated with contempt and indignity in return for my paſt unworthy conduct, as their diſcretion ſhall dictate; and aſſure them, that in this, and all other matters of a public nature, you will obſerve an implicit obedience to their authority. Follow this counſel, and my remains will infallibly receive the honours of a magnificent funeral; and yourſelf and your offſpring will be eſtabliſhed in the dignities of the royal ſtation." Having concluded this ſpeech, Alexander expired, in the twenty-ſeventh year of his ſovereignty, and in the forty-ninth of his age.

CHAP. XVI.

HYRCANUS, the eldeſt Son of ALEXANDER, is advanced to the pontificate. ARISTOBULUS leads an Army againſt PTOLEMY. The Siege of PTOLEMAIS by TIGRANES, King of ARMENIA. MITHRIDATES vanquiſhed by LUCULLUS. The Forts belonging to Queen ALEXANDRA ſubmit to ARISTOBULUS, whoſe Wife and Children ſhe impriſons. ALEXANDRA dies.

Alexandra obtains the good will of the Phariſees.

THE caſtle being ſubdued, the queen, in conformity to the direction of her late huſband, delivered the body to the Phariſees, to be diſpoſed of as they ſhould judge expedient, and ſubmitted the adminiſtration entirely entirely to their direction. This conduct acquired Alexandra the warmest friendship of the Pharisees, who had hitherto been her most inveterate enemies: they harangued the multitude, highly extolling the merits of Alexander, and lamenting the loss of so excellent a sovereign; and their discourse had such an effect upon the people, that they determined to observe his funeral with a magnificence superior to what had been known on any former occasion.

Hyrcanus raised to the high-priesthood.

Alexander left two sons, the elder of whom was named Hyrcanus, and the other Aristobulus; but the regal dignity he bequeathed to his queen Alexandra. Hyrcanus was not qualified for affairs of state, being naturally disposed to a life of ease. Aristobulus was of an active and intrepid disposition. The disapprobation which the queen expressed of the administration during the life of her husband, obtained her the favour of the people. Through her interest Hyrcanus was appointed to the office of high-priest: this distinction was not given him on account of his seniority to Aristobulus, but on the consideration that he might be governed with the least difficulty. Though the government was conducted under the authority of the queen's name, she was a mere instrument to the Pharisees, to whose will she exacted a strict obedience in her subjects. The traditions and ordinances of the Pharisees, which had been suppressed by her father-in-law, she caused to be revived, at the instance of this sect, who also obtained her concurrence to the return of exiles, and such other measures as they were inclined to effect. She considerably augmented her own troops, and had a mercenary army in constant pay.

Intrigues and severities of the Pharisees.

In this last, and some other particular instances, she acted independent of the Pharisees. Her great power rendered her so formidable to the neighbouring states, that they sent her hostages as a security for not committing acts of hostility. The Pharisees were perpetually urging the queen to acts which fomented disorders in the government. They became exceedingly importunate for vengeance to be executed upon those who had advised taking away the lives of the eight hundred Jews, of whom we have already spoken. In compliance with their request, Diogenes was put to death, and after him many others. At length the leading men among those who were prosecuted by the Pharisees repaired to the queen, Aristobulus being at their head; and his countenance manifested the abhorrence he entertained of the public measures. The adherents of Aristobulus represented to the queen, that in the utmost extremity of danger they had preserved an uniform loyalty to their late sovereign, who had generously rewarded their services: and they supplicated, that since they had escaped the perils of war, they might not be sacrificed to the malevolence and treachery of their domestic enemies. They added, that if their persecutors would proceed no further in their sanguinary purpose, from a respect to their superiors, they would suppress future complaints on what had been already perpetrated. They requested that if their adversaries were permitted to continue their cruelties, the queen would allow them to withdraw, saying they would rather yield their lives in the palace than retire from her jurisdiction without her consent. They observed, that to countenance the declared enemies of her deceased consort, at the expence of his approved friends, would be a severe reproach upon her majesty's honour; and Aretas, the Arabian king, and other hostile powers, would enjoy a peculiar pleasure upon learning that she had driven from her court the men who had been so formidable, that their very names had formerly struck them with terror. They said, that if she was determined to yield every consideration to the ambition of the Pharisees, they had only to solicit her majesty to grant them permission to retire into castles and garrisons, where they would terminate a miserable existence, honourably sharing the common calamities which seemed to await the friends of the deceased king.

Remonstrance of Aristobulus and his adherents against them.

These expostulations drew tears from the auditors, who invoked the ghost of Alexander to compassionate those who had been slain, and those whom it was apprehended would experience a similar fate. Aristobulus spoke with the most freedom on the public cause, and he was the least reserved in uttering reproaches upon his mother. The people who were so heavily oppressed were themselves the cause of the calamities they experienced, by vesting the government in the hands of an impetuous and vindictive woman, notwithstanding the empire might have been legally consigned to a successor of the male line.

The queen gives the discontented Pharisees several strong places, reserving others to herself.

Being greatly embarrassed by the conduct of the malecontents, the queen judged she could not adopt a more expedient measure than that of appointing them to retire to several garrisons and places of strength: but it was stipulated that they should not enter Hyrcania, Alexandrias, and Machæras, in which places she had deposited her jewels and other valuable treasure. Soon after this she sent Aristobulus at the head of an army to oppose Ptolemy, surnamed Mennæus, near Damascus, he being a turbulent prince, and exceedingly vexatious to his neighbours: but he returned without effecting any considerable enterprise.

Expedition of Tigranes against the Syrians and Jews.

While affairs remained in this situation, Alexandra received intelligence that Tigranes, king of Armenia, had marched an immense army into Syria, and that his design was to penetrate into Judæa. In consequence of this alarming intelligence, the queen dispatched an embassy, charged to make compliments and present gifts to Tigranes, who was then encamped before Ptolemais. The queen Selene, otherwise named Cleopatra, who held the government of Syria, animated her subjects to oppose the operations of Tigranes. The ambassadors sent by Alexandra

Alexandra on the part of the whole Jewiſh people, were favourably received, and Tigranes aſſured them of a friendly diſpoſition, acknowledging that he conſidered himſelf highly honoured by the queen's ſending an embaſſy to him at ſo great a diſtance. Tigranes ſubdued Ptolemais, and immediately after that enterprize received information that Mithridates having been routed and purſued by Lucullus, had fled into Siberia; and that Lucullus being unable to overtake him, had marched into Armenia, where he was then committing great devaſtation. Hereupon Tigranes drew off his army, and reſolved to provide for the ſafety of his own dominions.

Ariſtobulus forms a deſign of obtaining the government.

Alexandra being ſeized with a dangerous illneſs, Ariſtobulus judged that he ſhould not meet a more favourable opportunity for executing the deſigns he had formed. Accompanied only by one attendant, he went privately by night to the forts and caſtles where the friends of his late father reſided. He was greatly diſſatisfied with the conduct of his mother; and he became uneaſy upon reflecting, that if death ſhould be the conſequence of her preſent indiſpoſition, the whole family would be at the mercy of the Phariſees, who had an abſolute authority over their creature Hyrcanus, the next in ſucceſſion to the government, and that he was totally unqualified for executing a public truſt. He communicated his purpoſe only to his wife, whom leaving, with his children, at Jeruſalem, he repaired to Agada, where an inhabitant of diſtinguiſhed rank, named Galates, gave him a liberal reception. On the day after that of his departure, his abſence was obſerved by Alexandra, who, however, entertained no idea of his intention, till ſhe was informed that ſeveral fortreſſes had ſubmitted to him. For when one place had accepted his propoſals, the example was immediately followed by the reſt. The queen and her party were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation, judging Ariſtobulus to be a man qualified to ſucceed in the enterpriſe he had undertaken; and they were further alarmed by the dreadful apprehenſion that they ſhould be called to a ſevere account for the barbarities they had exerciſed upon his friends. The wife and children of Ariſtobulus were ſeized, and confined under a ſtrong guard in the citadel adjacent to the temple. The people repaired in great bodies to the prince, who in fifteen days was maſter of two and twenty caſtles. He ſpeedily aſſembled an army from Mount Libanus, Trachonitis, and the neighbouring powers, who were readily inclined to ſupport the ſtronger party, from the expectation of the advantage they ſhould derive by aſſiſting in the eſtabliſhment of a new king. Hyrcanus and the elders requeſted that the queen would give directions as to the meaſures they were to purſue. They informed her of the great power of Ariſtobulus, ſaying their ſituation was deſperate, but that though ruin was to enſue, they could not act without her concurrence. She replied, that the ſtate of her mind and body rendered her wholly incapable of the cares of government, which ſhe reſigned entirely to their management: adding, that there was no deficiency either of men or money. Having delivered theſe words, ſhe expired, in the ſeventy-third year of her age, and in the ninth of her reign.

The rapid increaſe of his intereſt.

Death of Alexandra.

Alexandra was a woman highly ambitious of honour and command, and ſo particularly aſſiduous in the diſpatch of public buſineſs, that ſhe may ſerve as a worthy example to rulers of the other ſex. She attended to preſent circumſtances, without vainly endeavouring to penetrate into futurity. She was moderate in the exerciſe of her authority, and lived in high reputation for juſtice and integrity. After her deceaſe, the errors of her government were conſpicuous in the calamities experienced by the royal family. The queen having choſen the enemies of her houſe for her adviſers, is to be juſtly attributed as the cauſe of the misfortunes which followed. During her reign, however, ſhe preſerved the government in uninterrupted tranquillity.

CHAP. I.

HYRCANUS defeated by ARISTOBULUS. An Accommodation between them.

HYRCANUS entered on the office of high-prieſt in the third year of the Olympiad one hundred and ſeventy-ſeven, when Q. Hortenſius, and Q. Metellus Creticus were conſuls. Ariſtobulus inſtantly prepared to attack him, and a battle was fought near Jericho, in which Hyrcanus was routed, many of his troops deſerting to the oppoſite party, and himſelf obliged to take refuge in the citadel, where, by the command of the mother of Ariſtobulus, his wife and children were impriſoned: the reſt of Hyrcanus's troops fought for ſafety within the the verge of the temple, but in a little while were induced to submit. The paſſions of the brothers being at length cooled, they mutually agreed that the poſſeſſion of the government ſhould be ſecured to Ariſtobulus, while Hyrcanus ſhould enjoy his private fortune in the manner moſt agreeable to himſelf. This agreement was ſigned in the temple, and validated by the ceremonies of joining hands, pledging their public faith, and embracing each other in the ſight of all the aſſembly: and this being done, Ariſtobulus departed to his palace, and Hyrcanus to his private apartments in the ſame building.

Antipater ſtirs up the Jews againſt Ariſtobulus.

Among the adherents of Hyrcanus was a certain Idumæan, named Antipater, who was a mortal foe to Ariſtobulus. He was a man of fortune, of an active but litigious diſpoſition; and from an enmity which had long ſubſiſted between him and Ariſtobulus, he ſought to degrade the latter in the opinion of the people, by every poſſible method of calumny and detraction; and at length ſo far prevailed, as to excite their jealouſy and fear of him. Antipater uſed to inſinuate how unreaſonable it was that the elder brother ſhould be ſuperſeded by the younger, to the excluding him from his government and birthright; and hinted, that it was a diſgrace to the many noble Jews who permitted ſuch an aſſumption of power. In the ſame manner he talked to Hyrcanus, whom he adviſed to ſecrete himſelf, ſince the oppoſite party could not but have a deſign on his life, knowing that his brother was not ſafe while he lived. Hyrcanus was a man of an unſuſpecting diſpoſition, on whom this diſcourſe appeared to have little effect; but his brother Ariſtobulus was of warm and violent paſſions.

He applies to Aretas in behalf of Hyrcanus.

Antipater perceived that his inſinuations did not operate on Hyrcanus as he wiſhed: but he ſtill urged him to avoid his brother, till at length he prevailed on him to offer his friendſhip and ſervices to Aretas, king of Arabia, and claim his protection in return; and this advice appeared the more reaſonable, as Arabia was adjacent to Judæa. This reſolution being made, Antipater repaired to Aretas, and having obtained his oath not to deliver Hyrcanus into the hands of his enemies, he returned to him with an account of the ſucceſs of his expedition. Having remained a little while at Jeruſalem, he conducted Hyrcanus out of the city by night, and, making long journies, brought him ſafe to the city of Petra, where the court of Aretas was kept. He now exerted all his influence with the king to eſtabliſh Hyrcanus in his paternal right; and, at length, by preſents and arguments, induced him to conſent. At the ſame time Hyrcanus promiſed that if, through the king's means, he ſhould be ſettled in his government, he would reſtore the twelve cities which his father had taken from the Arabians.

CHAP. II.

ARISTOBULUS defeated by ARETAS, who drives him to the Temple, and aſſaults him there. The JEWS retire to EGYPT, to celebrate the Feaſt of unleavened Bread. ONIAS ſtoned to Death.

Aretas overcomes Ariſtobulus, and aſſaults him in the temple.

ARETAS, encouraged by the promiſes of Hyrcanus, collected an army of fifty thouſand cavalry and infantry, with which he marched againſt Ariſtobulus, whom he ſoon overcame; and many of his troops deſerting to Hyrcanus, he retreated to Jeruſalem, to which place Aretas purſued him, and attacked him in the temple; moſt of the people, except the prieſts, now taking the part of Hyrcanus; while Aretas, with his Jewiſh, as well as Arabian forces, preſſed on with the utmoſt alacrity. As the feaſt of unleavened bread approached, at the time this war was depending, the principal Jews retired into Egypt; and at this period Onias, a holy man, ſecreted himſelf, in the expectation of a civil war. The Jews, impreſſed with an idea of the piety of Onias, intreated him, that, as his prayers had formerly delivered them from famine, he would now denounce a curſe on Ariſtobulus and his people, that they might be freed from the miſeries of war. Onias heſitated; but the people repeatedly urging him, he ſtood up in the midſt of them, and ſaid, "Thou, O God, art the King of kings; and ſince it ſo happens, that we who now ſtand before thee are thy people, and thy prieſts are thoſe who are beſieged in the temple, I humbly intreat that thou wouldeſt not liſten to the prayers of either party to deſtroy the other!" Thus ſaying, a ſet of villainous Jews ſtoned him to death; and his barbarous murder was avenged in the following manner. During the attack of the temple, the time of the feaſt of unleavened bread arrived, when it was cuſtomary for the Jews to offer a number of ſacrifices: but the parties beſieged being deficient, deſired the others to ſupply them; and a thouſand drachmas, ready money, for each beaſt, was the agreed price. The prieſts and Ariſtobulus let down this money in a bag, from the wall of the temple: but when the aſſailants had received it, they refuſed to deliver the beaſts for ſacrifice, thus not only robbing men, but defrauding God of the ſacrifice intended for his ſervice. On this infamous conduct the prieſts united in prayer, that God would not permit the crime to eſcape without puniſhment. An immediate judgment was the conſequence of their prayers: a violent tempeſt deſcended, which cut off the fruits of the earth throughout the province: ſo that fifteen drachmas was the price of a ſingle meaſure of wheat.

Scaurus, the Roman general, ſent into Judea, and eſpouſes the intereſt of Ariſtobulus.

At this period Pompey being kept in Armenia, in conſequence of a war with Tigranes, diſpatched Scaurus into Syria, who arriving at Damaſcus, found that Metellus and Lollius had lately made capture of that city, and therefore proceeded towards Judæa. While he was on his way thither, an embaſſador arrived from Hyrcanus, and another from Ariſtobulus, each to treat of an alliance offen-ſive and defenſive: and they each offered four hundred talents as the terms. Scaurus, on conſideration of the whole matter, accepted the offer of Ariſtobulus, and directed Aretas to retire from the ſiege of Jeruſalem, upon pain of being deemed an enemy to Rome. Scaurus now returned to Damaſcus, while Ariſtobulus advanced with his army againſt Aretas and Hyrcanus, whom he attacked and conquered in a place called Papyron, killing ſeven thouſand of their men, among whom was Cæphalis, the brother of Antipater.

CHAP. III.

The Acceptance of Bribes charged on GABINIUS and SCAURUS. The Diſpute between HYRCANUS and ARISTOBULUS heard before POMPEY, who poſtpones the Settlement of it: and ARISTOBULUS retires to JUDÆA.

Ariſtobulus ſends valuable preſents to Pompey.

WHEN Pompey was on his way to Damaſcus and Cœlo-Syria, embaſſadors attended him with preſents from Syria, Judæa, and Egypt. In particular, Ariſtobulus ſent him a golden vine, valued at five hundred talents, of which Strabo gives the following account: "A preſent was made to Pompey, from Egypt, of a crown weighing four hundred pieces of gold; and from Judæa another preſent, of a golden vine or garden, which received the name of Delight. Embaſſadors made theſe preſents; and in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, at Rome, I ſaw the vine, inſcribed 'Alexander, king of the Jews.' It was allowed to have been ſent by Ariſtobulus, prince of the Jews, and was eſtimated at five hundred talents."

Pompey hears the cauſe between the two brothers.

Pompey was now attended by other embaſſadors, viz. Antipater from Hyrcanus, and Nicodemus from Ariſtobulus, who charged Gabinius and Scaurus, the former with embezzling three, and the latter four hundred talents. Pompey undertook to hear this cauſe, and appointed the parties to attend him. The ſpring advancing, Pompey marched towards Damaſcus, in his way to which he deſtroyed Apamia, a fort belonging to Antiochus Cyzicenus. He likewiſe adverted to the conduct of Ptolemy Mennæus, a bad man; who was, however, permitted to redeem his life by paying a thouſand talents, which were diſtributed among the troops of Pompey. This prince next razed the fort of Lycias (poſſeſſed by Silas the Jew), and proceeded through Heliopolis and Chalcis, to Cœlo-Syria, and thence from Bella to Damaſcus, where the diſpute between the Jews and their princes was to be heard. Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus charged each other, and the common people oppoſed both; ſaying, "They ought not to be governed by kings, but prieſts, agreeable to the laws of their country." They acknowledged that the two brothers were deſcended from the line of prieſthood; but inſiſted, that their view was to overturn the government and enſlave the people.

Plea of Hyrcanus.

Hyrcanus pleaded, that, though he was the elder brother, Ariſtobulus had uſurped his rank and eſtate, contrary to juſtice, had robbed him of his birth-right, and reduced him to a dependence on his own bounty. He repreſented him as a man diſpoſed to haraſs his neighbours both by land and ſea; and inſiſted, that the violence of his diſpoſition was what enraged the people againſt him.

Defence of Ariſtobulus.

The plea of Ariſtobulus was, that no view to uſurp the authority had deprived Hyrcanus of his title or dignity: but that he was ſet aſide from ruling, on the ſcore of incapacity for government, the people in general holding him in contempt. "For my part (ſaid Ariſtobulus) I had no choice but to aſſume the government, or venture its being transferred to another family; and with regard to the title of king, I held it only as I received it from my father Alexander." Theſe things he offered to prove by the teſtimony of a ſet of gaudy courtiers, whoſe evidence ſeemed fit only to be rejected by men of calm and temperate diſpoſitions.

The matter referred by Pompey to a future deciſion.

On hearing both ſides, Pompey ſeemed to be of opinion, that Ariſtobulus had been too haſty in his proceedings; but, for the preſent, he diſmiſſed both parties, promiſing that when he had reduced the Nabathæans, he would return and conſider the buſineſs farther; but he enjoined them to behave peaceably in the mean time, and, leſt Ariſtobulus ſhould interrupt him in his journey, diſmiſſed him with reſpectful compliments: but the latter, regardleſs of what Pompey had promiſed, departed to Delion, and from thence to Judæa.

CHAP. IV.

POMPEY in a rage marches againſt ARISTOBULUS, who delivers up the Caſtles in his Poſſeſſion, and retreats to JERUSALEM, towards which place POMPEY follows him.

Revenge of Pompey againſt Ariſtobulus, whom he purſues to Judæa.

POMPEY was ſo exaſperated at the proceedings of Ariſtobulus, that he combined the army he had deſtined againſt the Nabathæans, with thoſe forces he had raiſed in Damaſcus and other parts of Syria, and his Roman legions, and purſued him through Pella and Scythopolis, till he arrived at Coroe, in the center of Judæa, where he learnt that Ariſtobulus was retired to a ſtrong caſtle named Alexandrion, at the ſummit of a mountain. From this place he ſummoned him to come down, which, in dread of a war with the Romans, his friends adviſed him to comply with. They now held a conference on the ſubject of the diſpute between the brothers, after which Ariſtobulus obtained Pompey's permiſſion to retire to the caſtle; a favour which he frequently aſked, by way of of obtaining his end, by keeping on good terms with Pompey: yet this did not prevent his putting himself in the best posture of defence, lest the latter should declare for his brother. Some time afterwards Pompey commanded him to deliver up his castles, and to signify to the governor thereof, the royal will, that no hesitation might be made. Aristobulus obeyed this order, but was so chagrined thereat, that he departed immediately to Jerusalem, to make preparations for a war which he now thought inevitable. In a little time Pompey followed him at the head of his army; but, while on his march, received an express from Pontus, informing him that Pharnaces had slain his father Mithridates.

Aristobulus delivers up his castles to Pompey.

The terms of Aristobulus accepted, but are not complied with.

The first place Pompey encamped at was Jericho, and the next day he proceeded towards Jerusalem. By this time Aristobulus, who had regretted his former conduct, went out to meet Pompey, to whom he offered a sum of money, with the command of the city, and whatever other gratification he might wish, so that a war could but be prevented. These terms were accepted by Pompey, who dispatched Gabinius, with some troops, to the city, to receive the offered money: but his endeavours were fruitless; for the gates of the city were shut on his approach, and it was urged, that the soldiers would not abide by the stipulation. This behaviour so enraged Pompey, that he advanced to Jerusalem, and directed that Aristobulus should be guarded in the strictest manner.

CHAP. V.

The Citizens of JERUSALEM divided. A Peace proposed, but rejected. The Temple assaulted and taken. JERUSALEM made tributary to the ROMANS. ARISTOBULUS carried Prisoner to ROME by POMPEY.

Opposite parties in the city.

DURING the time that Pompey lay before the town, the citizens were divided in opinion how to act. The friends of Aristobulus broke down the bridge between the temple and the city, having first possessed themselves of the former; while the adherents of Pompey admitted his army, and gave the city and palace into his hands. Piso, his lieutenant, being sent to take possession of them, fortified the buildings near the temple. This being done, Pompey made an offer of peace, which being rejected, he prepared for an assault; Hyrcanus supplying him with all things that were necessary. Pompey proposed to begin on the north side of the temple, which was the weakest part: but this was encompassed by a ditch, and guarded by high towers. Crags and precipices prevented all passage on the city-side, as the bridge was down: but the Romans, with amazing labour, filled the ditch with timber and other materials, and raised ramparts so high, that they played large stones on the walls of the temple. But the sabbath of the Jews intervening, gave the Romans an advantage; for on that day, though the law allowed them to repel force by force, yet they durst not work, even to hinder the operations of their enemies. The Romans observing that no opposition was made on the sabbath, employed that day in preparation for the attack on the following. This will serve to prove the high veneration the Jews have for their religion and laws, from which even the dread of death cannot induce them to depart.

The temple taken by assault, and a general massacre ensues.

When the siege had continued about two months, the temple was taken on a fast-day, in the hundred and seventy-ninth Olympiad, during the consulship of C. Antonius, and M. T. Cicero. On entering the place the enemy made a general massacre; but even this cruelty did not deter those at the altar from proceeding in their devotions, as they deemed it preferable to fall into the hands of an inveterate foe, than to abandon the rights of their religion. These facts are attested by Strabo, Nicolaus of Damascus, the Roman historian Livy, and others who have written of the life and actions of Pompey. The enemy attacked the great tower with engines and batteries, and having made a breach in a wall adjacent to it, the tower fell to the ground. The breach being made, the enemy crouded in at it; among the first of whom were Cornelius Faustus, the son of Sylla, Furius and Fabius, each with distinct parties. The place was covered with dead bodies, some of which were slain by the Romans, while many of the Jews killed each other: some threw themselves from the walls, others fired the houses, rather than be witness to the barbarities that were practised. About twelve thousand Jews fell in this action, though but few of the Romans. Among the prisoners was Absalom, the uncle and father-in-law of Aristobulus. A number of persons now entered the holy places, where none but the priests had ever been before; among whom were Pompey and his attendants, who found a table of gold, cups and a candlestick of the same metal; perfumes, incense, and, in the treasury, about two thousand talents. These things, however, he deemed holy, and from motives of piety forbore to touch them, but ordered the officers of the temple to cleanse the place on the following day, and offered sacrifices in the accustomed manner. He reinstated Hyrcanus in the office of high-priest, caused the incendiaries who promoted the war to be executed, and rewarded, according to their merits, Faustus, and others who had behaved valiantly in the attack. He rendered Jerusalem tributary to the Romans, and reduced to allegiance those towns in Cœlo-Syria which were possessed by the Jews, whom he confined to their antient boundaries. Gadara he caused to be rebuilt, in compliment to his freedman, Demetrius, who was born there, and gave up to their former inhabitants the towns of Hippon, Scythopolis, Dian, Samaria, Marissa, Pious behaviour of Pompey.

Jerusalem made tributary to the Romans.

Mariſſa, Azotus, Jamnia, Arethuſa, and other places in the interior parts of the country: but Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and Straton's-Tower, being all on the coaſt, he made them free ports, and added them to the province. In future time Straton's-Tower took the name of Cæſarea, on its being rebuilt by Herod.

The feud between the two brothers the cauſe of the Jewiſh ſlavery and misfortune.

The ruin of Jeruſalem, and the loſs of the liberty of the Jews to the Romans, is to be dated from the quarrel between Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus; as the Jews were compelled to reſtore to the Syrians what they had taken in war, to pay above ten thouſand talents to the Romans, and had the mortification to ſee the ſovereign authority tranſferred to the meaneſt of the people, which had hitherto remained with the prieſts.

The war being ended, Pompey aſſigned the government of Cœlo-Syria, even to Euphrates, and the borders of Egypt, to Scaurus, with whom he left two legions of Roman troops; departing himſelf to Rome, having Ariſtobulus, with his ſons Alexander and Antigonus, and two of his daughters priſoners: but Alexander found means to effect his eſcape.

Treaty concluded between Scaurus and the Jews.

Scaurus marching towards Petra, the chief place in Arabia, found the country ſo ſtony and deſolate, that he was compelled to commit great ravages in order to furniſh his ſoldiers with bread. Agreeable to an order of Hyrcanus, Antipater ſupplied Scaurus with corn and other neceſſaries from Judæa; and Antipater being known to Aretas, Scaurus commiſſioned him to go and treat with him; and he ſucceeded ſo well in his commiſſion, that Aretas agreed to pay three hundred talents to prevent the ruin of his country. Thus an apprehended war terminated to the equal ſatisfaction of both parties.

CHAP. VI.

ALEXANDER attacked and routed by GABINIUS, who offers an Amneſty, and orders the damaged Cities to be repaired. ALEXANDER delivers up his Caſtles. HYRCANUS reſtored to the Prieſthood. Five Courts of Juſtice conſtituted.

Gabinius marches againſt Alexander;

FREQUENT incurſions being made into Judæa, and much miſchief done by Alexander the ſon of Ariſtobulus, a command was given to Gabinius, who went from Rome to Syria againſt him, and performed many actions of bravery. At this time Hyrcanus the high-prieſt, though unable to reſiſt an enemy, propoſed to repair the walls of Jeruſalem, which Pompey had demoliſhed; but the Romans prevented his proceeding in this buſineſs. Alexander now collected through the country ten thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe, conſiſting of Jews and others, and fortified the caſtle of Alexandrion, after having ſupplied it with ſtores. Gabinius proceeded to attack him; but ſent forward Marcus Antonius, and other officers, who being joined by Antipater's auxiliary forces, and the honeſt Jews commanded by Pitholaus and Malichus, came up with Alexander, who hereupon retreating towards Jeruſalem, a battle enſued, in which Alexander had three thouſand men ſlain, and the ſame number taken priſoners. Gabinius now beſieged Alexandrion, but offered pardon to the beſieged, on their ſurrender: but they ſtrongly guarded the walls of the caſtle, which the Romans bravely attacked, and killed many of them; Marcus Antonius, on this occaſion, behaving with diſtinguiſhed valour. Gabinius now left his army to proſecute the ſiege, and proceeded to a ſurvey of the country, and to give orders for the rebuilding thoſe cities which had been deſtroyed; in conſequence of which, after having been long deſerted, they ſoon became places of convenient reſidence. This being done, Gabinius repaired to the ſiege of Alexandrion, from whence Alexander ſent embaſſadors, offering to deliver that place, and the caſtles of Hyrcania and Machæras, on the condition of his pardon; which Gabinius granted, but razed the places to the ground. The mother of Alexander (whoſe huſband and children were priſoners at Rome) now viſited him, and he complied with all her propoſals. Hyrcanus was now conducted to Jeruſalem, and reinſtated in his office of high-prieſt. Five courts of juſtice were now eſtabliſhed, viz. at Jeruſalem, Gadara, Amathus, Jericho, and Saphora, the whole province being ſeparated into five equal diviſions: the people of each applying for the adminiſtration of juſtice in their own diſtrict.

who is defeated with great loſs of men.

Alexander delivers up to Gabinius the city and caſtles.

Ariſtobulus quits Rome, is purſued, and his army defeated.

Ariſtobulus eſcaping from Rome to Judæa, with a view to repair and fortify Alexandrion, after the deſtruction cauſed by the late ſiege, Gabinius diſpatched after him Siſenna, Antonius, and Servilius, to ſecure the place, and take him priſoner. His fame had brought many Jews to his intereſt, among whom was Pitholaus, governor of Jeruſalem, with a thouſand men well armed: many unarmed likewiſe attended, but thoſe he diſmiſſed. Marching with eight thouſand men to attack Machæras, the Romans overtook, fought, and conquered him, killing about five thouſand on the ſpot, while the reſt fled for ſafety. After being thus routed, Ariſtobulus, with about a thouſand men, fortified the caſtle as well as he was able; but in two days it was conquered by aſſault, and himſelf, and his ſon Antigonus made captives, and conducted to Gabinius, who ſent him a ſecond time priſoner to Rome, after he had poſſeſſed the offices of king and high-prieſt for three years and a half. Gabinius having intimated to the ſenate of Rome that he had promiſed their mother that the children of Ariſtobulus ſhould be ſet at liberty, on the giving up certain caſtles, they were ſent back to Jeruſalem in freedom.

He is ſent back priſoner to Rome.

An expedition againſt the Parthians was now undertaken by Gabinius, who, altering his intention, proceeded towards Egypt to reſtore Ptolemy. For this this expedition Antipater assisted him with money, arms, and corn, and induced many of the Jews near Pelusium to enter into an alliance with him.

Alexander, ravaging Syria, is overcome by the Romans.

When Gabinius returned, he found that Alexander, son of Aristobulus, had ravaged Syria with a large army, compelled many Jews into his service, killed numbers of the Romans, and pursued the inhabitants to mount Gerizim, whither they had fled for refuge. Hereupon Gabinius sent Antipater, a man of honour and skill, to treat with the Syrians; by which many of the revolters were brought to a sense of their duty: but Alexander was inflexible; for having collected an army of thirty thousand Jews, he resolved to hazard a battle with Gabinius. This battle was fought on mount Itabyr; and Gabinius conquered them, killing ten thousand Jews.

Gabinius defeats the Nabathæans.

After this victory Gabinius, in consequence of Antipater's advice, proceeded to attack the Nabathæans, whom he totally routed, and gave liberty to Mithridates and Orsones, two noble Parthians, who sued for his protection, and whom he reported to have fled into their own country. Gabinius, having honourably discharged all that he had in trust, retired to Rome, and was succeeded in his command by Crassus.

CHAP. VII.

The PARTHIANS destroy CRASSUS and his Army. PITHOLAUS made Captive, and put to Death. Character of ANTIPATER.

The temple pillaged by Crassus.

WHILE Crassus was preparing to make war with the Parthians, he went to Judæa, and plundered the temple of eight thousand talents, exclusive of the two thousand which Pompey refused to touch. He took likewise a bar of gold of three hundred minas, each mina computed at two pounds and a half. This bar was secreted in a beam made hollow to receive it, and delivered to Crassus by Eleazar, who observing his avidity, gave him this as a composition for the rest; for adjoining to this timber were hangings of immense value; and Eleazar had likewise the care of the other rich ornaments of the temple: nor was this bar of gold delivered till Crassus had solemnly sworn he would be content with it, and take no more: but he stripped all the temple, in violation of his oath.

How great soever this treasure deposited in the temple may appear, it will not seem so extraordinary, when it is considered how long the Jews were in amassing it, and that it was sent from all parts of the world where the true God was worshipped. That this account of its immense value is not exaggerated, appears by the testimony of various historians, among whom Strabo says, "Some money which Cleopatra had deposited at the Isle of Coos, with eight hundred talents of the Jews, was sent for to that island by Mithridates." Now as the Jews have no public treasure but what is sacred, it is evident that the Jews of Asia, fearing a war with Mithridates, sent this treasure to Coos: for those of Judæa would rather have lodged it in the temple of Jerusalem. In another place Strabo says, "Sylla going through Greece, to attack Mithridates, dispatched Lucullus to Cyrene, which was then distracted by the quarrels of the Jews, who had spread themselves all over the world." Again, he says, "The Cyrenians consisted of burghers, husbandmen, strangers and Jews, the last of whom are so dispersed, that they are found in every habitable part of the earth. Egypt and Cyrene, while governed by one prince, and several other countries, embraced the laws, rites and customs of the Jews; allowed them religious assemblies, and even educated their own children in the Jewish mode. In Egypt were great numbers of them, to whom a part of the city of Alexandria was assigned, and they were allowed magistrates and courts of justice. The Egyptians corresponded well with the Jews, who had formerly come from that country, and were easily united with the people."

Testimonies of Strabo.

Crassus now proceeded to give battle to the Parthians; but himself and most of his army were cut to pieces. In the interim Cassius went to Syria, where he stopped the progress of the Parthians, whose success had rendered them insolent. He then proceeded, by the way of Tyre, to Judæa, where he assaulted Taricheæ, and took it, making thirty thousand prisoners, among whom were Pitholaus, the friend of Aristobulus, who was put to death by the advice of Antipater. This Antipater married Cypron, an Arabian lady of high rank, by whom he had four sons, Phasael, Herod (afterwards king) and a daughter named Salome. Antipater was a man of such obliging deportment, that he conciliated the affections of the princes and nobles who knew him; particularly of the king of Arabia, who entrusted the government of his children to his care, while he waged war with Aristobulus. By this time Cassius, having reinforced his army, proceeded to the river Euphrates, to oppose the progress of the Parthians.

Crassus worsted by the Parthians, whom Cassius repulses.

CHAP. VIII.

CÆSAR liberates ARISTOBULUS, who is poisoned by the Partizans of POMPEY. ALEXANDER beheaded. His sister married to PHILIPPION, who being slain, she is then married to PTOLEMY.

Pompey flies from Rome.

SOME time after this, Cæsar having conquered Rome, found that Pompey and all the senate had fled from the city, and retired beyond the seas. Cæsar, therefore, gave Aristobulus his freedom, and placing two legions under his command, sent him into Syria, to keep that country in ſubjection: but the ſatisfaction he had reaſon to hope from this diſtinction was of very ſhort duration; for the adherents of Pompey ſoon found means to deſtroy him by poiſon: but the friends of Cæſar took care of his funeral. For a conſiderable time his body was embalmed in honey, till at length Antony ſent it for interment in the royal vault.

Alexander put to death by Pompey.

Pompey having given orders to Scipio that Alexander, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, ſhould be beheaded for former ſeditious practices againſt the Romans, the ſentence was executed at Antioch. Hereupon Ptolemy Menæus, governor of Chalcis near Libanus, ſent his ſon Philippion to Aſkalon, requeſting that the widow of Ariſtobulus would ſend to him her ſon Antigonus, and her daughters. With one of theſe daughters, named Alexandra, Philippion became enamoured, and was married to her; but he being afterwards killed, Ptolemy his father eſpouſed her, and made proviſion for the family.

Antipater aſſiſts Cæſar in conquering Egypt.

The influence that Antipater had in Judæa was very conſiderable. After the conqueſt and death of Pompey, by the advice of Hyrcanus, he rendered great ſervice to Cæſar in his war in Egypt: for Mithridates bringing troops to the aid of Cæſar, being compelled to ſtop at Aſkalon, as he could not proceed to Peluſium, Antipater reinforced him with three thouſand Jews, and induced the principal people of Arabia, and all Syria, to give him their aid: among the aſſiſtant princes was Jamblicus and his ſon Ptolemy; and Tholomy of Libanus, the ſon of Sohemus: in fact, the people were ambitious who ſhould be foremoſt in their ſervices. Hereupon Mithridates proceeded to Peluſium, the inhabitants of which refuſing him admittance, he attacked the place, and broke down part of the wall. Antipater firſt entered at the breach; and the troops ſo well ſeconded him, that the town ſoon ſurrendered.

Peluſium taken by Mithridates.

After this Antipater and Mithridates being on their way to join Cæſar, were oppoſed by the Egyptian Jews in the country of Onias: but Antipater, whoſe credit as their countryman was not ſmall, produced a letter from Hyrcanus the high prieſt; on which the opponents afforded them ſuch ſupplies as might be neceſſary on their march; and the inhabitants of Memphis chearfully came into the ſame intereſt.

CHAP. IX.

ANTIPATER relieves MITHRIDATES when near loſing a Battle. CÆSAR honours HYRCANUS and ANTIPATER. ANTIGONUS complains againſt them to CÆSAR, who determines in their Favour.

Antipater reſcues Mithridates, and overcomes the enemy.

MITHRIDATES and Antipater attacked the enemy at a place called Delta, diſtinguiſhed by the name of the camp of the Jews. Mithridates was puſhed ſo hard, as to endanger a general rout, when Antipater, advancing by the bank of the river, relieved him, put the enemy to flight, took poſſeſſion of their camp, and ſent for Mithridates to ſhare in the booty. In this action Antipater loſt about fifty men, and Mithridates eight hundred. When Cæſar was informed what had happened, he confeſſed that the honour of the victory was due to Antipater, whom he employed in poſts of honour during the war, in conſequence of which he received a number of wounds.

Antipater and Hyrcanus highly honoured by Cæſar.

This war being over, Cæſar went by ſea to Syria, paying all poſſible reſpect to Hyrcanus and Antipater, the former of whom he confirmed in his office of high-prieſt, and made the other a freeman of Rome. Some writers affirm, that Hyrcanus was in the above war: Strabo ſays, "Hyrcanus the high-prieſt came with Mithridates into Egypt:" and, in another place, he tells us that "Mithridates having gone thither by himſelf, ſent for Antipater, governor of Judæa, to come to him at Aſkalon, who brought three thouſand men with him: and that in conſequence of his advice, many princes and great men, among whom was Hyrcanus the high-prieſt, went over to Mithridates."

Antigonus in vain accuſes them to Cæſar.

At this period Antigonus, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, repreſented to Cæſar, that his father had been poiſoned for ſerving him in the wars; that Scipio had cut off his brother's head; that himſelf was diſinherited, and an object of commiſeration. He accuſed Hyrcanus and Antipater with having injured him in particular, and violated the rights of the people in general. Antipater, being preſent, obviated theſe reflections, ſpoke of the ungovernable ſpirit of Antigonus, ever ready to deſtroy the public peace, and modeſtly hinted his own merits to Cæſar, to whom he appealed on his own declaration reſpecting the late war. Ariſtobulus (it was ſaid) was always a profeſſed foe to Rome; ſo that the treatment he had received at the hands of the Romans, was no more than what the law of nations, and common prudence, would warrant. With regard to Scipio's beheading his brother; he had been convicted of ſeveral robberies, and was only puniſhed according to his demerits. Cæſar, having heard the whole merits of the caſe, confirmed Hyrcanus high-prieſt, offered Antipater the choice of any command, and made him governor of Judæa.

At this period the walls of Jeruſalem lying in the ſame ſtate of ruin in which Pompey had left them, Hyrcanus ſolicited Cæſar's permiſſion to rebuild them, which he readily granted, with every token of reſpect: and he likewiſe diſpatched an expreſs to the conſuls at Rome, to enter on the records of the capitol, his reſolution for that purpoſe.

This happened in the month of Panemus, in the ninth year of Hyrcanus's office of high-prieſt and prince. This governor of the Jews was likewiſe ſingularly honoured by the republic of Athens, who tranſmitted to him a decree in favour of the Jews.

Cæſar

Antipater repairs the walls of Jeruſalem.

Cæſar having diſpatched his affairs in Syria, returned immediately by ſea to Jeruſalem, taking with him Antipater, who, on his arrival, gave immediate orders for repairing the walls which Pompey had thrown down. Antipater likewiſe made a tour through the province, exhorting a turbulent people to peace and quietneſs. He repreſented to them the virtues of obedience to their prince, by the peaceable enjoyment of their poſſeſſions; explained what danger would reſult from ſeditious practices and innovations, which would compel their governors to perſecute them, force Hyrcanus to acts of tyranny, and even produce enmity from their beſt patrons and allies the Cæſars, and the ſenate of Rome, "who (ſaid he,) will exact a rigid obedience."

CHAP. X.

JERUSALEM and GALILEE governed by PHASAEL and HEROD. ANTIPATER envied for his Reputation. He is complained of to HYRCANUS, and HEROD is ordered to appear before the Judges. HEROD exaſperated againſt HYRCANUS.

Promotion of Phaſael and Herod.

HYRCANUS being of an eaſy diſpoſition, Antipater ſeized the opportunity of promoting his ſons, Phaſael and Herod, to poſts of eminence. To the former he gave the government of Jeruſalem and the adjacent country; and to the latter that of Galilee. Herod, at this time, was only fifteen years of age; but of a genius ſo great and enterpriſing, that he ſought every opportunity to diſtinguiſh himſelf. The borders of Syria were at that time much infeſted with robbers, and Herod took the whole band, and put them to death, with Ezechias, their commander. This heroic deed ſo raiſed his fame among the people, that he was deemed the author of their repoſe in every town and village: it alſo brought him to the knowledge of Sextus (kinſman of Cæſar) who had then the government of Syria. Phaſael was likewiſe inſpired, by his example, to ſeek for popularity. He was a man of patriotic diſpoſition, calculated for buſineſs, of admirable addreſs, temperate in the uſe of power, and never abuſing it. This diſpoſal of his ſons rendered Antipater an object of regard to the whole nation, which conſidered him rather as a prince than a deputy; and he was ſingularly diſtinguiſhed by his faith and friendſhip, and for remaining unaltered in his proſperity.

Antipater incurs the envy of the Jews.

The wealth, power, and grandeur of Antipater, the dignity of his family, and the veneration in which the people held him and his children, together with the vaſt revenue he received from Hyrcanus, cauſed him to be viewed with an eye of jealouſy by the principal Jews, eſpecially when they found he was a favourite with the emperor, as well as with the common people of Rome. They inſinuated that he received money of Hyrcanus, for the uſe of the Romans, and took the credit of it to himſelf, as if he had advanced it. This being hinted in malice to Hyrcanus, he appeared rather pleaſed with the circumſtance. But the people were chiefly chagrined by the ambitious diſpoſition of Herod, which induced them to make the following complaint to Hyrcanus: "Why will you be negligent while every thing is going to deſtruction? Perceive you not that Antipater and his ſons divide the prerogatives and emoluments of the royal power, while you are a prince only in title and name? Be cautious ere matters proceed too far; for depend on it, your government and life are equally endangered. If you conſider thoſe youths as your deputies, you are miſtaken; for, in fact, they are maſters. Herod's treatment of Ezechias and his companions was a violation of public juſtice: for it is murder to put a man to death without the ceremony of trial, however atrocious his crimes may have been: but Herod has exerciſed an arbitrary power, without the leaſt pretence of authority for ſo doing."

Herod, being accuſed, is cited to judgment.

The mothers of thoſe who had been ſlain now continued day after day in the temple, calling on prince and people for juſtice on Herod, for the murder of their children: till at length Hyrcanus appointed a day when a bench of judges ſhould determine between Herod and his accuſers. Herod came into court at the firſt call; but, in conſequence of his father's advice, only with ſuch attendants as might appear neceſſary to ſecure him without offending the court. At this time Sextus Cæſar, who commanded in Syria, wrote in favour of Herod to Hyrcanus, with threats, if he were not acquitted: but theſe were needleſs; for Hyrcanus was extravagantly fond of him. Herod and his attendants having waited a while, without a ſingle charge againſt him, the company were wondering at the event, when Sameas, a man of incorruptible integrity, ſpoke as follows:

Speech of Sameas againſt him.

"I never before ſaw a priſoner at the bar behave in ſo bold and vain a manner; and I believe your obſervation and experience will hardly furniſh you with ſuch another inſtance. It has been formerly cuſtomary for people, in ſuch a ſituation, to appear, by their dreſs and behaviour, reſigned to the legal enquiry that awaits them: but here is a culprit who ſeems to pride himſelf in his dreſs and attendants, and looks as if public juſtice was more to be dreaded by the court than the criminal. Yet I cenſure not him for conſulting his own ſafety, rather than the reſpect due to the laws, ſo much as I do the king and judges, who have permitted him to act in this manner. But remember that God is juſt and powerful; and the time is advancing, when this man, whom, in favour of Hyrcanus, you are ſeeking to diſcharge, ſhall ruin you, the judges and the king." It will appear, in the ſequel of the work, that his prediction was verified.

Herod withdraws, and goes to Sextus Cæſar.

As it now appeared to Hyrcanus that Herod was in danger, he adjourned the court till the following day, and adviſed him to ſave himſelf by a private retreat.

Hereupon

Hereupon Herod retired to Damaſcus, under pretence of being in fear of Hyrcanus; and, in conference with Sextus Cæſar, declared that he would diſclaim the juriſdiction of the court, if ever he ſhould be again ſummoned. This enraged the judges, who told Hyrcanus that his ruin was concerted: but though the matter was evident, and himſelf convinced of it, yet he had not courage to take the neceſſary advantage of the circumſtance. By this time Herod was ſafe in the protection of Sextus Cæſar, and had purchaſed part of the government of Cœlo-Syria. Hyrcanus now ſaw the danger that might be dreaded. Herod, enraged at being expoſed to a trial, drew forth an army, and would have attacked Jeruſalem, but for the entreaties of his father and brother: on their interceſſion, however, he abſtained from farther violence to the man who had raiſed him to fortune and honour. They ſaid, that though he had been cited to trial, he lay under obligation for his diſcharge. They mentioned the uncertain chance of war, and that victory often decided againſt all human expectations: ſaid he could hope nothing from divine juſtice, when fighting againſt the prince who had nouriſhed and protected, but never injured him: yet if, at preſent, he conceived an ill opinion of Hyrcanus, he ſhould attribute his conduct to evil counſellors. By this time Cæſar was returned to Rome, and preparing for an expedition into Africa, againſt Scipio and Cato; having been congratulated on his way by embaſſadors from Hyrcanus, who ſolicited with ſucceſs the renewal of antient leagues of friendſhip.

CHAP. XI.

A Sedition in SYRIA. CÆSAR murdered, and a Civil War enſues. The People greatly oppreſſed, and even ſold by Auction. MALICHUS enters into a Plot againſt ANTIPATER, but ſaves himſelf by Perjury.

Sedition in Syria.

A VIOLENT ſedition now happened in Syria. Cæcilius Baſſus engaging in a plot againſt the life of Sextus Cæſar, procured him to be murdered, withdrew his troops from the province, and took poſſeſſion of it. To this ſucceeded a war on the borders of Apamia. The friends of Cæſar marched againſt Baſſus, and were joined by Antipater and his ſons, who deemed themſelves bound to revenge the murder of their friend. During the progreſs of this war, Marcus offered himſelf to ſucceed Sextus; and, in the interim, Cæſar was murdered in the ſenate-houſe, by Brutus, Caſſius, and their fellow conſpirators, after having governed three years and a half.

Aſſaſſination of Cæſar by Brutus, &c.

Commencement of the Roman civil war.

Cæſar being dead, dreadful commotions happened among the principal men of Rome, each conſulting his apparent intereſt, till a civil war was the reſult. Caſſius taking poſſeſſion of the army in Syria, which then lay before Apamia, raiſed the ſiege, and induced Marcus and Baſſus to join him; which being done, he proceeded from place to place, collecting arms, money, and men: but in Judæa he impoſed a rate of between ſeven and eight hundred talents of ſilver, oppreſſing that diſtrict beyond any other. During this confuſion Antipater committed the care of levying part of his money to his two ſons, while Malichus (who was ſecretly his enemy) was concerned with others in collecting the reſt. Herod, ready to oblige the Romans at the expence of other people, gave Caſſius an early proof of his zeal, by valuable preſents collected in Galilee: but cities under the command of other governors, not being equally ready with their offers, were publickly ſold, with their inhabitants, to the beſt bidder, by order of Caſſius; as was the caſe with Gophna, Emmaus, Lydda, and Thamma. Malichus would, on this occaſion, have fallen a ſacrifice to the rage of Caſſius, had not Hyrcanus compounded for his life by the payment of a hundred talents. Caſſius had no ſooner departed with the treaſure he had collected, than Malichus concerted a plot againſt Antipater, conceiving that if he was deſtroyed, Hyrcanus would govern with more ſecurity. Antipater was aware of this deſign on him, and, for the prevention of its effects, croſſed the river Jordan, and placed himſelf at the head of as large an army of Jews and Arabians as he could collect: but Malichus, who was a man of equal artifice and courage, went immediately to Antipater and his ſons, and ſolemnly ſwore to his innocence. "Can it be imagined (ſaid he) that I ſhould be ſo weak as to think of a plot or conſpiracy, when I knew that Herod had the command of the arms and magazines, and that Phaſael had the government of Jeruſalem?" Thus, failing in his principal view, he obtained pardon of Antipater. At this period Syria was governed by Marcus, who, hearing of other deſigns that Malichus had in Judæa, would certainly have put him to death, but that he was ſaved by the mediation of Antipater.

Judæa greatly oppreſſed under Herod and Caſſius.

Malichus plots againſt Antipater, but artfully evades puniſhment.

CHAP. XII.

The Government of LOWER-SYRIA beſtowed on HEROD, by MARCUS and CASSIUS. ANTIPATER poiſoned through the Contrivance of MALICHUS, who forſwears the Deed.

THE pardon of Malichus procured the deſtruction of Antipater. Marcus and Caſſius having collected an army, committed the command of it by ſea and land to Herod, whom they appointed to the government of the Lower-Syria, with the promiſe of that of Judæa, when a war in which they were engaged with Antony, and the younger Cæſar (afterwards Auguſtus) ſhould be ended.

Great preferment of Herod ended. Herod's advancement made Malichus so jealous of Antipater, that he bribed Hyrcanus's butler to poison him while he was at dinner with his master: which being done, he took possession of the city with a guard of soldiers. This murder of their father enraged Herod and Phasael: but Malichus confidently swore to his innocence. The brothers were resolved to be revenged, but differed in the mode. Herod was for taking the field with an army; but Phasael, dreading a civil war, proposed rather to act by stratagem; wherefore he behaved with civility to Malichus, never hinting his suspicions of the murder: and employed himself in erecting a superb monument to the memory of his father. About this period Herod went to Samaria, where finding all things in great confusion, he endeavoured, by the rules of law and justice, to adjust the differences that had arisen among the inhabitants.

Dissimulation of Malichus.

On the approach of a solemn feast at Jerusalem, Herod marched his army towards the city; which terrifying Malichus, he persuaded Hyrcanus not to admit him; and accordingly he complied, on the pretence that a communication of their worship with strangers would defile their holy religion. Herod, however, in contempt of this order, got into the city by night; which alarmed Malichus; but he had the artifice to provide a guard for the security of his person, and to conceal his real sentiments by tears and lamentations for the loss of his honoured friend Antipater. On the other hand, the friends of Herod pretended to have the greatest friendship for, and confidence in him, as a counterbalance to the weight of his grief.

Herod and Cassius unite to revenge the murder of Antipater.

Cassius was so well acquainted with the character of Malichus, that hearing of Antipater's death, he commanded Herod to take vengeance on the murderer, and issued private orders to his troops at Tyre to assist him. Some time afterwards, when Cassius took Laodicea, and the people crouded to him with money and other effects, Herod thought that would be the proper opportunity to effect his purpose: but as Malichus was advancing to Tyre, his spirits failed him, and he had recourse to a different plan. Having then a son who was an hostage in Tyre, he conceived that if he could privately carry him off to Judæa, the Jews might be induced to revolt, and himself take possession of the government, while Cassius was at war with Antony. This scheme might have answered the proposed end, but that Herod prevented it: for he sent out a number of officers to meet Malichus and his party, and invite them to a treat: which being done, they attacked him on the side of the town next the sea, and slew him with their daggers. Hyrcanus was struck with astonishment at hearing of this affair: but Herod immediately informed him, that it was done in consequence of Cassius's command; on which Hyrcanus appeared satisfied with the vengeance that had been taken for so foul a murder, on a notorious enemy to his country.

Malichus dispatched with daggers.

A tumult raised in Judæa.

Cassius having quitted Syria, great commotions happened in Judæa. The troops in Jerusalem under the command of Felix, attacked Phasael, in whose defence the people betook themselves to arms. Hereupon Herod applied to Fabius, governor of Damascus, for aid to assist his brother; but being seized with a fit of illness, was unable to carry his generous design into execution. However, Phasael was happy enough to complete his business without assistance, compelling Felix to retreat to a fortress, and submit on conditions. Phasael now reproached Hyrcanus with ingratitude for taking part with his enemy, after such a number of obligations received; for at this period the brother of Malichus had possessed himself of many fortified places, among which was Massada, hitherto deemed almost impregnable: but Herod, recovering of his illness, retook the places that had been reduced by Felix, after having obliged him to submit to terms of agreement.

CHAP. XIII.

The Generosity of HEROD to the TYRIANS. HEROD encounters ANTIGONUS, defeats him, and is married to MARIAMNE.

AT this time Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, paid a sum of money to Fabius, to assist him in raising an army; and they procured the confederacy of Marion, to whom Cassius had given the command of Tyre, and all Syria, in which several garrisons were placed, and three even in Galilee. These places, however, were soon reduced by Herod, who not only treated the Tyrians that defended them, with fair quarter, but shewed them respect, and made them presents, to testify the regard that he had for them. This being done, he marched to Antigonus, attacked and routed him on the confines of Judæa; and then returned to Jerusalem in triumph, where Hyrcanus and all the people received him with every testimony of respect. Herod was now on the point of marriage with Mariamne, daughter of Alexander; and the marriage being soon after consummated, he had by her three sons and two daughters. Antipater, his eldest son, was by the daughter of Dores, a former wife of his own country.

Herod's generosity to the Tyrians; and defeats Antigonus.

Antony and Augustus having conquered Cassius at the battle of Philippi, Cæsar departed into Gaul, and Antony proceeded into Asia. Marching through Bithynia, the latter received several embassies, and among them one from many Jews of distinction; complaining of Phasael and Herod, and insisting that, though Hyrcanus was the nominal governor, yet the brothers had usurped the authority and administration. Herod pleaded his own cause, and backed his arguments with presents of such value, that his enemies could obtain no advantage. When Antony arrived at Epheſus, embaſſadors waited on him from Hyrcanus, and the body of the Jews, with a crown of gold, and various preſents, entreating, that ſuch of their countrymen as Caſſius had made priſoners, contrary to the laws of war, might have their freedom reſtored, and be put in poſſeſſion of their lands, of which they had been deprived: and for this purpoſe, they ſolicited Antony's letters to the provinces. There was ſo much reaſon in this requeſt, that Antony granted their deſire.

Inſtructions to this effect were written to the people of Sidon, Antioch, and Arad; as well as to Hyrcanus and the people of Tyre, which is mentioned to prove what reſpect the Romans conſtantly paid to the Jews.

On Antony's going toward Syria, Cleopatra met him in Cilicia, to pay her reſpects; on which he became moſt violently enamoured of her. At this period near a hundred perſons of rank amongſt the Jews complained to him of the conduct of Herod and Phaſael, bringing with them a number of good orators, to act as counſellors. Antony heard the cauſe at Daphne: Meſſala pleaded for the brothers, and was ſupported by Hyrcanus. When the pleadings were ended, Antony aſked Hyrcanus which of the young men was beſt qualified for a governor. He replied, Herod: but Antony had ſuch regard to them both, (in remembrance of the kindneſs of their father Antipater, who protected him when Gabinius invaded Judæa), that he made them tetrarchs, and committed that country to their government. He wrote many letters in their favour, threw fifteen of their moſt implacable enemies into priſon, and had reſolved to have them executed, but that Herod interfered, and obtained their pardon. Herod's benevolence, however, had no weight with his enemies; who were no ſooner diſmiſſed, than they concerted new ſchemes to deſtroy him. Having ſelected a band of a thouſand people, they went towards Tyre, to wait the arrival of Antony. In the mean time Herod and his brother had made ſuch an intereſt by valuable preſents, that Antony diſpatched orders to the magiſtrates of Tyre, commanding them to ſupport the authority of Herod, and to puniſh the Jewiſh meſſengers, as people whoſe wiſh was to fruſtrate the ſchemes of government. Herod now gave a ſecond proof of his benevolence, by going out to meet the deputies, whom he adviſed to retire. Hyrcanus ſeconded this advice, repreſenting the miſchief that might ariſe from their perſeverance: but in defiance of all danger, and in contempt of advice, they obſtinately perſiſted in going forwards, till being met by numbers, both Jews and Tyrians, many of them were ſlain, many wounded, and the reſt fled; which put an end to all open oppoſition; but the vulgar continued to revile the proceedings of Herod, till Antony was ſo exaſperated, that he ordered judgment of death on the priſoners.

Syria was conquered in the following year, by Pacorus, ſon of the king of Parthia, and Barzaphanes, a prince of the country. At this period died Ptolemy Mennæus; who was ſucceeded by his ſon Lyſanias, who, through the intereſt of Barzaphanes, contracted an intimate friendſhip with Antigonus, the ſon of Ariſtobulus.

CHAP. XIV.

The JEWS of MOUNT CARMEL take part with ANTIGONUS. PHASAEL betrayed by PACORUS. BARZAPHANES denies the Treachery with which he is charged.

THE people of Parthia were offered a thouſand talents, and five hundred women, by Antigonus, on condition of their killing Herod and his adherents, depoſing Hyrcanus, and accepting Antigonus governor in his place. Hereupon the Parthians marched againſt Judæa; Barzaphanes going through the inland country, and Pacorus by the ſea-coaſt. The people of Tyre refuſed to admit Pacorus into the city; but thoſe of Sidon and Ptolemais received him readily. On this he entruſted a party of horſe to the king's cup-bearer, whoſe name likewiſe was Pacorus, to obſerve the ſituation of the country, and aſſiſt Antigonus, if it ſhould be neceſſary. The Jews of Mount Carmel aſſociated with Antigonus, who expected to conquer that part of the country called Drymæ, by their aſſiſtance. Many reinforcements joining him, he was induced to advance to Jeruſalem, to attack Herod and Phaſael in the royal palace; but as he was proceeding to put his deſign in execution, the brothers attacked him in the market-place, and compelled the partizans to retreat to the temple. Herod placed a guard of ſoldiers in the adjacent houſes; but the croud ruſhing violently in upon them, ſet fire to the houſes, which were conſumed, with thoſe that were in them. Herod ſoon revenged this action, by ſlaying a great number of them in battle. There were now almoſt daily ſkirmiſhes, till near the feaſt of Pentecoſt, which Antigonus anxiouſly expected, on account of the number of people then reſorting to the city. The time arriving, thouſands, both armed and unarmed, crouded round the temple, and every part of the city was thronged but the palace, which Herod guarded, while Phaſael took charge of the walls and outworks. The enemy being now ſtationed in the ſuburbs, Herod ſallied out on them, killed many, and routed thouſands, ſome of whom fled to the city, ſome to the temple, while numbers ſought refuge behind an adjacent rampart. In this attack Phaſael likewiſe behaved nobly.

Antigonus tampers with the Parthians, to depoſe Hyrcanus, and put to death the brothers.

Pacorus now, by the perſuaſion of Antigonus, entered the city with a ſmall party, under pretence of reſtoring peace; but in fact to promote Antigonus to the government.

Pacorus gains admiſſion into Jeruſalem.

They

They were, however, treated reſpectfully by Phaſael; but in return Pacorus laid a plot againſt his life, under pretence of an embaſſy to Barzaphanes. Phaſael, naturally unſuſpicious, agreed to undertake this embaſſy, though much againſt the opinion of Herod, who adviſed deſtroying Pacorus and his people, knowing how little confidence was to be repoſed in them. Hyrcanus and Phaſael, however, proceeded on their journey, leaving behind them two hundred horſe, and ten of the people called freemen, with Herod, and being conducted by Pacorus. When they arrived in Galilee, the governors of the adjacent garriſons came in arms, and with preſents, to meet them; and among the foremoſt of theſe was Barzaphanes, notwithſtanding the latent treachery of his heart. Phaſael and his attendants being conducted to a ſtation near the ſea-ſide, were there informed that Antigonus was to give the Parthians a thouſand talents, and five hundred women, for this ſervice. Phaſael now ſuſpected treachery; and the ſame night he had information that a band of ſoldiers were ready to ſeize him. This plot would have been certainly executed, but that they waited for advice of Herod's being ſeized at Jeruſalem, agreeable to a pre-concerted plan: for if the others had been firſt ſeized, it was thought that Herod might have had time enough to eſcape. The arrival of guards that were to take them into cuſtody, proved the reality of this contrivance. Hereupon Phaſael's friends adviſed him to take horſe, and ſeek his ſafety; particularly Ophellius, who had detected the conſpiracy through the information of Saramella, one of the richeſt men in Syria, who living near the ſea-coaſt, offered him the convenience of ſhipping from his houſe. But Phaſael diſdained to leave his friends in diſtreſs; and going to Barzaphanes, directly accuſed him with the baſeneſs of his conduct: "If money (ſaid he) had been your object, I ſhould have conceived that Phaſael might have more amply gratified you than Antigonus; to ſay nothing of the intended infamous inſult to be offered to the perſons of embaſſadors, in violation of the laws of nations, and the rights of hoſpitality." Barzaphanes departed to Pacorus, having firſt denied the whole fact.

Barzaphanes charged with perfidy, but denies it.

The PARTHIANS ſeize HYRCANUS and PHASAEL. A Scheme to take HEROD, who accuſes PACORUS. He eſcapes, and builds HERODIUM. The beſieging of JERUSALEM, and Demolition of MARISSA. The Government given to ANTIGONUS. PHASAEL deſtroys himſelf. HEROD's Preſence of Mind. He applies to MALCHUS, King of ARABIA, who ordering him to leave the Country, he departs for EGYPT and ROME.

BARZAPHANES had no ſooner retired, than a party of ſoldiers ſeized Hyrcanus and Phaſael, who exclaimed againſt the villainy of ſuch treatment: at this inſtant an eunuch was ſent to take Herod, if he could be enticed out of his palace; but his correſpondence with his brother having been intercepted, he ſuſpected their deſign, and went to Pacorus, and the chiefs of the Parthians, to expoſtulate with them. They anſwered, that they were unacquainted with the matter, but if he doubted of his brother's welfare, his beſt way would be to go out of the town, and receive his letters, leſt they ſhould fall into improper hands. But Herod, having heard how his brother had been treated, was ſuſpicious; and his ſuſpicions were confirmed by Alexandra, daughter of Hyrcanus, to whoſe daughter Herod was to be eſpouſed; and by her advice he governed himſelf. The Parthians now took till the following day to conſult how they ſhould act with Herod, for they were afraid to ſeize him openly; but Herod, knowing how violently they had acted towards his brother, and conſidering how dangerous it might be to remain longer among them, reſolved to attempt an eſcape in the night. Hereupon he provided waggons, horſes, and other beaſts of carriage for the women; among whom were his mother, ſiſter, and Mariamne, the niece of Ariſtobulus, and daughter of Alexander, to whom he was to be married. There were likewiſe the mother of his intended wife, with his own youngeſt brother, and all the family. Having collected his troops, they departed towards Idumæa, and were conſiderably advanced before their enemies had notice of their deſign. It was melancholy to think of women, with children at their breaſts, being thus hurried from their country, while their friends were in bonds, and themſelves in apprehenſion of a ſimilar fate.

Hyrcanus and Phaſael apprehended by the Parthians.

Herod flies by night.

At this period, however, Herod remained immoveable, animating his companions both by example and advice; he ſaid that neither their lives nor perſons were ſecure but in flight; and adviſed them not to loſe that time in lamentation, which they ought to uſe for their ſafety: on which they reſolved to act with a becoming degree of reſolution. At this inſtant a waggon being overturned, endangered the life of Herod's mother; which ſo affected him, that, partly through tenderneſs to her, and partly through apprehenſion that the loſs of time might occaſion his being overtaken by the enemy, he would have thrown himſelf on his ſword, had not his attendants prevented him. They urged that he ought not to ſacrifice his friends to the fear of his enemies, and that a brave man ſhould diſdain to injure the public by his own deſtruction. Being reduced to the power of recollection, he took all poſſible care of his mother, and haſtened his journey to Maſſada: the Parthians frequently preſſing on him in ſmall parties, but he was ſtill victorious. When he was about ſixty furlongs from Jeruſalem, the Jews who had purſued, attacked him; but he routed them, ſhewing admirable diſcipline in the fight, fight, notwithſtanding his hurry and confuſion. On his ſubſequent advancement to the throne, Herod built a palace on the ſpot where this victory was obtained, and near it a village which he called Herodium.

Herod and his brother diſmiſs the uſeleſs people.

Proceeding to Reſa in Idumæa, Herod's brother Joſeph met him, and they conſulted how to get rid of great numbers of uſeleſs people that were with them, excluſive of their troops: and conſidering that the caſtle of Maſſada, to which they intended to retire, was too ſmall to contain them all, they diſcharged about nine thouſand perſons, to ſeek ſubſiſtence in Idumæa, till they could find a regular ſettlement. Thoſe who were fit for war he kept; and having placed in the caſtle his near relations, with the women and children, in all about eight hundred people, he left them ſufficient proviſions, and proceeded to Petra, the chief city of Arabia.

The Parthians plunder the city and palace.

On Herod's leaving Jeruſalem, the Parthians, the next morning early, ravaged the city and palace, ſeizing every thing therein, except three hundred talents belonging to Hyrcanus, and a few valuable articles the property of Herod. Nor were the Parthians ſatisfied with plundering the city, but ravaged the adjacent country, and totally demoliſhed the city of Mariſſa, which was famous for its ſtrength and riches.

Antigonus obtains the government.

The king of Parthia having given the government to Antigonus, Hyrcanus and Phaſael were delivered to him as priſoners: but he regretted the loſs of the women, who, as well as the money, were to be delivered to him by contract. Antigonus now ordered that Hyrcanus's ears ſhould be cut off, to incapacitate him for the office of high-prieſt; preſuming that the people might otherwiſe, at ſome future period, reſtore him.

Phaſael deſtroys himſelf.

Phaſael, finding that he was deſtined to death, determined that his enemies ſhould not deſtroy him, but, as his hands were fettered, daſhed out his brains againſt a wall. It has been ſaid that the hurt was not mortal; but that the ſurgeons employed by Antigonus put a period to his life, by dreſſing his wounds with poiſon. However, he lived to learn that Herod was ſafe from the hands of his enemies, which enabled him to die in peace.

Herod applies to the king of Arabia.

Mean time Herod, ſo far from ſinking under his misfortunes, ſeemed but the better diſpoſed to encounter them. He applied to Malchus, king of Arabia, for a loan of money, either on paying intereſt for it, or in mere friendſhip, having no doubt that a prince who owed him ſo many obligations would be glad to repay them. At this time he had not heard of his brother's death, and his intention was only to raiſe three hundred talents for his ranſom; and he took a ſon of Phaſael, of ſeven years of age, to pledge for the money. Meſſengers now arrived from Malchus, directing Herod to quit the country, for the Parthians would not admit his ſtay. He replied, that he came not to give trouble, but to adjuſt his own buſineſs: but he conceived this treatment aroſe from a wiſh of ſome powerful people to avoid paying a juſt debt, and defraud him of money that had been lodged in the hands of Antipater.

Herod goes for Egypt.

Herod now retired towards Egypt, calling, in his way, at a temple where he had left a number of his friends. At Rhynocura, on the following day, he was told of his brother's death. By this time Malchus, repenting of his ingratitude, went after Herod, to make reparation; but he was too late; for the former was gone to Peluſium, where arriving, the mariners bound to Alexandria would not take him on board. Hereupon he applied to the magiſtrates, who in reſpect to his former character, attended him into the city, where Cleopatra entertained him with magnificence, and entreated that he would reſide there ſome time: but he was ſo determined to go to Rome, that neither dangers, difficulties, nor entreaties, could prevent him from putting his ſcheme in practice.

Hereupon he embarked for Pamphylia, and after a tempeſt that obliged the ſeamen to throw the lading overboard to ſave the ſhip, he was at length landed at Rhodes, where he was happy enough to meet Sappinas and Ptolemy. He contributed part of his ſhattered fortune to the repair of the town, which was almoſt deſtroyed by the war with Caſſius. At Rhodes he ſhipped himſelf for Italy, and after putting in at Brunduſium, proceeded to Rome, where he informed Antony of what had happened in Judæa; related the murder of his brother; the impriſonment of Hyrcanus; the contract for the thouſand talents, and five hundred women, to be delivered to the Parthians when the government devolved to Antigonus. "With regard to the women (ſaid he) I got them away by night, and lodged them in a place where they are now beſieged, and in momentary danger of being made priſoners. Theſe are the facts: and in defiance of every danger by ſea and land, I am now come to ſtate my affairs, and to ſolicit your aſſiſtance."

AUGUSTUS and ANTONY become HEROD's Friends. He is elected King of JUDÆA. ANTONY and AUGUSTUS conduct him to the Capitol. The Caſtle of MASSADA attacked by ANTIGONUS. VENTIDIUS extorts Money from ANTIGONUS.

Herod is favourably received by Antony and Auguſtus.

ANTONY was affected with the ſtory of Herod's misfortune. He reflected on the inſtability of fortune, which might ſoon make his own ſituation as pitiable: he recollected the friendly offices formerly done him by Antipater, father of Herod; nor forgot the ſum he was to receive, when he advanced Herod to the rank of a king: but what chiefly influenced him him in his favour was, the enmity he had to Antigonus, whom he considered as a dangerous man, and a foe to Rome. Augustus seconded Antony's views in favour of Herod, partly on account of a family acquaintance, partly because his father and Antipater had been fellow-soldiers in Egypt, and partly from his wish to gratify Antony. Messala and Atratenus presented Herod to the senate of Rome, recommending him to their regard, on account of his own and his father's services; reprobating Antigonus, for accepting the government from the Parthians, in contempt of the Romans, and for his former ill conduct. When the senate were warmed with their address, Antony said, that in consideration of the present state of the war with the Parthians, it would be proper to appoint Herod king of Judea; and this was universally agreed to. Distinguished as this honour was, Herod owed much to Antony for procuring it; since the Romans deviated from their usual practice, in bestowing a royal dignity on one who was not a branch of a royal family. His ambition had aspired no farther than to solicit it for Alexander, brother of Mariamne, and nephew to Aristobulus and Hyrcanus, whom he afterwards put to death, as will appear in the sequel. This business was transacted in seven days, at the end of which Herod was sent from Italy, on the exercise of his new dignity.

Elected king of Judæa.

When the senate broke up, Herod was conducted to the capitol, between Antony and Augustus, attended by the consuls and senators, where they offered sacrifices, and deposited their decrees. This was in the consulship of C. Domitius Salvinus, and C. Asinius Pollio, in the 184th Olympiad; and Antony made a most superb entertainment, to congratulate the new king on his accession.

He is honourably conducted to the capitol.

During Herod's absence, Antigonus besieged the castle of Massada, where all provisions were plenty except water; for which they were so distressed, that Joseph, with 200 men, had resolved to force their way through the besiegers to the Arabians, having been informed that Malchus regretted his late ungenerous treatment of Herod: but at this juncture a violent shower of rain falling, their cisterns and reservoirs were all filled with water, which determined them to remain in their present situation: and animated by this providential relief, they made repeated sallies on the enemy.

Massada closely besieged by Antigonus.

In the interim, the Parthians were driven out of Syria by Ventidius, a Roman general, who then went into Judea, on a pretence of assisting Joseph; but in fact to extort money from Antigonus, which, by advancing his troops to Jerusalem, he effected. His end being answered, he retreated with the greater part of them; leaving a few under the command of Silo, to disguise his design: for Antigonus was compelled to compound with him also, lest he should attack him before the arrival of the Parthians, whom he expected to his assistance.

The Death of JOSEPH. A Revolt in GALILEE. GATH is fortified by MACHÆRUS. PAPPUS defeated by HEROD. He is surprised in the Bath. JERUSALEM besieged by HEROD.

BY this time Herod was returned out of Italy, and had reached Ptolemais, on his way towards Galilee, to meet Antigonus, having under his command a large body of auxiliary troops, besides his own forces. At this period also Gellius arrived from Antony, with orders to Silo and Ventidius, that they should afford Herod all possible assistance in taking possession of his kingdom: but when these orders arrived, Ventidius was busily employed in quelling tumults that had taken place in several cities, through the means of the Parthians; and Silo was in Judæa, on the receipt of a pension from Antigonus. Herod's army being collected, appeared to be considerable, and increased as they marched: almost all the people of Galilee declared in his favour. The first great object of his present wish was to raise the siege of Massada, in order to give liberty to his friends and relations, who had been so long imprisoned in that city. But in this expedition Joppa appeared to be such a barrier against his views of advancing to Jerusalem, that he could not think of leaving so strong a place unsubdued. In this situation Silo marched off; and the Jews making a close attack upon his rear, Herod drove in upon them with a select party, put them to the rout, and rescued Silo, when he was on the point of being made prisoner. This being done, Herod made a conquest of Joppa, and, without loss of time, repaired to relieve his friends in Massada, at which place numbers of people flocked to his assistance; some of them on account of his father, some in respect to his own merits, and a third sort in consideration of the obligations they owed to both: but a hope of ingratiating themselves with the new king was the most prevailing motive. In the interim Antigonus had laid several snares and ambushes to entrap him in his way. These, however, produced scarce any effect; and Herod, having raised the siege of Massada, gave all possible relief to his friends. He then attacked and took the castle of Resa, and marched towards Jerusalem, his army being composed of a number of citizens that dreaded his power, together with Silo's forces. Having ſtationed his army on the weſt quarter of the city, many violent ſallies were made againſt him, and the beſieged galled his forces with repeated ſhowers of darts and arrows. In the interim Herod commanded his herald to proceed round the walls of the city, and proclaim, in different places, that his whole view in the undertaking was the benefit of the city, and the welfare of the public at large: that ſo far from harbouring the leaſt intention of doing them any injury, he was willing to grant a perpetual oblivion and forgiveneſs of all paſt offences, let the crime be ever ſo atrocious, and by whomſoever it might have been committed. In anſwer hereto, Antigonus (in an addreſs to Silo and the Roman ſoldiers) repreſented how inequitable and unreaſonable a thing it was, to think of advancing Herod to the throne, who was himſelf a private man, and an Idumæan, and to be conſidered in no other light than as a half Jew; a practice diametrically oppoſite to ancient cuſtom, and to the laws and rights of ſucceſſion. Antigonus farther ſaid, that if they were offended at his receiving the crown from the hands of the Parthians, and ſought to deprive him of the dignity on that account, there were not wanting ſeveral of the royal and ſacerdotal line, who had merited equally well from the Romans, and having an indiſputable title to the government, the depriving them of it would be an act of the higheſt injuſtice. At length the diſpute between Herod and Antigonus increaſed to that degree, that abuſive language paſſed, and in the end, Antigonus commanded his men to drive the enemy from the walls; which they did effectually, by means of darts and arrows. There now remained no doubt but that Silo had been corrupted. He had tampered with many of his acquaintance among the troops, who began to be very clamorous for money and proviſions; demanded more commodious winter-quarters, and ſaid, that Antigonus had ravaged the country in ſuch a manner, that no ſubſiſtence was to be obtained in it. This mutinous diſpoſition increaſed to ſo great a degree, that the ſoldiers were on the point of quitting their arms, and deſerting. Herod, on the contrary, declaimed on his authority; made uſe of the names of Cæſar, Antony, and the Senate, who had commiſſioned him to come into that country; and encouraged both his officers and ſoldiers not to depart from their duty, but to rely on him, who would exert his utmoſt influence to accommodate them with every convenience that their preſent ſituation would allow. Hereupon he diſpatched commiſſaries to buy up all kinds of neceſſaries, ſo that Silo had not the leaſt cauſe of complaint left; for the troops were ſoon ſupplied with incredible quantities of proviſions: Herod having likewiſe directed his friends in Samaria to collect at Jericho great ſtores of corn, wine, oil, and cattle, and to ſupply the army from thence. Antigonus conceiving rightly of what had been directed, ſent out parties to patrole the fields and roads, and intercept the perſons bringing the ſupplies: and, according to order, they lay in detachments near Jericho, and about the crags of the mountains, watching when the convoys might paſs. Nor was Herod leſs aſſiduous on his part; for with ten companies of troops, half conſiſting of Jews, and the other of Romans, together with a hired party, he marched towards Jericho; but five hundred of the inhabitants, with all their families, having quitted the town, and fled to the mountains, he purſued them, made them priſoners, but afterwards gave them their liberty. The city was ranſacked by the Romans, who found therein an immenſe treaſure, conſiſting of money, jewels, rich furniture, and other valuable effects. The king having left a garriſon in the place, retired by the way that he came, and appointed his army to take up their quarters in places which he had lately conquered; as Samaria, Idumæa, and Galilee. Antigonus bribed Silo with a ſum of money to permit the Roman army to be quartered in Lydda, which was done to obtain the friendſhip of Antony. The Romans were now in the midſt of peace and plenty, and every way well accommodated.

Herod, however, whoſe diſpoſition would not permit him to remain long idle, ſent one thouſand foot and four hundred horſe, under the command of his brother Joſeph, into Idumæa, while he himſelf went to Samaria, to take proper care of his mother, and the reſt of his relations, whom he had conveyed from Maſſada; and then he went to Galilee, to take in ſome garriſons of which Antigonus was in poſſeſſion.

Arriving at Sepphoris, while the ſnow laid deep on the ground, he found that the inhabitants had deſerted the place, but left behind them great quantities of proviſions of all kinds. At this time the adjacent country, particularly about Arbela, was moſt dreadfully infeſted with robbers, who iſſuing from their lurking places in the mountains, diſturbed the neighbourhood in a high degree. Hereupon Herod ordered out a ſquadron of horſe, and three companies of foot, to drive them out from their retirements. He marched againſt them with his whole army, about forty days after he had ſent out this force; on which the robbers made their appearance, and attacked Herod's troops with ſo much reſolution that his left wing gave way; but bravely rallying his forces, and putting himſelf at the head of them, he renewed the charge, and totally routed the opponents, whom he purſued even to the river Jordan. The conſequence of this victory was, that, in a ſhort time, all the people of Galilee ſubmitted, except thoſe who had taken refuge in the mountains. On this concluſion of the buſineſs, Herod directed that one hundred and fifty drachmas ſhould be given to each private ſoldier, and a ſum proportionably larger to the officers; and they were ordered into winter quarters on the receipt of this gratuity. Herod was now informed by Silo and his officers, who had been in the pay of Antigonus, that the latter not only refuſed to grant them more than proviſions for one month, but had had likewise issued orders to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, to clear the country of all the necessaries of life, and to starve the Romans out of their quarters, by retiring with the provisions to the mountains. Herod, however, prevented this calamity from befalling them, by directing his younger brother, Pheroras, to take care and provide for the army, and likewise to repair the then ruined fort of Alexandrion: and he executed both these commissions with great fidelity, and much to his credit.

Ventidius was at this time in Syria, and Antony at Athens, who commanded Silo to repair to the former place with the Parthian auxiliary troops; but first to give his assistance to Herod, if it should be found necessary. To him he repaired, but Herod dispatched Silo and his forces to Ventidius, while himself marched against such of the enemy as were skulking about in the mountains. The passages were so narrow, and the rocks so steep, that it was almost an impossibility to approach them; and themselves and families lived in the caverns. On viewing these places Herod found that it would be equally impossible to creep down on them from above, or scale them from below; and he therefore had recourse to the following contrivance: He had a number of cases made, to be let down by iron chains from a machine at the top of the hills; in which cases were men with hooks, darts, lances, and other arms, to destroy them in their holes, or draw them out, and throw them headlong to the bottom, as might be requisite. Considering the depth and danger of the place, this was a horrid experiment: besides that, the robbers were furnished with provisions in their caverns. On letting down one of these cases to the mouth of a cell, and no one daring to come out, a soldier, impatient of waiting, seized his sword and buckler, and catching hold of the chain that suspended the case, slipped into a cavity of the rock. In this place he slew several with his darts, and in case of their resistance drew out others with his hooks, and cast them down the precipice. Some he killed with his lance, and then safely returned to the case. Those who escaped were terribly frightened by the lamentations of the wounded, but night advancing, nothing more was done. The king now offered pardon to all who would lay down their arms and submit, and many acceded to these terms of mercy.

Extraordinary method of extirpating the robbers.

Desperate conduct of a veteran robber.

The attack was commenced in the same manner on the following day; only they exposed themselves more, placing fire to combustible materials that were in the caves, by which the parties were smothered. In one cave was an old man, who had a wife and seven sons, who earnestly implored him to submit to the enemy. The man however took his station at the mouth of the cave, and as they attempted to pass him, he stabbed them one after the other, killing his wife the last. Their bodies he threw down the precipice, and followed them himself, determined rather to die, than sacrifice his liberty. While he was thus destroying his family, he reprobated Herod on account of the meanness of his extraction; though the prince, who stood at a distance, courted his acceptance of mercy, by the most expressive signs in his power. The war between Herod and these people was now at a period.

Herod proceeds to Samaria, and Ptolemy slain.

Soon after this enterprize, the government of that district was committed to Ptolemy, and Herod marched into Samaria, with three thousand foot, and six hundred horse, in order to come to a decisive battle with Antigonus. Ptolemy, however, lost his life by his advancement; for he was attacked and slain by a party of those who had committed so many ravages in Galilee; and they immediately retired to the mountains, and other almost inaccessible places; whence they occasionally issued, and ravaged all the country: but Herod, on his return, punished them for their outrages, killing some on the spot, forcing others from their retreats, whom he put to the torture, and destroyed their forts and castles. Having thus conquered his foes, he laid a fine of a hundred talents on certain cities suspected to favour the enemy.

Macherus, in his way to Emmaus, massacres many of the Jews.

Pacorus king of the Parthians, having been now defeated in battle, Ventidius, agreeable to his orders from Antony, sent Macherus to Herod with a thousand horse, and two legions; but Macherus having been artfully applied to by Antigonus, departed to him, under pretence of giving intelligence, though in direct opposition to the advice of Herod. On his approach, Antigonus, so far from confiding in him, directed his people to oppose him with darts and slings. He was now convinced that Herod was perfectly right in his dissuasion, and that he ought to have listened to his advice. Enraged at the treatment he had received, he turned about towards the city of Emmaus, destroying, without distinction of friend or foe, every Jew that he met with in the way. This conduct was so obnoxious to Herod, that he immediately went towards Samaria, to acquaint Antony with what had happened, and to inform him that he was himself able to cope with Antigonus, without the aid of such as did more mischief to their own cause, than to that of the enemy. While he was on this expedition, Macherus hurried after him, and having overtaken him on the road, earnestly entreated him either to give over all thoughts of his proposed journey, or at least to leave his brother Joseph behind, that those two might carry on the war against Antigonus in conjunction. On this solicitation Herod yielded, forgave all that had passed, and left the army under the command of Joseph, with particular directions not to quarrel with Macherus, nor to undertake any enterprize without a prospect of success.

Herod goes to Antony at Samosata, and in his way routs the barbarians.

On this adjustment of affairs Herod took with him an additional number of horse and foot, and marched to join Antony, who then lay before Samosata, on the banks of the Euphrates. When he arrived at Antioch he found multitudes disposed to join Antony, but that the roads were so thronged with barbarian rian enemies, that they could not approach him. Hereupon Herod put himſelf at their head, and undertook to conduct them: they proceeded on their march; but having advanced within two days journey of Samoſata, a party of the enemy's horſe encountered them, which had lain in ambuſh behind ſome buſhes, on the entrance into the open country, to prevent Antony receiving any aid from that quarter. The enemy ſuffered the front of the troops to paſs; but when Herod advanced with the rear, they attacked him violently with about five hundred horſe, and broke his front ranks. The king, however, bore down courageouſly on them with his guards, drove them from their ſtation, rallied his ſcattered forces, and purſued his ſucceſs till he had recovered all they had taken, which in priſoners, baggage, carriages, horſes and mules, amounted to a very conſiderable booty. This battle being ended, Herod proceeded in his way to Antony; but was frequently attacked on his rout, by companies of barbarians, who ſallied out upon him from the woods and thickets; but in all his encounters he was ſtill ſuperior to them, defeating them in all the attempts they made; till at length a free paſſage was left him, no perſon to oppoſe him, and the people hailing him as their preſerver as he proceeded.

He is honourably received by Antony.

Herod's actions againſt the barbarians being ſignified to Antony, with the gallant manner in which he had acquitted himſelf in other conteſts, he ſelected the choiceſt of his troops, and going out to meet him, he no ſooner approached the town than he was received with all poſſible diſtinction. As ſoon as Antony ſaw him he ran to embrace him, with every token of friendſhip and regard: praiſed him for his wiſdom and virtue, and treated him with a degree of dignity and reſpect proportioned to the royal character with which he had inveſted him. Not long after this a period was put to the war, by Antigonus delivering up Samoſata. Antony now conferred on Soſius the government of the province, and the command of the army, with orders to afford all proper aſſiſtance to Herod, and then departed into Egypt. On this Soſius ſent two legions to guard the king in his way to Judæa, and followed himſelf with the reſt of the army, almoſt immediately.

Joſeph ſlain in action.

During theſe tranſactions Joſeph loſt his life in Judæa, by not obſerving the directions which Herod had given him when he departed to Antony. Joſeph marching towards Jericho, with his own ſoldiers, and five companies of Machærus', with a view to get in the harveſt, ſtationed his troops on the mountains. The greater part of the Roman troops being lately raiſed in Syria, and all of them raw and undiſciplined, the enemy ſeized the advantage both of their poſition and inexperience, and attacking them by ſurpriſe, totally routed them, deſtroying ſix companies, and cutting Joſeph to pieces, while he was valiantly fighting at their head. The field being now in poſſeſſion of Antigonus, he found the body of Joſeph among the ſlain, and gave directions for cutting off his head: but this was redeemed, at the price of fifty talents, by his brother Pheroras. Soon after this the diſtrict of Galilee revolted, and as many of Herod's friends as could be found were drowned in the lake. There were various other diſturbances in Judæa; and, in the interim, the caſtle of Gath was fortified by Machærus.

Herod attacked by the people of Galilee.

Intelligence of theſe repeated misfortunes, ſo immediately following each other, was conveyed to Herod, at a place called Daphne, in the neighbourhood of Antioch: but he was the leſs aſtoniſhed at it, as he had lately had ſome diſagreeable dreams, which evidently predicted the death of his brother. Herod now departed with all expedition towards Mount Libanus; and taking with him eight hundred men, he approached to Ptolemais: from whence going forward in the night through the country of Galilee, he was attacked by the enemy, who had quitted the caſtle on the preceding day. He beat them back to their old quarters, ſurrounded the place, and diſpoſed his troops for an attack early on the following morning; but in the interim there happened ſo violent a tempeſt, that he was obliged to retreat and take ſhelter in the adjacent villages. At this critical juncture arrived another legion which Antony had ſent to Herod, a circumſtance which ſo intimidated the garriſon, that they abandoned the place, and made their eſcape in the night. Herod being now impatient to revenge the death of his brother, repaired with all poſſible expedition to Jericho, where, on his arrival, he treated the princes of the place with the utmoſt magnificence. Supper being ended, and the company departed, Herod was the laſt man who quitted the room, to retire to his own apartment; and he was no ſooner out of the parlour, than the roof of it fell at once to the ground, without injury to any perſon. This was deemed a ſignal interpoſition of providence, by which the imminent danger that had awaited Herod was prevented.

Ptolemais abandoned to him.

Herod defeats Pappus, and takes ſeveral towns.

On the following day the enemy deſcended from the mountains, ſurpriſing the Romans with a body of ſix thouſand men. The diſtreſs occaſioned hereby was very great; they trampled down all oppoſition, and Herod himſelf was wounded in the ſide by an arrow. Juſt after this, Antigonus, as if boaſtful of his ſuperior force, ſent Pappus, with a number of troops under his command, into Samaria; and while he and Machærus were mutually conſidering which ſhould attack the other. Herod took poſſeſſion of five towns, put to the ſword two thouſand men that were in garriſon in them, and leaving the places in aſhes, retired to ſeek for Pappus, who had then made his encampment at a place named Iſanas, where numbers of people from Jericho and Judæa flocked to his ſtandard. Herod finding the enemy in a diſpoſition to decide the matter by arms, a battle immediately enſued, in which he totally routed his opponents, amply revenging the death of his brother, and puniſhing them in the very town to which they fled for ſanctuary. In an inſtant the houſes were crouded with with ſoldiers, from the top to the bottom, each ſeeking his own ſafety. The roofs were uncovered, and ſtones and weapons deſcending, the ſlaughter was moſt horrid: but the moſt dreadful part of the ſpectacle was the dead bodies lying one on another in the chambers, which ſunk their ſpirits into a ſtate of abſolute deſpair.

The broken troops now fled in ſuch numbers, and in ſuch wildneſs of diſorder, that if a furious tempeſt had not happened in the very juncture, the aſſailants, in the firſt zeal of conqueſt, would have marched directly to Jeruſalem, and put a ſpeedy termination to the war: for at this period Antigonus was doubting if he ſhould not quit the city. The evening being far advanced, Herod directed his ſoldiers to go to ſupper, and retreated to his own chamber, to take ſome neceſſary refreſhment after the battle: and now again he had a providential deliverance, no leſs ſingular than the former. Being in his bath, unattended but by one perſon, three ſoldiers, each with a drawn ſword in his hand, ruſhed into the room, croſſed it with great haſte, and went off by the oppoſite door. On enquiry it appeared that theſe men, during the rage of the battle, had concealed themſelves in the houſe, in fear of the enemy; and now retired with all expedition, to ſave themſelves, without having any notion of doing injury to the king, whom it would have been eaſily in their power to have put to death. Among the bodies of the ſlain was found that of Pappus, whoſe head Herod ordered to be cut off, and ſent it to Pheroras, as a ſort of conſolation for the death of his brother Joſeph, who had been ſlain by Pappus, while fighting at the head of his troops.

He eſcapes from imminent danger;

The confuſion occaſioned by the above battle was no ſooner over, than Herod marched his army towards Jeruſalem, and ſtationed himſelf (where Pompey had done before) on that part of the city next the temple, which ſeemed the moſt obvious place of attack. When his engineers were ready, all proper materials provided, and he had given orders for the erecting of towers, and throwing up trenches and bulwarks about the place, he went to Samaria, to conclude his marriage with Mariamne, daughter of Alexander, and grandchild of Ariſtobulus, to whom, as hath been heretofore obſerved, he had been contracted a conſiderable time before: but he left behind him a number of officers, to conduct the ſiege in his abſence.

and afterwards marches towards Jeruſalem.

CHAP. XVIII.

HEROD and SOSIUS beſiege JERUSALEM. The taking of the City and Temple. ANTIGONUS carried to ANTONY in Chains, and put to Death through the Influence of HEROD.

No. 13.

Jeruſalem beſieged by Herod and Soſius.

SOON after the marriage of Herod had taken place, Soſius diſpatched a large body of horſe and foot, which he ſoon followed himſelf, taking the road through Phœnicia. In the mean time the king returned from Samaria, with a body of about thirty thouſand men; and the whole army being united, advanced towards the north walls of the city, conſiſting, excluſive of the auxiliaries from Syria, of ſix thouſand horſe, and eleven regiments of foot. Herod and Soſius were the commanding officers: the latter being employed by Antony to aſſiſt in the war; and the former conſulting his own intereſt, having a view to ſettle himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the kingdom, which, on the defeat of Antigonus, the profeſſed enemy of Rome, had been beſtowed on him by the ſenate.

The Jews make a gallant defence.

In the city the Jews were equally courageous and numerous: for almoſt all the body of that people were aſſembled within the place. Their defence was very obſtinate. They animated each other with exclamations of "The temple of the Lord! the temple of the Lord!" repeatedly exulting in what they deemed preſages of victory, and flattering themſelves that theſe ſeemed to foretell a conqueſt, which, by the bleſſing of God, would attend their arms. At the ſame time they were extremely frequent in ſallying forth into the country, where they made ravages, in order to diſtreſs the beſiegers; and ſo induſtrious were they in this buſineſs, that in a ſhort ſpace they left ſcarce any ſubſiſtence for man or beaſt. Herod, however, who foreſaw the inconveniencies that muſt ariſe from theſe proceedings, in great meaſure prevented them, partly by placing troops in ambuſh to entrap the pillagers, and partly by ſupplying the camp with proviſions, by means of commiſſaries ſent to diſtant parts. The weather proved ſo very fine, and ſuch a number of hands were employed in advancing the works, that the pioneers had ſoon finiſhed their part, and the aſſailants were now advanced to the battery, exerting all their ſkill and diligence to accompliſh their end. Nor were the parties beſieged leſs vigilant in their reſiſtance; ſtill oppoſing one ſtratagem to another, and by one invention counterworking another. A number of deſperate ſallies were made, in which the enemies' works, as well thoſe that were completed, as thoſe that were only in hand, were frequently ſet on fire: their courage was likewiſe extremely conſpicuous when they advanced to fight hand to hand, being no ways inferior to that of the Romans; though it muſt be confeſſed, that in experience and military knowledge the advantage was very greatly in favour of the latter. One wall was no ſooner thrown down, than immediately the beſieged ſupplied its place by a retrenchment that anſwered the end of another. When the beſiegers wrought one mine, the beſieged worked a countermine; and they repeatedly met under ground, and fought while employed in this buſineſs; their actions were moſt deſperate, and they became valiant through mere deſpair. At the time they were acting theſe wonders againſt an enemy without the walls, they were almoſt ſtarving within them, for want of neceſſaries; for this happened in the ſabbatical year, when it was unlawful for them to cultivate the earth.

The Romans ſcale the walls

At the end of forty days after the attack commenced, twenty gallant men mounted the firſt wall, and were followed by one of Soſius's centurions. At the expiration of fifteen days from this time the ſecond wall was taken, and a number of the galleries round the temple ſet on fire, which circumſtance Herod attributed to Antigonus, to render him obnoxious in the eyes of the people. The lower-town, and the outer-quarter of the temple being taken, the Jews retired to the upper part of the city, and the middle of the temple: and apprehenſive that the Romans might interrupt them in offering up their daily prayers and ſacrifices, they ſent embaſſadors to Herod, to aſk permiſſion to bring in as many beaſts to the city as might be neceſſary for that ſervice. This requeſt, in the hope that it might have a conciliating effect upon them, Herod readily granted:

The city and temple taken, and a horrid maſſacre enſues.

but he ſoon diſcovered his error, for they appeared to be ſtill more zealous in the cauſe of Antigonus; on which Herod immediately attacked the city with his whole force, and made a conqueſt of it by aſſault. The delay that had happened, and the oppoſition that had been made, ſo exaſperated the Romans, and the Jews in the ſervice of Herod were likewiſe ſo enraged with thoſe of the oppoſite party, that they jointly united to put all they met with to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex or age: and this was done equally in the ſtreets and houſes; nor was the temple itſelf any longer a ſanctuary to thoſe who ſought for refuge in it. The ſcene of blood and ſlaughter that now enſued exceeds all deſcription. The ſoldiers, tranſported to the higheſt degree of fury and revenge, were implacable in their reſentment, and paid not the leaſt regard to the rights of humanity: Herod, however, did all that was in his power, by intreaty and authority, to put a ſtop to the carnage; but all his orders and perſuaſions paſſed equally unheeded.

Antigonus ſurrenders himſelf to Soſius.

When things had arrived at this extremity of diſtreſs, Antigonus, in debaſement of his former regal character, deſcended from the tower, and threw himſelf at the feet of Soſius; but, ſo far from taking pity on his misfortunes, Soſius treated him as one who had debaſed himſelf below the dignity of manhood, calling him by the name of Antigona (inſtead of Antigonus), as if he had been a woman. But in the ſequel he was not treated like a woman; for Soſius directed that he ſhould be put in irons, and a ſtrong guard placed over him for ſecurity.

Herod endeavours to reſtrain the fury of the ſoldiers

Herod, however, had not yet accompliſhed his end; for the victory he had already obtained over his enemies, was not attended with greater difficulties than he now experienced in keeping his own people in ſubjection. The forces which he had hired crouded in immenſe numbers, and were extremely importunate to get into the temple, and even into the very ſanctuary; to prevent which, Herod was obliged to exert all his authority, and to have recourſe to force, as well as to fair words and threatenings. In fact, he would have been more eſſentially injured by his ſucceſs, than even by a defeat, if he had indulged the curioſity of the riotous multitude ſo far as to expoſe to their ſight the ſacred and venerable myſteries of religion. He likewiſe argued and reaſoned with Soſius, to prevent the ſoldiers from indulging their rage for plunder, murder, and devaſtation: repreſenting, that if they continued to ravage and deſtroy, as they had hitherto done, the Romans would find, in the end, that inſtead of having a people to govern, he would be king of a deſert: he added, that if the ſovereignty of the whole world were to be offered him at the expence of ſo much blood, he would not accept of it. In anſwer to this Soſius ſaid, that it was a matter of courſe, an act of juſtice, and agreeable to general practice, that when any place was taken by aſſault, the ſoldiers ſhould have the booty. Herod in reply told him that, as far as the ſoldiers had any intereſt in the matter, he would himſelf compound with them for the plunder, and gratify them to the utmoſt of their wiſhes: and this he accordingly did; for he made it a point of honour and conſcience to be true to his engagements. In a word, he behaved in ſo liberal a manner to the common ſoldiers, gave the officers ſuch ſuperior gratuities, and made ſo many acknowledgments, attended with ſumptuous preſents to Soſius, that he wholly redeemed the city, and in the end, all parties appeared perfectly ſatisfied. This event took place in the 185th Olympiad, in the third month, and on the day of a ſolemn faſt, being the anniverſary of the taking of the city by Pompey, twenty-ſeven years before: happening likewiſe when Marcus Agrippa and Canidius Gallus were conſuls.

He prevents the deſolation of the city by a liberal compoſition.

Antigonus carried in chains to Rome, and there privately put to death

All things being thus ſettled, Soſius dedicated a golden crown to God, and then departed to Jeruſalem, and took with him his priſoner Antigonus, in chains, to preſent him to Antony. Herod now began to entertain an idea, that it was poſſible Antony would not put the priſoner to death; but that, when he ſhould appear at Rome, he might appeal to the ſenate for the legality of his claim to the government; and as Antigonus was of the blood-royal, and Herod himſelf but of vulgar extraction, he was exceedingly doubtful what might be the iſſue. It occurred to him that Antigonus might inſinuate, that as he had been in arms againſt the Romans, he could not expect the reſtitution of the regal dignity in his own perſon, as his actual offences might be deemed a ſufficient forfeiture of his pretenſions; yet that his ſon, who was perfectly inoffenſive, might be admitted to the ſucceſſion, and no advantage taken of the innocent for the crime of the guilty. Herod becoming very uneaſy with the weight of theſe reflections, bribed Antony, with a large ſum of money, that Antigonus might be privately put to death; and this being done, Herod became eaſy in his mind.

The

Extinction of the Aſmonæan family.

The Aſmonæan line was extinguiſhed by the death of Antigonus. This family had poſſeſſed the government one hundred and twenty-ſix years; was rendered famous by the long continuance of the prieſthood therein; and not leſs illuſtrious by the ſignal ſervices rendered to the public by a long line of anceſtors. Our forefathers have by tradition informed us, that a domeſtic war put an end to theſe ſervices; and that the adminiſtration fell into the hands of Herod, who was a private ſubject, and, from lineal deſcent, or dignity of extraction, had no proper claim to the ſovereignty.

CHAP. I.

HEROD's Kindneſs to his Friends, and Severity to his Enemies. The Friendſhip of POLLIO and SAMEAS with HEROD. His Preſents to ANTONY. ANTIGONUS beheaded at ANTIOCH.

Liberality of Herod to his friends.

HEROD was no ſooner promoted to the exerciſe of his regal authority over the kingdom of Judæa, than he began to make ample proviſion for thoſe of the citizens who adhered to his intereſt, while he was to be conſidered only in the ſtation of a private man: but with regard to thoſe who had oppoſed his meaſures, one or more of them were almoſt daily doomed to death, and executed. On this occaſion Herod took into his particular favour Pollio, the Phariſee, and his diſciple Sameas, in gratitude for the favour conferred on him (when he beſieged the city), by adviſing the citizens to open the gates, and give him entrance. This was the ſame Pollio *, who, on a former occaſion, when Herod was examined before Hyrcanus, and the reſt of the judges, told them that the time was advancing when that man whom they were ſeeking to diſcharge, ſhould ruin them: and in the event this prediction was wholly verified.

The Jews ſpoiled of their wealth.

Herod had no ſooner taken poſſeſſion of the city, than he gave orders for the collection of all the royal furniture, together with ſuch valuable treaſure, in gold, ſilver, and effects, as had been ſecreted by the more wealthy of the citizens; and this he directed to be conveyed to the palace, and out of it made a moſt ſumptuous preſent to Antony, gratifying with the remainder ſuch friends and adherents as had been moſt faithful to his intereſt. He now gave orders that forty-five of the moſt zealous friends of Antigonus ſhould be put to death, and directed that a guard ſhould be placed at their doors while the bodies were brought out, which guard was alſo to ſee that nothing elſe was conveyed away; and if any gold or ſilver was diſcovered, it ſhould be immediately produced to the king: ſo that, in fact, the vanquiſhed ſaw no end to their misfortunes. They were unhappy enough to be ſubjected to a neceſſitous prince, whoſe avarice was ſo great, that all their earthly poſſeſſions were too little to gratify it. This happened, likewiſe, during their ſabbatical year, when their wants could not be ſupplied by the cuſtomary produce of the harveſt.

Antigonus beheaded.

At this time Antigonus was a priſoner to Antony, who had an intention of gracing his triumph by exhibiting him in chains: but hearing that the Jews began to be mutinous, and to favour Antigonus, from the antipathy they had conceived to Herod, he immediately gave orders for his being beheaded at Antioch, as the moſt likely method to appeaſe the paſſions of the people.

Hyrcanus and Phaſael.

Of Barzaphanes and Pacorus, the two generals of the Parthians, we have already ſpoken, together with their making priſoners of Hyrcanus and Phaſael, of whom the former had been high-prieſt, and then prince of the Jews; and the other (who was brother of Herod) had daſhed his brains out againſt the wall, rather than ſubmit to an ignominious death from the hands of the enemy. At this period Hyrcanus was a priſoner in the hands of the Parthians, and news being conveyed to him of Herod's advancement to the ſovereignty, he was very ſolicitous to obtain his liberty, and return. How he came to obtain it will hereafter appear.

* In the IXth chapter of the XIVth book, this is ſaid of Sameas, not of Pollio.

CHAP. II.

An Invitation from HEROD to HYRCANUS, and Preſents

Preſents ſent to PHRAATES. HYRCANUS diſcharged, and goes to JERUSALEM, where he is generouſly entertained by HEROD. HEROD advances ANANEL to the Office of High-Prieſt. ALEXANDRA charged by HEROD with conſpiring with CLEOPATRA. ANANEL depoſed, and ARISTOBULUS advanced to the Prieſthood. ALEXANDER's Vindication.

Hyrcanus, captive in Parthia, is honourably treated by Phraates.

HYRCANUS was conveyed as a priſoner to the care of Phraates, king of Parthia: but this prince, in conſideration of his birth and character, and through a veneration of his quality and illuſtrious deſcent, gave inſtant orders that he ſhould be freed from his chains, and permitted him the liberty of the whole city of Babylon. In this city Hyrcanus found great numbers of Jews, who paid him the higheſt degree of reſpect; nor was leſs reverence ſhewn him by thoſe who dwelt on the other ſide of the Euphrates. Thus ſituated, the life of Hyrcanus was rendered tolerably agreeable. At length, Hyrcanus was informed that Herod was advanced to the government; and being himſelf a man of a grateful and generous diſpoſition, he conceived that others poſſeſſed the ſame benevolent feelings. Influenced by theſe ideas, he thought that Herod, on his elevation, would make every poſſible acknowledgment to the man who had preſerved his life and honour, in a caſe of the utmoſt extremity; which he himſelf had actually done, as hath been mentioned in a former part of this work.

He intends to viſit Herod.

Hyrcanus reflected ſo much on this plan, that he was reſolved to carry it into execution by a journey to Herod; but he thought it expedient firſt to conſult his moſt intimate friends on the ſubject. A conſultation being held on the buſineſs, they unanimouſly adviſed him againſt taking the journe[illegible] "While you remain here (ſaid they) you may be certain that we and our people will all pay you that reſpect and obedience to which the dignity of your own character, and our rank as ſubjects and ſervants, entitle you. This is an honour you cannot expect to receive in your own country, as you are incapacitated from the acceptance of it by the perſonal injury that hath been done you by Antigonus." They likewiſe repreſented to him, that, with regard to the rendering of mutual good offices to each other, princes were leſs careful than perſons in a more humble ſituation: that the memories of kings were not the moſt tenacious, and that the fortunes of men were very apt to have an influence on their manners. Reaſonable as this diſcourſe was, the violent inclination that Hyrcanus had to viſit his own country made him deaf to all their advice. At this period too it happened that Hyrcanus was invited, by a letter from Herod, to repair to him, and take his ſhare in the government: this letter deſired him to requeſt Phraates, and the Jews his brethren, not to deny him a ſatisfaction which he ſo much coveted: intimating, that this was the period when he had the faireſt opportunity of teſtifying his gratitude to the man to whom he was indebted for his life and advancement. Nor did Herod's entreaties thus end: for he diſpatched Saramalla as an embaſſador to Phraates, commiſſioning him to deliver valuable preſents, and pay all poſſible reſpect, in behalf of Hyrcanus, whom he eſteemed his friend and patron. Now the whole of this conduct appeared to be dictated by hypocriſy; for Herod being a prince not only ſuſpicious and artful, but knowing that he had uſurped the dominion, thought it a point of prudence to ſecure himſelf againſt every viciſſitude of fortune; and on this principle, deemed it good policy to get Hyrcanus into his cuſtody, or to cauſe his deſtruction; which laſt circumſtance happened, as will appear in the ſequel.

Receives an invitation from him.

Hyrcanus goes to Jeruſalem, and is honourably received by Herod.

At length Phraates gave a diſmiſſion to Hyrcanus, whom the Jews in Babylon having ſupplied with money, and all other neceſſaries for his journey, he repaired to Jeruſalem, where no degree of reſpect or eſteem was wanting to congratulate him on his arrival. Herod aſſigned him the moſt diſtinguiſhed place at all public meetings and entertainments; called him, and treated him as his father, and behaved in all reſpects with ſuch an unreſerved confidence, that there could not remain the leaſt doubt but that he was ſincere in his profeſſions. In the common opinion, nothing ſeemed to be now wanting to the confirmation of Hyrcanus in the office of high-prieſt, but Herod's too great ſolicitude on the occaſion; which gave riſe to a diſſenſion in the family, of a moſt dangerous nature. Herod, however, determined that no man of diſtinguiſhed extraction ſhould be promoted to the office of high-prieſt, ſent to Babylon for Ananel, a perſon of inferior degree, and cauſed him to be promoted to that diſtinguiſhed honour. The wife of Hyrcanus was Alexandra, the widow of Alexander, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, by whom ſhe had a ſon, likewiſe called Ariſtobulus, after his grandfather, and a daughter named Mariamne, married to Herod, who was a woman of the moſt diſtinguiſhed beauty. Now Alexandra was exceedingly concerned at this ſlight being put on her family; ſince, as ſhe had a ſon living, ſhe thought the office of high-prieſt ought not to be given to a ſtranger; and hereupon ſhe employed a certain muſician to carry a letter to Cleopatra, requeſting that ſhe would ſolicit Antony to beſtow that diſtinguiſhed office on her ſon: but no regard was paid to this ſolicitation. It happened at this juncture, that Gellius, a confidential friend of Antony, being in Judæa, on buſineſs reſpecting his own affairs, ſaw Ariſtobulus and Mariamne, whom he deemed to be two of the moſt beautiful and graceful perſons that had ever exiſted. Hereupon he paid many compliments to Alexandra, on having had the happineſs to give birth to two ſuch wonderful inſtances of human perfection, and perſuaded her to ſend Antony a preſent of each of their pictures, as the moſt likely method to ſucceed in any requeſt ſhe had had to make to him. In conſequence of this advice ſhe ſent the pictures: and Geſſius, who wiſhed to inflame Antony with a paſſion for Mariamne, greatly exceeded the bounds of truth in his report of the beauty of their perſons, repreſenting that they were elegant beyond deſcription, and had much more the appearance of angels in human ſhape, than of mere mortals. Antony could not, with any appearance of a regard to the laws of honour or politeneſs, think of ſending for the wife of a prince with whom he was on terms of friendſhip; and he was equally averſe to give offence to Cleopatra. Thus ſituated, he wrote to Herod, intimating how happy he ſhould be to receive a viſit from Ariſtobulus, whenever it might be thought convenient. At this time Ariſtobulus was not more than fifteen or ſixteen years old; and Herod conceived that it would be extremely imprudent, to ſend a youth of noble extraction, in the flower of his age, and ſo diſtinguiſhed by his perſonal perfections, to a man who was remarkable beyond all others for a propenſity to unnatural crimes, and unceaſing in the purſuit of irregular pleaſures: for this, in fact, was the character of Antony: ſuperadded to which, he was known to uſe his authority to countenance and aſſiſt him in the perpetration of his enormities. On this conſideration Herod ſent him an excuſe, intimating that the Jews were of ſuch a ſeditious diſpoſition, and ſo fond of the idea of a new king, that if Ariſtobulus was to quit the kingdom, an inſurrection would unavoidably happen.

Antony ſends for Ariſtobulus.

Herod ſends him an evaſive anſwer.

Herod, having ſent this meſſage to Antony, now contrived to keep on the beſt terms with Ariſtobulus and Alexandra: but his wife was repeatedly urging him to do juſtice to her brother, with regard to the office of high-prieſt; inſiſting, that his own intereſt was concerned in the affair, ſince the duties of the office would neceſſarily prevent Ariſtobulus from taking the journey. Herod, having reflected on this diſcourſe, put an extraordinary ſcheme into execution. Having ſummoned a kind of council of his friends, he began to exclaim bitterly againſt Alexandra, who he ſaid had engaged in a conſpiracy againſt him, and was endeavouring, by means of Cleopatra, to prevail on Antony to remove him from the government in favour of her ſon; a conduct, he ſaid, which was the more extraordinary, as ſhe could not elevate Ariſtobulus without degrading her daughter; and paving the way, by means of civil diſcord, to diſplace her ſon-in-law from the throne, and deprive him of that rank which he had acquired by ſuch unremitted toil and repeated danger. "Notwithſtanding this (ſaid he) I am ſo willing to bury in oblivion all that is paſt, and to ſhew the reſpect and regard I entertain for my mother, and every one of her family, that I will immediately beſtow the office on her ſon; which, indeed, I ſhould ſooner have done, but that he was not of a proper age to undertake it when I committed it to the care of Ananel."

He inveighs againſt Alexandra.

This addreſs, which was calculated only to amuſe the women and the council, affected Alexandra in a very high degree. She was at once highly concerned to find her own conduct ſuſpected, and enraptured to hear the determination in favour of her ſon; ſo that ſhe burſt into tears, proteſted her innocence, and proceeded farther to elucidate the motives of her conduct in the following manner; "With regard to the office of high-prieſt, I was ſo enraged at the inſult offered to my ſon, that I left no proper and equitable means unattempted to procure juſtice to be done him: but with regard to any deſign of advancing him to the throne, it has been ſo far from my intention, that if an offer of that kind had been made, I ſhould have rejected it: for I was no farther ambitious than that my ſon might be ſo provided for, as that the honour and ſafety of the family might be conſulted. But as the matter is now adjuſted, I am ſo ſenſible of the king's goodneſs to myſelf in the perſon of my ſon, that I ſhall always remain truly loyal to him; and if through too nice a ſenſe of honour, or too great a degree of pride, I have been leſs obſervant of my duty than I ought to have been, he will be pleaſed to pardon me." This conceſſion appeared to have put an end to all animoſity; for they parted, with mutual expreſſions of friendſhip and regard.

Her plea in excuſe for her conduct reſpecting her ſon Ariſtobulus.

CHAP. III.

ALEXANDRA is invited by CLEOPATRA to bring her Son into EGYPT. ARISTOBULUS drowned by the Contrivance of HEROD.

NO ſooner had the above-mentioned meeting broke up, than Herod depoſed Ananel from the office of high-prieſt. This Ananel, as hath been heretofore mentioned, was a foreigner, deſcended from thoſe Jews who had been formerly carried captives by the Aſſyrians, beyond the river Euphrates, thouſands of which captives went to reſide at Babylon. Ananel, however, was deſcended from the line of the prieſthood, and had been an old friend of Herod, who, on his advancement to the regal dignity, made him high-prieſt, and now depoſed him, in order to procure peace in his family. This proceeding, however, was contrary to law; for the office of high-prieſt having been once regularly conferred, ought to remain with the party for life. This rule was firſt violated by Antiochus Epiphanes, who placed his brother Onias in the office, having removed Joſhua for that purpoſe. In the ſecond inſtance, Ariſtobulus ſet aſide Hyrcanus, and took on himſelf the dignity. And finally, Herod, as above related, conferred this diſtinction on the other Ariſtobulus, during the life-time of Ananel.

Ananel depoſed from the prieſthood

Herod is ſuſpicious of the deſigns of Alexandra.

The intention of this proceeding appeared to have been a regard to domeſtic peace; but the event will ſhew, that the reconciliation which ſeemed to have taken place was by no means ſincere: for Herod was impreſſed with the idea, that Alexandra would not remain quiet any longer than till ſhe could find a freſh opportunity of giving farther trouble. Convinced in his own mind that this was the fact, he gave orders that ſhe ſhould be confined to her palace, and iſſued his injunctions that ſhe ſhould never intereſt herſelf in public concerns. Excluſive of this he appointed ſo many perſons to watch over every part of her conduct, that all her actions were immediately reported to the king. As ſhe was a woman of great rank, diſtinguiſhed ſenſe, and high ſpirit, ſhe could but ill brook the indignity of having all her motions thus minutely obſerved. She was cut to the heart when ſhe reflected on the circumſtance, and determined that ſhe would do or ſuffer any thing, rather than ſhe would be thus unjuſtly ſuſpected, and live in perpetual fear and diſtreſs, the life of a ſlave, while ſhe had every right to be diſtinguiſhed as a perſon of ſuperior dignity. Having maturely reflected on her ſituation, ſhe ſtated her whole caſe in a letter to Cleopatra, whoſe advice and aſſiſtance ſhe ſolicited. Cleopatra returned an anſwer, in which ſhe earneſtly entreated her to make an eſcape with her ſon, and gave her an invitation to take refuge with her in Egypt. This advice ſhe highly approved, and contrived to carry it into execution in the following manner. A ſhip being provided that lay ready to convey them into Egypt, ſhe directed that two coffins ſhould be got ready, herſelf put into one, and her ſon into the other; and ſervants whom ſhe thought ſhe could depend on were entruſted to carry them out by night, and put them on board the veſſel. It happened that there was one Sabbion, who was deemed to be a firm friend of Alexandra, and ſo utter a foe to Herod, that he had been ſuſpected of being concerned in the plot for putting Antipater to death by poiſon. Now Alexandra had a ſervant named Eſop, who not having the leaſt doubt but Sabbion was acquainted with the intended eſcape, incautiouſly revealed the whole ſecret to him: on which the latter, ſeizing this opportunity to redeem his loſt credit with Herod, immediately informed him of every particular. Herod, however, ſuffered all the proceedings to go forward till they were on the very point of making their eſcape, and then he cauſed them to be taken into cuſtody. Nevertheleſs he was induced to forgive this attempt of Alexandra, not from any motive of benevolence to her, but leſt the power of Cleopatra, and her influence over Antony, ſhould carry into execution ſome ſcheme of revenge. Herod, in fact, was ſo far from treating her with ſeverity, that he aſſumed an uncommon appearance of benevolence and greatneſs of mind; and this even to ſuch a degree, that it was beyond the bounds of probability that his profeſſions ſhould have any ſincerity for their foundation. However, notwithſtanding all this apparent nobleneſs of conduct towards Alexandra, it was ſecretly determined that the life of her ſon ſhould be of ſhort duration: but he was not to be diſpatched ſo haſtily or inconſiderately, as to give cauſe of ſuſpicion.

She prepares to go into Egypt.

She is betrayed and her deſign fruſtrated.

It happened that the feaſt of tabernacles, one of the moſt ſolemn and celebrated that is held among the Jews, was now advancing: when Herod determined to recreate and make merry among his people, and aſſumed an unuſual degree of good-nature on the occaſion: but an incident now gave occaſion to accelerate the original intention of murdering Ariſtobulus. He was at this time in the eighteenth year of his age, very tall, remarkably handſome, and in fact, the perfect reſemblance of his grandfather. As he advanced towards the altar, dreſſed in the proper robes of his office as a prieſt, to officiate as the law required, he did his duty with ſo ſingular a grace, aided as he was by the diſtinguiſhed perfections of perſon, and a dignity of mind that was apparent even in his countenance, that he at once engaged the hearts, and charmed the eyes of all the ſpectators. And to ſuch a degree were they delighted, that they could not refrain from expreſſing the affection, reſpect, and eſteem they had for him, by offering up their prayers, wiſhes, and vows, for his proſperity; their joy and gratitude ſeemed to be without bounds, and they teſtified it by repeated acknowledgments of the obligations they owed to his diſtinguiſhed family. The people, however, did not ſeem to reflect, that while they were extolling Ariſtobulus, they were degrading Herod, and that the envy of the latter would conſider it in this light: but this was actually the caſe, and Herod becoming jealous of their behaviour, the deſtruction of the other was accelerated.

Ariſtobulus careſſed by the people.

After the feſtival was ended, Herod went to Jericho, to accept of a treat given by Alexandra, and there, as in point of compliment to Ariſtobulus, he took him apart from the company, to take a ſhare in his diverſions and recreations. As the weather was too hot for any conſiderable degree of exerciſe, they retreated to a cool ſhade, adjacent to a number of fiſh-ponds, in which ſeveral of their friends and dependents were bathing. Herod now prevailed on Ariſtobulus to make one of the party, and the latter, taking his advice, jumped into the water; when ſeveral of Herod's agents, who had been purpoſely ſtationed for that buſineſs, began to plunge and play with him in the water, under pretence of diverſion only, ſo that at length they kept him down till he was drowned. Thus ended the life of Ariſtobulus, in the firſt year of his prieſtly office, and the eighteenth of his age: and Herod immediately reſtored Ananel to his former dignity. This tragical event was no ſooner known to the women, than univerſal deſpair ſeemed to take place: the lamentations exceeded all deſcription, and the ſorrow was beyond all bounds. The loſs was deemed a general one;

Herod cauſes Ariſtobulus to be drowned.

Exceſſive grief of the people, and eſpecially of Alexandra, at his untimely death.

one; the whole city was in tears on the occaſion, and every family ſeemed to ſhare the common diſtreſs. Alexandra, however, was the principal mourner; and it was no ſmall aggravation of her misfortune, that though ſhe was convinced of the baſe deſign to which her ſon had fallen a ſacrifice, ſhe was compelled to ſilence, in the fear of more fatal conſequences. Her deſpair, however, was ſuch, that ſhe was frequently tempted to deſtroy herſelf; but ſtill ſhe reſtrained every effort of her paſſion, in the hope that if ſhe could but ſurvive her preſent reſentment of the horrid murder of her ſon, and conceal her knowledge of the real author of the crime, ſhe might live to ſee a juſt vengeance fall on his head. On this principle ſhe behaved as if ſhe had been a ſtranger to what had really happened; but Herod exerted all his addreſs to convince the public he was totally innocent; and by his language, appearance, and conduct, ſo well acted the part of a real mourner, that it was almoſt impoſſible to have ſuppoſed that he was inſincere. It has been deemed doubtful whether, partly from motives of humanity, and partly from the influence of conſcience, he might not be conſidered as a true penitent, for the having ſpilt the blood of ſo accompliſhed and noble a youth; but, on the other hand, it is ſaid that the death of the one was thought neceſſary for the ſecurity of the other; and that Herod's principal view, was to obviate all ſuſpicion of his being concerned in ſo infamous a buſineſs. Ariſtobulus was buried with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence, by the order of Herod. His body was embalmed, and nothing left undone that might tend to add ſplendor to the ſolemnity: and this he did to appeaſe the violent paſſions of the women, who were highly exaſperated on account of the murder.

Herod's diſſimulation.

CHAP. IV.

CLEOPATRA urges ANTONY to ſee Juſtice done on the Murderer. He ſends for HEROD to anſwer for his Conduct. HEROD becomes jealous of MARIAMNE. JOSEPH is put to Death, and ALEXANDRA committed to Priſon. ANTONY is governed by CLEOPATRA. Baſeneſs of her Conduct.

Alexandra informs Cleopatra of Herod's treachery and cruelty.

THESE ſplendid proceedings, however, afforded no ſatisfaction to Alexandra, whoſe mind was ſo diſtracted by the murder of her ſon, that her whole thoughts were employed in conſidering of ſome means of revenge. Having revolved the whole matter deliberately in her mind, ſhe diſpatched to Cleopatra a particular account of the perfidious manner in which her ſon had been deſtroyed by Herod. On this occaſion Cleopatra, who had been always inclined to do her ſervice, felt herſelf unuſually animated to aſſiſt her, and eſpouſed her intereſt as if it had been her own; continually ſoliciting Antony to ſee ample juſtice done on the murderer. She repreſented to him the atrociouſneſs of the crime itſelf, and how derogatory it would be for him to ſuffer a king whom himſelf had elevated, and who was in fact but the uſurper of the right of another, to eſcape unpuniſhed, after having committed ſo violent an outrage on the legal heir to the throne. Antony having maturely conſidered the affair, went to Laodicea, where he ſent for Herod, to examine him reſpecting the death of Ariſtobulus, ſince he could not but entertain the utmoſt horror of the deed, even though Herod himſelf was the perpetrator of it.

Antony ſends for Herod.

Herod was too ſenſible of his guilt to truſt to the merit of his cauſe; beſides, he reflected that Antony would be repeatedly applied to by Cleopatra in his diſfavour: ſo that, at all events, he came to a reſolution to make his appearance, which in fact, he would otherwiſe have been compelled to do. Wherefore he entruſted the care of his government to his uncle Joſeph during his abſence, ſtrictly commanding him, that if Antony ſhould put him to death, he ſhould immediately doom Mariamne to the ſame fate: for ſo violent was his regard for his wife, that he could not bear the reflection of any other man poſſeſſing her after his death; and he likewiſe conſidered that her perfections had been, in great meaſure, the cauſe of his misfortunes. Antony had likewiſe conceived an affection for her, on the report of her charms. When Herod had given the above orders, he repaired to Antony, but in the utmoſt dejection of mind.

Herod enjoins his uncle Joſeph to put Mariamne to death, on certain conditions.

Joſeph, during his adminiſtration, took the utmoſt care of the truſt committed to his charge; and often waited on Mariamne, partly through reſpect, and partly on affairs of buſineſs. While they were in converſation, Joſeph uſed frequently to ſpeak of Herod, as one of the moſt fond and tender huſbands in the world. The women ſeemed to wonder at the ſtrangeneſs of this aſſertion, particularly Alexandra: but Joſeph, in the zeal of his heart to aſcertain that character of which he had ſpoken ſo highly, unintentionally betrayed the ſecret he was intruſted to have kept; arguing as an undoubted proof of Herod's affection, that as he found himſelf unable to live without his wife, he was determined that they would not be parted even in death. Theſe words were interpreted by the women, not as a proof of Herod's love, but as a reſolution that they ſhould not long ſurvive, in caſe he ſhould be put to death.

Joſeph unwarily diſcovers the ſecret.

A report now became prevalent in the place, propagated by ſome who wiſhed ill to the king, that Antony had firſt ordered Herod to be put to the torture, and then doomed him to death. The whole court was alarmed at this news, and the women in particular; whereupon Alexandra entreated Joſeph to take them with him, and ſeek protection of the Roman legion commanded by Julius, which was then quartered in the ſuburbs. She urged, that if any diſturbance ſhould happen in the palace, the Romans would provide for their ſafety;

A falſe report concerning Herod's death

ſafety; and that if Mariamne could but have an opportunity of appealing to Antony, he would not refuſe her any favour ſhe could aſk, even though ſhe were to ſolicit the poſſeſſion of the kingdom, and all the royal privileges attendant thereon.

Antony ſhews great favour to Herod.

During the conſideration that took place on this affair, letters were received from Herod, which proved the falſhood of the late report: and by them it appeared, that Herod was no ſooner arrived with Antony, than by obliging language, and the effects of preſents, he ſo far engaged him in his intereſt, that the power of Cleopatra to do him injury ſeemed to be at an end. "Kings (ſaid Antony) would be no longer kings, if they were to be accountable for their proceedings: it is their privilege that their actions ſhould paſs unqueſtioned; and Cleopatra would give an inſtance of her prudence, if ſhe would ſeek leſs to pry into the arcana of government." Theſe letters were likewiſe full of a deſcription of the honours that Herod had received from Antony; mentioning that he had invited him to his council and ſolemn feaſts, notwithſtanding all the detractions of Cleopatra, whom he repreſented as having a deſign on the government, excluſive of her endeavours to injure him. But he ſaid that Antony was a prince of integrity and honour, and his friends might ſoon expect his own return to take poſſeſſion of the kingdom, which would be effectually ſecured to him, together with the continued friendſhip of Antony, who had made Cleopatra a preſent of the country of Cœlo-Syria, on the condition that ſhe would never trouble him again on the affairs of Judæa.

The conſequence of theſe letters was, that the deſign they had of putting themſelves under the protection of the Romans, was ſet aſide: but the plan had not been conducted ſo ſecretly, but that Herod had ſome intimation of it; and as ſoon as Antony was gone on an expedition againſt the Parthians, he returned to Jeruſalem, where he was made acquainted with the whole affair by his mother, and his ſiſter Salome: in fact, the latter proceeded ſo far as to charge Joſeph her own huſband, with having an intrigue with Mariamne: but this aroſe from a former animoſity againſt Mariamne, who being once in a diſpute with Salome, had thrown out ſome inſinuations reſpecting the meanneſs of her extraction. By theſe inſinuations, however, Herod was thrown into the utmoſt rage of wrath and jealouſy (for Mariamne was dear to him as his own exiſtence); ſo that it was with the utmoſt difficulty he was enabled to prevent himſelf from breaking out into the wildeſt extravagancies, and to reſtrain his paſſion within the bounds of diſcreet moderation: but on cool recollection he took Mariamne apart, and cloſely examined her reſpecting her intimacy with Joſeph.

Mariamne pleads her innocence before Herod; and a reconciliation takes place.

Mariamne, in vindication of her innocence, ſaid every thing that it might be ſuppoſed ſuch innocence would dictate; inſiſting, that for any thing that might look like criminal, or diſhonourable in her conduct, ſhe was not only innocent with regard to Joſeph, but with reſpect to all mankind. At length the king, enamoured of the charms of his wife, and overcome by the extremity of his own paſſion for her, relaxed by degrees from his former ſeverity to her, totally abſolved her from all ſuſpicion of the crime that had been imputed to her, and confeſſed himſelf perfectly convinced that ſhe had given no cauſe of offence. He likewiſe repeatedly entreated her pardon for that inconſiderate haſte, which induced him to give credit to a report by which ſhe had been ſo vilely traduced. During this diſcourſe he behaved to her with unfeigned tenderneſs, and with ſuch endearments, that mutual tears and embraces ſucceeded, as is generally the caſe in theſe kinds of reconciliations. The more doubts Mariamne ſeemed to entertain of the reality of Herod's regard for her, the more anxious was he to give her every teſtimony of his undoubted ſincerity. At length, however, ſhe exclaimed, "Yes, truly, you give an abundant proof of the tenderneſs of your regard as a huſband, by ordering an innocent wife to be put to death, in caſe you ſhould happen to die yourſelf!" Theſe words were no ſooner ſpoken than he broke from her arms in the utmoſt rage, tore his hair, and cried out with all the fury of a madman, "Ay! it is now evident, beyond a doubt, that the purity of my wife has been corrupted by Joſeph; for nothing leſs than the confidence ariſing from ſuch an intimacy, could have induced him to give up ſo important a ſecret, which had been committed to his care with ſuch ſolemn injunction not to reveal it." In the firſt impetuoſity of his paſſion, Herod had almoſt determined to put Mariamne to death on the ſpot: but, after ſome violent ſtruggles on his part, the warm love that lay latent in his heart prevailed for her preſervation. With regard to Joſeph, however, he gave inſtant orders for his being put to death, even without being heard in his own defence: and he directed that Alexandra, as the author of all the miſchief, ſhould be committed to priſon.

Herod orders Joſeph to be ſlain, and Alexandra to be impriſoned.

At this period there were great commotions in Syria, ariſing from the conduct and intrigues of Cleopatra, who had now an abſolute aſcendant over Antony, which ſhe made uſe of to produce very miſchievous conſequences: ſhe was perpetually ſoliciting him againſt the men of rank in his dominions, till ſhe had prevailed on him to take their governments from them; and then ſhe got them appropriated to her own uſe. In a word, her ambition and avarice were ſo extravagant, that ſhe made no ſcruple of any thing which might be productive of her own advantage. One of her firſt flagitious crimes was to procure the deſtruction of her brother, a youth near fifteen years of age, and who was next heir to the throne. She then cauſed her ſiſter Arſinoë to be deſtroyed, while ſhe was engaged in her devotions, in the temple of Diana, at Epheſus. Neither ſanctuaries, temples, nor ſepulchres, eſcaped the rage of her avarice, where ſhe conceived that any thing might be obtained by a ſacrilegious violation violation of them. She conſulted no meaſures of right or equity, nor made diſtinction between things ſacred and profane, ſo that her own advantage might be promoted. In a word, this woman was ſo loſt in pride, vanity, and voluptuouſneſs, that the poſſeſſion of the whole world would have been inſufficient to gratify the unbounded exuberance of her paſſions. This being her diſpoſition, it is not much to be wondered at that ſhe was ſo ſolicitous to urge Antony to deprive others of what ſhe intended for her own emolument: and, in fact, ſhe had no ſooner entered Syria with him, than ſhe began to concert how ſhe might make herſelf miſtreſs of the whole country. She procured Lyſanius, the ſon of Ptolemy, to be put to death, on the pretence that he was a friend to the Parthians, without aſſigning any other cauſe. She ſolicited and obtained of Antony, the countries of Arabia and Judæa, in injury of the kings who were the legal poſſeſſors. In a word, Antony was ſo much devoted to the humour of this woman, that he appeared to be almoſt faſcinated with her charms; yet ſome of her demands were ſo extremely enormous and illiberal, that there was no poſſibility of his complying with them, without publicly declaring himſelf the ſlave of a woman of moſt abandoned character. In a word, being unwilling, on the one hand, to diſoblige her by the refuſal of any of her requeſts; and, on the other, equally aſhamed publicly to announce himſelf her ſlave by complying with all her demands, however unreaſonable, he took a middle courſe of conduct, between the two extremes, by aſſigning to her uſe certain parts of both the provinces, together with all the cities from the river Eleutherus to Egypt, Tyre and Sidon alone excepted, which had been always accounted free: yet theſe donations, liberal as they were, did not prevent her ſoliciting Antony, in the moſt earneſt manner, to give her thoſe two places likewiſe.

Antony is governed by her.

CHAP. V.

HEROD receives CLEOPATRA with great Diſtinction at APAMIA. She attempts to ſeduce HEROD, who attends her towards EGYPT. ARMENIA ſubdued by ANTONY, who preſents CLEOPATRA with Priſoners and other Booty. Two Hundred Talents a Year paid to CLEOPATRA as a Tax.

Herod honourably receives Cleopatra at Apamia.

CLEOPATRA having adjuſted her own affairs, and Antony being going into Armenia, ſhe accompanied him as far as the river Euphrates, and on her return towards Judæa ſhe came by the way of Apamia and Damaſcus, where ſhe was met by Herod, who received her in the moſt diſtinguiſhed manner, and entered into a treaty with her reſpecting as much of her revenue as aroſe from that part of Arabia and Jericho as had been granted to her. Now Jericho is a place diſtinguiſhed for its balſam, which is the moſt valuable of all gums; and alſo for the fineſt palm-trees in the univerſe.

Cleopatra now exerted all thoſe artifices of which ſhe was ſo complete a miſtreſs, to induce Herod to embark in an amour; and as ſhe was a woman of warm paſſions, and almoſt dead to ſhame, ſhe made ſuch advances towards the concluſion of the contract as could not be miſunderſtood. Love was the pretence for all her actions; though it is extremely probable ſhe had ſome farther deſign in reſerve, for her artifice had no limits.

He deſigns her death, but is oppoſed by his friends.

Herod was not unapprized that Cleopatra was one of the moſt malicious women exiſting, ſo that he thought himſelf previouſly prepared how to treat her: but when he came to be a witneſs of the ſhameleſs licentiouſneſs of her behaviour, he was ſtruck with aſtoniſhment, and ſecretly reſolved, that if ſhe ſhould proceed to any greater lengths, he would affront and abandon her. On farther reflection, he ſummoned a meeting of his friends on the buſineſs, and conſulted whether it might not be beſt to put an end to the life of ſo vile a woman while he had her in his power, which he thought would yield ſome kind of ſatisfaction to thoſe ſhe had heretofore ill treated, and be a ſecurity to thoſe who might otherwiſe fall a prey to her artifices in future. He conſidered too, that Antony would receive an advantage by this proceeding, as ſhe was the common enemy of all mankind, nor would fail to betray him likewiſe, if ever it ſhould happen that he ſhould want her aſſiſtance. On the whole, then, Herod was abſolutely of opinion that ſhe ſhould be put to death: but his friends were zealous in adviſing him to the contrary, thinking it would be a derogation from his royal dignity, and a dangerous proceeding. Wherefore they entreated him to recollect himſelf, reflect ſeriouſly on the buſineſs, and not to proceed raſhly: for Antony, though the circumſtance might be really to his advantage, would not eaſily brook the affront; beſides, that his miſtreſs being taken off by force, or privately deſtroyed, he would but become the more enamoured of her former charms, and be irritated to a ſpirit of reſentment. They urged too, that it would not be eaſy to palliate or excuſe a violence offered to the perſon of a princeſs of her diſtinguiſhed rank and deſcent: and however great the advantage might be that Herod would reap from her death, yet no pardon could ever take place, on account of the inſult it would appear to be to the honour and love of Antony. They likewiſe repreſented to him in the moſt earneſt manner, that if the execution of his intended ſcheme ſhould take place, the dreadful diſtreſs and confuſion that would moſt certainly follow, not in the royal family only, but throughout the whole kingdom. With regard to the wanton importunities and addreſſes of the queen, they urged, that neither actual injury, nor any danger of it, could poſſibly ariſe from his rejection of them: and as to any thing elſe that might happen, he had only to act as his reason should dictate in the present state of affairs. This was the substance of the arguments made use of by the friends of Herod; and partly by the credit of their counsels, and partly by the weight of the arguments themselves, they prevailed on him to acknowledge that his plan was not fit to be adopted; and thus diverted him from the execution of it. Herod having thus altered his intentions, behaved complaisantly to Cleopatra, made her presents of great value, and as she was going into Egypt, he conducted her a part of the way.

Armenia subdued by Antony.

At this time Antony was ravaging the country of Armenia; and having made prisoners of Artabazes, the son of Tigranes, and some of the princes, his sons, he sent them into Egypt, as presents to Cleopatra, together with immense quantities of valuable treasure, of which he had made capture. Artabazes was succeeded in the government by his eldest son Artaxias, whom fear had induced to leave the country on the first commencement of the war: but he had not been long in possession of this new dignity before he was deprived of it by Archelaus, and the emperor Nero, who caused Tigranes, the youngest brother of the family, to reign in his stead.

He loads Cleopatra with presents.

Herod made the most regular payments of the revenues of the country which Antony had granted to Cleopatra; considering that it was ill policy to provoke a woman, and it was particularly his interest to keep on good terms with her. As Herod had the care of collecting these revenues, the Arabians paid them punctually for a considerable time, raising no less a sum than two hundred talents annually: but they soon began to decrease in their contributions, till in the end not quite one hundred talents were raised.

CHAP. VI.

A Competition for the Empire between AUGUSTUS and ANTONY. The JEWS conquer the ARABIANS in a bloody Battle. Another vast Army of ARABIANS at CANA, in CŒLO-SYRIA, is likewise routed by the JEWS. ATHENION obtains a complete Victory over them.

Civil broils among the Romans.

THIS breach of faith, and neglect of the Arabians, in not raising the stipulated taxes, would certainly have been punished by Herod, by a war upon that people, but he was prevented from carrying his design into execution by the civil contentions among the Romans: for at this time the battle of Actium was near at hand, the event of which it was thought would prevent all farther competition for the empire, which then prevailed between Antony and Augustus. This happened in the 187th Olympiad. As Herod had now been, through the distinguished generosity of Antony, a long time in possession of a fertile and well-peopled country, and having plenty of cattle, corn, and money, he immediately began to raise a large army, with which he marched to offer his patron assistance: but Antony not being in want of such additional force, advised Herod to march immediately against the Arabians, whom he considered in the light of a traiterous and perfidious people. In fact, these directions were given in consequence of the advice, and by the direction of Cleopatra, who thought she was consulting her own interest in promoting a quarrel between the Arabians and Jews. In obedience to the royal will, Herod returned with his army, and soon arrived in Arabia, having under his command a very considerable number both of horse and foot. The Arabians, having perfect intelligence of all his motions, were waiting to give him battle near a place called Diospolis, towards which he immediately directed his march. The opposite armies soon came to an engagement, and after a most obstinate and bloody contest, victory declared in favour of the Jews.

Herod brings succour to Antony, who directs him to make war on the Arabians.

They collect a large army to oppose him.

Not long after this event, the Arabians assembled another large army at Cana, in Cœlo-Syria; of which Herod having received authentic information, and being advised that they were upon their march, advanced with the main body of his troops to that part of the country; intending there to encamp and fortify himself, till he should have a favourable opportunity of attacking the enemy with good prospect of success. The soldiers, however, were so elated with the consideration of their former victory, and so perfectly convinced that the army was animated with courage, and in the best possible condition for an attack, that they urged that waiting in expectation was but losing time; and they therefore desired permission to proceed to an immediate encounter: nay, such was their impatience for engagement, that they were ready to break through all the bounds of discipline. This uncommon ardour and alacrity of the troops gave the king so much satisfaction, that he was determined to encourage the humour, and not check the eagerness of disposition, which he thought might, most probably, lead on to victory. Wherefore he immediately put himself at the head of his troops, grasped his sword in his hand, gave the word of command to march and begin the attack, and only follow the example of his own valour. Hereupon they marched forward to the combat with such a determined warmth of bravery, that the Arabians were astonished at their courage before the actual encounter. For a little while, indeed, they made some faint shew of a slight resistance; but, soon after the first onset, they gave way, and the greater part of them fled in confusion, finding themselves wholly unable to cope with the magnanimous valour of their enemies.

Herod obtains a victory.

This defeat would probably have proved the total destruction of the Arabians, but that Athenion, who acted as general for Cleopatra in that country, took advantage of the situation of affairs. Now Athenion, who was an irreconcileable enemy to Herod, had remained, during the late battle, in a kind of neutrality, having his forces drawn up in order to wait the the event of the conteſt. If the Arabians had happened to have proved ſucceſsful, Athenion would not have interpoſed between the contending parties: but when he came to find that the Jews were the conquerors, and that after the battle they ſeemed to be fatigued and wearied out with the labours of the day, and likewiſe, in the pride of victory, indifferent to a proper care of their own ſecurity, he collected a great number of the natives, and taking advantage of the Jews being off their guard, he ſurpriſed them by a ſudden attack, and routed them with a very ſmall degree of difficulty: purſuing his advantage, he followed them over precipices, and drove them into bogs, doing great execution, as the Jews were unacquainted with thoſe places.

Fatal conſequences of their defeat.

Theſe ſymptoms of victory inſpired the Arabians with ſuch additional courage, that they renewed the battle, and gave freſh chace to their enemies, whom they ſlew in ſuch immenſe numbers, that very few eſcaped out of ſo great a multitude. Herod beginning to ſee the dangerous ſituation of affairs, and being a witneſs how greatly the enemy had the advantage of his troops, haſtened away with all poſſible expedition to get freſh ſuccours; but the camp of the Jews was taken and plundered before he could bring up his reinforcements. Thus, by the means of a ſingle ſurpriſe, was a complete and important victory obtained, and the deſtruction of a potent enemy effected, beyond all human expectation or probability. After this melancholy iſſue of the conteſt, Herod was compelled to have recourſe to the making of depredations and incurſions on the Arabians. He was likewiſe obliged to ſeek refuge in the ſecure places of the mountains, being afraid to expoſe his army to the event of a battle. However, the time thus ſpent was not abſolutely thrown away; for his troops were hereby kept in perpetual exerciſe, inſtructed in the duties of military diſcipline, inured to hardſhips and fatigues, and in ſome degree qualified to redeem their forfeited honour on any future occaſion.

CHAP. VII.

The JEWISH Embaſſadors put to Death by the ARABIANS, when they went to ſue for Peace. A ſignal Victory obtained over the ARABIANS, by HEROD's Forces.

A terrible earthquake in Judæa.

IN the ſame year that the important battle of Actium was fought, which was in the ſeventh year of the reign of Herod, there happened a more violent and dreadful earthquake in Judæa than had been known in any former period. Great numbers of cattle were deſtroyed by this melancholy event, and, in the ſeveral towns, above ten thouſand men loſt their lives by the overthrow of the buildings: but the ſoldiers, who were in the open fields, eſcaped with much leſs injury, as they could not ſuffer by the fall of houſes. The news of this providential judgment having reached the Arabians, their pride and inſolence on the occaſion is not to be deſcribed. Though in fact the earthquake was exceedingly horrid and deſtructive, the report of the miſchief it had done greatly exceeded the truth. The Arabians, however, thought that the land of Judæa was almoſt wholly depopulated, the cities and people buried in the ruins, and the nation no longer in a condition to wage war againſt them. The Jews, in the midſt of their diſtreſs, diſpatched embaſſadors to the Arabians, humbly ſoliciting terms of peace; but the Arabians not only put the embaſſadors to death, but, in a ſhort time, advanced with an army, ſtill farther to diſtreſs the already unfortunate.

The Arabians maſſacre the Jewiſh embaſſadors.

Mature reflection on the hopeleſs and deplorable ſtate of their affairs, had dejected the Jews to ſuch an aſtoniſhing degree, that they became utterly deſponding, loſt all regard to the ſupport of their public government, and, in caſe of the approach of an enemy, deſpaired of having courage to defend themſelves. Matters being thus ſituated, the king did all in his power to elevate their ſpirits, encourage them to diſmiſs their unreaſonable anxiety, and entreated an exertion of as much courage as might be neceſſary to prepare for their own defence. Some of the more diſtinguiſhed of Herod's people felt their misfortunes ſo ſeverely, that while the ſenſe of them was recent in their minds, they could not eaſily be prevailed on to attend to the arguments of prudence and wiſdom: but when Herod, in conſequence of his advice, had prepared them to liſten to what he had to offer for the emolument and ſatisfaction of the army, he ſtated to them the nature of the war, and their preſent ſituation; and moreover addreſſed them in a moſt eloquent and animating ſpeech, by which all the antient courage of the Jews ſeemed to be revived; wherefore taking advantage of their preſent diſpoſition, he offered the cuſtomary ſacrifices, and immediately marched beyond the river Jordan (towards the Arabians), where he fixed his camp. Now, between the two armies there happened to be a caſtle, which either party regarded as a moſt advantageous ſituation, in caſe of their coming to a battle, or of decampment. The obtaining poſſeſſion of this place, then, occaſioned a kind of ſkirmiſh with their darts and lances; but the armies, by degrees, approaching nearer to each other, a cloſe engagement enſued, in which many men were loſt on both ſides; till, in the end, the Arabians turning about, left the field with great precipitation. This evident puſillanimity of the enemy inſpired the Jews with ſo great courage, that they ruſhed forward, and forced them to their very trenches, where, for a conſiderable time, they made ſome appearance of reſiſtance; but this was in a very irregular manner, and with ſuch apparent dejection in all their looks and actions, that it was evident they fought in mere deſpair, and almoſt without the hope of conqueſt. Still, however, they continued the the conteſt, partly encouraged by the greatneſs of their numbers, and partly impelled by the neceſſity of fighting, or loſing their lives on the ſpot; till at length, after a tedious conteſt, and the ſhedding of much blood, they were totally routed, with the loſs of five thouſand men, part of whom fell by their own ſwords, part by thoſe of the enemy, and the reſt were trodden to death by the croud. They who remained alive retreated with all poſſible expedition to their camp, where their proſpect was of the moſt melancholy kind; for they had neither food nor liquor to ſupport their exiſtence; and in this ſituation they remained for a conſiderable time, without proſpect of eſcape or relief, ſo cloſely were they environed by the Jews.

They ſue for peace in vain.

Thus reduced to the moſt extreme neceſſity, they ſent out deputies to Herod, humbly entreating that he would either grant them peace, or permit them to furniſh themſelves with cold water, to relieve them from the intolerable pain of intenſe thirſt: but Herod, reſolved to give full ſcope to his revenge, refuſed to accept of preſents which they had ſent him, diſdained to attend to the entreaties of the deputies, and determined not to gratify them in any of their requeſts.

Within five days after the return of the deputies, about four thouſand of theſe wretched people came out of the camp, and offered to become ſlaves, and ſubmit to chains, rather than endure any longer the extreme diſtreſs of an unconquerable thirſt. On the fixth day, by a general conſent, all the remainder of them ſallied forth, and attacked Herod's troops, preferring an inſtant death, to the torment of tediouſly expiring under every circumſtance of infamy. Thus deſperate were they on their firſt iſſuing forth; but having neither ſtrength nor ſpirit equal to the ardour of the undertaking, they ſought death as a relief to their preſent miſery. On the firſt attack ſeven thouſand of them were ſl[illegible]; and by this victory, the reſt were taught that Herod was a ſkilful commander, and not to be eaſily perſuaded to reſign advantages he had gained: and thereupon they ſubmitted themſelves to the protection of the conqueror.

CHAP. VIII.

The Defeat of ANTONY at ACTIUM. HEROD debates with himſelf on the deſtruction of HYRCANUS. HYRCANUS examined by HEROD, and put to Death. An Abſtract of the Hiſtory of HYRCANUS. HEROD retreats to CÆSAR, firſt committing his Government to the care of his Brother PHERORAS.

HEROD was elevated to the higheſt degree of vanity on reflecting upon the above victory. He conceived that the world would deem him a conqueror of the firſt magnitude; and in this idea returned to Jeruſalem, filled with the moſt pleaſing thoughts that he had obtained the ſummit of his ambition. But while he was congratulating himſelf on his good fortune, he received advice that Auguſtus had defeated Antony at Actium; on which he conſidered himſelf as a ruined man: nor was he ſingular in this opinion: all parties, friends and foes, were of the ſame ſentiment; conceiving that the perſon who had been ſo firm a friend to Antony, would never be forgiven by Auguſtus. His friends were ſo ſincere with him, as not to conceal their opinion that he would be utterly ruined: while his foes, who conceived great hopes from the probable change of affairs, pretended to condole with him on his misfortunes.

The battle at Actium, wherein Antony is defeated by Auguſtus.

Herod now began to conceive, that as Hyrcanus was the only ſurviving branch of the royal family, it would be good policy to procure his deſtruction, even though Auguſtus might afterwards determine unfavourably with regard to himſelf. He thought that, whether he might fall under his diſpleaſure, or eſcape it, there would be no wiſdom in leaving between himſelf and the government a perſon who had ſo fair a pretenſion thereto: excluſive of which, the cutting him off from the ſucceſſion would afford him a perſonal gratification. While he was revolving in his mind how he ſhould act in this emergency, an incident that happened in the family of Hyrcanus afforded him the means of coming to a reſolution. Hyrcanus was a man of the moſt pliant and eaſy diſpoſition imaginable: he had an utter averſion to buſineſs of all kinds; he was for leaving every thing to chance, and was contented with whatever event took place. Oppoſed to this character was that of his daughter Alexandra, a woman violent in her paſſions, aſpiring, turbulent, and, on the preſent occaſion, animated with the warmeſt hopes of a change in the adminiſtration of affairs. Now Alexandra was perpetually remonſtrating with, and urging her father, to deviſe ſome mode of delivering his family from the oppreſſions and perſecutions of Herod; and adviſing him to make a timely proviſion for his own ſecurity, while a happy change in his fortune preſented itſelf to his view. The ſubſtance of her advice was, that he ſhould immediately write to Malchus, who was at that time governor of Arabia, requeſting that he would receive him into his protection, if the urgency of affairs ſhould require it: but ſhe ſaid, that if it ſhould happen that Auguſtus ſhould be diſpleaſed with the conduct of Herod, the conſequence would be that himſelf would be reſtored to his dignity; ſince the opinion of the public was clearly on his ſide, and he had an indiſputable right to the ſtation.

Herod is jealous of Hyrcanus, and meditates his death.

Hyrcanus heſitated for a conſiderable time: but Alexandra perpetually urging him to the ſame purpoſe, and giving him every encouragement to hope, while Herod was preparing ſecret practices againſt his life, he at length ſuffered himſelf to be overcome by the importunities of his daughter, and thereupon wrote a letter to Malchus, the care of which was committed committed to one Dositheus; and the substance of it was, that "Malchus should send a party of horsemen to the lake Asphaltites, about three hundred furlongs distant from Jerusalem."

Perfidy of Dositheus.

Dositheus being a confidential friend both of Hyrcanus and Alexandra, this letter was therefore entrusted to his care; and the rather, because he was conceived to be an inveterate foe to Herod, and his cause for the putting his relation, Joseph, to death; and likewise on account of his brothers, who had been some time before slain at Tyre by Antony. All these considerations, however, were insufficient to make Dositheus faithful to his employers; for he thought it more to his interest to solicit the favour of the present king; whereupon he immediately went and shewed him the letter, and received his acknowledgments for the obligation. Herod now requested the farther favour of him to fold it up, seal it, carry it according to the original direction, and bring back the answer that Malchus should send; since it would very much import him to know, how the latter would act in so interesting a business. Thus directed, Dositheus set forward on his journey, executed his commission with fidelity, and brought back the answer of Malchus, which was to the following purport: "That he was willing to give entertainment to Hyrcanus and his family: that if he chose to bring with him all those Jews who remained true to his interest, they should likewise be received in the most hospitable manner: that he was ready to send a proper force to conduct them in safety, and heartily disposed to give Hyrcanus all possible assistance in any way he might require."

Hyrcanus is put to death.

Upon the receipt and reading of this letter, Herod sent for Hyrcanus, and demanded of him whether he held any correspondence with Malchus, or not; and being answered in the negative, Herod produced the letter, and commanded that it should be read publicly; which having been done, he directed that Hyrcanus should be put to death. Thus ended the life of Hyrcanus; a life long and troublesome; and chequered with a vast variety of good and bad fortune. In the way above-mentioned, this story is recited in Herod's commentaries; but many different reports have prevailed respecting this affair. Several persons have insisted, that he did not fall a sacrifice on account of the crime above alledged, but for a conspiracy in which he was said to be concerned. The story is yet told in a different manner. It is said, that Herod being at a public entertainment, inquired of Hyrcanus (but not in a way that seemed to evidence any suspicion) whether he had received any letters from Malchus. To this he answered in the affirmative, but averred that these letters had nothing particular in them, containing only matters of more compliment and civility. Herod, it is asserted, now proceeded to interrogate Hyrcanus farther, and demanded whether he had ever received any presents from Malchus. To this likewise he answered in the affirmative; but said, that these presents were nothing more than four horses for his own use. It is averred, that the king construed this trivial circumstance into treason, arising from the acceptance of bribes; and thereupon gave orders for his being taken from his presence, and immediately put to death.

Different opinions concerning Hyrcanus.

After all that has been said on this matter, many persons are of opinion that Hyrcanus was altogether innocent; and this opinion they found on very rational arguments. He was remarkably distinguished for being a man of almost the mildest temper imaginable, who had the least of officiousness in his disposition of any person that ever lived. He was so singular for his modesty, and the temperance of his conduct, that he is said never to have been guilty of one rash action in the whole course of his life: never to have indulged himself in the usual levities of youth, nor to have been wanton in the exercise of his authority; for in his mode of government he strictly followed the advice of Antipater, the father of Herod. Hyrcanus, at the period above-mentioned, was more than eighty years of age, and dwelt on the opposite side of the river Euphrates, having left his friends and best connections behind him, in submission to the will of Herod, who was now established in the plenitude of his power: so that it seems to exceed the bounds of all human probability that Hyrcanus should have attempted a plan so impracticable in itself, and so totally contrary to the whole bent and disposition of his mind: wherefore, the whole matter hath been justly looked upon to be a contrivance of Herod for the destruction of the other.

History of his life.

He was promoted to the execution of the office of high-priest during the reign of his mother Alexandra, and continued to discharge the duties of it nine years, at the end of which his mother died, and he assumed the reins of government. He had not been in possession above three months, when he was expelled by his brother Aristobulus: after this, however, he was restored to his former station by Pompey, who put him in possession of all his dignities, and for the space of forty years he continued in the enjoyment of them; but was at length dethroned by Antigonus, suffered the pain and disgrace of having his ears cut off, and was carried away prisoner among the Parthians. But he had not long remained in this situation before he obtained his liberty, and returned home, flattering himself with great advantages from the friendship of Herod: but in this hope he was so egregiously disappointed, that the latter caused him to suffer an ignominious death, at a most advanced age, and after having experienced so many of the malicious turns of fortune. Hyrcanus was distinguished by the candour and moderation of his disposition, as well as by his regard to the laws of equity. He was remarkable for his love of ease, and generally entrusted the administration of public affairs to the care of others, from a conviction that he was himself ill calculated for the management of them. This easiness of disposition in Hyrcanus laid the principal foundation of the fortunes of Antipater and Herod: yet, in the event, it ſo happened, that, in defiance of all law and juſtice, he fell a ſacrifice to that very goodneſs of temper which ought to have been his protection.

Herod, reſolving to go to Cæſar, commits the care of the government to his brother.

Herod had, by the means above-mentioned, no ſooner got rid of Hyrcanus, than he immediately departed to Cæſar; not that he had any great expectation of favour from that quarter, towards a man who had abetted the cauſe of Antony with ſo great a degree of zeal. Previous to his departure, being ſuſpicious of the conduct of Alexandra, and apprehenſive that ſhe might foment a rebellion among the people during his abſence, he committed the executive power of the government to the care of his brother Pheroras. His mother Cypris, his ſiſter, and his other relations, he ſent to the caſtle of Maſſada; laying ſtrong injunctions on his brother, that if any misfortune ſhould ariſe to them, he ſhould reſolutely ſupport his authority, and adminiſter all public affairs in his own name. Mariamne, the wife of Herod, he ſent to Alexandrion, to reſide with her mother Alexandra, as the animoſities ſubſiſting between his wife, his own mother, and his ſiſter were ſo great, that it would have been the higheſt imprudence to have permitted their reſidence together. The government of the fort of Maſſada, he committed to the care of two of his faithful and confidential friends, Joſeph his treaſurer, and Sohemus, of Iturea; which was done, under the pretence of a reſpectful attention to the princeſſes: but the governors received private orders, that if they ſhould hear of any violence offered to the perſon of Herod, the women ſhould be immediately deſtroyed, and their utmoſt endeavours exerted that his brother and ſons might be rendered ſecure in the government.

CHAP. IX.

HEROD's Speech to CÆSAR, who confirms him in his Government. HEROD waits on CÆSAR at PTOLEMAIS, where he entertains the Emperor with the utmoſt Magnificence.

Interview between Herod and Cæſar.

HEROD had no ſooner iſſued his orders reſpecting what he intended ſhould be done in his abſence, than he proceeded, without loſs of time, to wait upon Cæſar at Rhodes. When he came to that city, he laid by his crown, but did not diſrobe himſelf of any other part of his dreſs that was an enſign of royalty. Cæſar having given permiſſion for his being admitted to an audience, he exhibited a diſtinguiſhed proof of the dignity of his mind: diſdaining to make needleſs apologies and idle excuſes for what he had to ſay (as is but too cuſtomary in ſimilar caſes), but delivered his whole ſentiments with manly freedom and reſolution.

He is confirmed in his government.

Herod delivered his ſpeech with an air of ſo much magnanimity, and accompanied it with ſo graceful an action, that Cæſar, who poſſeſſed a natural greatneſs and benevolence of diſpoſition, was wonderfully charmed with the defence he had made. He had no ſooner finiſhed his oration, than the emperor treated him with particular marks of generoſity and regard, directed him to re-aſſume his crown, and continue to be as ſincere a friend to himſelf in future, as he had heretofore been to Antony: he likewiſe informed him, that the good offices which Herod had done him in the affair of the gladiators, had been made known to him by Caſſidius.

Theſe generous expreſſions of Cæſar were ſoon followed with the moſt ſubſtantial effects; for Herod was reinſtated in his kingdom, the poſſeſſion of which was ſecured to him by a decree of the ſenate: and this very ſingular favour was granted through the immediate influence of Cæſar; a circumſtance that, as it exceeded Herod's moſt ſanguine expectations, was matter of equal ſurprize and joy to him. Theſe matters being adjuſted, he went into Egypt with Cæſar, and on the journey treated both the emperor and his attendants with a degree of ſplendor agreeable to their high rank, and conſiſtent with the benevolence of his own diſpoſition: excluſive of which he made them many valuable preſents. Herod now greatly intereſted himſelf with Cæſar, to obtain the pardon of Alexander, who had been a friend to Antony: but this ſolicitation could by no means be complied with, as Cæſar had bound himſelf, by a ſolemn vow, not to grant a pardon to the delinquent.

The Jews, who on Herod's departure had conſidered him as a ruined man, were now ſo aſtoniſhed at his return with a greater degree of reputation and ſplendor than that with which he had left them, that they looked upon him as one whom providence protected in a peculiar manner, and turned to his advantage all thoſe circumſtances which appeared to lead him only into diſgrace and danger.

Herod ſumptuouſly entertains Cæſar at Ptolemais.

Some time afterwards, when Cæſar was on his return out of Ægypt, Herod went to Ptolemais, in order to pay his reſpects to him; and there treated him with a degree of magnificence, and a profuſion of expence, that exceeds the power of deſcription: nor was this liberality confined to himſelf only, but he ſupplied all his army with neceſſaries of every kind. Cæſar was ſo ſtruck with this behaviour, that he entered into the utmoſt degree of familiarity with him, and they generally rode together, while their troops were forming in order. Herod had at this time in his train one hundred and fifty perſons, dreſſed in a moſt ſumptuous manner, who were perfectly well inſtructed in the diſcharge of a truſt committed to their care; which was, to pay particular attention to the accommodation of Cæſar and his friends on their march, and to take care that himſelf and his army ſhould be properly ſupplied both with wine and water, however barren or dry the ways might be; a circumſtance that greatly enhanced the reputation of Herod in the opinion of the army. He likewiſe made Cæſar a preſent of eight hundred talents, and behaved in all reſpects ſo much to the general ſatisfaction, that far greater reſpect was paid to the ſublimity of his ſentiments, than to the dignity of his ſtation. In conſequence of this conduct in embracing ſo proper an opportunity to exhibit the benevolence of his diſpoſition, and his ſubſequent reſpectful behaviour to many other Romans of diſtinction, in their journey out of Ægypt, he obtained, from all ranks of people, the character of one of the moſt illuſtrious princes that ever exiſted.

The Horrors of HEROD's Conſcience. A Plague breaks out in JERUSALEM. HEROD afflicted with a dreadful Diſeaſe. The enormous Cruelties of HEROD. He fortifies SAMARIA.

Diſtracted ſtate of Herod's family.

WHEN Herod returned to his kingdom, diſtinguiſhed in the moſt glorious manner, he found his family in the higheſt degree of diſorder, and his wife and mother-in-law greatly chagrined at their ſituation: for they could not but deem themſelves rather to be priſoners in the caſtle (which was really the caſe) than as having been lodged there for the ſecurity of their perſons: and they were mortified beyond all deſcription from the conſideration that not a ſingle circumſtance there was at their order or diſpoſal. Previous to his return, the mind of Mariamne was filled with the idea that the whole of Herod's profeſſions of regard to her had no farther view than the conſulting of his own convenience. But what, above all other things, gave her the utmoſt concern, was the reſolution that ſhe ſhould fall a ſacrifice in caſe of her huſband's death. The ſanguinary tendency of the orders, which Herod had given to Joſeph, engroſſed all her faculties: ſhe ſaw that her only proſpect of ſecurity conſiſted in her obtaining the favour of her keepers; particularly that of Sohemus, for her life was more immediately in his hands. For ſome conſiderable time he remained true to his truſt, and kept the ſecret inviolable; but on the ladies treating him with great complaiſance, and preſenting him with ſeveral little gratuities, he began to recede by degrees, and, at length, diſcovered the whole ſecret that Herod had entruſted him with. Now at this time he had formed an idea that Herod was to be conſidered only as a loſt man: and he therefore imagined that no danger could ariſe from that quarter, while, on the other hand, he ſhould be certain of ingratiating himſelf with the princeſs, and by this means advance his intereſt at all events. But if the matter, however, ſhould iſſue the other way; and if Herod ſhould ſucceed in every wiſh of his heart; "In this caſe (ſaid he) I know that he doats on Mariamne to ſo extravagant a degree, that he will never conſent to any thing that is not perfectly agreeable to her:" and in conſequence of theſe reflections it was that he determined to reveal the whole ſecret.

Mariamne was ſo ſhocked with theſe conditional orders which her huſband had repeatedly given reſpecting her, that ſhe conceived the greateſt antipathy to him; and ſo great was the horror and dread of her mind at the thought of living with a man who could entertain ſuch ſentiments regarding her, that ſhe made it the ſubject of her daily prayers that he might never return to her alive: and, at a future period, when ſhe had it not in her power to conceal her ſentiments any longer, ſhe acknowledged this circumſtance in the moſt open and explicit manner.

Mariamne treats Herod with indifference and averſion.

The new and unexpected honours and diſtinctions with which Herod had been gratified, ſo engroſſed his whole mind, that he was impatient to be the firſt meſſenger of the good news to Mariamne: and he delivered the happy tidings to her amidſt a profuſion of tender embraces, that evidently proved the violent and unabating love he had for her. But while he was relating the circumſtances of events, which he could not doubt would afford her great ſatisfaction, ſhe looked about her with an air of the moſt perfect indifference, without paying the leaſt kind of attention to his narrative. She was, in fact, perfectly unreſerved in her neglect; and being a woman who prided herſelf in acting without diſguiſe, ſhe took no pains to aſſume a look foreign from her heart, but permitted Herod to read in her countenance, that his good news and endearments afforded her abundantly more pain than ſatisfaction.

His agitation of mind on that occaſion.

Herod was now no longer tormented with the doubts of jealouſy, ſince what he moſt dreaded to be aſſured of, appeared now to be altogether certain. In fact, the averſion that his wife had to him was now ſo evident, that partly through the indignation he felt at finding his love rejected, and partly through his confuſion, from the tranſports of his rage, and the warmth of his affection, each paſſion tormenting and tearing his breaſt with violent and oppoſite force, his tenderneſs inciting him one way, and his reſentment hurrying him another, that a perfect whirlwind of paſſion agitated his whole frame. He ſaw not how to gratify his love, without offering violence to his reſentment; and at the ſame time he dreaded the giving ſcope to his vengeance, more than the oppoſite extreme, for he felt a principle of ſelf-love in his breaſt, which told him, that after he ſhould have taken vengeance on his wife, the moſt unhappy conſequences would ariſe to himſelf, when future experience ſhould convince him, that life was not to be ſupported without the endearments of her converſation.

This reſtleſs anxiety of Herod's mind (which was greater than language can expreſs) leaving him in doubt how he ſhould conduct himſelf with regard to Mariamne, his mother and ſiſter thought this was a fit opportunity of increaſing the difference between them, hem, by doing all kinds of ill offices, and propagating every ſpecies of calumny, that might tend to promote that hatred which was already growing apace in the breaſt of Herod. They, therefore, ſuggeſted a number of circumſtances to him, ſuch as, from their nature, though he could not entirely reject, yet neither could he afford them ſuch an implicit confidence of belief, as to determine, on the credit thereof, to deſtroy a perſon for whom he had ſuch an unbounded affection. Nevertheleſs, he became daily more and more diſcontented in his mind, and behaved with a greater degree of ſeverity to his wife. On the contrary, Mariamne took not the leaſt pains to diſguiſe the diſcontent which rankled at her heart; ſo that the violent regard that Herod entertained for her, was, by degrees, converted to the utmoſt rancour of hatred: inſomuch that it is not improbable, but that ſhe might have fallen an immediate ſacrifice to his reſentment; but that juſt at this juncture intelligence was received of the death of Antony and Cleopatra, and that Egypt was at that time in the poſſeſſion of Cæſar. On the receipt of this information, Herod loſt not a moment in repairing to Cæſar, leaving his family in the above-mentioned diſordered ſituation, and once more committing Mariamne to the care of Sohemus, to whom he made many acknowledgments for his former ſervices, and gratified him with a command in Judæa, as a teſtimony of his eſteem.

Death of Antony and Cleopatra.

On the arrival of Herod in Egypt, Cæſar treated him with great diſtinction, behaved more in a ſtile of familiarity than heretofore, placed great confidence in him, and conferred the following favours on him in token of his regard: he made him a preſent of four hundred Gauls who had officiated as guards to Cleopatra; he likewiſe made him governor of that part of the country which Antony had heretofore given to Cleopatra, and added thereto the government of Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and the tower of Straton, which lay towards the ſea, together with the command of Gadara, Hippen, and Samaria; all which proved a great addition to his royal ſplendor and dignity.

Additional favours conferred by Cæſar on Herod.

Herod having reſpectfully attended Cæſar as far as Antioch, there took leave of him, and returned to Jeruſalem, but found himſelf altogether as unhappy at home, as he had been ſucceſsful abroad: he was convinced, that the ſplendor of a crown was by no means a counterpoiſe to the misfortunes attendant on an unhappy marriage; and his diſtreſs was aggravated from the conſideration that this match was of his own choice, on which he had built all his hopes of earthly happineſs: for certainly no man ever loved a woman with a purer or more honourable affection, than Herod did Mariamne. Notwithſtanding all objections to her conduct, her chaſtity remained undoubted, even beyond ſuſpicion; but ſhe had ſome ſingularities of temper, which made her forget all reſpect to her huſband's power and authority; for ſhe would ſometimes treat him in the moſt opprobrious manner. Herod endeavoured to behave with an apparent evenneſs of temper, though ſhe uſed frequently to reflect on his mother and ſiſter, on account of the meanneſs of their extraction; and this too in ſo public a manner, that it created the moſt implacable animoſities among the ladies, and was the ſource of a thouſand ſcandalous reports and malevolent calumnies.

Mutual offices of enmity had now continued a whole year from the time of Herod's return from Cæſar, and ſeemed to be continually increaſing, when a plot, which had been preconcerted, was carried into execution. Herod, oppreſſed by the heat of the weather, and intending to indulge himſelf in repoſe, retired to his cloſet for that purpoſe: but thoughts of a more tender kind occurring to his mind, he ſent for Mariamne: and when ſhe came to him, he careſſed her with the utmoſt fondneſs, and beſought her kindneſs with prayers and ſolicitations: but ſhe anſwered him only with the utmoſt contempt and ſcorn, and reminded him, with great acrimony, of the death of her father and brother. Herod, enraged beyond all deſcription at the inſolence of this behaviour, flew into ſo violent a paſſion, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty he reſtrained himſelf from taking immediate vengeance on her, in which caſe ſhe would undoubtedly have fallen a ſacrifice to the impetuoſity of his wrath. Herod's ſiſter, Salome, hearing a diſturbance, kept the butler in readineſs to execute an important commiſſion with which ſhe had previouſly charged him; and this was no other than to wait on the king, with a tale that Mariamne had been ſoliciting his aſſiſtance in the preparation of a love potion for his majeſty. The butler was inſtructed, that if the king ſhould demand to know its contents, he ſhould declare that they were mixed by Mariamne, that he knew nothing of the ingredients, and that all his buſineſs was to deliver the preparation; but if the king ſhould not be particular in his enquiries, he ſhould behave with equal reſerve, and no injury would ariſe from what might paſs from the interview.

Mariamne reproaches Herod with the death of her father and brother.

The butler being perfectly well inſtructed in what manner he was to act, executed his commiſſion agreeable to his directions; and approaching the king with an appearance of great gravity, and as if he had important buſineſs to communicate, he told his majeſty, that Mariamne had offered him bribes and other gratuities to induce him to provide a love potion for him. The butler finding that the king appeared to be alarmed at hearing this intelligence, proceeded to inform him, that ſuch a preparation having been offered to him, and he being ignorant of what it might contain, thought it would be an act of the greateſt prudence, as far as it concerned both the king and himſelf, to wait upon him with an account of what had happened. Herod had heretofore met with ſufficient cauſe of vexation; but the aſtoniſhment with which he was ſtruck at the above-mentioned information, drove him to the very verge of diſtraction:

traction: wherefore he inſtantly ordered that a perſon in whom Mariamne particularly confided ſhould be put to the torture, preſuming that ſhe would not carry into execution any plan, whether of greater or leſs conſequence, without his being in the ſecret. Obedience being paid to this ſentence, the party was ſtrictly queſtioned; but nothing could be extorted from him, till, in the extremity of his anguiſh, he dropped ſome words, intimating that the uneaſineſs of Mariamne aroſe from ſomething that Sohemus had communicated to her. The ſufferer had hardly pronounced theſe words, when Herod burſt into the moſt paſſionate exclamation, declaring that "Sohemus, who had hitherto been ſo loyal a ſubject, and approved himſelf ſo true a friend both to his king and country, never could have betrayed a ſecret of ſo important a nature, as that with which he had been intruſted, but in the confidence of illegal familiarities with Mariamne." He therefore gave immediate orders that Sohemus ſhould be put to death; and directed that his wife ſhould be ſummoned to take her trial before a court of juſtice: and appointed for her judges a number of perſons devoted to his will.

Trial and execution of Mariamne.

When the day of her trial arrived, the charge exhibited againſt her was, the having conſpired to poiſon the king. Herod was more violent againſt her, both by words and actions, than was conſiſtent with the dignity of a court of juſtice; and the judges obſerving the diſpoſition of the king, followed his example in pronouncing her guilty. This ſentence was no ſooner paſſed, than both Herod, and all his ſurrounding friends, thought it would be prudent not to carry it into execution; but rather to ſpare her life, and detain her in priſon. Salome and her adherents were alone violent in their exclamations for immediate juſtice: and, in conſequence of what they urged, that a revolt would happen among the people if the queen's life was ſpared, Herod was prevailed on to agree to her execution: and this occaſioned the fatal exit of Mariamne.

Alexandra's puſillanimity and hypocriſy.

When Alexandra found to what extremity the proceedings againſt her daughter had been carried, ſhe had every reaſon to conclude that her own life was in danger. In order, therefore, to avoid the dreaded conſequence, ſhe deſcended to a conduct that was altogether derogatory to the dignity of her character. Her fears in this juncture, induced her to go ſuch lengths, and ſhe was ſo zealous not to be thought to have combined with her daughter, that ſhe ſought every opportunity of traducing her character in all companies, repreſenting her as the moſt baſe and ungrateful of women, and extolling the juſtice of that ſentence which had doomed her to death for conſpiring the deſtruction of a huſband, to whoſe tenderneſs ſhe lay under ſuch unbounded obligations. Alexandra carried this hypocritical behaviour to ſuch a height, that ſhe became univerſally deſpiſed, as one who could ſo unnaturally inſult her daughter during the extremity of her misfortunes: but Mariamne, even while ſhe was conducting to the place of execution, ſpoke not a word in anſwer to all ſhe heard of her mother's baſe and cruel behaviour, though her countenance teſtified the ſenſe ſhe entertained of the ſhameful part that her mother had acted. In a word, Mariamne maintained her ſpirits to the greateſt degree of firmneſs and conſtancy; not exhibiting, even by the change of her complexion, that ſhe was terrified at the thoughts of approaching death. In a word, ſhe died in the ſame manner ſhe had lived, a pattern of courage, diſdaining fear, and proving herſelf capable of ſuſtaining the moſt arduous trials.

Character of Mariamne.

Thus ended the life of the generous and virtuous princeſs Mariamne, a woman who would have been ſuperior to all her ſex, but that ſhe had too great a mixture of paſſion and pride in her diſpoſition. Her beauty was ſo great, the graces of her perſon ſo extraordinary, and the charms of her converſation ſo ſingular, as not ſimply to render her ſuperior to all other women, but ſo much ſo, as not to admit of any degree of compariſon. Now theſe ſupereminent gifts and qualifications tended in a great degree to the aggravation of her misfortunes, by occaſioning the unhappy life ſhe led with her huſband: for he was enamoured of her beyond all deſcription, neither oppoſed her will, nor denied her any thing; but permitted her to do what ſhe pleaſed, and indulged her in every gratification ſhe choſe: and this perhaps might give riſe to thoſe frequent and inconſiderate reproaches that ſhe caſt upon him, without reflecting that ſhe was thereby deſtroying her own happineſs: for by this kind of conduct ſhe rendered herſelf obnoxious to the mother and ſiſter of her huſband, and finally to himſelf, whoſe affection ſhe conceived would never have been alienated from her.

Herod inconſolable for the loſs of Mariamne.

After the death of Mariamne, the paſſion which Herod had entertained for her in her life-time (of which much hath been already ſaid) broke forth with redoubled violence: for the regard that he had for her exceeded that of other huſbands to their wives; it was a paſſion carried beyond all common conjugal affection, even to a degree of dotage; for the more contemptuouſly ſhe treated him, the more his fondneſs for her increaſed. Now when he came to reflect upon the ſentence he had ordered to be carried into execution, he broke out into the ſtrangeſt and moſt unmanly exclamations, ſtill repeating the name of Mariamne, and ſaying that her blood cried aloud for vengeance. The agonies of his mind increaſed to ſuch a degree, that he ſought to divert his melancholy by drinking, feaſting, keeping much company, and a variety of other entertainments: but when he found that all theſe endeavours were fruitleſs, he reſigned the care of his government, which he was no longer able properly to manage: ſoon after which he grew delirious, talked in a raving manner, and while his fits of phrenzy were on him, he would frequently call for Mariamne, and direct that ſhe ſhould be brought to him; for in the ramblings of his fancy ſhe appeared to him to be yet living.

A great peſtilence in Jeruſalem.

During the time that Herod was afflicted with this diſorder, a moſt dreadful plague broke out in Jeruſalem, which raged with ſuch prodigious violence, that perſons of all ranks and degrees fell a ſacrifice to its rigour; and this calamity was univerſally deemed to be a juſt judgment conſequent on the murder of the unfortunate and innocent Mariamne. As the king's illneſs now daily increaſed upon him, he retired to a private country-ſeat in Samaria, and cauſed a report to be propagated, that he was gone to take the diverſion of hunting. Before he had been long in this retreat, he was attacked with an illneſs much more violent than the former; attended with a racking pain and inflammation in the head, ſo that he was not maſter of his own conduct. The preſcriptions applied with intention to relieve him, were found to do him more injury than ſervice, ſo that his caſe was conſidered as little leſs than hopeleſs. The difficulties that aroſe in the attempt to conquer this diſeaſe, the peculiar ſituation of the patient, and the impoſſibility of relieving him in the regular way, being conſidered, the phyſicians reflected that it would be in vain to interpoſe their advice any longer, and therefore left him entirely to his own management, and the event to Providence; only recommending that he might be gratified in every thing that he required.

Herod afflicted with a dreadful diſeaſe.

Alexandra's treacherous deſign diſcovered.

Herod's unhappy ſituation of body and mind being made known to Alexandra, who was then at Jeruſalem, ſhe reflected on the circumſtance, and began to conſider if it might not be poſſible for her to obtain the poſſeſſion of ſome of the ſtrong forts; and, in particular, ſhe wiſhed to be miſtreſs of two of them above the reſt, one of which was ſituated in the city, and the other cloſe adjoining to the temple; being aſſured that the people muſt be altogether at the mercy of the party in poſſeſſion of thoſe two towers: for ſuch is the diſpoſition of the Jews, that they will yield up their lives rather than part with their religion; and as their daily ſacrifices make a very conſiderable part thereof, whoever has the command of the abovementioned towers may determine whether they ſhall have any ſacrifices at all, or not. With a view to the accompliſhment of her deſign, Alexandra made application to the governors of the ſaid towers, whom ſhe addreſſed to the following purpoſe: "I need not inform you of the very deplorable ſtate of the king's health; wherefore I intreat you that the two fortreſſes may be given up to the poſſeſſion of the mother of the king's wife, and the children of Herod and Mariamne; leſt, in caſe of his death, a different family ſhould ſucceed to the throne; and even if the king ſhould recover, the hands of his neareſt relations are thoſe in which the government may with moſt ſafety be truſted." The governors, partly from a ſenſe of their duty, but chiefly from an enmity they had to Alexandra, refuſed to acknowledge the force of her arguments for the delivering up of the towers: beſides, they ſaid it would ill become them to make a kind of prejudication of the king's life, for whom, during many years, they had entertained the moſt perfect friendſhip: and Achiab, one of theſe very governors, was nephew to Herod. Their converſation was no ſooner at an end, than Achiab diſpatched an account of the propoſal that Alexandra had made to Herod, who ſent back immediate orders that ſhe ſhould be put to death, without loſs of time.

She is put to death.

Herod's diſtemper increaſes.

With great difficulty Herod recovered of his violent indiſpoſition, but it produced a very ſtrange and ſingular effect both in his body and mind. His diſpoſition was totally altered, and he became ſo extravagantly cruel and ferocious, that the leaſt trifle that ruffled his temper incited him to acts of ſingular barbarity; and either friends or foes were equally the objects of his vengeance. The following account reſpecting Coſtabarus, Lyſimachus, Antipater (otherwiſe named Gadia), and Doſitheus, will be deemed a caſe in point. Coſtabarus was a man of as great diſtinction as moſt in Idumæa, and deſcended from a family whoſe anceſtors had heretofore officiated as prieſts of Coze, a deity which they had formerly paid great veneration to, till at length, during the reign of Hyrcanus, they adopted the Jewiſh mode of religion. When Herod was firſt advanced to the regal authority he committed to this Coſtabarus the government of Idumæa and Gaza, and gave him for wife his ſiſter Salome, whoſe huſband Joſeph he himſelf had cauſed to be put to death, as hath been noticed in another place. This promotion ſo exceeded the expectations, or even the hopes of Coſtabarus, that his pride and inſolence increaſed with the elevation of his rank, till at length he even conceived the idea of diſputing the authority of Herod; for, on reflection, he thought the Idumæans had deſcended beneath their own dignity in acknowledging themſelves to be ſubject to the Jews, merely becauſe they had adopted their ceremonies and mode of worſhip. Hereupon he diſpatched an embaſſy to Cleopatra, hinting to her that as the country of Idumæa had long ſubmitted to the authority of his anceſtors, there would be no impropriety in her ſoliciting Antony to beſtow the government of it on herſelf. Coſtabarus did not recommend it to her to make this application from any particular deſire he had to be under the command of Cleopatra, but in the hope that, the force of Herod being thereby weakened, he might have it in his power to ſeize the government of Idumæa for himſelf: and to induce him to hope for ſucceſs in this undertaking, he had two principal encouragements, viz. the dignity of his birth, and the immenſe fortune he had acquired; the latter, indeed, by means that did him no credit, for he amaſſed his money without paying any regard to the dictates of honour or conſcience: nor was his avarice in any degree ſuperior to his ambition.

Coſtabarus and Salome diſagree.

Cleopatra exerted her utmoſt influence with Antony to obtain the government of Idumæa: but all her interceſſions proved in vain. This circumſtance being made known to Herod, Coſtabarus would have fallen a ſacrifice, ſacrifice, for the advice he had given, but that Herod's mother and ſiſter became advocates in his behalf, and, after ſome difficulty, procured him a pardon, on the condition that no future confidence ſhould be repoſed in him. Some time after this a violent quarrel happening between Coſtabarus and Salome, the latter cauſed a bill of divorce to be delivered to her huſband, a circumſtance diametrically oppoſite to the uſage and practice of the country, and an abſolute infringement of the privilege of the man; for the cuſtom was, that the huſband might diſcharge the wife, and abſolutely forbid her contracting marriage again without his permiſſion. In the preſent inſtance, however, the will of Salome had the validity of a law: ſhe parted from her huſband, and going to her brother, paid him a compliment, intimating that ſhe entertained a higher ſenſe of the duty ſhe owed to him, than that ſhe had vowed to her huſband: and that ſhe came to inform him of a conſpiracy againſt him, which had been entered into by Coſtabarus, Lyſimachus, Antipater, and Doſitheus. What gave the principal credit to her information was, an account of the friendſhip that Coſtabarus had ſhewn to the ſons of Babas, whom he had privately protected for no leſs a ſpace of time than twelve years. A piece of intelligence ſo very extraordinary made an unuſual impreſſion on Herod; for he had long ſince determined in his own mind to complete the deſtruction of the ſons of Babas, as perſons who were profeſſed enemies to his intereſt; but one incident or other had continually ariſen to divert his attention from this ſubject. Now the offence that provoked Herod to ſuch a degree of enmity to theſe people, aroſe from the following circumſtance.

She accuſes him of a conſpiracy.

During the time of Antigonus, when Herod was beſieging Jeruſalem, the inhabitants were ſo wearied out with the misfortunes and calamities conſequent on the ſiege, that a great majority of them declared for throwing open the gates, and permitting Herod to enter the city: but this was reſolutely oppoſed by the ſons of Babas, who were men of great rank and influence in the city, and friends to the cauſe of Antigonus; and their advice was, to make an obſtinate defence, and ſupport the government in the royal line. Soon afterwards, when Herod took the city, he gave inſtructions to Coſtabarus to keep a ſtrict watch on all the paſſages which led out of the city, and to ſee that not a ſingle perſon of the country-faction made his eſcape. Now it happened that the ſons of Babas were the peculiar favourites of the people in general, and of courſe the moſt proper inſtruments to be made uſe in caſe any future attempt might be made to change the government. Coſtabarus ſeemed to conſult his own intereſt in their preſervation, and gave private orders that they ſhould be ſecretly conveyed to a place of ſafety. This tranſaction had no ſooner paſſed, than Herod, who immediately ſuſpected what had happened, examined him ſtrictly on the circumſtances of the affair; but the other ſwore a ſolemn oath, that he was altogether ignorant how they had been diſpoſed of. This produced an immediate proclamation, offering a reward to thoſe who would diſcover the place of their retreat; and many other modes of enquiry were adopted: but nothing was confeſſed on the part of Coſtabarus, who having at firſt denied the truth, found that he could not now retract what he ſaid: ſo that the concealment of the affair, which had been a point of kindneſs, now became a matter of neceſſity and prudence. At length, however, the whole ſecret being developed by Salome, the king immediately diſpatched proper perſons to their places of retreat, and cauſed them all to be cut to pieces, with their friends and adherents; and by this proceeding, the whole houſe of Hyrcanus was utterly eradicated: inſomuch that, from this time forward, there was no ſuch thing thought of as controuling the actions, or oppoſing the will of the king.

Coſtabarus and his adherents ſlain.

No ſooner was Herod eſtabliſhed in the plenitude of an abſolute dominion, than he began, by ſlow degrees, to recede from an obſervance of the valuable laws, and prudent government of our anceſtors, by which the people in former times had been kept in obedience, and induced to a regular diſcharge of their duty: and, inſtead thereof, he introduced a number of foreign innovations: particularly, he cauſed a theatre to be built near Jeruſalem, for the purpoſe of exhibiting wreſtling matches, which were to be celebrated every fifth year in honour of Auguſtus Cæſar. Herod likewiſe built a magnificent amphitheatre without the walls of the city: and the two buildings above-mentioned were equally ſuperb and expenſive: but theſe were neither of the leaſt uſe, nor afforded any entertainment to the Jews, who were not of a diſpoſition to be gratified by the vanity of ſuch exhibitions. Now Herod, to make his public entertainments the more diſtinguiſhed, cauſed proclamations reſpecting them to be made in various parts of the country, with promiſes of conſiderable rewards to ſuch as ſhould come off conquerors. By this mode of proceeding, he engaged (from various parts) a great number of competitors in their ſeveral profeſſions, ſuch as wreſtlers, horſe-racers, mimicks, ſingers, players on muſical inſtruments, charioteers, ſome of whom were ſkilled in driving two horſes, others four, &c. in fact it was the king's particular care to collect together every thing that might tend to promote the principal deſign, to render it curious, pleaſurable, or ornamental. The theatre was embelliſhed with trophies, devices, and inſcriptions, to the honour of Cæſar, and in celebration of his triumphs: the whole building was ornamented with gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones, and furniſhed with rich habits, and hangings of great price. That the diverſions might be rendered the more various, he provided likewiſe a number of lions, tygers, and ſeveral other of ſuch kinds of wild beaſts as were diſtinguiſhed by their ſtrength or fierceneſs, or by any other remarkable ſingularity. Sometimes theſe ravenous animals were turned turned looſe to encounter each other, and at other times to attack criminals under ſentence of condemnation. Now the foreigners ſeemed to receive a ſingular ſatisfaction at this ſight, but, on the contrary, the Jews had an equal averſion to it, deeming it an unjuſtifiable cruelty, and ſuch a kind of violation of their laws as tended to a corruption of their manners: for what can be more inconſiſtent with the dignity of human nature, than receiving ſatisfaction from the ſavage entertainment of ſacrificing men to beaſts, and ſpilling blood by way of diverſion! To ſay nothing of the folly of adopting bad new cuſtoms in the room of excellent old ones.

The trophies offend the Jews.

In a word, the Jews in general were exceedingly diſguſted; but what gave them greater diſſatisfaction than other circumſtances were the trophies, which appeared to them to be the repreſentations of men covered with arms; and which they looked upon in the light of a total oppoſition to the inſtitutions of their country. They were ſo vehement and outrageous in the expreſſion of their antipathy to theſe trophies, that Herod did not think it would be a point of prudence to oppoſe their humour in a forcible manner, but rather endeavour by reaſonable arguments, and the prevalence of fair language, to ſet before them the abſurdity of thoſe ſuperſtitious notions which gave riſe to the objections that they made: but they were ſo far from being convinced by his arguments, that they univerſally exclaimed againſt a proceeding which they thought had the appearance of inſult. They ſaid they could have ſubmitted to any thing elſe; but with regard to the bringing of images (for ſo they denominated the trophies) into the city, they could never think of acquieſcing in ſo atrocious a wickedneſs, but would always oppoſe it to the utmoſt of their power.

Deſcription of them.

As Herod found that the antipathy to the trophies was continually increaſing, and that neither the exertion of authority, nor the arts of perſuaſion tended to moderate the paſſions of the people, he ſelected a number of the principal men of the opponents, and having conducted them to the theatre, where he directed that the trophies ſhould be ſhewn them, he demanded their opinion of them, deſiring they would frankly tell him what they took them to be; on which they declared, as with one voice, that "they were the images of men." Hereupon Herod gave directions that the trophies ſhould be ſtripped, and when it came to appear that there was nothing beneath the covering but ſtumps of wood, the ſuſpicion in which they had ſo long indulged themſelves was turned into perfect ridicule: and when the tumult ariſing from the diſcovery of this affair was ſubſided, the majority of the people appeared to be perfectly paſſive in the ſubmiſſion to every innovation: ſtill, however, there were not wanting ſeveral who perſiſted in their abhorrence of the admiſſion of all foreign cuſtoms, apprehenſive that they might probably be followed by very fatal conſequences in the public ſtate of affairs: theſe, therefore, thought it a point of duty they owed their country, at whatever hazard to themſelves, to preſerve their antient diſcipline, now ſo greatly endangered, and not to permit Herod, under the ſanction of the regal dignity, to behave as an enemy to his country, and, by the introduction of illegal cuſtoms, to wound the conſciences, and violate the rights of the people.

Conſpiracy of the citizens againſt the life of Herod.

A great deal being publicly ſaid on this ſubject, the minds of the people were much inflamed; and hereupon ten citizens immediately united in a conſpiracy againſt the life of the king, notwithſtanding the extreme hazard and danger that muſt attend the engaging in ſuch a plot. Now among the reſt, there was one who happened to be blind. This man hearing repeated accounts of the alarming nature of Herod's proceedings, was ſo tranſported with rage at his conduct, that he declared, though it was out of his power to take an active part for the general welfare, yet he was willing to bear an equal ſhare in the ſufferings of his companions, however ſevere they might happen to prove: and this public-ſpirited declaration tended, in a great degree, to fix them in their reſolution. After having held repeated conferences together upon the ſubject, each man concealed a dagger under his coat, and thus armed, they proceeded to the theatre, with a fixed determination to ſtab the king, if they ſhould be ſo happy as to get near enough to him, which they flattered themſelves they ſhould be able to do: but at all events they determined to make an attack on his guards, from whence they promiſed themſelves one comfort would ariſe, in caſe of their miſcarriage; ſince their being put to death for the attempt, would render the king ſtill more odious in the ſight of the people: ſo that the force of their example in vindication of the ſacred rights of their religion, might encourage others to carry the plan into execution on ſome future opportunity.

Diſcovery of the plot.

Juſt as the king was going to enter the theatre, a perſon whom he had employed as a ſpy prevented his going in, by revealing all the circumſtances of the plot: whereupon Herod, fully ſenſible of the enmity the people entertained for him, returned to his palace, whither he ſent for the conſpirators, of whoſe names he had been previouſly informed. When they attended, they conſidered themſelves as if taken in the actual fact; and being certain that there remained no chance of their eſcape, they gave a freſh proof of the moſt undaunted courage, by acknowledging every part of the crime with which they were charged, and juſtified it in all its circumſtances. This they did with aſtoniſhing compoſure and reſolution of mind and behaviour; and produced the daggers with which they intended to have deſtroyed the king. They ſaid, "We do not conceive ourſelves as having engaged in a criminal aſſociation, for the promotion of our intereſt, or the gratification of our paſſions, but as having leagued together in a ſacred combination for the public welfare, fare, and the preſervation of the laws, which it is the duty of all worthy citizens, and true patriots, to ſupport at the hazard of their lives."

The conſpirators put to death and vengeance taken on the informer.

Having made this free and generous declaration, they were immediately taken from the royal preſence, and put to death with every circumſtance of exceſſive cruelty. However, the miſerable wretch who had given the information againſt them, lived but a very little time after them; for he was ſuddenly attacked by ſeveral perſons, who tore him to pieces, and threw his mangled body to the dogs: this was done in the ſight of a great number of people, yet, for a conſiderable time, not a ſingle man was detected who had a hand in this ſcene of vengeance: but at length, ſome women who happened to be preſent when the fact was committed, being taken into cuſtody, and put to the torture, they made a diſcovery who it was that had been concerned in the tranſaction. Hereupon all thoſe who had a hand in the buſineſs were apprehended, and themſelves, and every perſon of their families immediately put to death: in the mean time the common people remained firm in the ſupport and vindication of their old laws, cuſtoms, and privileges.

Herod fortifies himſelf in the city and Samaria.

Herod ſeriouſly reflecting on the miſchievous conſequences which he feared might ariſe from this mutinous diſpoſition among the people, who, he found, were not to be kept in ſubjection but by an abſolute force, he thought it would be a point of prudence to do every thing that lay in his power, and without loſs of time, toward the preventing of an abſolute revolt. At this time the king had two fortreſſes in the city, in one of which his palace was ſituated, and the other, named Antonia, ſerved as a proper guard upon the temple. Excluſive of theſe, he likewiſe fortified Samaria (which is otherwiſe named Sebaſte), which was advantageouſly ſituated for keeping the country in ſubjection: nor was it leſs properly ſtationed for preventing the effects of inſurrections in the city, as it was only about a day's journey diſtant from Jeruſalem. Another ſtrong fortreſs lay likewiſe in a good ſituation for the furtherance of Herod's deſigns, which had been formerly called Straton's Tower, but was now known by the name of Cæſarea. He alſo erected the fort of Gabala in Galilee, and that of Eſtmonitis in Peræa, and built a caſtle in the great plain, which was deſtined for the quarters of the cavalry.

Security of his fortreſſes.

So advantageous were the ſituations of theſe various fortifications throughout the different parts of the country, that if the people ſhould attempt to carry into execution any plot or contrivance againſt the ſtate, there was a ſufficient force in every neighbourhood, and always holding themſelves in readineſs, either to prevent the miſchief growing to any conſiderable head, or to cruſh the inſurgents. Herod, in the firſt inſtance, ſet about adjuſting the affairs of Samaria, as a place of great natural ſtrength, and admirably adapted to the ſcheme he had in view. For this purpoſe he ordered a large number of troops, both foreign and domeſtic, to march into the city, partly to aſſiſt in guarding a temple which he propoſed to build there, and partly to give a degree of ſplendor to the proceedings; but principally with a view to his perſonal ſafety, which was amply provided for under theſe appearances of magnificence. From Samaria he changed the name of the city to that of Sebaſte, as hath been heretofore noticed; and ſeparated the country around it into lots, which he diſtributed among the inhabitants, who ſoon grew into eaſy circumſtances, as the ſoil was naturally fruitful. This place he encompaſſed with a ſtrong and thick wall, and enlarged its original ſize to ſuch a degree, that it was thereafter deemed one of the firſt among the cities of eminence. The circumference of the city was twenty-five furlongs, and in the center of it was a furlong and a half of ground ſet apart for the erection of a temple: and on this ſpot, Herod cauſed the ſaid temple to be built; which, for the magnificence of the ſtructure itſelf, the expence that attended it, the extent of its dimenſions, and the abundant variety of ornamental and curious articles with which it was embelliſhed, was by no means inferior to any other building of the kind. Herod likewiſe proceeded regularly, without the leaſt loſs of time, in improving all the other parts of the city, ſo as to be anſwerable to the temple; for excluſive of his relying for ſecurity on the ſtrength of this place, his ambition was gratified in the hope of tranſmitting to poſterity ſo ſplendid a monument of his own dignity and greatneſs.

CHAP. XI.

JUDÆA afflicted with a blaſting Drought, Famine, Plague, and other terrible Judgments. HEROD builds a moſt ſumptuous Palace. JESUS, the Son of PHABES, depoſed from the Office of High-Prieſt, and SIMON, the Son of BOETHUS, promoted in his ſtead. HEROD erects a Caſtle, and cauſes ſeveral Cities and Temples to be built.

Dreadful judgment which befel Judea.

WHEN Herod had reigned ſomething more than twelve years, the country of Judæa was afflicted with a variety of ſevere calamities; but whether theſe aroſe from the immediate denunciation of the divine wrath, or were the conſequence of the general courſe of providence, it does not become me to determine. A tedious and blaſting drought was the forerunner of theſe calamities; and this was followed by ſuch a barrenneſs, that the earth could no longer produce the neceſſaries of life. This, of courſe, was ſucceeded by a famine; and partly, at the firſt, through the change of diet, and partly through the want of food, the people were tormented with the plague, and afflicted with a variety of other diſorders, ſucceeding in the moſt rapid courſe after each other. Nor was it a ſmall aggravation of their ſingular diſtreſs, that there were no perſons to attend thoſe who were ſick, who were, of conſequence, left without aſſiſtance, food, or medicines. Death now made ſuch ravages among them, that the ſurvivors deſpaired of ever ſeeing each other again, and, neglecting to afford any relief to the diſeaſed, permitted them to die without ſo much as an attempt to alleviate their miſeries. By this time the proviſions of the preceding year being all expended, and no proſpect appearing of any ſupply, their condition grew almoſt hopeleſs, as they were every day more pinched by the extremity of want, than on the preceding one; and their misfortunes were greatly aggravated by the reflection, that after the expiration of one ſeaſon, the earth continued barren, and promiſed nothing for a future ſupply. Diſtreſs ſo exquiſite as this naturally put every one on contriving how he might keep himſelf from abſolute ſtarving.

Great diſtreſs of the people.

The calamity at length increaſed to ſuch a degree, that even the ample revenues of Herod, great as they were, afforded not reſources equal to his ſupport; for his receipt of rents and cuſtomary duties all failed; his former maſs of treaſure had been expended on buildings and fortifications; and there was an univerſal deficiency in all the public accounts. Add to all this, that the people grew outrageouſly violent and clamorous; and, as is uſual in all inſtances of popular diſcontent, the blame of every miſcarriage was attributed to the government. All this time, however, Herod was extremely anxious how to obviate the difficulties with which he was ſurrounded; but the method of doing it preſented a ſcene of no ſmall embarraſſment. As his neighbours were no better ſupplied with proviſions than himſelf, there was no great reaſon to expect relief from that quarter; and with regard to money, for the procurement of the neceſſaries of life from more diſtant parts, he had ſo little left, that it was by no means equal to the payment of the neceſſary expence. It was, however, abſolutely requiſite that ſomething ſhould be done towards the alleviation of the general diſtreſs. After mature conſideration on the affair, the king gave orders for the melting down all his plate, veſſels, curioſities, and other articles of gold and ſilver, which had been heretofore employed in the ſervice of his own table; and this being all collected together, he cauſed it to be ſent into Egypt, which was at that time governed by Petronius, under a deputation from Cæſar.

Herod deviſes means for obtaining a ſupply of proviſions.

The great number of applications that had been made to Petronius, on the ſame account, and the importunity with which they had been urged, had produced him great diſtreſs; but from a ſingular regard and eſteem that he had conceived for Herod, he had of courſe a wiſh to promote the happineſs of him and his ſubjects: he therefore, in preference to all others, granted him a permiſſion to export corn; and even aſſiſted him to the utmoſt of his power, in the purchaſe of it, and in the carriage. This circumſtance proved highly advantageous to Herod, and tended to the promotion of what he had in view: for no ſooner was this ſeaſonable relief imported, than his reputation and credit were reſtored among thoſe who had heretofore ſpoken the moſt unfavourably of him: his conduct and good management were extolled in the higheſt degree, and his wiſdom and virtue were univerſally ſpoken of in terms of admiration.

His equitable diſtribution of them.

On the happy receipt of this ſupply, the firſt care of Herod was to diſtribute it to thoſe who were diſtreſſed, with proper regard to the number and ſituation of thoſe who were to partake of it. He iſſued orders for the carrying proviſions to ſuch as were not able to fetch them: and with regard to thoſe whom age, ſickneſs, or other impediments prevented from making their own bread, he directed proper bakers to make it for them. He likewiſe took particular care that his ſubjects ſhould be ſupplied with proper cloathing, as well as food abſolutely neceſſary for the ſubſiſtence of life. On this principle he ſent them variety of garments, ſince ſheep for the furniſhing of wool had been as ſcarce as corn for the making of bread. Having provided for his own ſubjects in the moſt ample manner, he was excited by the common feelings of humanity, to extend his benevolence, in the next place, to the relief of the Syrians, his near neighbours, whom he ſupplied with a large quantity of ſeed-corn, to be ſown againſt the following ſeaſon. This happening to arrive at the preciſe time when it was moſt wanted, they ſowed it immediately; and the produce was ſo unuſually great, that, when the harveſt came on, Herod ſent fifty thouſand men to aſſiſt in gathering in the fruits of the earth; and theſe fifty thouſand Herod had himſelf prevented from ſtarving during the famine. By the above-mentioned prudent conduct and good management on the part of Herod, affairs that had been given up as hopeleſs were abſolutely re-eſtabliſhed; every thing that he undertook ſucceeded to the extent of his wiſhes, whether in his own dominions, or among thoſe of his friends. Not a ſingle perſon applied to him but what was relieved: the rich, the poor, the citizens, the ſoldiers, and even ſtrangers, experienced the extent of his bounty. It was calculated that he diſtributed among his own people eighty thouſand cori of wheat, each cori reckoned at ten Attic medimni, (which was a meaſure containing ſix buſhels) and it was computed that he gave away ten thouſand cori to ſtrangers.

Herod revives his credit with the Jews.

The well-timed exertion of Herod's humane plan, in behalf of the public, operated ſo forcibly on the minds of the people in general, that they ſeemed univerſally to have forgotten all his former negligence and miſmanagement, and ſaid not a ſingle word reſpecting his encroachments on their laws, and violation of their diſcipline: as they conceived that his late provident care of, and liberal proviſion for them, ought to be deemed an ample atonement for all his miſconduct in preceding times. Neither was his character become more eſtimable at home than abroad; ſince, in the event of things, it ſo happened, that his reputation had been advanced in one place in proportion as his misfortunes had increaſed in the other; and, from the benevolent exertion of his humanity towards ſtrangers, a general judgment was formed of him, not from what he had been in former times, but from the feelings it appeared that he had been capable of in cases of extreme distress.

He builds a magnificent palace.

About the time of these transactions Herod selected, out of his own guards, five hundred men, who had served, with the greatest degree of reputation, under Ælius Gallus, in the Arabian war; and these he presented to Augustus. A state of composure having now succeeded the late distressful posture of affairs in Judæa, Herod conceived a design of building a spacious and elegant palace on the high grounds of Jerusalem. The rooms of this building were large enough to contain great numbers of people; and in them were seats and other ornaments composed of gold and marble most curiously carved, and bearing the names of the persons for whose accommodation they were intended: one of them being inscribed the apartment of Cæsar, another that of Agrippa, and so on.

While Herod was giving the necessary directions for the raising of this edifice, he formed a design of marrying a second wife, as the most probable means of diverting his attention from illicit amours. Now it happened, that at this time there was in Jerusalem a citizen named Simon (the son of Boethus, an Alexandrian), who was a priest that had his origin from a noble family. This Simon had a daughter whose beauty was so abundantly celebrated, that no other woman was deemed to bear any comparison with her. The reputation of the beauty of this lady had struck Herod in an uncommon degree; but when he came to see her, he was perfectly enamoured: yet he determined not to make a tyrannical use of the power that his rank and station gave him, but to demand her hand in the honourable way of marriage, and take her legally to his bed. It is true, that a match of this kind was greatly beneath his dignity; yet not so much so as to have any thing mean or contemptible in it: to balance, however, in some degree, the inequality of his own rank, and that of the family of his intended bride, and to gratify his passion, without derogating from the respect due to his station, he could think of no method more rational, than to bestow some great and distinguished dignity on Simon, preparatory to the honour he proposed to confer on his family: and for this purpose he divested Jesus, the son of Phabes, of the office of high-priest, and elevated Simon to that station: soon after which the marriage took place.

Builds the castle Herodium, &c.

Not long after the celebration of the nuptial ceremonies, Herod caused a most magnificent castle to be erected on the spot where, in his former wars with Antigonus, he had overcome the Jews in battle. The distance of this fortress from Jerusalem was about sixty furlongs; its situation was extremely strong by nature, and capable of being rendered altogether impregnable. The figure of the hill on which it stood was circular, rising with a gradual ascent, and so regularly, that it appeared to have been the work of art. The castle was surrounded by a number of towers, and was entered by a flight of two hundred stone steps: the apartments within it were very superb and magnificent, and the whole edifice at once strong and elegant. At the foot of the mountain were situated a number of buildings, well worthy the inspection of the curious; and particularly several fine aqueducts, by means of which the water was brought from a very great distance, with incredible labour and expence. The plain which surrounded the hill was covered with such a number of houses, that they might well be deemed to form a city of no inconsiderable magnitude; over which the castle had the appearance of a citadel, equally adapted to command and protect all the adjacent buildings.

His general character and disposition.

By this time Herod had adjusted his affairs so much to his own satisfaction, that he had no present apprehension of any danger from farther tumults or insurrections. His subjects were held to their obedience, partly from motives of fear, and partly from those of interest and affection: for in cases that demanded the punishment of an offender, he paid the most rigid and inflexible regard to justice; yet the benevolence of his disposition was equally remarkable, in instances where the general welfare of the subject could be promoted by it. He constantly kept such a guard on himself, and every thing around him in such a posture of security, as if he meant to insinuate, that the safety of the prince and people were mutually involved in that of each other. He was equally polite and easy in his address to all men, whether strangers or his own subjects; and, on particular occasions, most singularly generous to persons of distinguished rank; for he was truly of a most princely disposition. By this kind of conduct he obtained an universal regard and esteem, which tended greatly to promote his designs, and forward all his views. But so great was his ambition to obtain the favourable regard of Augustus, and other distinguished Romans, that he was imperceptibly tempted to depart from the custom and discipline of our ancestors, by the vanity of erecting cities and temples in honour of his illustrious patrons. It is true, that these erections were not made in the interior parts of Judæa; for the Jews would not have submitted to the gratification of an ambition so contrary to their laws, since it tended to promote the worship of idols and images, according to the idolatry of the Greeks: for which reason Herod caused these cities to be built on the confines of the province, and not within its immediate jurisdiction: and his excuse for the whole of this proceeding was, that it was not so much in consequence of any will of his own, as the result of the orders of those who had a right to command him. By this proceeding, however, he obtained the favour of Cæsar and the Romans, as he appeared to have renounced the principles and discipline in which he was educated, in compliment to them; but of this I will take no farther notice than to observe, that his ultimate view was the promotion of his own interest, and the rendering himself distinguished in the opinion of posterity, rity, by these lasting monuments of his splendor and benevolence.

CHAP. XII.

Several spacious and elegant Edifices erected by HEROD. He sends his Sons ALEXANDER and ARISTOBULUS to CÆSAR, who displays his Bounty to him in various Instances.

Straton's tower, or Cæsarea, built by Herod.

ADJACENT to the sea-coast was situated a place which had been heretofore denominated Straton's tower; and this Herod deemed to be a spot most admirably adapted for the building of a city. Having drawn the model of the intended erection, he employed a number of hands to construct it, and completed the whole. The private houses, as well as the palaces of this city, were all built with marble; but the most distinguished part of the whole was the port, which was erected on the same scale as the Pyræum, and, exclusive of all the other conveniencies that attended it, was protected from all danger from wind or weather. The completion of this work was the more extraordinary, as every article of the materials for finishing it was conveyed thither from distant parts, at an expence almost incredible.

The situation of this city is in Phœnicia, near the passage into Egypt, between Joppa and Dora, two most miserable sea-port towns, in the harbours of which there is no riding with any degree of safety, if the wind blows from the south-west; for it beats upon the coast with such fury, that the merchant-men are often obliged to keep out at sea for a considerable time, lest they should be driven on shore. To obviate these dangers arising from the situation he had chosen, Herod gave directions that a mole should be formed in the shape of a half-moon, and of size sufficient to contain a complete royal navy. In this place he gave orders for the sinking of stones of immense size, in twenty fathom of water. Some of these stones were fifty feet long, eighteen feet broad, and nine feet thick, and many others of them of various dimensions, some being even more than this size. The extent of the mole was no less than two hundred feet, one half of which was destined to the breaking of the surf of the sea, and the other was appropriated to form the foundation of a stone wall, on which a number of fortified turrets were erected: and the largest and most beautiful of these Herod called by the name of the Tower of Drusus, in honour of the memory of Drusus, the son-in-law of Cæsar, who had died in his youth. Adjacent hereto were several arched vaults, which served as cabins for the sailors. There was also a quay, or landing place, with a broad walk around the port, proper to retreat for the benefit of the air, and as a place of recreation. The opening of this port was to the northward, whence the wind blows with its mildest influence. On the entrance of the port to the left hand, a turret was built with a large platform, and beneath it was a descending bank to prevent the sea from washing it: on the right hand, and opposite to the tower, were erected two pillars of stone, and of an equal height. The houses adjacent to the port were all built with the finest kind of marble, and with the most exact uniformity to each other. A temple dedicated to Cæsar, was erected on a mount in the middle, which became a famous sea-mark, and proved of the utmost use to mariners. In this temple were placed a representation of the city of Rome, and a statue of Cæsar, which were no less distinguished for the beauty of the materials they were made of, than for the elegance of the workmanship; and thence the city obtained the name of Cæsarea. Nor was less ingenuity exerted in the contrivance of the vaults, and common sewers, which were placed at equal degrees of distance from each other, and discharged their contents into the sea; but there was one conveyance, which intersected all the rest, which, while it carried off all the filth from the various parts of the city, was so disposed that the tides entered by it, and washed the passages, by which the whole was kept in an uncommon state of cleanliness. Exclusive of all the erections above-mentioned, Herod built a theatre of stone; and on the south side of the harbour constructed a very large amphitheatre, which afforded an elegant prospect towards the sea. In fact, nothing that money could procure, or diligence effect, was wanting; and the whole of this magnificent work was completed in about twelve years.

A stone theatre and amphitheatre.

Herod having now totally finished the two cities of Cæsarea and Sebaste, sent his two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, on an embassy, to pay his respects to Cæsar. Pollio, who was the particular friend of Herod, had ordered lodgings for the reception of the visitors: but this was more than was necessary; for Cæsar had previously given directions that they should be entertained and accommodated in the royal palace. His reception of them was consistent with the utmost rules of politeness and friendship; and having, in addition to all his former favours to Herod, conferred on him the government of the three provinces of Trachon, Batanæa, and Auranitis, he likewise submitted to his own choice which of his sons should succeed him in the government of Judæa. But of these matters we will speak farther.

Description of the Trachonite freebooters.

The lands of Lysanius having been rented by one Zenodorus, he could not rest satisfied with the lawful profits of his farm, but went shares with the free-booters of Trachon, a kind of people that, in a great measure, subsisted on the pillage that they obtained from the inhabitants of Damascus. Now Zenodorus, whose business it was to have punished these invaders of their neighbours' property, made no scruple of accepting his proportion of the stolen effects. Hereupon those people who had been the principal sufferers by their violent violent proceedings, made application to Varro, who governed the province at that time, requeſting he would grant a letter to Cæſar, againſt Zenodorus. This being done, Cæſar ſignified his royal pleaſure that the "Thieves ſhould be ſmoked out of their holes like hornets;" and he likewiſe conferred on Herod the government of that province, in expectation that, for the future, the Trachonites might be kept in ſubjection. Theſe diſorderly people poſſeſſed neither towns, houſes nor lands, but inhabited caves and dens like beaſts; but in theſe they were provided with ſuch ſtores of food, and plenty of water, that it could not but be very difficult to drive them out; nor was it an eaſy matter to explore their receſſes: beſides, as they lived by their unlawful depredations, they would be very unwilling to quit their irregular courſe of life. It was not poſſible for more than one perſon at a time to enter into their hiding-places, as the paſſage was ſo extremely narrow; but the apartments in the inſide were more ſpacious than can be imagined, and the whole were covered with flat and plain roofs. Upon the whole, their retreat conſiſted of one immenſe rock, that was almoſt impaſſable; the turnings and different paſſes in it were innumerable, and it was neceſſary to have a guide to find the right way into it. The abandoned inhabitants of this place were deſperate beyond the power of deſcription; and would rob each other, rather than not gratify their natural propenſity to theft.

They are driven from their retreats by Herod, whom Zenodorus in vain accuſes to Cæſar.

Herod had no ſooner entered on the poſſeſſion of the government of this new province, than taking with him a number of guides and agents, he explored the receſſes of the thieves, drove them from their retreats, and re-eſtabliſhed peace and ſecurity in the country. Zenodorus was ſo enraged at the late events, partly, perhaps, through mortification on account of having loſt his government, and partly through its being given to Herod, that he loſt no time in complaining of the latter, for which purpoſe he made a journey to Rome; but all his accuſations produced not the effect he deſired.

During this ſituation of public affairs, Agrippa was commiſſioned by Cæſar to go into Aſia, to aſſume the command of the tranſmarine provinces in that country. Now Agrippa being a particular friend and old acquaintance of Herod, he went as far as Mytilene, to meet him on his journey, and then returned into Judæa. No ſooner was he arrived, than the Gadarenes inſtantly repaired to him, exhibiting very extraordinary complaints againſt Herod: but they were immediately confined in chains, and ſent away to Herod, without ſo much as being admitted to a hearing.

The Arabians enemies to Herod.

About this time the Arabians began to exhibit tokens of their enmity againſt Herod, on the foundation of an ancient animoſity that had ſubſiſted between them; and in fact this affair was not without ſome plauſible appearance of reaſon. Zenodorus, of whom mention has been already made, finding his influence and authority began to decay, came to an agreement with theſe Arabians, that they ſhould pay him a rent of fifty talents annually, for a certain diſtrict of his eſtate in the province of Auranitis. Now this being within the limits of the government which Cæſar had granted to Herod, the Arabians expreſſed great unwillingneſs to ſubmit to the payment. They at one time diſputed the matter in a legal way, and at length entertained thoughts of taking up arms, having engaged in their ſervice a conſiderable number of indigent ſoldiers, who, copying the example of other perſons in diſtreſſed circumſtances, were not unwilling to promote their own intereſt by what might tend to the ruin of others. Herod was by no means unacquainted with the nature of theſe proceedings; but thought it would be more prudent to conciliate the affections of theſe people by gentle methods, than to irritate them by harſh proceedings, leſt new troubles ſhould be the conſequence of the procedure.

The Gadarenes accuſe him to Cæſar.

During the ſeventeenth year of the reign of Herod, Cæſar made a journey into Syria, where he was no ſooner arrived than the Gadarenes approached him, with the bittereſt complaints againſt Herod, whom they repreſented as an oppreſſive and moſt inſupportable tyrant. Theſe complaints and accuſations againſt him, aroſe, however, principally from the inſtigations of Zenodorus, who, as hiſtory informs us, had bound himſelf by a ſolemn oath, never to leave the perſecution of Herod, till they (the Gadarenes) ſhould be releaſed from all ſubjection to him, and once again under the immediate authority of Cæſar. This extravagant promiſe of Zenodorus inſtigated the Gadarenes to be ſtill the more preſumptuous in their behaviour, eſpecially on their reflecting that thoſe priſoners whom Agrippa had heretofore delivered to Herod ſtill remained free from thoſe puniſhments which it was expected would have been inflicted on them.

Charge brought againſt him, and his acquittal.

Now though Herod had in many inſtances diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſeverity towards the Jewiſh offenders, yet no man could be more backward in the puniſhment of ſuch injuries as he received from thoſe of other countries. He was now charged by the Gadarenes with a variety of crimes, ſuch as plundering and oppreſſing the people, and violating and demoliſhing of their temples. Notwithſtanding the violent importunities of the multitude, Cæſar did not treat Herod with the leaſt degree of reſpect leſs than uſual; though there was a kind of examination into the nature and cauſe of their complaints for one day, after which nothing more was done in the affair: for the Gadarenes, by this time, obſerving how glaring the partiality of Cæſar was to Herod, ſeemed to entertain well-grounded fears, that when the buſineſs ſhould be brought to an iſſue, it would be their fate to be delivered up into the hands of their enemy; therefore ſome of them, on the very night following, cut their own throats, ſome of them drowned themſelves, and others again threw themſelves from rocks and precipices, and broke their necks, fearing that they ſhould be puniſhed by methods of torture; and Cæſar concluding them ſelf-condemned by theſe acts of ſuicide, acquitted Herod without any farther ceremony. In his favour there now likewiſe appeared another very ſingular providential circumſtance; and this was nothing leſs than the death of Zenodorus, which happened at Antioch, in Syria, in conſequence of a violent dyſentery. Hereupon Cæſar immediately put Herod in poſſeſſion of a very conſiderable eſtate, which had been the property of Zenodorus, and which was ſituated between Galilee and Trachonitis, comprehending Ulatha, Panium, and the adjacent country. He likewiſe conferred on him a ſupreme authority over the governors of Syria, and directed that his orders and commands ſhould be obeyed in every particular.

Cæſar's further bounty and favours to Herod.

By this time the good fortune of Herod was advanced to ſo great a height, that as Cæſar and Agrippa were the two ſupreme governors of the empire, ſo he was equally a favourite with them both; for Agrippa loved him better than any other man except Cæſar; while the affection that Cæſar entertained for him was next to that eſteem which he had for Agrippa. In conſequence of this weight of intereſt, Herod prevailed on Cæſar to grant the commiſſion of a tetrarch of Judæa to his brother Pheroras, to whom he likewiſe allowed a revenue of a hundred talents out of his own private fortune, that he might not be deſtitute of a reſource in caſe of a change in his affairs; nor obliged to apply to his children for ſupport. This matter being adjuſted, Herod paid a conſtant court to Cæſar, whom he attended till he ſaw him embarked, and then he returned to his own abode.

He erects a temple to Auguſtus;

On the eſtate which had belonged to Zenodorus, Herod now ſet about erecting a magnificent temple of white marble, in honour of Cæſar, and in grateful remembrance of his benefactions. This building was erected near the cave which is called Panias, ſituated at the bottom of a mountain which is celebrated for the river Jordan taking its riſe there. At the bottom of this mountain is a cavern of prodigious depth, in which are ſprings of water that are continually bubbling. The proſpect from this mountain is remarkably delightful; but the mountain itſelf is ſtill more remarkable for this temple in honour of Cæſar, than for any other circumſtance.

and remits a third part of the taxes.

On this occaſion Herod ſought the means of ingratiating himſelf with his ſubjects; and to this end he releaſed them from a payment of a third of their taxes, under pretence of relieving them from the diſtreſs occaſioned by the famine: but his true motive was to conciliate their affections; for he had done ſo many things ſcandalous to religion, and in violation of the laws of good manners, that the people in general were extremely diſguſted with him; nor did they ſcruple to ſpeak againſt his conduct in the moſt public manner. This laid him under a neceſſity of taking yet other methods to keep his people in ſubjection; the principal of which were, the commanding that every man ſhould attend only to his own buſineſs, and that there ſhould be no private cabals or clubs, or public meetings. He likewiſe appointed ſpies to watch the motions of all companies, and commiſſioned officers to take into cuſtody all thoſe who ſhould act in diſobedience to theſe orders: in conſequence of which many perſons were publicly committed, and others privately conveyed to fort Hyrcania, where they were puniſhed in the moſt exemplary manner. The ſtreets, lanes, avenues, and even roads, were all beſet with ſpies; and not a meeting was held on which there was not the cloſeſt guard and obſervance: nay, ſo jealous was Herod in his fears, that he would frequently diſguiſe himſelf, and go out alone in the night among the people, to ſound their inclinations, and learn what was the general opinion concerning him. When he encountered any man that was violent in cenſures of his conduct, he took care that the party ſhould find the moſt ſerious effects of his reſentment: but for thoſe who were more cautious in expreſſing their real ſentiments, it was his cuſtom to diſmiſs them, after having adminiſtered to them an oath of allegiance. By this mode of conduct the greater part of the people were ſoon reduced to ſubmiſſion, from motives of fear; and with regard to ſuch as had the reſolution to juſtify their own conduct, and to deny his right to act as he had done, ſome mode was ſtill deviſed to remove them out of the way, and thereby prevent all cauſe of future complaint. The oath of allegiance above-mentioned was offered to Pollio, the Phariſee, and to Sameas, as likewiſe to their reſpective diſciples, as well as to other people; but on their refuſing to make the depoſition, Herod declined to urge them any farther on the ſubject, owing to the ſincere regard that he entertained for Pollio. Nor was he leſs generous in his conduct towards the Eſſenes, a ſect that bore a great reſemblance to the Pythagoreans among the Greeks. In ſeveral other parts of this work, much will be found reſpecting the Eſſenes; but there can be no impropriety in our ſpeaking of them in this place; eſpecially as it will account for the predilection that Herod had in their favour, and tend to elucidate the motives of his preſent conduct.

Prediction of an Eſſene named Manahem.

When Herod was very young, there lived one Manahem, an Eſſene, who was not only remarkable, beyond other men, for the regularity of his life, and all the virtues of his moral character, but was likewiſe happy in the poſſeſſion of the ſpirit of prophecy. Now this perſon obſerving Herod playing about with his ſchool-fellows, approached him, and ſaluted him with theſe words, "Hail, king of the Jews!" Hereupon the youth ſaid, that he was not deſcended from a family from whom he might hope to inherit any of the honours attendant on royalty; and told Manahem either that he did not know him, or that he meant to make a ridicule of him. To this Manahem, ſmiling, and laying his hands on the boy's ſhoulder, ſaid, "Yes, yes, it is determined beyond a doubt that you ſhall be a king, and that you may govern your people happily; happily; for that you ſhould do ſo, is the will and pleaſure of Almighty God: but I beſeech you to remember theſe words of Manahem, and to reflect on the uncertainty of that ſtation to which you will be elevated. It will become your dignity, and be a part of your duty, to diſtribute equal juſtice to all men, and to govern according to the laws of conſcience, and the rules of equity; but I am ſecretly impelled to tell you, that I fear theſe maxims will not be the rule of your conduct. I foreſee that you will neither obey God, nor ſerve your fellow-creatures as you ought: though, in other reſpects, you will be remarkably fortunate, and acquire an unuſual degree of renown. Rely on it, however, that none of your tranſactions will be hid from the Moſt High, but that a moſt deplorable judgment will bring you to your end."

Herod interrogates him concerning the prophecy.

This prediction was paid but little attention to by Herod, nor for a conſiderable time did it again enter into his mind; but in proceſs of time, when he came to be advanced to the throne, and was in the utmoſt ſplendor of his circumſtances, he cauſed Manahem to be brought to him, and queſtioned him how long he thought his reign would continue. To this Manahem returning a dubious reply, Herod again cloſely queſtioned him whether it was his opinion that he would reign ten years; "Yes (replied the other) twenty, and even thirty;" on ſaying which words he ſtopped, and declined to mention the preciſe period. Herod, however, appeared to be ſatisfied with what he had ſaid, diſmiſſed him in the moſt affectionate manner, and, ever after that period, held the Eſſenes in the higheſt degree of eſteem. If any part of this narrative ſhould ſeem to exceed the juſt bounds of credibility, the reader will recollect that there are innumerable inſtances of righteous men having been favoured with particular revelations of the ſecret counſels and purpoſes of the divine will.

CHAP. XIII.

HEROD reſolves to build a magnificent Temple. Deſcription of its Front, Galleries, Walls, &c. The Temple dedicated.

Rebuilding of the temple.

HEROD having now ſignalized himſelf by a great number of very diſtinguiſhed actions, and completed many buildings of uncommon pomp and magnificence, conceived an idea, in the eighteenth year of his reign, of erecting a temple to the honour of God, which he propoſed ſhould be a much larger and more ſplendid building than the former. This work he intended ſhould redound more to the credit of his own name, and tend more effectually to perpetuate his memory, than all he had ever done before; which proved to be actually the caſe: but leſt the people ſhould conceive that he propoſed a plan which would be too difficult in its execution, he cauſed them to be ſummoned together, to try what the force of reaſon would do towards the removing of that objection: and when they were met, he addreſſed them in a ſpeech on the ſubject.

Fears and anxiety of the people reſpecting the building.

There was ſomething in his addreſs and declaration ſo totally unexpected by the people, that they were aſtoniſhed at the hearing of it, and filled with apprehenſion what would be the conſequence. Excluſive of this, they were extremely afraid that the old temple would be pulled down before they were certain of having another to ſupply its place; nay, the having any other at all, was rather the object of their hopes than of their expectations: for they thought it almoſt impoſſible that ſuch a work ſhould be completed. While they were revolving this buſineſs in their minds, the king finding what it was that gave them uneaſineſs, deſired that they would not indulge their anxiety any longer, for they might reſt aſſured that the old temple ſhould remain altogether in its preſent ſituation, till the materials for the new one ſhould be provided; and in this circumſtance his performance kept pace with his promiſe.

Great preparations made for the work.

For the completion of this work a hundred carriages were provided to remove ſtones and other materials: of handicraftſmen of all ſorts there were ten thouſand artiſts, and of theſe the beſt in each kind that could poſſibly be procured; and for the ſuperintendence of them, a thouſand prieſts that underſtood the buſineſs of maſonry and carpentry; and theſe prieſts were ſupplied with robes and veſtments at the king's expence. When the workmen were engaged, and the ſtones, timber, and other materials all provided, the firſt work they began upon was to clear the old foundation, and lay a new one in its ſtead: and on this they elevated a ſuperſtructure of a temple, the length of which was a hundred cubits, and the height one hundred and twenty; but as it afterwards happened that the odd twenty cubits ſunk, it fell ſo much ſhort of the original deſign; and our forefathers, in the time of Nero, had an intention of ſupplying the defect. The whole building was a compoſition of durable white ſtone, each ſtone being eight cubits high, twelve broad, and twenty-five in length.

Front and ſituation, &c. of the temple.

The principal front of this extraordinary building had very much the appearance of a palace, the center part of which was much higher than the ſides. The proſpect it afforded towards the fields was extremely agreeable, and this proſpect extended into the country ſeveral furlongs: nor was the view of the building itſelf leſs pleaſing to thoſe who had their reſidence oppoſite to it, or ſuch as were travelling towards it. The porch of the temple was a curioſity no leſs ſingular than the reſt of the building; the upper part of it being adorned with an abundance of the richeſt tapeſtry hanging, variety of beautiful purple flowers, and pillars appearing to be interwoven; round the pillars a golden vine crept and entwined itſelf, the branches of which ſuſpended cluſters of grapes that deſcended in elegant negligence from the cornices of the room: the whole exhibiting a piece of workmanſhip no leſs valuable for the materials with which it was formed, than for the admirable ſkill with which it was executed.

Outward galleries. Large galleries extended round about the temple, which were equally ſuperb and magnificent with the reſt of the work; but, for the elegance and beauty of their ſtructure, greatly ſurpaſſing any thing that had been ſeen before of that kind. Two ſtrong walls formed the ſupport for two of theſe galleries, and were of themſelves deemed pieces of work of a very remarkable degree of excellence.

The walls. Near this city nature had placed a ſteep rocky hill, but on the eaſtward ſide of it the deſcent was gently ſloping. Now Solomon, in former ages, had, by the particular command of God, ſurrounded this hillock with a wall, and the lower extremity of it was encompaſſed by another wall, under which, towards the ſouth, was a deep valley. This was compoſed of ſtones of immenſe ſize, cramped together with irons round the whole work, and extending down to the bottom of the hill. This work was built in a ſquare form, and was deemed a moſt extraordinary piece of architecture, allowance being made for its depth and magnitude. The beſt opinion could be formed of the ſize of the ſtones wherewith it was built, by viewing it on the outſide, ſince, on the inſide, they were jointed together, one within another, to prevent the inclemency of the weather from ſeparating them.

When this wall was built up to its proper height, the ſpace between that and the hill was filled up with earth ſo as to bring the ground to a level with the wall; and then were erected four galleries, each gallery being deemed a furlong in extent. Within the ſquare, likewiſe, there was another ſtone wall, which extended round the top of the hill, and was ornamented with a double porch, on the eaſt ſide, which was oppoſite the portal of the temple which ſtood in the middle. Several princes contributed to adorn this portal, by many tokens of their royal bounty; and round about various parts of the temple were hung the ſpoils and trophies which had been acquired in battles with the barbarians: theſe Herod cauſed to be again dedicated, and added to them many others of later date, which, in his battle with the Arabians, he had brought off as proofs of his own victories.

Inner ſtone wall.

The tower, called Baris. A ſtrong and well fortified building ſtood on one of the angles of the north ſide, which had been erected by ſome of the line of the Aſmonæans, a family that had executed the joint authority of prince and high-prieſt, for a long ſucceſſion of years. To this place they gave the name of Baris, or the Tower; and herein they depoſited the pontifical habits, which, agreeable to ancient cuſtom, were never to be brought forth but when the high-prieſt wanted them for his immediate uſe, in the exerciſe of his office. To this purpoſe Herod likewiſe deſtined the building; but on his deceaſe it fell into the hands of the Romans, with whom it remained till the time of Tiberius; and during his reign the government of Syria was given to Vitellius. Now this Vitellius, on going to take poſſeſſion of his government, was received in ſo diſtinguiſhed a manner at Jeruſalem, that in grateful return for the reſpect and eſteem ſhewn him by the Jews, he ſolicited that Cæſar would ſubmit to their earneſt entreaties that they themſelves might take poſſeſſion, and have the keeping of the ſacred veſtments. Now Cæſar having graciouſly complied with their requeſt, theſe valuable effects remained in their cuſtody till king Agrippa had paid the debt of nature: but, upon his deceaſe, Caſſius Longinus, the governor of Syria, and Cuſpius Fadus, the lieutenant of Judæa, iſſued immediate orders that theſe ſacred veſtments ſhould be depoſited in the fort Antonia, aſſigning for a reaſon, that as they had formerly been in the keeping of the Romans, they ought to be reſtored to their cuſtody again.

Before the middle incloſure was placed the altar where the prieſts offered up their ſacrifices. This place was ſo ſacred that even Herod himſelf durſt not enter into it, ſince the law prohibited him from ſo doing, as he was not a prieſt. For this reaſon Herod committed the care of this part of the ſacred work to the prieſts; and they completed it in the ſpace of eighteen months; whereas Herod himſelf, in ſuperintending the completion of the reſt, employed no leſs a time than eight years.

The Holy of Holies.

The finiſhing of the ſacred part of the work in ſo ſhort a time, afforded matter of ſuch extreme joy to the people, that they united in returning thanks to the Almighty for the bleſſing he had beſtowed on their endeavours, and likewiſe ſpoke in the higheſt terms of the king, for the laudable zeal he had ſhewn in the promotion of the worſhip of God.

The temple finiſhed and dedicated.

The temple being thus reſtored, the circumſtance was celebrated by every demonſtration of the ſincereſt joy. On this occaſion three hundred oxen were ſacrificed for the king's account, and a proportionable number for perſons of all ranks and degrees; ſo that the whole of the ſacrifices exceeded in number what could poſſibly be imagined. There was a very great degree of ſolemnity in this dedication of the temple, beyond, indeed, what any perſon could have formed an idea of; and this ſolemnity was doubled by its happening on the very day of Herod's acceſſion to the throne.

A remarkable ſubterraneous vault.

While we are reciting an account of Herod's building theſe works, it may not be improper to take notice of a vault which he conſtructed under-ground, from the fort of Antonia to that gate of the temple which led to the eaſt, near which gate he cauſed another fort to be erected: this vault was built with a view, that in caſe of any treaſonable proceeding againſt the government, himſelf or his ſucceſſors might have an opportunity of making a ſecure and private retreat. A tradition is prevalent amongſt us, that during the whole time of the building the abovementioned temple no rain fell in the day, but only in the night; which was deemed to be owing to the peculiar peculiar interpoſition of Providence, that the progreſs of the work might not be impeded. Be this as it may, the ſtory hath been communicated among us from father to ſon; and we conceive that in inſtances where the worſhip of God is concerned, ſuch an interpoſition is by no means inconſiſtent with the laws of divine Providence.

CHAP. I.

HEROD eſtabliſhes a Law againſt Robbers of Houſes. He goes to ROME, is ſumptuouſly entertained by CÆSAR, and returns to JERUSALEM with his two Sons.

Law againſt houſe-breakers offenſive to the people.

HEROD conſidering it a principal branch of juſtice, both in the city and country, enacted a law, purporting that offenders convicted of houſe-breaking ſhould be ſold into ſlavery, either to natives or foreigners, without exception. The people judged this law to be an inſult upon the cuſtoms and inſtitutions of their nation, rather than as proceeding from a regard to public juſtice, and that the ſubjection of people living under different laws and regulations was not meant ſo much as a puniſhment to the criminal as an affront and injury to religion. It is enacted by our ancient laws that a felon be condemned to fourfold reſtitution, provided he be poſſeſſed of property; that, in caſe of being inſolvent, he be ſold into ſlavery, but not to ſtrangers; and that he be releaſed on the expiration of ſeven years. The new law was conſidered as a deliberate act of injuſtice and oppreſſion, eſtabliſhed in contempt of the ancient practice.

Herod's journey to Italy.

About this time the king made a voyage to Italy, in order to viſit his two ſons whom he had ſent to be educated in that country, and to pay his reſpects to the emperor. He found that his ſons had acqured a great proficiency in the knowledge both of literature and buſineſs; and they were delivered into his care by Cæſar. The youths were tall and well proportioned; and their converſation proved the excellency of their minds to be equal to the gracefulneſs of their perſons; and all their actions were accompanied with a peculiar dignity which ſeemed to ſpeak them of the royal line. Herod having paid his compliments to Cæſar, returned with his ſons to Jeruſalem, where they were received with great joy by the Jews, who were ſtruck with admiration upon obſerving the eminent accompliſhments which the princes had acquired. The favourable reception which the young princes experienced from the people proved a circumſtance extremely diſagreeable to Salome, the ſiſter of Herod, and to the ſeveral perſons who had united with her in effecting the deſtruction of Mariamne; and they conſidered theſe youths as the inſtruments preſerved by Providence by which they were to be puniſhed for having cauſed the death of their mother. Influenced by theſe ſuggeſtions, they determined to endeavour to alienate the affection of the king from his ſons by ſlanderous inſinuations: they propagated a rumour among the multitude, that the ſons muſt neceſſarily entertain an implacable averſion to the father who had bathed his hands in the blood of their innocent mother. Though they ventured not to addreſs theſe and other calumnies immediately to Herod, they doubted not of their reaching him in the end, and of giving birth to an irreconcileable hatred againſt his ſons.

Returns with his ſons to Jeruſalem.

CHAP. II.

ARISTOBULUS is married to BERENICE, and ALEXANDER to GLAPHYRA. HEROD is viſited by AGRIPPA.

Marriage of Herod's two ſons.

HITHERTO the conſpiracy of Salome and her adherents had proved ineffectual; and Herod continued unreſerved and tenderly affectionate to his ſons. He applied himſelf to negociate matrimonial alliances between them and princely families; and effected an union between Ariſtobulus and Berenice, daughter of Salome, and between Alexander and Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, ſovereign of Cappadocia.

Being informed that Marcus Agrippa was now returned from Italy into Asia, Herod repaired to him, and with great earneſtneſs intreated that he would honour him with a viſit. Agrippa accepted the invitation, and Herod exerted his utmoſt power to give a generous reception to, and contribute to the ſatisfaction of, his gueſt. He conducted him to the ſeveral magnificent cities and palaces, which he had built or repaired, ſhewing him Sebaſte, the port of Cæſarea, the forts of Alexandrion, Herodian, Hyrcania, &c. at which places he entertained Agrippa and his friends with the greateſt ſplendor that can be conceived. Having made this expedition, Herod conducted Agrippa to Jeruſalem, where the people received him with expreſſions of joy, and the acclamations and other ceremonies uſual on a ſolemn feſtival. On this occaſion Agrippa dedicated to the Lord an hecatomb, which is a ſacrifice of an hundred victims, and feaſted the multitude. The behaviour of Herod proved ſo agreeable, that Agrippa was deſirous of prolonging his viſit: but as the winter approached, and the ſeas were dangerous in that ſeaſon, he embarked, after having received many honours and valuable preſents, and returned with his troops to Ionia.

Friendly intercourſe between Herod and Agrippa.

CHAP. III.

HEROD meets AGRIPPA at SINOPE. The two Sovereigns go in company to SAMOS.

Voyage of Herod to reviſit Agrippa.

HEROD having paſſed the winter in his own dominions, embarked on the opening of ſpring for Leſbos, where he expected to join his friend Aprippa, who he was adviſed had led an army towards the Boſphorus. Having paſſed Rhodes and Coas, he was forced by the northern winds upon the iſle of Chios, and detained there ſeveral days. During his reſidence in this place, he received viſits from many perſons of diſtinction, whom he complimented with magnificent preſents: and obſerving that, from a ſcarcity of money, the public edifices which had been deſtroyed in the Mithridatic war ſtill remained in ruins, he gave the inhabitants credit for a ſum ſufficient to defray the expence of the neceſſary reparations, expreſsly charging them to complete the work with all poſſible expedition.

Upon the wind changing to a favourable point, Herod embarked, and ſailed to Mitylene, and thence to Byzantium. Having received intelligence that Agrippa had paſſed the Cyanean rocks, he made all poſſible ſpeed in ſearch of him, and at length joined him at a city of Pontus called Sinope. Agrippa was no leſs rejoiced than ſurpriſed at the unexpected arrival of Herod; and on the meeting of theſe princes, they gave every poſſible demonſtration of an honourable and reciprocal friendſhip. Agrippa made grateful acknowledgments to Herod for the ſingular inſtance of kindneſs he had ſhewn in poſtponing the concerns of his own government, and joining him with a powerful fleet at a point of time when his affairs were in the moſt preſſing exigency. Agrippa repoſed an unlimited confidence in Herod, to whoſe advice in council he paid the greateſt deference; and theſe princes were ſo ſtrongly united, that they jointly partook of labours, dangers and difficulties, as well as the pleaſurable relaxations from the arduous concerns annexed to their ſituation.

Their mutual friendſhip.

Having diſpatched the buſineſs which had called him to Pontus, Agrippa, accompanied by Herod, returned over land. They directed their courſe through Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the Greater Phrygia, and having arrived at Epheſus, they took ſhipping for Samos. During their progreſs, the generoſity of Herod was diſplayed on a variety of occaſions, both by liberal donations on his own account, and by ſoliciting Agrippa in favour of the inhabitants of the places through which they paſſed. Agrippa was naturally of a humane diſpoſition, and was never backward to perform acts of kindneſs, except when rendering ſervice to one man would be attended with injury to another. This benevolent temper operated more extenſively through the mediation of Herod, to which nothing was refuſed by Agrippa, who ſtudied to anticipate him in offices of kindneſs and generoſity. On the interceſſion of his friend, Agrippa granted a pardon to the Illienſians, whoſe conduct had given him great offence. He diſcharged an arrear which the people of Chios had incurred to the emperor, and put them in poſſeſſion of divers privileges: and he was diſtinguiſhed by many other inſtances of virtue.

Agrippa's kindneſs to Herod.

CHAP. IV.

At the Inſtance of HEROD, AGRIPPA grants a hearing to the JEWS of IONIA, who complain of the Tyranny of the Natives. He eſpouſes the Cauſe of the JEWS.

Agrippa confirms the laws of the Jews of Ionia, whom he alſo protects.

UPON the arrival of Herod and Agrippa in the province of Ionia, they found a great concourſe of Jews aſſembled, who vented the moſt bitter complaints againſt the natives for interrupting their religious worſhip and the exerciſe of their laws. They repreſented that the officers broke in upon their public meetings, and forcibly hurried them to the courts of juſtice; prevented the holy treaſure being conveyed to Jeruſalem; compelled them to take up arms, and exacted duties of their ſubſiſtence money; urging that theſe oppreſſions were inflicted upon them in direct violation of the privileges granted to them by the Romans. Herod availed himſelf of this favourable opportunity to render ſervice to the Jews, and interceded with Agrippa to allow them to ſubmit their complaints to him. Agrippa conſented to grant the Jews a hearing, and Herod retained his friend Nicolaus as counſel to plead their cauſe. On this occaſion a court was ſummoned to meet, at which were preſent Agrippa, a bench of honourable Romans, ſeveral princes, and other perſons of diſtinguiſhed rank. The advocate in behalf of the Jews pleaded their cauſe in a very eloquent ſpeech.

to

The Greeks made no attempt to invalidate what was advanced by Nicolaus, who ſpoke in favour of the Jews; for the matter in agitation was not a judicial trial of right, but a petition for redreſs of grievances. They urged, however, that the Jews were foreigners, and a burthen upon the natives. On the other hand, it was contended that being entitled to the privileges of citizens, the Jews could not come under the deſcription of foreigners; that they were a people under the regulation of their own laws, living in conformity to the will of the Almighty, and at peace with mankind.

Agrippa confirms the privileges formerly granted to the Jews.

Convinced of the juſtice of their cauſe, Agrippa declared himſelf in favour of the Jews, and ſignified, that if their deſires had not been confined within ſuch moderate bounds, he ſhould have complied with them, provided he could have done it conſiſtent with a due regard to the dignity of the ſtate of Rome. "Since the requiſitions of the Jews (ſaid Agrippa) are ſo reaſonable, from a regard to common juſtice, and a reſpect to their ſovereign, I pronounce a full ratification of the privileges, which, by a previous grant, they have an undoubted right to claim; and I promiſe, that as long as they continue within the limits of good order, the neceſſary meaſures ſhall be taken for guarding them againſt future vexations of this kind." Having delivered this ſpeech, Agrippa diſſolved the aſſembly; and, in the name of the whole nation, Herod expreſſed the warmeſt acknowledgments to him for his generous conduct. After a mutual profeſſion of friendſhip, theſe princes departed from Leſbos.

Herod, arriving at Jeruſalem, communicates to the people a ſtate of his tranſactions.

Herod embarked for Cæſarea, and having the advantage of a favourable wind, he ſoon reached that place; and in a few days afterwards he arrived at Jeruſalem. He iſſued a proclamation for an aſſembly of the people, at which the ſtrangers as well as citizens were to attend. He related to the multitude the principal incidents which had occurred during his late expedition, repreſenting the reſolutions whereby Agrippa had ſecured the perſonal liberty of, and the free exerciſe of religion to, the Jews inhabiting Aſia. He obſerved, that during his government, the people had been in a ſtate of proſperity, and that their future welfare ſuperſeded every other conſideration. As a proof of his regard, he excuſed them from one fourth part of the tribute which they had been uſed to pay. The loud and unanimous acclamations of the multitude proved that they were gratefully ſenſible of their ſovereign's generoſity.

CHAP. V.

SALOME and PHERORAS, by ſlanderous Inſinuations, raiſe the Indignation of HEROD againſt his two Sons. He appoints his Son ANTIPATER to ſucceed him in the Government. ANTIPATER accompanies HEROD on a Viſit to AGRIPPA at ROME.

Conſpiracy of Salome.

SALOME, the ſiſter of Herod, entertained an irreconcileable enmity towards Alexander and Ariſtobulus, the ſons of Herod by his wife Mariamne, and, inſpired with confidence by the ſucceſsful manner in which her injurious repreſentations had operated with regard to their mother, ſhe determined to proſecute a deſign ſhe had conceived for effecting the deſtruction of the princes, leſt they ſhould revenge the death of the queen. The conſpiracy was carried on againſt the young princes with the greater appearance of juſtice as they had ſhewn many inſtances of diſreſpect towards their father, being induced thereto partly by an abhorrence of the cruelty exerciſed upon their mother, and partly by the ambitious deſire of ſupplanting their father in the government.

Diſſenſions in Herod's family.

The ſons openly vented the moſt bitter reproaches upon Salome and her brother Pheroras; and, on the other hand, they uttered reflections equally rancorous, but conveyed in a more artful and cautious manner. The princes being inflamed with paſſion, in the natural ſimplicity of their hearts, declared their ſentiments without reſerve: but the others exerciſed their malice with more circumſpection, employing every ſtratagem they could ſuggeſt for betraying their adverſaries into ſuch extravagance of expreſſion as they might take advantage of. The princes declared that they conſidered it an honour to have derived their exiſtence from ſo excellent a queen as Mariamne, who, they inſiſted, had been barbarouſly murdered. This declaration was taken advantage of by their enemies, who propagated it ſo aſſiduouſly, that it ſoon became the prevailing ſubject of converſation among the people, the generality of whom, however, lamented the indiſcretion of the young men, in ſuffering their paſſions to precipitate them into ſuch deſperate liberties of ſpeech. The youths were frequently heard to lament their own fate as only inferior in miſery to that of their deceaſed mother; for that they were compelled to live with thoſe who had embrued their hands in her blood, and that they were, therefore, partakers in ſome meaſure, of their iniquity.

Artful deſigns of Pheroras and Salome againſt the two ſons of Herod.

The abſence of Herod was a circumſtance exceedingly favourable to the conſpiracy. A ſhort time having elapſed after the return of the king, Salome and Pheroras, with a well affected plauſibility, inſinuated to him, that it was neceſſary he ſhould guard againſt the danger which threatened him in the perſons of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, who had publicly licly denounced vengeance againſt the murderers of their mother; and they falſely repreſented, that through the intereſt of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, they expected to compel Herod to abide the event of a judicial enquiry before the emperor. Herod was induced to place more confidence in theſe inſinuations as they were frequently repeated, and communicated to him through a variety of channels. He reflected on the unhappy ſituation to which he had already been reduced by diſſenſions in his family, and lamented that theſe diſagreements had proved deſtructive to his moſt valuable friendſhips, and deprived him of a wife, towards whom he entertained the moſt tender affection. He recalled to his imagination the events which had occurred, and thence pictured in idea what might probably enſue in the preſent inſtance; and the proſpect was ſo alarming as nearly to drive him to a ſtate of diſtraction. His foreign concerns proved ſucceſsful to the utmoſt extent of his moſt ſanguine hopes, while thoſe of a domeſtic nature were involved in all the difficulties which could unite to render him completely miſerable. It is to be queſtioned whether his ſplendid ſtation in the world was a ſufficient counterbalance to the diſorders which prevailed in his family, and whether he would not have enjoyed a greater ſhare of happineſs in a private ſtation, than he experienced while ſurrounded with all the magnificence annexed to the regal character.

Antipater is ſet up by Herod in oppoſition to Alexander and Ariſtobulus.

Herod remained ſome time under great embarraſſment, not knowing what courſe it would be moſt eligible to purſue in the diſtracted ſtate of his affairs; but at length he reſolved to receive into his family a ſon, named Antipater, who he had cauſed to be privately educated, and to entertain the youth with particular reſpect; judging that ſuch conduct would prove a check to the ambition of his other ſons. Agreeable to this intention he inveſted Antipater with conſiderable authority, and repoſed great truſt in him, ſignifying by his whole behaviour towards him, that he meant the youth to be his ſucceſſor in the government. In the particular diſtinction which Herod ſhewed to Antipater, his whole view was to reduce the inſolence of Mariamne's ſons, who he imagined would, when they were convinced that there was no want of a ſucceſſor to the government, be more obſervant of their duty; but, contrary to his original deſign, he afterwards conferred upon him the regal dignity. The reſpect which was ſhewn to Antipater ſerved to inflame rather than appeaſe the paſſions of the brothers, who conſidered the deference paid to him as an affront offered to themſelves.

His artifices to ſupplant the two brothers.

Antipater determined to preſerve the conſequence he had ſo unexpectedly obtained; and for effecting this purpoſe he had recourſe to malevolent inſinuations, expecting thereby to alienate from his brothers the ſtill remaining affection of Herod. He aſſumed the utmoſt appearance of candour and good will, but at the ſame time laboured to effect the ruin of the brothers, by means of agents who were eſteemed by the king, and who he was convinced would eaſily prevail upon his credulous temper to put full confidence in their miſrepreſentations; and this deſign was attended with the deſired ſucceſs; for Herod was inſpired with an averſion which ſoon increaſed to an implacable degree. Alexander and Ariſtobulus, being greatly affected by the indignities they endured, with tears lamented their unhappy fate; at other times, in the anguiſh of their hearts, they appealed to the manes of their innocent mother, and bitterly reflected upon their father as the author of the grievances they ſuſtained. The adherents of Antipater availed themſelves of the advantage which the ungovernable paſſions of the princes afforded, and, with every poſſible aggravation, repreſented their intemperate behaviour to Herod, who, being ſtill more violently inflamed againſt them, reſolved to convince them of his indignation by heaping additional honours upon Antipater. The artifices which Antipater employed, prevailed upon Herod to ſend for his mother to court, and to write letters on behalf of himſelf, recommending him to Cæſar in terms of the greateſt reſpect.

Herod gives credit to their inſinuations.

Agrippa, after having held the adminiſtration for the ſpace of ten years in Aſia, ſet out on his return to Rome; and Herod embarked, in order to meet and compliment him on the way, taking with him many valuable preſents, and being accompanied by Antipater, the other ſons being denied the honour of engaging with him in this voyage. Herod requeſted Agrippa that Antipater might be permitted to accompany him to Rome, and that he would preſent him to Cæſar, to whom he ſent rich preſents for the purpoſe of obtaining for his ſon a favourable reception. Herod's conduct on this occaſion was with a view to give Antipater a diſtinction above his brothers.

Agrippa returns to Rome with Antipater.

CHAP. VI.

HEROD exhibits Accuſations before CÆSAR againſt his Sons ALEXANDER and ARISTOBULUS.

Malevolent conduct of Antipater againſt the two ſons of Mariamne.

HEROD having furniſhed his ſon with recommendatory letters to his friends at Rome, Antipater derived additional conſequence from his voyage to that capital. In his preſent ſituation, however, he was unhappy in having no longer the opportunity of gratifying his rancour againſt the ſons of Mariamne by injurious repreſentations to Herod, who he apprehended might be prevailed upon to treat them with leſs rigour. He was determined to omit no meaſures which he ſuppoſed would operate to the diſadvantage of Alexander and Ariſtobulus; and, therefore, under the pretext of an extreme ſolicitude for his father's ſafety, he wrote letters containing ſuch ſuch malicious charges, as induced Herod to conſider the unfortunate brothers as his moſt inveterate enemies: and the ultimate view of his iniquitous proceedings was, to obtain poſſeſſion of the government.

Herod exhibits accuſations before Cæſar of their attempt to deſtroy him.

Herod determined, leſt the violence of his diſpleaſure ſhould tranſport him into any raſh or unjuſt proceedings againſt his ſons, to repair to Rome, and exhibit complaints againſt them before Cæſar. Upon his arrival at Rome, he found that Cæſar was not in that city; he therefore proceeded to Aquileia, and having obtained permiſſion to ſubmit his unhappy cauſe to the deciſion of the emperor, he produced his two ſons, and accuſed them of diſobedience, and an attempt to deprive him of life by poiſon, urging, that the ambition of obtaining poſſeſſion of the government had inſpired them with the horrid and unnatural deſign of putting their father to death. He ſaid their malice was ſo inveterate, that, though defeated in their rebellious attempt upon the crown, they would ſtill enjoy a cruel ſatisfaction in the inhuman murder of their father. He mentioned the ſpace of time he had endured the diſobedience of his ſons, ſaying that now, in the laſt extremity, he was compelled to the cruel neceſſity of ſubmitting his cauſe to the determination of Cæſar. "What act of my life (ſaid he) has rendered me deſerving the treatment I have experienced from theſe young men? Towards whom have I been guilty of injuſtice? On what pretext can any man preſume to diſpoſſeſs a prince of the authority, in the due exerciſe of which he has been ſo long eſtabliſhed, and which he has obtained by ſuch unwearied aſſiduity, and imminent hazards? Is it reaſonable that I ſhould be denied the liberty of nominating my ſucceſſor? Eſpecially ſince Cæſar has been pleaſed to grant me the right of beſtowing the crown upon ſuch of my iſſue as ſhall approve himſelf moſt worthy the regal dignity? The power which I have an undoubted right to exerciſe of exalting the fortunes of that ſon who ſhall diſtinguiſh himſelf by a pious regard to his duty, muſt ſurely be conſidered as a motive to a generous emulation in worthy deeds. But whoever deſires to obtain the authority of his father, muſt wiſh that father dead, becauſe while he ſurvives he cannot ſucceed to his ſtation. They cannot pretend that I have been deficient in my duty towards them, either as a gracious prince, or an indulgent parent. Can they aſſert that I have not been liberal in my allowance of every gratification they could reaſonably require, either in point of magnificence equal to their ſtation in life, amuſement, and every other matter that might contribute to their happineſs? Have I not endeavoured to promote their fortunes, by eſpouſing them to princeſſes of the moſt diſtinguiſhed rank? I have married Alexander to the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and Ariſtobulus to the daughter of my own ſiſter. As a ſtill more remarkable inſtance of kindneſs to theſe refractory youths, I have waved my authority both as a king and father, and putting myſelf on terms of equality with my children and ſubjects, thus appeal to the imperial majeſty of Cæſar, requeſting that his wiſdom will award a due puniſhment to ſuch enormous offenders, and thereby relieve me from the apprehenſion of paſſing the remainder of my days in the dreadful anxiety occaſioned by the reſtleſs ambition of theſe youths, who have merited to be for ever ſecluded from beholding the light of the ſun, as an equitable retribution of the daring violation of the rights of human nature and ſociety, of which they juſtly ſtand accuſed."

The princes are much affected at the charge brought by their father.

Herod delivered the above ſpeech with conſiderable warmth: and while he was ſpeaking the princes frequently wept; but upon the concluſion of his addreſs, their grief was expreſſed by a torrent of tears: it is not, however, to be underſtood that they were affected by a conſciouſneſs of guilt, but rather by an honourable ſenſe of filial piety, upon being ſo heavily accuſed by their father, and by the conſideration that their afflicting ſituation compelled them to the neceſſity of oppoſing their father, or to the no leſs unhappy extreme of forfeiting every pretenſion to a rectitude of principle. Thus grievouſly diſtreſſed and embarraſſed, they lamented their fate in ſighs and tears, but made no attempt to plead in their own defence. Cæſar put a juſt conſtruction upon their behaviour, attributing their diffidence not to a ſenſe of criminality, but to their being unuſed to addreſs ſo formidable an aſſembly: and the ſame ſentiments were entertained by the auditors, who unanimouſly compaſſionated the young princes, and even Herod himſelf was greatly affected.

CHAP. VII.

ALEXANDER pleads in Behalf of ARISTOBULUS and himſelf: and CÆSAR pronounces them both innocent. HEROD meets the King of CAPPADOCIA at ELEUSA. He aſſembles a Council at JERUSALEM, and appoints ANTIPATER to ſucceed him in the Government.

Alexander's defence.

WHEN the grief of the princes was ſomewhat moderated, they obſerved that Cæſar was greatly affected, that many of the auditors wept in pity of their calamities, and that even the heart of their father was ſoftened towards them. Judging this to be a favourable opportunity, Alexander, who was the eldeſt, pleaded his own cauſe and that of Ariſtobulus.

The audience pity the young princes;

When the charge was exhibited againſt the princes, Cæſar judged it to be of too extraordinary a nature to be founded in juſtice, and this opinion was confirmed by Alexander's addreſs, during the delivery of which he obſerved Herod to be greatly affected. The auditors entertained very unfavourable ſentiments of Herod for proceeding to ſo violent an accuſation; and being greatly prejudiced in favour of the youths by their engaging perſons, the moderation of their reply, and the exact propriety of their whole deportment, they unanimouſly reſolved to render them every friendly office in their power. After a pauſe, during which the princes waited the iſſue of their cauſe with their eyes caſt down, and other inſtances of a depreſſion of ſpirits, Cæſar addreſſed the aſſembly in a ſpeech, purporting that the ſons were deſerving ſome degree of cenſure for the intemperate expreſſions which had given riſe to their father's jealouſy; but that he pronounced them innocent of the offence alledged againſt them. He mentioned diſſenſions between a father and his children as a misfortune of great magnitude, and recommended the parties to ſink all animoſities in oblivion, and manifeſt their entire reconciliation by mutual confidence and a conſtant interchange of friendly offices. Cæſar now intimated by a ſign that the ſons were to come forward; and, with features which expreſſed the anguiſh of their minds, and the utmoſt humility of deportment, they obeyed, and were preparing to throw themſelves at the feet of their father, but he prevented them, and taking them in his arms, embraced them with great tenderneſs and affection.

and Cæſar pronounces them innocent

This inſtance of tenderneſs in Herod was equally unexpected and ſatisfactory to the whole court. Having made due acknowledgments to Cæſar, Herod departed, accompanied by Alexander, Ariſtobulus, and Antipater, the latter affecting an exceſs of joy on occaſion of the happy agreement.

Herod is reconciled to his children; and gives Auguſtus 300 talents.

Some days ſubſequent to the reconciliation between Herod and his ſons, Auguſtus gave an entertainment to the people; and at this time Herod made the emperor a preſent of three hundred talents, in return for which Cæſar granted him a moiety of the profits ariſing from the mines of Cyprus, and full power of diſpoſing of the reſidue of the income: he alſo confirmed the right of appointing a ſucceſſor to the government in the ſon whom he ſhould moſt approve, or dividing the government between them, at his own diſcretion: but theſe liberties were granted on the condition that he ſhould maintain the natural authority of a father over his children, and the ſovereignty of his kingdom, during the term of his life.

A rebellion at Trachonitis ſuppreſſed.

Thus were matters circumſtanced when Herod and his three ſons proceeded on their return to Judæa. During the abſence of Herod, the people of Trachonitis, who formed a conſiderable part of his ſubjects, engaged in a rebellion: but the vigilant and ſpirited behaviour of the officers to whom the king had entruſted the management of public affairs, reſtored them to allegiance. At Eleuſa, a city in Cilicia, now called Sebaſte, Herod and his ſons met Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, who expreſſed much ſatisfaction on the re-eſtabliſhment of a friendly underſtanding in the family of Herod, and the honourable acquittal which his ſon-in-law Alexander had experienced on the trial. The reception which Archelaus gave to Herod was truly hoſpitable and generous; and theſe kings parted after an exchange of preſents, and reciprocal profeſſions of friendſhip.

Herod aſſembles the people, nominates Antipater for his ſucceſſor, and recommends obedience.

Upon the arrival of Herod at Jeruſalem, he ſummoned the people to aſſemble in the temple, and related to them an account of his late expedition, particularizing the ſeveral honours which had been conferred upon him by Cæſar, and dwelling upon other paſſages which he was deſirous to impreſs upon their minds: he then adverted to his ſons, and recommended unanimity and moderation to the court and his ſubjects in general. He then pronounced Antipater to be his ſucceſſor in the government, which was to devolve from him to Alexander, and then to Ariſtobulus. "During the term of my life (ſaid he) you are to acknowledge myſelf only as your ſovereign. I make this declaration to the ſeveral perſons of my family, my officers civil and military, and my ſubjects in general. Age produces experience, whereby men are inſtructed in wiſdom; my increaſe of years, therefore, rather than proving an obſtacle, will render me more equal to the important duties of adminiſtration." He concluded with exhorting his people ſteadily to preſerve their allegiance, as the moſt certain means of ſecurity and happineſs. He now diſmiſſed the aſſembly. The majority of the people were perfectly ſatisfied with his conduct, but many were apprehenſive that the deſire which they conceived the ſons would reſpectively entertain of being advanced to the throne would prove the ſource of future troubles.

CHAP. VIII.

The Dedication of CÆSAREA. HEROD rebuilds the Temple of the PYTHIAN APOLLO. An annual Allowance made out of his own Revenue, for the Support of the OLYMPIC Games.

Cæſarea finiſhed, and dedicated with great pomp.

IN the tenth year after laying the foundation of Cæſarea, that city was completely finiſhed, which happened in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of Herod, and in the Olympiad one hundred and ninety-two. No degree of ſplendor or magnificence was omitted to celebrate the dedication of this city: perſons who profeſſed the ſeveral faculties and exerciſes of all kinds, and thoſe too the moſt excellent in their various ways, were procured from different parts of the country. Among theſe were muſicians, wreſtlers, ſwordſmen, and others of like kinds; and theſe were appointed to play for prizes in their ſeveral arts and profeſſions. There were likewiſe a number of horſe-races, and exhibitions of various kinds of wild beaſts, together with a great variety of other ſhows and entertainments, ſuch as were then in faſhion, either in Rome or other places. It was to the honour of Cæſar that this ſolemnity was inſtituted, and it obtained the name of Cer-

The quinquennial exerciſes.

tamen Quinquennale, implying, that the exhibition of the ſpectacles was to be renewed every fifth year. The expence that the king incurred, in the procuring of curioſities of all kinds, and bringing them from places more or leſs diſtant, for the furniſhing out of this ſplendid ſpectacle, was aſtoniſhingly great; excluſive of which, Julia, the wife of Cæſar, contributed very largely towards it on her own account, and cauſed a variety of curioſities to be brought out of Italy; ſo that the whole of her gifts on that occaſion were reckoned at about five hundred talents. Motives of curioſity induced incredible numbers of people to flock thither on this occaſion: many embaſſadors came from diſtant places to pay their reſpects to Herod, all of whom were ſplendidly entertained, genteelly treated, and every way accommodated at the king's expence; their diverſions conſiſting of public ſhows by day, and, in the evening, of the moſt elegant feaſting and exhibitions of mirth, all which was conducted in ſuch a manner as to do the higheſt honour to the character of Herod, as a prince of ſplendid taſte, and the moſt liberal diſpoſition. In a word, he affected, on this occaſion, to exceed all preceding inſtances of his liberality; and to eclipſe the glory of all his former actions, by the ſingular ſplendor attendant upon the latter. In remark on this part of Herod's character, both Cæſar and Agrippa have frequently ſaid to their ſurrounding friends, that it was to be lamented that both Syria and Egypt were not under his juriſdiction; for that the ambition of his mind was too great to be gratified with the government of Judæa, and the limited revenues ariſing from the command of that province.

Cæſar and Agrippa commend Herod's magnanimity.

Herod builds Antipatris.

After the cloſe of all the mirth, gaiety, and pomp attendant on this feſtival, Herod applied himſelf to the building of another city, on a plain named Capharſaba, a ſituation moſt elegantly choſen; for it had all the advantages ariſing from the happy combination of wood and water: being almoſt ſurrounded by a delightful river, and having a fine grove with a plantation of the moſt curious trees, in its neighbourhood. To this city he gave the name of Antipatris, in honour of his father Antipater: and not long afterwards he cauſed a caſtle to be erected beyond Jericho, on which he beſtowed the name of Cypron, in pious remembrance of his mother: this place was exceedingly well built and fortified, and was ſingularly pleaſant and agreeable in its ſituation. Nor did Herod forget to celebrate his regard for his beloved brother, ſince he erected ſeveral ſplendid and monumental ſtructures, which he dedicated to his memory; and among the reſt he cauſed a tower to be conſtructed within the city, to which he gave the name of Phaſael; and this was as ſtrong, and as extenſive a building as the Pharos of Alexandria: in the next place he built a town on the north ſide of the valley of Jericho, which likewiſe received the ſame name. Hitherto the adjacent country, which had been altogether abandoned, was ſoon ſtocked with a competent number of inhabitants, and received the name of the province of the Phaſaelites.

His great liberality.

To recite the hiſtory of the bounties of Herod would be a moſt tedious taſk. He was, in every place, and on all occaſions, a pattern of liberality. In Syria, in Greece, and, in fact, whereever his buſineſs or inclination led him, he uſed to furniſh aids to ſome perſons, to promote the advancement of public works for others; and to ſupply money where it was wanted, for the perfecting of ſuch ſchemes as had been begun, and could not otherwiſe be completed.

Temple of the Pythian Apollo.

One of the moſt ſuperb and magnificent of all his undertakings remains yet to be ſpoken of; which is the temple of the Pythian Apollo at Rhodes. This Herod rebuilt at his own particular expence, and preſented the people of Rhodes with a very conſiderable number of talents of gold, to be by them expended in the building of a number of ſhips. He gave likewiſe an immenſe ſum of money towards the repairing and beautifying ſeveral public buildings in the city of Nicopolis near Actium, which had been originally built by Cæſar. In Antioch, which is the largeſt city in all Syria, he cauſed two galleries to be erected, which had a walk between them, and extended the whole breadth of the city. Theſe galleries were ornamented in the moſt curious manner, and a pavement of ſmooth poliſhed ſtone covered the ſtreets. The convenience of the inhabitants, and the ſplendid appearance of the city, were equally conſulted in theſe elegant improvements.

The Olympic games.

When the ſeveral works above-mentioned were completed, Herod allotted a conſiderable ſum annually, out of his own revenue, towards ſupporting the expences of the Olympic games, which for ſome time paſt had been evidently in a declining ſtate, as they had not been ſupplied with ſums equal to the defraying the charges of ſacrifices, and other expenſive ceremonies, proper on the meeting of ſuch numbers as uſed to aſſemble on occaſions of this kind: and Herod acquired the name of a perpetual maſter of the revels, on account of the liberality he exerted in this particular inſtance.

The contradictorineſs in Herod's character accounted for.

Notwithſtanding this ſeeming greatneſs and dignity of Herod's conduct, his general character appears to be a compound of the moſt abſolute contradictions: perhaps no man ever was, in all reſpects, ſo perfect an oppoſite to himſelf. If his liberality in general caſes be conſidered, and the external appearance he made of an inclination to do good to all mankind, it would ſeem but reaſonable to conclude that he was one of the moſt generous men that ever exiſted. On the contrary, if we reflect but for a moment on the extreme rigour, and even barbarity, of ſome of his proceedings, even towards his neareſt relations, as well as in reſpect of his ſubjects in general, it will ſcarcely be denied that he acted as if he was void of pity and ſhame, and loſt to all the finer feelings of humanity. Now conſidering Herod in theſe various lights, it ſeems but natural to conclude that he was a man actuated by different, and even oppoſite paſſions; but I own that I rather incline to the the opinion that he had one uniform and ſteady principle, by which all his actions were regulated. As he was exceedingly ambitious of honour, a paſſion which ſeemed to abſorb all the other faculties of his ſoul, he had recourſe to every ſpecies of magnificence, in order to procure the end he ſought for, which was nothing leſs than the poſſeſſion of ſingular renown in this life, and the hope of leaving an immortal fame behind him.

Ill effects from his avarice of fame.

The wiſh to be thus ſingularly diſtinguiſhed, made him extravagant beyond the bounds of his income, and, of courſe, he loaded his ſubjects with heavy burdens; for the equitable and legal mode of taxation was by no means equal to the ſupport of his extravagant and ſuperfluous expences. He ſoon became ſenſible that his oppreſſions were a ſource of perpetual ill-will to himſelf, and that it was not eaſy to allay the ſeditious diſcontents which rankled in the breaſts of his people: he plainly ſaw, that in order to do this, he muſt either retrench his expences in a very conſiderable degree, or be contented with a much more limited revenue; neither of which was agreeable to his inclinations; ſo that the only method he now had left, was to improve the ill-will of his people to his own advantage; and this he effected, firſt by provoking them beyond all the bounds of patience, and then puniſhing them for complaining, as if they had been his moſt inveterate enemies: and he proceeded in this tyrannical manner, equally with regard to friends or foes, to relations or to ſtrangers; being firmly reſolved to ſupport and maintain his authority in every inſtance whatever. It is likewiſe remarkable in his conduct, that he intended to hint by the honours and diſtinctions he paid to others, what kind of treatment it was that he expected himſelf: to inſtance in the caſes of Cæſar and Agrippa, and the reſt of his friends of high rank; his view was to inſinuate that his behaviour towards them, ſhould furniſh an example of the adulation he wiſhed his own ſubjects to pay him. The turn and diſpoſition of his mind is ſufficiently marked in this particular part of his conduct. Now Herod's mode of proceeding in the homage he paid to his ſuperiors, was by no means proper to furniſh a precedent for the Jews to copy; ſince it was a mode of acting diametrically oppoſite to their laws and practices; for the turn of their education was ſuch, that they were taught obedience from motives of conſcience, without any regard to their own intereſt, or any wiſh for the gratifications that the poſſeſſion of power could beſtow. By this reſtraint they were very conſiderable loſers: for could they have ſubmitted to the vulgar arts of flattery, they would not have failed to have inſinuated themſelves into the good graces of the king, by the pompous dedications of ſtatues and temples, by which they might eaſily have gratified the vanity of a man whoſe whole ſoul was abſorbed in views of ambition. What has been urged above, I conceive, will enable us to form a true judgment of Herod's character, and explain the cauſe why he behaved with ſuch extreme liberality and benevolence towards ſtrangers, while his own ſubjects felt the weight of that cruelty which he was perpetually exerciſing towards them.

Secret motives of his actions.

CHAP. IX.

CÆSAR is petitioned by the GREEKS againſt the JEWS. The Privileges of the JEWS confirmed by CÆSAR.

AT this time the Jews reſiding in Aſia, and likewiſe thoſe who dwelt at Cyrene in Africa, were treated in the moſt cruel manner by the Greeks; nor was there either end to their oppreſſions, or moderation in their proceedings; and the whole was done on the pretence that the Jews carried away their money out of the country, and were exceedingly troubleſome to the Greeks in other reſpects. Now as the Jews had been favoured by former kings with the free privileges and rights of citizens, having been granted the ſame immunities to which the natives themſelves had a claim; the Greeks laid hold of this opportunity to ſend embaſſadors, with a complaint and petition to Cæſar, appealing to him againſt the Jews. In anſwer hereto Cæſar ſent back a letter to the provinces, importing that, "It was his ſovereign will and pleaſure, that all the privileges the Jews had heretofore enjoyed ſhould be ſtill continued to them."

Embaſſy to Cæſar of the Cyrenian and Aſiatic Jews.

CHAP. X.

Family Diſſenſions reſulting from HEROD's riſling the Sepulchre of DAVID. Sacrilegious Attempt of his Guards puniſhed. Hypocriſy of ANTIPATER, and Fallacy of the King's Relations. HEROD's Jealouſy, Oppreſſion, and Cruelty, followed by a State of remedileſs Horror and Miſery.

HEROD's taſte for ſplendor and magnificence in buildings, and other expenſive works, had occaſioned his ſquandering away immenſe ſums of money, both at home and abroad, and he was in want of more to ſupply his demands, when he was informed that his predeceſſor Hyrcanus had paid a viſit to the ſepulchre of David, and had at one time taken away from thence no leſs a ſum than three thouſand talents of ſilver; but that there was ſtill a ſufficient quantity left to anſwer the purpoſe of any future viſitant.

Herod reflected on this circumſtance for a conſiderable time, and often revolved it ſeriouſly in his mind, before he formed any reſolution of what he propoſed to do in the affair: but having at length come to a determination, he communicated his intentions to a few perſons, in whoſe care and fidelity he could place the moſt abſolute confidence; and taking theſe truſty friends with him, he proceeded by night to the ſepulchre, pulchre, which they entered with all poſſible ſecrecy and circumſpection, to keep the knowledge of this adventure from the people. In this depoſitory he found immenſe quantities of rich plate, and variety of veſſels, both of gold and ſilver, all which his companions carried off with them: but as to the ready money that he expected to have met with, his ſearch after it was in vain, for this had been previouſly made booty of by Hyrcanus.

David's ſepulchre ranſacked for wealth.

Two of Herod's men killed by lightning.

Herod's ſucceſs, however, was conſiderable enough to induce him to make a ſtricter ſearch than he had at firſt intended; on which he proceeded ſtill farther into the vault, till he came to the place in which were depoſited the coffins containing the bodies of David and Solomon. The hiſtory which we have of this affair informs us, that a flaſh of fire ſuddenly broke out of the receſs, and killed two of Herod's guards on the ſpot; which was looked upon as an evident denunciation of the vengeance of Heaven, and ſent as a puniſhment for the wicked temerity, and glaring impiety of the action. Herod was ſo aſtoniſhed and terrified at this apparent token of the divine wrath, that partly through his fear, and partly from motives of conſcience, he immediately abandoned the farther proſecution of his deſign. He likewiſe came to a reſolution to atone, in ſome meaſure, for the ſacrilege of which he had been guilty, and thereupon determined to erect a moſt ſuperb and ſtately monument of white marble, to block up the very entrance into the ſepulchre; and ſoon afterwards he gave orders for the forwarding of this work, which was accordingly carried into execution.

Nicolaus the hiſtoriographer reproved.

A writer who lived when theſe things happened, named Nicolaus, makes mention of the erecting of the abovementioned monument of marble, but he does not recite a ſingle circumſtance of the king's deſcent into, and robbery of the vault, which it is probable he looked upon to be ſo diſgraceful, profane, and impious an undertaking, that he was unwilling or afraid to make it publicly known; for as he was a contemporary with Herod, who was not unacquainted with what he wrote, he was under a kind of neceſſity of recording only ſuch circumſtances as might gratify the king; ſuch, in fact, as redounded to his honour; and of omitting ſuch as would have proved only the teſtimony of his vices. The method, then, in which this writer proceeded, was either to omit all account of the king's moſt glaring, notorious, and extravagant cruelties; or, when that could not be ſo properly done, to diſguiſe and palliate them; ſo that the enormity of the crime ſeems to be loſt by his mode of relating the circumſtances of it. In this manner it is that he ſpeaks of the murder of Mariamne, and the outrageous and unprecedented indignities that were offered to her ſons; for he artfully inſinuates that the queen had been guilty of a violation of her huſband's bed; and intimates that the princes had concerted the deſtruction of their father's life! And this is his method of proceeding in every part of his writings; either to extenuate the king's crimes, or paſs over in total ſilence whatever he did amiſs, and to extol his more worthy actions beyond all the bounds of credibility. Nicolaus, however, has this to boaſt, that if he did not write a faithful and authentic hiſtory, he compiled an admirable volume of panegyric: to ſum up all in a few words, it may be ſaid that his writings were all rather calculated to gratify the diſpoſition of his patron, than to convey to poſterity a faithful account of the tranſactions of his times.

Joſephus came of the prieſtly line of the Aſmonæans.

Having ſaid thus much in cenſure of a former writer, it becomes me to declare reſpecting myſelf, that having the honour to be deſcended in the royal Aſmonæan line, and being likewiſe in the race of the prieſthood, I ſhall ſcorn to report matters otherwiſe than as I find them recorded on the faithful page of hiſtory; with all proper reſpect and reverence, however, to the deſcendents of Herod; but yet with a greater and more perfect reſpect to the ſacred and immutable laws of truth: for I would by no means forfeit my character for integrity, nor willingly ſtain the page of this hiſtory by the inſertion of a ſingle falſhood.

Diſcords in Herod's houſe.

From the period abovementioned, when Herod broke into, and ſacrilegiouſly robbed the ſepulchre of the valuable treaſure there depoſited, he became daily more and more unhappy in his domeſtic concerns: every thing went wrong in his family, as if a judicial vengeance had taken place againſt that part of it who had previouſly ſhewn the badneſs of their diſpoſition; and as if heaven was determined to puniſh the flagitious and enormous wickedneſs of which the king had been guilty, by new and unuſual diſtreſſes. A kind of civil war raged throughout the whole houſe, and while ſome were open and outrageous in their violent oppoſition, the reſt carried on and promoted their treacherous deſigns by all the ſecret arts of calumny and detraction. But the moſt extraordinary conduct was that of Antipater, whoſe artifice and hypocriſy was of the moſt finiſhed kind: for while, on the one hand, he ſuborned practices againſt his brothers, which might make them appear obnoxious in the eyes of Herod, he on the other hand became an advocate with the king in their behalf, endeavouring to palliate what they had done, and, under this double diſguiſe, more effectually to work their ruin. So refined was this diſſimulation of Antipater, and ſo artfully did he work on the paſſions of the king by his wily conduct, that Herod ſoon began to conſider him as the only faithful friend he had in the world; in fact, the only one who wiſhed to ſerve him from motives purely diſintereſted. Impreſſed with this idea of the worthineſs of Antipater's conduct, Herod gave directions to his prime miniſter Ptolemy to conſult with Antipater, and take his opinion in all affairs reſpecting the ſtate of the government: and the latter was no ſooner furniſhed with the neceſſary ſecrets, than he uſed immediately to impart them to his mother; and then they concerted matters together, ſo as to diſpoſe of all affairs as beſt ſuited their own inclinations: by this kind of management the enmity and eſteem of the king were made to anſwer the ſame purpoſe; and, whatever his intentions might be, the intereſt of Antipater and his mother were ſure to be promoted.

Antipater's craft and duplicity.

On the contrary, Alexander and Ariſtobulus, who were men of ambitious ſpirits, and extremely jealous of their honour, loſt all patience when they reflected on theſe proceedings; nor could they for a moment endure the idea of being degraded ſo exceedingly below their birth, and the being inſulted by thoſe who were in all reſpects their inferiors: nor were their wives agitated with paſſions leſs violent than thoſe which rankled in the breaſts of their huſbands: and Glaphyra conceived a mortal enmity againſt Salome, not only on account of the love that ſhe entertained for her huſband Alexander, but through the pique natural to a female mind, on ſeeing the daughter of Salome, who was married to Ariſtobulus, advanced to a level with herſelf, and qualified to rank with her on all occaſions.

Variance and jealouſies among the women.

Theſe were only a part of the diſtreſſes of Herod's family; for about the ſame time there happened another very unfortunate circumſtance, by which Pheroras, the brother of the king, became engaged in the diſagreeable contention: and this was at length improved to ſuch a degree, that in the end it increaſed to the utmoſt jealouſy and animoſity. Herod applied himſelf to Pheroras, to whom he voluntarily made an offer to give him his daughter in marriage: but the latter excuſed himſelf from accepting the intended favour, alledging as a reaſon this very extraordinary circumſtance, viz. that he was violently in love with his own ſervant-maid, and he could not bring himſelf to think of forming another attachment.

Pheroras refuſes the king's daughter offered him in marriage;

The king was exceedingly mortified at this refuſal, which affected him in much the greater degree, as it came from a brother to whom he had given very uncommon marks of his kindneſs and benevolence; and had even proceeded ſo far in the proof of his fraternal regard, as, in a great degree, to ſhare his government with him. Herod, however, finding all the inſtances of his generoſity thus requited, the propoſed offer he made his brother abſolutely rejected, and his own good intentions fruſtrated; and conceiving that there was no other way of reducing the brother to reaſon, he thereupon offered his daughter to the ſon of Phaſael, his elder brother, to whom, in a ſhort time afterwards, ſhe was married.

but is prevailed on by Ptolemy to conſent to a match with Herod's other daughter Cypras.

Some conſiderable time after this, Herod applied himſelf again to Pheroras, and having repreſented to him the indignity that had been offered him, by his refuſal of the former match, reſolved to give him yet another proof of his affection, by offering him in marriage his other daughter Cypras. Pheroras, having reflected for a while, as if to conſider how he ought to act, went to conſult Ptolemy on the ſubject: when the latter, without heſitation, told him, that if he had the leaſt regard to his own intereſt, he would not act ſo much like a madman, as to refuſe ſuch an offer from his brother and king: which refuſal would not only hazard his future fortune and peace of mind, but would occaſion the loſs of the king's favour, and make him an enemy, who had ſo long been a friend; and all this for the gratification of a lawleſs paſſion for one who was ſo greatly his inferior in point of rank. The counſel given by Ptolemy was too reaſonable for Pheroras not to accede to it: he therefore readily embraced his advice, and going to the king, beſought his pardon; engaging immediately to diſmiſs the woman with whom he was connected, and by whom he had one child. He likewiſe pledged his word of honour to the king, that within a month from that time, he would marry his daughter; offering to bind himſelf by an oath to the ratification of his promiſe; and, likewiſe, that he would never have any farther connection with the woman with whom he had heretofore cohabited.

Pheroras greatly provokes Herod by retracting his promiſe.

In the courſe of this month, however, Pheroras altered his ſentiments, relapſed into his former fit of fondneſs for the girl whom he had kept, and took her home to live with him as before. He went even farther than all this; for at the expiration of the month, he broke his good faith and pledged promiſes with his brother, in the moſt ſhameful manner, without the leaſt regard to all the oaths he had ſworn, and promiſes that he had made. The ſcandalous treatment offered to Herod by this mode of proceeding, inflamed his paſſions to ſo violent a degree, and left him ſo little the maſter of his own actions, that he could not forbear breaking out into the moſt intemperate language againſt his brother, whom he loaded with invectives ſuitable to the enormity of his crime: nor were there wanting a number of perſons malicious enough to lay hold of this circumſtance, which they improved to ſuch a degree, as to produce farther miſchief from an event already ſufficiently unfortunate. In a word, ſuch were the diſorders and uneaſineſſes perpetually ariſing in this unhappy family, that ſcarce a day or an hour paſſed, that did not produce ſomething to inflame the paſſions, pique the jealouſy, or raiſe the reſentments of the neareſt and moſt intimate friends and relations, who had every reaſon to live together in the moſt perfect love and harmony.

Salome intices her daughter to betray her huſband's ſecrets.

One ſtriking inſtance of this occurs in the following circumſtance: So inveterate and rancorous was the hatred of Salome to the ſons of Mariamne, that ſhe would not even permit her own daughter to enjoy, in peace and quietneſs, the conjugal converſation of her huſband Ariſtobulus; but was perpetually endeavouring to extract from her a particular account of the moſt intimate connections that had paſſed between them, in defiance of all the laws of decency and good manners: or if it happened at any time that they had not been on terms of the utmoſt cordiality (a caſe by no means uncommon in the married ſtate), ſhe never failed of doing all in her power to aggravate the differences between them, and making ſerious quarrels of what might have been otherwiſe deemed trifles. By a conſtant procedure of this kind, ſhe dived into the bottom of all their ſecrets; and, as opportunity offered, never failed to increaſe increaſe the diſcontent which already raged between them in too great a degree. She learnt from her daughter what the brothers had reported of Mariamne in private converſation; what ſevere reflections they made on the conduct of their father; and how they threatened that if ever they came to the throne, the ſons of their father by any other woman ſhould be diſpoſed of to mean and vulgar occupations, as moſt compatible with the inferiority of their education. The daughter likewiſe declared farther, that ſhe had heard the brothers ſay, that if ever they ſhould ſee any of Herod's wives adorned with the jewels that had belonged to their mother Mariamne, they would, without the leaſt degree of ceremony, put them up in ſackcloth, and depoſit them in ſuch ſecurity that they ſhould never again ſee the light.

Salome having made herſelf acquainted with all theſe particulars, was anxious till ſhe had imparted to the king the reſult of her enquiries: ſhe therefore loſt no time in ſeeking for Herod, to whom ſhe communicated every thing that had paſſed. Herod was exceedingly diſguſted with the information that ſhe gave him, but was yet willing to ſee if matters might not be rather adjuſted by amicable means, than carried to diſagreeable extremities. The different branches of the family inſpired the mind of Herod with ſuch a number of jealouſies and whims of various kinds, that at length he became fond of hearing their idle tales and calumnies of each other; and grew to be of ſo very credulous a diſpoſition, that he paid an almoſt implicit confidence to every thing that was told him: however, he contented himſelf, in the preſent inſtance, with ſeverely reprimanding his ſons for the unwarrantable liberties they had taken; and, on their making a proper ſubmiſſion, he was tolerably reconciled.

Pheroras inſinuates that Herod was in love with Glaphyra.

But the domeſtic diſtreſſes in which this unhappy family were involved, were ſtill farther aggravated by the following circumſtance. Pheroras ſought an occaſion of addreſſing himſelf privately to Alexander, the huſband of Glaphyra, to whom he related an odd kind of tale, which he ſaid Salome had told him, the ſubſtance of which was, that Herod had become moſt violently enamoured of Glaphyra, and that the paſſion preyed upon his mind to ſo great a degree, that he found it altogether impoſſible to live at eaſe. Now Alexander, who was by nature of a jealous diſpoſition, and ſubject to the impulſe of the moſt violent paſſions, was inflamed beyond all deſcription at this unexpected piece of information: ſo that, from that time forward, the ſlighteſt circumſtances furniſhed freſh food for his jealouſy; and every little favour that Herod thereafter conferred on Glaphyra, though for the ſake of his ſon, was by him conſtrued into a full proof of the reality of what Pheroras had told him.

Alexander's diſtreſs on this occaſion.

This imagination wrought ſo powerfully on the mind of Alexander, that at length, unable any longer to bear the weight of his own reflections, he repaired immediately to his father, and told him all the circumſtances of which he had been informed by Pheroras, while the tears flowed plentifully down his face as he related the melancholy tale. Previous to this, Herod had met with family misfortunes ſufficient to harrow up the peace of his mind; but this piece of information drove him almoſt to diſtraction. To be traduced by the imputation of ſo enormous a crime, and this by one of his own family too, was ſuch an ungrateful return for all the favours he had conferred upon them, that he could not think of the circumſtance with the leaſt degree of patience. In the firſt emotions of his grief, therefore, he diſpatched a meſſenger to Pheroras, commanding his immediate attendance: and he was no ſooner arrived, but Herod addreſſed him to the following purport:

Herod's paſſionate addreſs to Pheroras.

"Moſt baſe and ungrateful of all the ſons of men, what worſe than diabolical diſpoſition could inſpire thee with the idea of my being guilty of ſo enormous a crime; or by what phrenſy couldſt thou be impelled to report a thing ſo much to my diſhonour? But I perceive the malice of thy deſign to be ſimply this: under pretence of becoming the confidential friend of my ſon, thou haſt ſought to impreſs his mind with ſentiments that may induce him to conſpire againſt the life of his father: for is it poſſible for me to conceive that any ſon, unleſs his actions were reſtrained by the particular providence of heaven, could ſubmit to ſuch an indignity from a father, without ſeeking the proper means of revenge? But there appears to me to be no difference between thy preſent proceeding, and that of putting a ſword into the hands of my ſon, to take away the life of his own father. But let me aſk further, what particular end couldſt thou have in view? For I know that thou art equally an enemy to us both; and that while thou art ſeeking, by fair words to my face, to obtain my friendſhip, thou art calumniating me in my abſence in the baſeſt manner, and endeavouring to repreſent me as one of the moſt abandoned wretches exiſting. Be gone from my ſight, thou moſt ungrateful of men, who haſt been capable of behaving in ſo perfidious a manner to a brother that has been ſo kind to thee. I ſhall ſeek no other revenge than that of leaving thee to the ſtings of thy own conſcience, which will not fail to upbraid thee more effectually than I can do. I will endeavour to obtain the nobleſt ſuperiority over my relations by returning good for the evil they do me, and not follow thy example in returning evil for the good that has been received."

He accuſes Salome of being the author of the ſtory, which ſhe vehemently denies.

Pheroras being thus charged with the infamy of his conduct, in ſo open and explicit a manner, conceived that he had no way of exculpating himſelf, but by tranſferring the blame of the whole affair to Salome, and accuſing her with being, as in truth ſhe was, the original propagator of the ſcandalous ſtory. Now it happened that, at this time, Salome was within hearing of what paſſed: and finding herſelf thus accuſed, ſhe burſt forth into the moſt violent exclamations, attended with correſpondent actions and geſtures, ſaying that the whole tale was an infamous forgery, a malicious conſpiracy and contrivance, calculated to take away her life, in revenge for the affectionate zeal and regard ſhe had always expreſſed for the preſervation of that of the king, whom ſhe aſſerted to be, at that preſent moment, in a greater degree of danger than at any former period. "Pheroras (ſaid ſhe) is my moſt implacable enemy; for it was through my advice that he abandoned the worthleſs woman on whom he had fixed his affection, and was prevailed upon to marry the king's daughter: and this is the cauſe of his inveterate hatred againſt me." While ſhe was making this ſpeech, ſhe tore her hair, beat her breaſt, and otherwiſe acted as if inſpired by the moſt frantic rage, ſo that it was impoſſible not to conceive her very much in earneſt in what ſhe ſaid.

Embarraſſed ſituation of Pheroras.

During this addreſs to Salome, the pain of Pheroras is not to be expreſſed: he was agitated by a variety of contending paſſions, and involved between two difficulties that ſeemed equally great. He could not, with any degree of confidence, deny what he himſelf had ſaid to Alexander, nor was it in his power to prove what Salome had really ſaid to him. The diſputes between the contending parties were very violent, and continued for a conſiderable time; till at length Herod was tired with their debates, and as the evening began to advance, he diſmiſſed them both, and retired to his ſupper.

Salome's calumny expoſed.

When Herod came to reflect on all the circumſtances attending the above affair, he highly extolled his ſon's mode of proceeding, and conceived that the coming to him ſo frankly with a recital of the whole ſtory, diſplayed ſomething of a candour and integrity of conduct that was praiſeworthy. The effect of the above diſpute was, that Salome was univerſally reputed to have been the author of the calumny; and the king's wives were very ready to propagate the report that this was really the caſe: for her diſpoſition was ſuch, that ſhe had few friends: ſhe was of an unequal temper, fickle and changeable; ſometimes in good humour, and ſometimes violently angry, agreeable to the ruling influence of her paſſions: ſo that the women were very much her enemies; and being diſguſted by her conduct, were perpetually influencing Herod by ſtories to her diſadvantage: and an accident happened at this time extremely favourable to their machinations againſt her.

Syllæus the Arabian, deſiring Salome to wife;

At this period it happened that Obodas was king of Arabia. This prince was diſtinguiſhed by nothing but the ſloth and idleneſs of his diſpoſition. He paid no regard to any kind of public buſineſs; making the gratification of his own eaſe the whole care and conſideration of his life. Now the prime miniſter, who tranſacted all affairs under Obodas, was named Syllæus, who was a man of very diſtinguiſhed abilities, of admirable ſkill and addreſs, in the prime of life, and remarkable for the grace and elegance of his perſon. Syllæus having been ſent to Herod on affairs of public concern, had the honour to ſup with the king, when Salome happened to make one of the company. Struck with her perſon, and the manner of her behaviour, he conceived a particular affection for this princeſs; and having made ſome inquiries reſpecting her, and finding that ſhe was a widow, he ſoon afterwards ventured to addreſs her with a propoſal of marriage.

She favours his addreſs.

Salome, finding that her life grew daily more and more diſagreeable in her preſent ſituation, and being well pleaſed with the perſon and behaviour of Syllæus, took ſome time to reflect on the affair, and then ſeemed well diſpoſed to liſten to the propoſal. From this time forward the parties were frequently in company with each other; and as they became more intimately acquainted, all that paſſed between them ſeemed to be cloſely regarded by others. Their looks, their hints, their actions, and many other little circumſtances, were conſtrued as proofs of the growing amour. All that paſſed was immediately made known to the king; and the ladies of the court entertained themſelves highly with the particulars of the affair. Herod, however, was not fully convinced by what the women ſaid to him, conceiving that malice might have ſome ſhare in their inſinuations. He therefore directed Pheroras to keep a watchful eye on the ſuppoſed lovers; and after a very careful regard to their proceedings, he informed the king that, as far as he was able to form a judgment from the intelligence of looks and ſigns, he had no doubt but that the parties were inſpired with a mutual paſſion for each other. Herod had now no farther doubt of the exiſtence of the fact; and ſoon after this Syllæus took his leave, and departed into Arabia.

Not above two or three months after this departure, Syllæus returned, to tranſact farther public buſineſs with Herod, and took this opportunity to treat with the king on the ſubject of marriage with his ſiſter: repreſenting how much ſuch a match would promote the intereſt of Herod in point of commerce, and that it would likewiſe validate his own right and pretenſions to a conſiderable diſtrict of the country. Herod took ſome little time to conſider of the affair, and then ſent for his ſiſter, of whom he immediately demanded whether the propoſal met with her approbation, and ſhe was willing to marry; to which ſhe inſtantly anſwered in the affirmative. This circumſtance was reported to Syllæus, who was informed that if he would embrace the Jewiſh religion he might marry the lady; but that otherwiſe ſhe could not wed him, conſiſtent with the laws of her country. To this Syllæus replied, that he was bound by ties equally ſtrong; for that if he ſhould depart from the rules and ordinances of his religion, he ſhould be ſtoned to death by the Arabians; and on this declaration the treaty of marriage was at an end.

Syllæus refuſing to embrace the Jewiſh religion, the affair broke off.

From the circumſtances above-mentioned, Pheroras took frequent opportunities of hinting to the king how greatly Salome had expoſed her reputation; but the king's wives were much more free in their reflections; for they made no ſcruple to aſſert that that the liberties in which Salome had indulged herſelf with Syllæus, would juſtify a charge of incontinence againſt her.

Salome now became very importunate with Herod, to conſent to marry that daughter of his who had been refuſed by Pheroras, to one of her ſons by her late huſband Coſtabarus; and Herod was much inclined to accede to this propoſal: but Pheroras prevented this match, by repreſenting to Herod, that the young man would never forgive him who had been the occaſion of the death of his own father.

Herod's daughter married to the ſon of Pheroras.

Pheroras therefore adviſed Herod to give her in marriage to his own ſon, who was to ſucceed him in the government. This advice was embraced by Herod, who gave his daughter one hundred talents for her marriage portion; and from that time all animoſities between him and Pheroras were obliterated and forgotten, as though they had never exiſted.

The diſorders, however, that reigned in Herod's family, were ſo far from being adjuſted after what had paſſed, that they increaſed day after day, from one degree of diſtreſs to another; and what was only ſcandalous and diſhoneſt in its beginning, turned out to be moſt fatal and tragical in the end. This melancholy truth will be properly evinced in the ſequel. Herod had in his ſervice three handſome young eunuchs, of whoſe fidelity he had the higheſt opinion, and for whom he entertained a ſingular regard. One of theſe acted as his cup-bearer, the ſecond ſerved him in the office of a ſteward, and the third attended as a gentleman of his bed-chamber: but, excluſive of theſe ſervices, he frequently conſulted them reſpecting affairs of ſtate. Now it happened that ſome perſon had given intelligence to Herod, that Alexander had been endeavouring to prevail on theſe eunuchs to betray him, in conſideration of their receiving a ſum of money from him.

Several tortured on Alexander's account.

Herod having acquired this information, had not long reflected on it before he gave orders that they ſhould be put to the torture, in order to extort from them a confeſſion of what had paſſed between them and Alexander. At the firſt they acknowledged that they had been in company together; but denied all knowledge of any treacherous deſign that Alexander might have on the life of his father, declaring that he was wholly innocent, for any thing they knew to the contrary. Now the perſons who were employed to torment them being of Antipater's faction, treated them with ſuch unuſual rigour and ſeverity, that at length, in the extremity of their pain and anguiſh, they made a declaration to the following purport: viz. "That Alexander, who entertained the moſt inveterate hatred to his father, had exerted all his influence to ſeduce them from their allegiance to the king, whom he repreſented as old and worn out, and worthy of no farther notice; and that he ſought to appear younger than he was, by repairing the decays of time by paint and other artifices." They ſaid farther, that Alexander had promiſed, "If they would come over to his intereſt, it ſhould be his particular care to provide for their advancement in a very ſhort time; for he had not only a right to ſucceed to the government as a matter of courſe, but that things were ſo contrived, that it was not in his father's power to prevent the ſucceſſion: for that, excluſive of the prerogative of his title, all things were ſo ordered and diſpoſed as to put him into immediate poſſeſſion of that government to which he had the moſt unqueſtionable pretences: that the officers of the army, and the king's friends, had formed a conſiderable party in his favour; and that they were determined, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, to ſupport him in the plan he had laid down for his advancement."

Herod much alarmed.

Herod was no ſooner made acquainted with the ſubſtance of this confeſſion, than he was ſeized with a moſt violent fit of rage and trembling: rage on account of the contempt, and trembling on account of the threats that were expreſſed in it. He remained for a while in a moſt diſtracted ſtate of mind, and in utter uncertainty how to behave in caſe of immediate ſurprize: he doubted whether he ſhould endeavour to avoid the danger that threatened him, or bravely defy it. After a long deliberation, he came to a reſolution not to bring the matter to a judicial enquiry, but to employ ſpies and informers to bring him ſuch intelligence as he thought it imported him be acquainted with.

His extravagant ſuſpicions

Herod was now in ſuch a ſtate of mind, that whoſoever he ſuſpected he conſequently hated; and his ſuſpicions frequently fell on thoſe who did not deſerve them, as well as on thoſe that did; for he conceived that his own ſecurity depended on the extent of his ſuſpicions. In a word, his jealouſies were without end, and without bound. With regard to thoſe who were nearly related to him, he conceived the greater apprehenſion of them, as of thoſe who had it in their power to do him more important miſchief than ſtrangers could. As to perſons with whom he was wholly unconnected, nothing farther was neceſſary to effect their certain deſtruction than the ſlighteſt hint from the mouth of an informer; for the moſt trifling circumſtance made him apprehenſive for his perſonal ſafety.

Confuſion among the ſervants.

His domeſtic ſervants were in a ſituation ſtill more pitiable than all his other ſubjects: for ſuch was the king's jealouſy of them, that the only way they had to ſave their own lives was by traducing each other. Indeed it frequently happened that their lives were thus preſerved: but thoſe that had been ſucceſsful in this practice, never failed to draw on themſelves a full meaſure of envy and deteſtation; and it generally happened, that in the end they ſuffered by the means they had employed to ruin others, falling ſacrifices to arts ſimilar to thoſe by which their companions had been deſtroyed. With regard to private animoſities between man and man, they frequently informed againſt each other, and each fell a ſacrifice to the malice of the other. It ſometimes happened that the king was ſtruck with a remorſe of conſcience, for being the occaſion of the death of ſo many innocent perſons, without even the ceremony of trial, or the form of conviction: but notwithſtanding all his feelings on the occaſion, he was perpetually recurring to the ſame practice, and repeatedly committing the crime which his conſcience condemned. In the iſſue of this whole buſineſs, however, there was an appearance of equity in Herod's conduct: for after having deſtroyed ſo many perſons in violation of the common rights of humanity, he had the juſtice to direct that the falſe witneſſes themſelves ſhould be puniſhed in the moſt exemplary manner.

Diſtracted ſtate of Herod's court.

The court of Herod was at this time in ſuch a ſtate of diſtraction and conſternation as it is not in the power of language to deſcribe: a number of the king's friends and moſt intimate confidents were baniſhed from the royal preſence, and even from the palace. They who were diſmiſſed were the men who were reputed to have merited more from Herod than any other perſons had done; and among theſe were Andromachus and Gemellus, who had long been ranked among the number of his favourites. Nor were the pretenſions of theſe miniſters ill founded; for they had ſerved their ſovereign both abroad and at home, having been diſtinguiſhed as embaſſadors, and as members of his council. They had likewiſe had the honour of ſuperintending the education of his ſons; and the diſcharge of various other important and confidential truſts had been committed to them; in all which they gave indiſputable proofs of their fidelity. Andromachus was diſcarded by Herod, on account of the affection that Alexander manifeſted towards his ſon Demetrius: and he then diſmiſſed Gemellus, on the pretence of the regard he had to Alexander, to whom he had heretofore been a kind of preceptor and governor, and had attended him when he went to Rome, as the companion of his travels. It is not very reaſonable to conclude but that Herod's ſeverity towards Andromachus and Gemellus would have been carried to a greater length, but that the high reputation they held with the people kept him in a kind of awe, and operated as a reſtraint on his conduct: for theſe reaſons he thought it prudent to content himſelf with diſmiſſing them from their ſtations, and commanding them to leave the court; that, in their abſence, he might be more at liberty to act without controul, and indulge himſelf in all the favourite wiſhes of his heart.

Antipater the chief fomenter of theſe diſaſters.

Antipater was the principal author and contriver of all theſe unaccountable proceedings; for obſerving that Herod was filled with ſuſpicions, and alarmed by his fears, he endeavoured, by a crafty compliance with his diſpoſition, to inſinuate himſelf into his councils; which being done, he inſtigated him to acts of cruelty and inhumanity, conſtantly inculcating to him, as an infallible maxim of ſtate, the abſolute neceſſity of working the deſtruction of thoſe who were poſſeſſed of power to do him any injury: and on the principles of this ſavage policy it was that Herod proceeded; for he had no ſooner diſmiſſed Andromachus, and ſuch of his friends and adherents as had the honour and reſolution to ſpeak the true ſentiments of their minds, than he gave orders that all the partizans of Alexander ſhould be put to the torture, and examined as to what plots or contrivances they were privy to: but theſe died under the ſeverity of their ſufferings, as it was impoſſible for them to confeſs what they were totally unacquainted with.

Alexander's friends cruelly tortured.

This conſtancy and uniformity of behaviour being interpreted into a contumacious obſtinacy, their torments were greatly increaſed, and much wonder was expreſſed that ſuch variety of aggravated puniſhments ſhould not be able to extort from them the ſlighteſt confeſſion, or even a hint that expreſſed the leaſt diſloyalty towards their ſovereign. Hereupon Antipater conceived a new method of ſolving the difficulty, and intimated that they conſidered it rather as a point of honour to deny than to confeſs the truth; as by ſuch confeſſion they ſhould violate that faith and good confidence that had been repoſed in them by their friends. He therefore alledged this as a reaſon why others ſhould be put to the torture, and pretended not to entertain the leaſt doubt but that, in the end, ſome one would be found that would confeſs the truth of what they wanted to be informed of.

Information, on torture, againſt Alexander.

At length it happened that a poor wretch, oppreſſed with the weight of torture, and ſinking under the extremity of his pain, declared, that when the people extalled Alexander as a man of uncommon elegance, an excellent marksman, and one poſſeſſed of other ſuperior qualifications, he had frequently heard him declare, that he had every reaſon to conſider theſe natural endowments rather as a misfortune than an advantage to him; for that his father's diſpoſition was ſuch, that he hated him for his very perfections: that when they were talking together he was obliged to ſtoop, leſt he ſhould appear taller than the king; and that when they were engaged in hunting, he was compelled to refrain from ſhooting at the mark, for that his father bore ſo great an antipathy to him, that he could neither endure to ſee him excel in any action, nor hear him praiſed for ſuch excellence. This pretended diſcovery being made, the torments of the poor ſufferer were reſpited for a while; and then he proceeded with his narrative, relating that Alexander and Ariſtobulus had on a former occaſion entered in a conſpiracy againſt the life of their father, when he was out on a party of hunting; and that it had been determined between them, that if they ſhould be ſucceſsful in their enterpriſe, Alexander was immediately to repair to Rome, to claim to ſucceed Herod in the government. A number of letters were likewiſe produced, written by Alexander to his brother, the general contents of which were a complaint againſt his father for giving to Antipater an eſtate in land, valued at two hundred talents annually.

Herod's ſuſpicions of his childrens guilt confirmed.

Theſe circumſtances laid together, operated ſo forcibly on the mind of Herod, that he deemed them to be ſufficient evidence to confirm that ſuſpicion which he had heretofore fore entertained of his children. He now, therefore, grew outrageously angry with his son Alexander, whom he immediately ordered to be sent to prison: yet it is not supposed that, in his cooler moments, he himself gave credit to the information he had received: for it is inconsistent with common sense to suppose that the sons could have any interest in the destruction of their father: or supposing his ruin to be once compleated, what favourable expectations could they form from making a journey to Rome, after so detestable a parricide? I confess that there might exist somewhat of a turbulent and ambitious disposition in the young people, respecting the favours that had been heaped upon Antipater; but I cannot think that there was any farther ground for complaint.

Alexander confined in prison.

But as Alexander was at this time under confinement, and the public were unacquainted with the cause of it, Herod did not think himself in a state of absolute security, without taking some step that might seem to convince the world that there was a plausible reason for his imprisonment: and, thus situated, he gave orders, that divers persons of quality, who were the warm friends and adherents of Alexander, should be put to the torture, and afterwards to death; which was done with a view of insinuating the guilt of Alexander; but it did not answer the desired effect, for the parties died without making any confession.

At this time the whole palace was in the utmost distress and confusion: nothing was to be seen but tumult, nothing heard but the voice of terror and lamentation.

Confession extorted from another.

It now happened that a certain young man, whose strength and resolution had been totally exhausted by the torture, related a story, importing that Alexander had written a letter to some of his friends at Rome, requesting that Cæsar might be informed that a conspiracy against him had been set on foot; and that if he were but commissioned to attend the emperor at Rome, he would make an ample discovery of the circumstances; for that the interest of Rome had been abandoned by his father, who was engaged in treaty with Mithridates, the king of the Parthians; adding likewise, that he had given orders for the preparation of a poison at Askalon, which was actually in readiness. Herod had so much faith in this improbable story, as to take the whole for a matter of fact; and he accordingly gave orders for an enquiry to be made after the supposed poison: but after the most diligent search, no such thing could possibly be found. All this time Herod was surrounded by a number of flatterers, who endeavoured to sooth his afflictions, and tried to convince him that his conduct was regulated by the sentiments of justice, and the measures of prudence.

Resolution and constancy of Alexander.

Mean time Alexander was so far from sinking under the weight of his oppressions, that he utterly disdained either to deny the charge that was exhibited against him, or seek to defend the propriety of his own conduct. This he did, partly to inspire his father with a detestation of the violent outrages that had been committed; and partly to prevent his listening to such idle and improbable tales as had lately been told him: and he privately determined that if his father should still persist to give credit to the absurd reports that were daily propagated, neither himself nor his family should want ample food to exercise their cruelty. Hereupon he dispatched to Herod four pieces of writing, in which he informed him that there could be no kind of necessity for the putting any of his people to farther torture, in order to make them answer such questions as might be put to them, by way of discovering the truth: for he might rely upon it, as an indisputable fact, that there was a conspiracy in agitation against his life; and that Pheroras, and several other persons of whom he had not the least suspicion, were among the principal conspirators. He farther informed the king, that Salome had stolen in secrecy to his bed one night, and had lain with him; absolutely insisting that she would not be rejected. He likewise acquainted Herod that the people in general were clearly of opinion that it was absolutely necessary that he should fall a sacrifice to their resentments; without which neither happiness nor freedom were to be expected: and he named Ptolemy and Saphinius (two persons in whom Herod placed the most implicit confidence) as principally concerned in the conspiracy.

Several sentenced to death without trial or conviction.

By this time the court of Herod was distracted with such a variety of turbulent passions, that it had more the resemblance of a mad-house, or a den of wild-beasts, than the habitation of rational creatures. Such was the strange variety of their dispositions, that they were one day in the utmost appearance of friendship, endeavouring to exhibit all possible tokens of mutual regard; and on the following, prepared to destroy each other without the least grounds of provocation. Nor, when their passions were excited, was time given for enquiry or proof of guilt; for the punishment constantly preceded the examination. Some of these unhappy people were confined in chains; others were sacrificed to the immediate impulse of malicious jealousy; and a third sort remained in a painful suspence and despair, than which death itself could not have been more intolerable. Nothing now remained in the palace that might indicate the splendor of its former state: but in the place of that gaiety and elegance by which it had been heretofore distinguished, there was only to be seen the most melancholy proofs of dejection of mind, and a weight of sorrow that admitted of no consolation.

Herod's miserable condition.

Herod himself was at this time so totally abandoned to despair, that he grew as weary of his own life, as the cruelty of his conduct had rendered others of theirs. He had not a single person near him in whom he could confide: his present situation was miserable beyond the power of language to describe, and his future prospects were replete with intolerable horror and confusion. It was impossible for him to take any rest. His sleeping ing and his waking hours were equally attended by the moſt diſagreeable ſentiments, and frightful imaginations. At one time he uſed to conceive that his ſon was planting a dagger at his heart; and at others he would be impreſſed with ſentiments if poſſible ſtill more ſhocking. To ſum up the whole of his diſtreſs in a ſingle phraſe, his life was a continued ſcene of torment and diſtraction.

CHAP. XI.

ARCHELAUS pays a Viſit to HEROD, to reconcile him to ALEXANDER. ARCHELAUS mediates the matter with great Skill and Addreſs. PHERORAS aſks Pardon of HEROD, who is thereupon reconciled to him. HEROD highly ſenſible of the good Offices of ARCHELAUS. Goes to ROME, and effects a Reconciliation between ARCHELAUS and TITUS.

Shrewd management of Archelaus to effect a reconciliation between Herod and his ſon Alexander.

WHILE Herod continued in this extreme torment and anxiety of mind, Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, conceived it would be conſiſtent with his duty, and becoming his character, both as a relation and a friend, to pay him a viſit, and to exert his good offices towards the effecting a reconciliation between Herod and his daughter and ſon-in-law, for whom he entertained the moſt unbounded good-will, and the ſincereſt affection. He had heard that affairs went very unhappily in the family; and, on his arrival, he found that report had fallen ſhort of the truth: but he conceived it would have but a ſtrange appearance to quarrel with Herod for the impropriety of his conduct, and for his giving credit to ſo many ridiculous ſtories, on the mere co[illegible]lence of idle report. He thought if he began to conteſt the matter with him, it would look like reproaching him for his conduct, and be productive of more miſchief than benefit. For theſe reaſons, inſtead of levelling a direct cenſure at the behaviour of Herod, he artfully inſinuated that Alexander was to blame. The king, he ſaid, had acted in all reſpects conſiſtent with the laws of honour and juſtice; and that, for his own part, he would immediately diſſolve the marriage, and never afterwards own Glaphyra for his daughter, if he ſhould diſcover that ſhe was acquainted with the plot, and did not inſtantly make the circumſtances of it known.

His reſentment is aſſuaged.

This ſeeming warmth on the part of Archelaus, and his apparent zeal for the vindication of Herod, brought the latter to a proper recollection, to a ſenſe of the impropriety of his conduct, and, by degrees, revived in his mind all thoſe tender ſenſations conſiſtent with his character as a father. Before this alteration the king would have deemed any man his enemy that but ſpoke a ſingle word in favour of Alexander: but now, that his nature was ſoftened by hearing what Archelaus ſaid againſt him, he burſt into tears, begged that he would not ſay any more to his diſadvantage, nor entertain the leaſt thought of breaking off the match; or be farther enraged at the inconſiderate conduct of the young man. When Archelaus found that he had ſuch an influence on Herod as to pacify the rage of his mind, he artfully ſhifted the diſcourſe, palliating in the beſt manner he could the miſtakes that might have been committed by Alexander; attributing his conduct to bad advice, and the evil example of the company he kept. He ſaid that the young man was of an eaſy, yielding diſpoſition, but he had never found that there was any thing of malice in his nature: he inſinuated that he might have been miſled and corrupted; and, during the whole of his addreſs, obliquely hinted that Pheroras was principally to blame.

Pheroras requeſts the mediation of Archelaus in his behalf.

By this time Pheroras, having reflected on his ſituation, was ſenſible that he had totally loſt the good opinion of Herod; and conſidering that Archelaus was the moſt proper perſon he could apply to for the effecting of a reconciliation, he dreſſed himſelf in a ſuit of deep mourning, and went to him with the air of a moſt penitent petitioner, beſeeching him, in all humility and ſubmiſſion, to intercede for him to the king.

Archelaus did not fail to treat him with all the reſpect due to his rank; but informed him, that greater difficulty would, probably, attend the removal of Herod's diſpleaſure than he might poſſibly conceive: yet if he might preſume to adviſe him as a friend, he would recommend that he ſhould go and make a proper ſubmiſſion to his brother, and humbly ſolicit his pardon, having firſt confeſſed himſelf the original cauſe of all the misfortunes that at preſent attended the family. A confeſſion and behaviour of this kind, he ſaid, would very probably pave the way to a perfect reconciliation.

Herod reconciled to Alexander and Pheroras.

Pheroras acted in purſuance of this advice, and the ſucceſs anſwered the moſt ſanguine expectation; for Alexander was exculpated from all ſuſpicion of the crime alledged againſt him; and Archelaus ſpeaking in behalf of Pheroras, the king was likewiſe reconciled to him. The obligations that Herod now conceived himſelf under to Archelaus, made ſo ſenſible an impreſſion on his mind, that he deemed him one of the moſt valuable friends he had in the world. Things being thus happily adjuſted, Archelaus returned into Cappadocia, loaded with valuable preſents, and pleaſed that the purpoſe of his voyage had been crowned with ſucceſs equal to his warmeſt expectations. It was now determined that Herod ſhould repair to Rome, in order to lay before Cæſar an account of the preſent ſtate of his family; as he had formerly written to the emperor on its diſtracted ſituation: he therefore accompanied Archelaus as far as Antioch, where he reconciled a difference that had ſubſiſted between him and Titus, the governor of Syria; and then returned into Judæa.

The TRACHONITES revolt, and a few of them escape into ARABIA, the main Body of them being overthrown by the King's Troops. HEROD makes an Incursion into TRACHON, and applies to SATURNINUS and VOLUMNIUS to deliver up the Rebels. They comply with his Requisition.

AFTER Herod had been at Rome, dispatched his business there, and was returned back again, to discharge the affairs of his own government, a war broke out with the Arabians, which took its rise from the following circumstance. It hath been mentioned in a former part of this work, that Cæsar took the government of the province of Trachon from Zenodorus, and bestowed it on Herod. Now the Trachonites, finding they were no longer at liberty to carry on their former trade of robbery, turned their thoughts to planting and tilling of the ground; but this course of life did not agree with their dispositions; and being but very indifferent husbandmen, they reaped neither much pleasure nor advantage from this new kind of business.

The Trachonites revolt;

For a considerable time after they were under the government of Herod, he so managed, very much to his credit, as to maintain tolerable good order among them; and prevented their making those barbarous incursions on their neighbours, which they had been heretofore accustomed to do: but soon after Herod had taken his departure into Italy, to recommend Antipater, and accuse Alexander, a report was spread that he was dead; whereupon the Trachonites revolted from their allegiance, and began to live in the same irregular manner they had heretofore done; but the king's troops being called forth to suppress them, they were soon subdued and dispersed; only about forty of the principal people among them made their escape, and fled into Arabia for protection. Now and are received and protected by Syllæus.

Syllæus being in Arabia, and not being as yet reconciled to the circumstance of Salome having been refused him for a wife, he received and entertained these Trachonites, allowed them a safe retreat, and gave them a strong and well fortified place in which to reside. From this retirement they frequently issued, infesting the countries of Judæa and Cœlo-Syria, and carrying off numbers of cattle, and considerable booty to their lurking places: nor was any step taken to prevent their proceeding in these outrages and depredations. Herod, on his return from Rome, being informed of the transactions of these notorious robbers; and considering that he could not, with any propriety, interfere to punish those who were under the protection of the Arabians, he was extremely enraged at the circumstance; and without allowing himself much time for reflection on the indignity that had been offered him, he made an incursion into the country of the Trachonites, and put whole families of those people to the sword without distinction. Hereupon the rest of the people of Trachon were transported with the most violent rage; and as the laws of their country required that they should not let such an attack on their brethren pass unrevenged, they bid defiance to all opposition, and to every species of danger, making perpetual inroads upon Herod, who could never remain unmolested by their attacks.

Herod requires the revolters to be delivered up.

Thus circumstanced, Herod made application to Saturninus and Volumnius, the two governors of the Arabian provinces under Cæsar, requesting that they would deliver up the fugitives into his hands, that they might be punished according to their demerits. The Trachonites were so irritated and enraged by this demand, that they assembled in a body, not less than a thousand in number, and then dividing into smaller parties, ranged from place to place, ravaging the towns and country, and killing and destroying where-ever they came; so that these encounters, though they might properly be called only skirmishes, had all the fatal effects of a devouring war.

Herod still continued to insist that the thieves should be delivered up; and on this occasion he likewise demanded the payment of sixty talents, which he had lent to Obodas, by the hands of Syllæus, the payment of which had been due a considerable time.

The Roman governors order the fugitives to be delivered up to Herod.

By this time Syllæus had taken upon himself, through usurpation, the government which had been in the hands of Obodas; and he not only hesitated to pay the sixty talents above-mentioned, but absolutely insisted that not any of the thieves had taken refuge in Arabia. Hereupon Saturninus and Volumnius directed that the fugitives on both sides should be immediately given up, and that the money which was due to Herod should be paid within the space of thirty days. The orders discovered the treachery of the conduct of Syllæus, for a great number of the free-booters had taken refuge with the Arabians, while Herod had not so much as a single Arabian under his protection.

Syllæus breaks his covenant, and repairs to Rome.

AT the expiration of thirty days, when the money ought to have been paid, Herod demanded it, and likewise insisted on the giving up of the fugitives; but Syllæus would not abide by his agreement; refused to comply comply with either of these demands, and immediately proceeded on a voyage to Cæsar. Herod finding this want of fidelity on the part of the Arabians, and perceiving that he could not recover his right by an equitable mode of proceeding, applied to Saturninus and Volumnius, for permission to do himself justice by the law of arms: and those governors having complied with his request, he immediately collected an army together, proceeded into Arabia, and marched seven stages in the course of three days. At length he arrived at a castle which bore the name of Repta, to which the robbers had retreated. He lost no time in assaulting this place, which he was fortunate enough to take on the first attack. The conquest being made, he demolished the several fortifications, but abstained from doing any farther mischief to the inhabitants. While these transactions were going forward, Nacebus, the general of the Arabians, marched to the relief of his countrymen; and was no sooner arrived than a battle ensued, in which very few, if any, of the troops of Herod were lost; but the Arabian general was slain on the spot, together with five and twenty of his people; and the rest of them were dispersed, and compelled to seek their safety in flight.

Herod's expedition into Arabia.

Herod having now revenged himself on the free-booters, for the insults that had been offered him, he proceeded to Trachon, with an army of three thousand Idumæans, in order to keep the irregulars in those parts within the bounds of subjection. To justify himself with respect to the above-mentioned proceeding, Herod dispatched a faithful narrative of the facts to the Roman governors presiding in Phœnicia, in which he acquainted them that in his late battle with the rebellious Arabians, he had done nothing but what he was authorised to do by full permission: and the governors having made an enquiry into the affair, found that Herod's allegations were consistent with truth.

He overawes the free-booters, by an army.

Artful Conduct of SYLLÆUS at ROME. CÆSAR writes a menacing Letter to HEROD. Account of the Insolence of the ARABIANS. HEROD's Embassadors are denied Audience of CÆSAR. SYLLÆUS endeavours to engross the Power of ARETAS. This latter sends Embassadors, with Letters and Presents to CÆSAR, who likewise refuses Audience to these Embassadors. NICOLAUS of DAMASCUS sent on a third Embassy, by HEROD.

Syllæus ingratiates himself with the emperor, and accuses Herod.

THE above is a fair representation of the truth: but the Arabians sent a very different account of the particulars to Syllæus at Rome, in which, by disguising some circumstances, and magnifying others, they made the whole appear contrary to the matter of fact. Now Syllæus had by this time so artfully insinuated himself, that he had obtained a personal knowledge of the emperor.

As Syllæus was walking one day before the royal palace, he received a packet of letters by an express, containing the account above-mentioned. When he had read the dispatches, he immediately changed his cloaths, put on a suit of deep mourning, and went away to Cæsar. Having obtained admittance, he told his melancholy story, which was interrupted by frequent tears and lamentations. The substance of it was, that Herod had entered Arabia with a large army; that he had overturned the form of government, and spread devastation throughout the country; that he had slain on the spot no less than two thousand five hundred noble Arabians, and that their general, Nacebus, who was his friend and relation, was among the slain; and that he had plundered the castle of Repta of an immense treasure which had been there deposited. He likewise represented that this arose from the advantage that Herod had taken of the weakness and neglect of Obodas, who was not furnished with a proper number of troops to make opposition to him, nor, during his (Syllæus') absence, had a general fit to take the command of those with which he was provided. Syllæus having mentioned these particulars, said farther, that he never should have thought of undertaking his present journey to Rome, but in the full confidence that Cæsar would make ample provision for all his people; and he boasted that if himself had been upon the spot, Herod should have severely repented the rashness of his undertaking.

His consummate subtlety, and scandalous relation.

Cæsar being exceedingly unhappy in his mind, on account of these unfortunate circumstances, made a number of inquiries among the friends of Herod, as well as among his own friends who had lately come out of Syria, demanding to know if Herod had marched his army any where without the limits of his own jurisdiction. These questions being answered in the affirmative, Cæsar entertained no doubt of the truth of all the rest that Syllæus had told him. He therefore, without farther hesitation, sent an angry and menacing letter to Herod, which was directed in the following singular manner: "To Herod, formerly my friend, hereafter my subject."

Cæsar sends a menacing letter to Herod

At the same time Syllæus wrote letters to the Arabians, informing them of the particulars of what had passed. When the Arabians, on the information of these letters, found that Herod was in disgrace with Cæsar, their insolence exceeded all bounds, and they became much more untractable than they had heretofore been. They absolutely refused to deliver up the malefactors, or even to pay their debts; nay, they went farther; they denied the payment of their rents, and refused to discharge all those common obligations which, by the mutual faith of society, one man owes to another. They likewise took advantage of the particular situation of affairs, and joined with the Insolent conduct of the Trachonites to Herod.

the Arabian ravagers againſt the garriſons of Idumæa which belonged to Herod. They deſtroyed, pillaged, and plundered where-ever they went; and this more from motives of revenge, than from thoſe of advantage.

He ſends to Cæſar, who rejects his embaſſy.

Herod having now loſt the friendſhip of Cæſar, was compelled to ſubmit to thoſe and many other indignities; for by this time his credit began to fail him, and he was abandoned by his natural courage. On two ſeveral occaſions did he ſend embaſſadors to Cæſar, to endeavour to exculpate himſelf on the charges againſt him; but the firſt time the emperor refuſed to admit the embaſſadors to his preſence, and on the ſecond application he would not receive their diſpatches. During this time Herod had every thing to apprehend from the arts of Syllæus, who ſought all opportunities of turning to his own benefit the anxiety of mind in which he found Cæſar involved. Syllæus, fortunately for his own purpoſes, was near enough to Cæſar to take every advantage of the change of his diſpoſition; and finding that he was credulous and eaſy to be wrought upon, he diſpoſed him to give ſuch directions as were conſiſtent with his own intereſt: and, excluſive of all this, Syllæus had a proſpect of affairs of ſtill farther importance.

Obodas dying, is ſucceeded by Aretas in the kingdom of Arabia.

In the interim king Obodas departed this life, and was ſucceeded by Æneas, who took the name of Aretas. Syllæus was no ſooner informed of this circumſtance, than he exerted himſelf in a ſingular manner to get Aretas turned out of his office, and to engroſs the whole power to himſelf; and the methods he made uſe of were the propagation of calumnious reports, the giving bribes at court, and the making large promiſes to Cæſar. What principally encouraged him to an attempt of this kind was, a diſguſt that Cæſar had conceived to Aretas for entering on the adminiſtration of government without obtaining his conſent, or even making him acquainted with his intentions.

The embaſſy and preſents of Aretas rejected by Cæſar.

Aretas, the new king, now ſent embaſſadors to Cæſar, to pay his compliments of reſpect to the emperor, and to carry him letters, and preſents of large value; one of which, in particular, was a crown of gold, which had been purchaſed at an enormous price. The letters thus tranſmitted contained a direct charge againſt Syllæus, for having uſurped the authority of Obodas in his life-time, and the cauſing him to be poiſoned: he was likewiſe charged with violating the chaſtity of the wives of the Arabians; and with obtaining large ſums of money, in order to pave the way to his pretenſions to the government. But as Cæſar had heretofore denied audience to the embaſſadors of Herod, ſo now he treated theſe in the ſame manner, rejecting their preſents, and ſending them away without an anſwer to their diſpatches.

Herod ſends Nicolaus of Damaſcus on a third embaſſy to Cæſar

While matters were in this ſituation at Rome, the affairs of Judæa and Arabia grew every day more perplexed and diſagreeable: a general confuſion enſued, and there was no one who had ability or authority to allay the ferment. One of the kings was yet inſecure in the poſſeſſion of his new government, and the other was very far from being maſter of his ſubjects: for ſuch was the ſituation of Herod, that he had it not in his power to do himſelf juſtice, without offering an offence to Cæſar; ſo that he lay under a neceſſity of ſubmitting to all that might be offered to him: at length, however, being reduced to the moſt diſagreeable extremity, he came to a final reſolution to exert all his own intereſt, and that of his friends, with Cæſar, and determined to try the event of a third embaſſy to Rome; and Nicolaus was appointed embaſſador on this occaſion.

Great diſſenſions in Herod's family.

THE family of Herod had been at all times rendered exceedingly unhappy by its inteſtine commotions; a caſe by no means uncommon in courts: but at preſent the animoſities ran higher than at any former period, and were principally occaſioned by the following circumſtance: There was a certain Lacedæmonian, named Eurycles, a man of noble deſcent, but of the moſt malicious turn of mind; prone to acts of ſenſuality, and vain beyond the power of language to deſcribe; but he was ſo conſummate an hypocrite, that it was not an eaſy matter to diſcern that he poſſeſſed any of theſe faults. Now Eurycles, by that admirable addreſs of which he was maſter, had inſinuated himſelf into an acquaintance with Herod, with whom he interchanged preſents, and to whom he rendered ſeveral good offices in the houſe of Antipater. By theſe means, and by being frequently in company with Alexander, he became familiarly acquainted with that prince alſo. Now Eurycles would be frequently hinting what an extraordinary degree of friendſhip there ſubſiſted between him and Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and how profound a reſpect ſpect the latter entertained for Glaphyra. Thus, by rendering himſelf an entertaining companion to every one about him, and by acting the part of an eaſy and general friend, he had an opportunity of hearing all that was ſaid, and ſeeing every thing that was done; ſo that he failed not of picking up a number of idle ſtories, which he applied to his own purpoſes whenever he found it convenient. In a word, he had ſo happy a method of applying himſelf to the paſſions, and ſo grateful a mode of complimenting the perſons of thoſe with whom he had to do, that to whomſoever he addreſſed himſelf, he was artful enough to perſuade the party that his or her intereſt was the chief object of his wiſhes, and that all the correſpondence he held with others was ſimply with a view to the ſervice and gratification of the perſon with whom he was converſing.

Eurycles inſinuates himſelf into the friendſhip of Herod, &c.

By a mode of addreſs thus artfully managed, he ſo far inſinuated himſelf into the eſteem and affection of Alexander, that he placed the utmoſt reliance on him, and confided in him as the keeper of all his moſt important ſecrets, and thought him the only man in the world that he could truſt in the full aſſurance that he ſhould not be betrayed. In this perfect confidence of friendſhip he related to him the whole hiſtory of his misfortunes; made him acquainted with the unkindneſs of his father; informed him of the death of his mother, and the credit that Antipater had obtained with the king. He ſaid that the oppreſſion of mind which he laboured under was become altogether too ſevere to be endured; and that the family averſion was at length arrived at that height, that he could no longer eat or converſe with his children.

Alexander entertained no kind of doubt but that the ſecrets would be ſafely depoſited in the breaſt of his friend: but Eurycles was no ſooner maſter of any part of the ſubject, than he went to Antipater, to whom he related, from time to time, all that had paſſed in the converſation. When he communicated theſe circumſtances to Antipater, he uſed to ſay, "It is true theſe matters are no immediate concern of mine; but in an affair which may be attended with ſuch dangerous conſequences, I cannot but think it my duty as a friend to adviſe you to conſult your own ſafety, and have a cautious eye on Alexander; for I have obſerved that he hath of late aſſumed a very great degree of confidence, ſo that he thinks it no longer neceſſary to diſguiſe the ſentiments of his mind; but, without any kind of ſcruple, declares, in the moſt explicit language, the malice that rankles at his heart, and openly avows the deſign that he has entertained to the prejudice of his father."

He obtains rewards of Antipater, Herod, and Archelaus.

This diſcourſe of Eurycles gave Antipater ſo high an idea of the ſincerity of his eſteem, and the diſintereſtedneſs of his friendſhip, that he acknowledged the favour by making him ſome preſents of great value; and having reflected on the nature and importance of the information, he came to a reſolution of acquainting the king with what he had heard, and taking his opinion on the ſubject. He therefore introduced Eurycles to Herod, who was already ſo prepoſſeſſed againſt Alexander, that it was no difficult matter to make him believe any thing to his diſadvantage: ſo that partly through his former prejudices, and partly from the hints of ſeveral circumſtances that were thrown out in the courſe of this converſation, his hatred to him became more violent and implacable than ever; a circumſtance with which Alexander was ſoon afterwards made acquainted. Herod conceiving that the good office which had been done him demanded a recompence, made a preſent of fifty talents to Eurycles, in gratification of his trouble; and this the latter had no ſooner received, than, in the true ſpirit of conſummate hypocriſy, he went immediately to Archelaus, to whom he extolled to the ſkies the virtues of his ſon Alexander; nor did he forget to hint that he had done himſelf the honour to endeavour to adjuſt the diſputes betwixt him and his father; and that he thought himſelf extremely happy in the ſucceſs with which his negociations had been attended. The artfulneſs of this addreſs ſo pleaſed Archelaus, that he likewiſe preſented him with a ſum of money; and being thus enriched by the ſucceſs of his villainies, he departed with his booty before there was an opportunity of detecting the impoſture. By this time Eurycles had retired into his own country, where he ſtill followed the ſame artful courſe of life, till at length a diſcovery being made of the iniquity of his conduct, he was brought to juſtice, and baniſhed from Lacedæmon.

The averſion of Herod to his ſons increaſes.

By this time the paſſions of Herod were wrought to ſuch a height, that he was not diſpoſed, as he formerly had been, to be ſatisfied with only lending an ear to the calumnious reports againſt his ſons, or to wait with patience till the voice of ſlander reached him in its common courſe; but his ſuſpicions were of ſuch a nature that they precluded the neceſſity of any one executing the office of a tale-bearer; and he made ſo many particular enquiries and ſcrutinies in ſearch of his own unhappineſs, as rendered it unneceſſary for any other perſon to take the trouble of carrying accuſations to him. Notwithſtanding this diſpoſition, however, he was ſtill as eager as ever to liſten to any informations againſt the brothers, from whatever quarter they were brought; nor did any thing afford him ſo high a ſatisfaction as the lending an attentive ear to theſe malicious ſtories.

The affairs of the family were at length in ſuch an unhappy ſituation, that the only ambition and contention ſeemed to be, who ſhould be the author of the greateſt degree of miſchief. The more malice that was evinced with regard to the ſons, the more acceptable the intelligence appeared to be to the father; and in all theſe informations the chief pretence ſeemed to be a generous concern for the ſafety of the king.

At this period there aroſe a circumſtance more fatal to the repoſe of the young princes than any which had yet befallen them. There were two perſons, the names of whom were Jucundus and Tyrannus, who had heretofore been of Herod's life-guard, who who were remarkably diſtinguiſhed by their extraordinary ſtature and uncommon ſtrength; but they had been lately baniſhed from the court, on account of ſome offence that they had given. Now Alexander, being appriſed of the ſingular merit of theſe men, took them immediately into his ſervice, as a guard on his perſon, and treated them with the utmoſt degree of liberality. This circumſtance gave ſuch extreme offence to the king, that he gave orders that they ſhould be immediately put to the torture. This being done, they bore up under the ſeverity of the torments as long as human nature could ſuſtain the extremity of the pain; but being at length unable to endure any more, they made a confeſſion to the following purport: "That Alexander had ſolicited them to ſeek ſome favourable opportunity of killing the king, while he was engaged in a party of hunting; that he ſaid this matter might be the more eaſily effected, under pretence that the king had fallen from his horſe upon his own arms; a pretence that would have the greater weight, becauſe that, on a former occaſion, he had very narrowly eſcaped with his life from a ſimilar accident." The ſufferers farther declared that a ſum of money was ſecreted in the ſtable; and they ſaid, that in purſuance of an order given to the principal game-keeper, by Alexander, his ſervant had received a number of the king's darts and lances.

Through extreme torture, Jucundus and Tyrannus accuſe Alexander.

The governor of Alexandrion was the next man that was put to the torture. The charge exhibited againſt him was, that he had given his promiſe to the brothers to receive them into the caſtle, and likewiſe to deliver into their hands all ſuch of the royal treaſure as was therein depoſited. During the time that the governor was under the torture he poſitively denied every particular of this charge; but, on the contrary, his ſon ſaid that it was founded on fact, and produced a writing to the following effect, which he pretended was under the hand of Alexander: "If God permit, you need not entertain the leaſt doubt of hearing from us, as ſoon as we have prepared matters ſo as to be ready for you; therefore remember your promiſe, and do not fail to be ready to receive us into the caſtle." Herod having peruſed this paper, had now no farther doubt of the real exiſtence of the conſpiracy; but Alexander, during all this time, poſitively inſiſted that the whole charge was founded on a mere fiction and contrivance of Antipater, and that the writing was forged by the ſecretary Diophantus, who had heretofore diſtinguiſhed himſelf by exploits of this nature; and who was afterwards apprehended while perpetrating a ſimilar act, and received the puniſhment due to his crime.

Charge againſt the governor of Alexandrion, which he denies, when tortured.

Forgery of the ſecretary Diophantus, and his puniſhment.

At this time, Herod was at Jericho; and after the witneſſes had been tormented, he had them conducted to that place, in order to accuſe his ſons publicly before the people; but before they could have an opportunity of doing this, they were ſtoned to death by the multitude, who, during the firſt tranſports of their rage, would have treated Alexander and Ariſtobulus in the ſame manner, but that Herod, by the aſſiſtance of Ptolemy and Pheroras, prevented their falling a ſacrifice. However, they were committed to cloſe cuſtody, and ſpies were appointed to guard them; and to keep the cloſeſt watch on all their words and actions. Thus ſituated, they had no doubt but that their lives would fall a ſacrifice; and the people in general were of the ſame opinion.

The brothers are caſt into priſon.

In this great and utter diſtreſs, Ariſtobulus, after mature reflections on his ſituation, thought it might be prudent to try if he could inſpire his aunt and mother-in-law, Salome, with proper reſentment of his ſufferings, and a juſt indignation againſt the author of them. To this purpoſe he wrote to her, demanding, "If ſhe could think herſelf ſafe under a charge of holding a private correſpondence with Syllæus, reſpecting the king's affairs, in the hope of obtaining him for a huſband?" This paper Salome immediately carried to her brother; who, being tranſported with rage, gave inſtant orders that his ſons ſhould be confined ſeparately from each other, and that they ſhould themſelves put down in writing the particulars reſpecting the treaſonable deſign in which they were ſuppoſed to have been concerned. This was done, agreeable to the orders that were given; and both their accounts exactly correſponded: they declared that they had not been concerned in any kind of conſpiracy; and that they had never entertained the leaſt idea of ſuch a circumſtance. They confeſſed that they had entertained thoughts of making their eſcape from their preſent confinement; for that death itſelf was preferable to the life they were obliged to live, ſurrounded as they were by perpetual jealouſy and ſuſpicion.

Ariſtobulus betrayed by Salome.

At this period, Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, ſent in the character of an embaſſador to Herod, a perſon named Mela, a man of great rank and diſtinction in that country. Now Herod was diſpleaſed with ſomething in the conduct of Archelaus; and being willing to let him ſee that he reſented his behaviour, he gave orders that Alexander ſhould be brought out of the priſon, and re-examined in the preſence of Mela. The priſoner being brought, was interrogated reſpecting his intended eſcape; he was aſked whither he propoſed to have gone, and in what way he intended to have diſpoſed of himſelf. To this he replied, that his determination was to have gone to his father-in-law, Archelaus, in conſequence of his promiſe to conduct him in ſafety to Rome. "Nor (ſaid he) was my brother or myſelf ever guilty of any thing farther than this with regard to our father, notwithſtanding all that the falſe witneſſes, and others of our enemies may have pretended to the contrary." Alexander then expreſſed his earneſt wiſh that Tyrannus and his aſſociates had been examined in a more careful and particular manner; but he ſaid that the principal thing Antipater had had in view was, to get them diſpoſed of as ſoon as poſſible, in ſuch a manner as that it ſhould not be in their power to make any diſagreeable diſcoveries; wherefore his agents were employed to ſpirit up the mob againſt them, in conſequence of which they put them to death.

This examination being ended, Herod gave immediate orders that Alexander and Mela ſhould be conducted to Glaphyra, and that ſhe likewiſe ſhould be ſtrictly interrogated, to diſcover what ſhe knew reſpecting the horrid treaſon ſuppoſed to have been in agitation. No ſooner were they come within ſight of this moſt unfortunate princeſs, than ſeeing her huſband bound in chains, ſhe began to tear her hair, attempted to offer violence on herſelf, and wept and groaned as if her heart would have broke; nor did the prince give leſs ſignal proofs of the extremity of his grief: ſo violent, in fact, were the effects of their affliction, that they who had the care of them ſtood in aſtoniſhment, as perſons who had loſt their ſenſes; and ſeemed ſo far wrapt in wonder at the ſcene before them, that they neither knew what they were doing, or what buſineſs had brought them thither.

Examination of Glaphyra before Alexander and Mela.

At length Ptolemy, to whoſe care the prince had been committed, interrogated him, requiring to know whether his wife had been concerned in the plot; to which Alexander, in a kind of ironical manner, replied, "How can you entertain the leaſt doubt of that? Wherever I am, ſhe muſt undoubtedly be preſent." And then, in a more ſerious tone, he ſaid, "She is a woman dearer to me than my own exiſtence; ſhe is one of the worthieſt of wives, and the moſt excellent of mothers; nor can the whole world produce her ſuperior in both thoſe characters." He had no ſooner pronounced theſe words, than the princeſs declared that her conſcience acquitted her of all idea of guilt; but that if the acknowledging that ſhe had been culpable would tend, in any degree, to the preſervation of her huſband, ſhe would not heſitate to make ſuch acknowledgment, even though ſhe was ſure to die without an opportunity of retracting her declaration.

They both deny the charge.

But Alexander, hearing what ſhe ſaid, eagerly exclaimed, "No, no! We are not guilty of a ſingle circumſtance that hath been alledged againſt us; and we have merited a very different kind of treatment from the hands of thoſe who have been baſe enough to injure us by their ſuſpicions. With regard to the reſolution we had formed of getting away to our father, and then of eſcaping to Rome, if that is to be conſtrued into treaſon, we have nothing to do but to plead guilty." What Alexander had ſaid was confirmed in all its particulars by Glaphyra.

Herod ſends deputies, with letters and inſtructions, to Archelaus.

Now in what had paſſed during the above examination, there was ſufficient matter to exerciſe the thought of a man already jealous of injuries done him; and Herod hereupon fixed his ſuſpicions ſtill more ſtrongly than ever on Archelaus; whereupon he immediately diſpatched Olympus and Volumnius with letters to the ſuppoſed offender, giving them directions to ſtop at Eleuſa, a city of Phœnicia, and there deliver their diſpatches. They were likewiſe inſtructed to expoſtulate with him on the ſubject of the conſpiracy, on a preſumption that he had been engaged in the confederacy with the ſons of Herod.

After they had delivered their letters, their orders were to ſail forward to Rome; and to inquire of Nicolaus of Damaſcus, if Cæſar was more diſpoſed to favourable ſentiments than he had heretofore been. If this happened to be the caſe, they were to preſent other diſpatches to him, which gave an account of the proceedings againſt Alexander and Ariſtobulus, and likewiſe copies of the evidence on which their conviction had been founded.

He vindicates his conduct.

When the embaſſadors came to Archelaus, he told them, without heſitation, that he had expreſſed his readineſs to receive the young princes; which he had done, in the zeal of his heart, as the moſt probable method of conferring an eſſential obligation both on the father and the ſons; for he confeſſed his apprehenſion leſt Herod, yielding to the impetuous force of his paſſions, might have completed their deſtruction; but on the whole, he declared that he had not entertained any thoughts of ſending them to Cæſar, or of protecting them in any illegal proceedings to the prejudice of their father.

When Olympus and Volumnius arrived at Rome, they found Cæſar ſo much reconciled to Herod, and ſo extremely well diſpoſed towards him, that they made no ſcruple of delivering their diſpatches, according to the orders they had received. Theſe letters were put into a proper form by the management of Nicolaus, who had conducted the previous buſineſs of his commiſſion in the following manner: On his firſt arrival at Rome, and being introduced to the palace of the emperor, excluſive of the inſtructions with which he was charged, he drew up a formal accuſation againſt Syllæus, accuſing him of practices of the moſt flagitious nature imaginable; ample materials for which accuſation he had obtained from the Arabians themſelves, who were at that time greatly divided in their ſentiments of their own affairs. One of the charges againſt Syllæus was the murder of Obodas, and many perſons of the ſame family, for proof of which many letters of his own writing, which had been intercepted, were produced. Now Nicolaus, a principal part of whoſe commiſſion it was to induce Cæſar to think more favourably of Herod than he had done, made all proper uſe of the providential diſcovery of theſe intercepted letters, to promote the intereſt of his employer. Reaſoning with himſelf, he conſidered that if he ſhould commence his application by endeavouring to palliate or defend the conduct of Herod, the emperor would at once be ſtruck with the whole deſign of his commiſſion; but that if he introduced what he had to ſay, by proper reflections on the conduct of Syllæus, it would be be an eaſy matter to juſtify Herod in the courſe of the converſation.

The matter brought to a hearing.

At length a day was appointed for the hearing of this buſineſs, when Nicolaus, being aſſiſted by ſome agents of Aretas, proceeded to alledge the following accuſations againſt Syllæus. He was charged with "having occaſioned the murder of his king and ſovereign; with murdering many of his ſubjects the Arabians; with taking up enormous ſums of money, for the purpoſe of diſturbing the public peace; with having been a notorious violater of the chaſtity of women, both at Rome, and in Arabia; and, finally, with having impoſed on the emperor himſelf by the propagation of the moſt improbable lyes and calumnious reports, which was evidenced by the account he gave of the conduct of Herod, the whole of which was totally foreign from the truth." He was proceeding to make good his allegations on all theſe charges, but Cæſar interrupted Nicolaus with reſpect to this laſt article, and deſired him to paſs over all the reſt, and to ſpeak to that ſingle circumſtance. "Make me acquainted (ſaid the emperor) with this particular part of the conduct of Herod. Did he not go into Arabia with an army? Did not two thouſand five hundred men fall there, by his arms? Did he not ravage the country, and carry off a number of priſoners?" In anſwer hereto Nicolaus ſaid, that he himſelf was as well able to give a proper account of the matter as any man exiſting. Having mentioned this, he averred that there was very little of truth in the whole ſtory, as it had been reported; and he aſſerted that Herod had been much leſs to blame in the whole conduct of the buſineſs than was generally ſuppoſed.

Evidence of Nicolaus.

Cæſar was aſtoniſhed at what Nicolaus had ſaid, and declared he would pay the utmoſt attention to what he had farther to advance; he thereupon related things in order as they had happened: he recounted the circumſtance of the five hundred talents which Herod had lent Syllæus upon his bond; ſaid that the time of payment had elapſed, and that Herod had a legal right to recover the debt from the country. He farther urged that the body of men to whom Syllæus had given the name of an army, did not deſerve that name, as it conſiſted only of ſuch a number as was ſufficient for putting in execution the legal claim of Herod; that the latter did not proceed in a raſh or violent manner, though the time of payment being more than expired, he had an undoubted right to ſue for his bond whenever it might be agreeable to him. On the contrary, he choſe rather, in the firſt place, to make application to Saturninus and Volumnius, who were then governors of Syria; and this appeal being made to them, Syllæus, in their preſence, at Berytus, bound himſelf by the ſacred obligation of an oath, and ſwore by the fortune of Cæſar, to pay all the money due to Herod within thirty days, and likewiſe to deliver up all the fugitives: but when the time was expired, neither the money was paid, nor were the fugitives reſtored. Hereupon Herod again made application to the governors, who gave it as their opinion, that he had a right to chuſe his own mode of redreſs. This therefore was the occaſion of Herod's going into Arabia, and gave riſe to the war which his enemies had ſo illiberally cenſured, with every circumſtance of aggravation. "But is it poſſible (ſaid Nicolaus) that this can be deemed a war, which was undertaken by the permiſſion and approbation of the governors; that had its juſtice founded in the proſecution of a lawful demand, when the detention of right had been endeavoured to be defended by the violation of a ſolemn oath, which had been ſworn before the gods, and ratified by the name of Cæſar?"

His account of the favourable treatment of the priſoners by Syllæus.

"Let us now (ſaid Nicolaus) ſpeak with regard to the priſoners. At firſt they conſiſted of about forty of the principal leaders of the Trachonite robbers, and theſe were followed by many others, who having made incurſions into Judæa, and ravaged the country, making great ſpoil where-ever they came, at length fled from the vengeance of Herod, and took ſanctuary in Arabia; where, when they were arrived, Syllæus not only gave them entertainment, though they ought to have been conſidered as the common enemies of mankind, but protected them, granted them lands, and accepted a ſhare of the booty which they ſo unjuſtly acquired. Now Syllæus had bound himſelf by a ſolemn oath to reſtore theſe very men, as well as the money that he had borrowed, within the limited time before-mentioned; and, Sir, I dare confidently aſſert (and call on any perſon living to contradict me), that Herod took no other priſoners in Arabia than theſe robbers: and even of theſe ſome made their eſcape."

"One ſtory more regarding theſe priſoners is well worthy the notice and attention of Cæſar, becauſe reſpecting that he has been impoſed upon in a more glaring manner than with regard to any other circumſtance. I can with truth declare, that at the time when a band of the Arabians attacked our troops, and a few of our men fell a ſacrifice, Herod found himſelf under a neceſſity, in his own defence, of repelling force by force; during the conflict Nacebus, their general, was killed, and with him fell twenty-five of his forces, but not a man beyond this number. Now Syllæus's account has made every man a hundred, and ſwelled theſe twenty-five to two thouſand five hundred."

This ſpeech of Nicolaus ſeemed to have the wiſhed for effect upon Cæſar, who turning towards Syllæus with a countenance in which was expreſſed the utmoſt vehemence of rage, demanded how many Arabians were ſlain in the action he had mentioned. Syllæus heſitated for a while, as if to recollect a circumſtance that he had forgot, and then acknowledged that he had been ſomewhat miſtaken with regard to the number.

Matters having proceeded thus far, the next buſineſs was, to read the conditions of the bond given by Syllæus to Herod, the arbitrations of the governors, and the remonſtrances that had been made by the ſeveral cities and towns, complaining of the various robberies that had been committed.

Nothing

Syllæus capitally convicted and condemned.

Nothing now remained to convince Cæsar of the iniquitous practices of Syllæus, against whom he passed sentence of death; and restored Herod to that share of favour which he had formerly held, confessing that he had been mistaken with regard to his conduct, or he never should have listened to those calumnious reports that had influenced him so much to his disadvantage, and provoked him to such unreasonable severities against him. He farther told Syllæus, that nothing less than his atrocious impudence, the lyes he had been guilty of telling, and the slanders he had propagated, could have induced him to fail of the usual respect for his best of friends.

The issue of the whole matter was, that orders were given for conducting Syllæus back to Arabia, where he was first to pay the debts he had contracted, and then to suffer an ignominious death. With regard to Aretas, his presuming to usurp the royal authority without having obtained the approbation and full consent of the emperor, Cæsar was extremely disgusted at the circumstance, and conceived an idea of transferring to Herod the government of the province of which he was possessed: but Cæsar changed his intentions, on reading the letters which were delivered him by Olympus and Volumnius, which letters were filled with the most bitter invectives against his own sons. Now the instructions that had been given to Olympus and Volumnius were, that if they found Cæsar in a mild and placable disposition, they should deliver their letters, which they did in pursuance of that order; but Cæsar, upon the perusal of them, having made proper allowance for his age, the violence of his passions, and the weight of his misfortunes, altered his resolution, which he had no sooner done than he ordered the embassadors from Aretas to be admitted. To these he gave audience, and reprehended them for the rash conduct of their master in assuming to himself the sovereign power without permission so to do. Having talked to them for a while in this strain, he received their presents, and confirmed Aretas in his authority, to the utter astonishment of the embassadors.

Letter of condolence from Cæsar to Herod.

Being thus reconciled to Herod, Cæsar wrote him a letter of condolence on account of the trouble he met with from his sons; allowing him free permission, and investing him with full power to proceed against them as parricides, if he should be convinced that they were engaged in the unnatural and infamous plot of which they were suspected: but if, on farther enquiry, he thought that there was nothing more to be alledged against them than simply a contrivance to effect their escape, he advised him to moderate his wrath, and let a more gentle reprehension take place of severer punishment. Upon the whole, the substance of his advice was, to assemble a council at Berytus, in which place a great number of Romans resided; and there to demand the assistance of the governors of the adjacent provinces, and to request the attendance of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, together with that of a number of persons of high rank; who having heard and concluded on the whole matter, should give their opinions, and finally decide the business.

CHAP. XVI.

A Convention summoned by HEROD at BERYTUS. His rancorous Persecution of his Sons, who, at the Instance of VOLUMNIUS are condemned to die. TYRO's generous Vindication of the unfortunate Princes, and his Remonstrance to HEROD. He is committed to Prison; and afterwards, with Three Hundred other Persons, torn to pieces by the Populace. Death of ALEXANDER and ARISTOBULUS by Strangulation. Cruelty of HEROD to his Relations.

Barbarous and unnatural behaviour of Herod towards his son.

THE receipt of the letter from Cæsar afforded the highest satisfaction to Herod, not only as it assured him of being restored to the favour of the emperor, but as it gave him full permission to dispose of his sons in such a manner as might be most agreeable to himself. It is something singular, and worthy of notice in the character of Herod, that whereas in former times, when he was in prosperity, though he had been a severe and rigid father towards his children, yet he had never shewn so bloody a disposition as to seek their lives; yet now, on this happy change and improvement of his circumstances, he became, from what cause it is hard to say, more severe and cruel than ever, and indulged this disposition to a most extravagant degree.

He summons a council at Berytus.

Agreeable to the advice of Cæsar, he summoned a council to meet at Berytus, consisting of all the persons recommended in the emperor's letter, excepting only Archelaus, which might be owing to an antipathy to the man, or to the fear that he might frustrate his designs. The parties being all met according to the summons, Herod did not think proper to bring his sons to the council, but left them at the village of Plantane in Sidon, which was but at a small distance, that they might be brought up if it should appear to be necessary. When the council were assembled, which consisted of one hundred and fifty persons, Herod went into the council-chamber without any attendants, and there, without reciting any part of the history of his own misfortunes, which might properly have introduced what he had to say, he began to exhibit an accusation against his sons. This charge was delivered in a very extraordinary manner, with equal vehemence and acrimony, and in language that very ill became his character as a father: it was accompanied with looks and behaviour of the most violent and menacing kind; and had more the appearance of the ravings of a madman, than the sober declamation

Exhibits an accusation against his sons.

tion of a man in his senses. His arguments were inconsistent and confused, and his discourse incoherent, unconnected, and almost unintelligible. He brought no proofs in support of what he said, by which the judges could form their opinion; but they were obliged to place implicit confidence in every thing the accuser advanced: thus, instead of being judges, they were made a kind of parties in the business, and rather took part against the prisoners than in their behalf. It is true that some letters which the young princes had written were read; but no proof arose therefrom that they had been guilty of disloyalty, or harboured any evil intentions towards the king. All that appeared from these letters was, that they had consulted on the means of effecting their escape, and there were some few intimations that they were dissatisfied with, and had taken offence at some part of their father's conduct. When Herod, in the course of his charge, came to remark on these parts of the letters, he, in the most violent and indecent manner, sought to exaggerate the crime, insisting that a clearer proof of a conspiracy could not exist: he likewise swore, in the most vehement manner, that death itself was not so dreadful in his idea as the language of those letters. "It is true (said he) that I might claim and assert that power over my children which hath been given me by the laws of nature, and ratified by the favour of Cæsar, not to mention the authority I derive from the express laws of my own country, which say, that 'If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, all the men of his city shall stone him with stones, that he die.' (Deut. chap. 21.) But I would rather decline the exercise of my undoubted authority in this case, and submit the matter to your opinions; not that I wish you to determine on an affair that is already determined in its own nature, but I would have your sentiments coincide with mine, in order to ratify the sentence: which will serve as a lesson of instruction to posterity, intimating what kind of punishment ought to follow such enormous crimes."

Partial conduct of the judges.

His absolute authority over his children confirmed.

It was now indisputably evident to the council, what were Herod's views: they saw by the manner in which the business was hurried forward, without even permitting the brothers to speak in their own defence, that the king had determined how he would act: wherefore, though very unwillingly, they voted, "that Herod might dispose of his children in the way most agreeable to himself." This vote being passed, Saturninus arose to give his opinion. He was a man of great dignity, and one who had discharged various offices of trust and consequence. He declared that he thought the prisoners ought to undergo some kind of punishment, but that of death would be too severe; saying that he felt the case the more sensibly, as he was himself the father of children. "I should be unhappy (said he) after such a variety of misfortunes as Herod hath suffered, that he should at length be oppressed with one so much more calamitous than all the rest." The three sons of Saturninus, who acted as deputies to their father, were the next who spoke, and they concurred with him in opinion. Volumnius now arose to deliver his sentiments, which were, that nothing less than death could atone for a crime of such enormous magnitude; and the majority of the company coinciding with him, the matter was decided to the prejudice of the brothers.

Saturninus speaks in favour of the brothers; and Volumnius against them.

Herod meets Nicolaus at Tyre, and informs him of the condemnation of his sons

As soon as the sentence was passed, Herod took his two sons with him, and proceeded to Tyre, where meeting Nicolaus, who was on his return from Rome, he informed him of the proceedings that had taken place at Berytus, and inquired, in his turn, what opinion the people of Rome had formed with respect to his sons. To this Nicolaus answered, that they were universally censured for the impropriety of their conduct; that the people said they ought to be confined in chains for what they had been guilty of; nay, that death itself would not be too great a punishment if the fact were clearly proved against them: since in case they were punished in a slighter degree, the public voice would declare that the prosecution was not so much founded in justice and reason, as in spleen and resentment: yet that, if Herod seemed more disposed to extend his mercy to them, he would do well to grant them their liberty, rather than by persisting in an act of severity, to perpetrate a deed which he might hereafter wish had never taken place. Having received this information, Herod continued for a considerable time in thoughtful meditation, totally silent, and as not knowing how to act; at length he invited Nicolaus to proceed to sea with him, and they took their departure for Cæsarea.

Nicolaus accompanies Herod to Cæsarea.

On their arrival at that place, they found that the general conversation turned on the story of Herod and his sons: the people seemed to be extremely anxious to know the event of the prosecution: it was the universal apprehension that the death of the brothers would be the consequence of the hatred that had been conceived against them. Pity for their situation seemed to penetrate every heart; but no one dared to speak his own sentiments, or to listen to those of others; so that the general resentment appeared to be smothered, and every motion, whether of grief or compassion, to be suppressed.

The young princes vindicated by Tyro;

There was one objection, however, to the truth of this observation. Among the king's troops there was a person named Tyro, an old soldier of very distinguished bravery, who had a son about the age of Alexander, that had been honoured with the friendship of the young prince. This man made no scruple to speak his mind with freedom, nor hesitated to deliver those truths which were industriously concealed by others. He made frequent and public declaration that all sense of honour and justice was banished from the face of the earth; that chicanery and ill-will had usurped their places, and ſo deluded the minds of the public, that all ideas of right and wrong, of good and evil, were confounded. This freedom of behaviour could not but be attended with danger: but there was ſomething ſo nobly diſintereſted in this generous proof of courage and virtue, in ſo critical a juncture, that it attracted the regard of every one; and they that would have been fearful to have proceeded ſo far themſelves, could not but eſteem the man who riſked ſo much in the public cauſe: and, in fact, the man muſt have wanted all feeling and ſenſibility, who, in ſuch a ſituation, could have failed to expreſs the common ſentiments of humanity.

Tyro boldly expoſtulates with the king.

Tyro, not content with what he had publicly ſaid, went to the king, with whom he demanded the honour of a converſation; which being granted, he expreſſed himſelf to the following purport: "If, Sir, I do not give vent to the ſentiments of my heart, I muſt be wretched. I am not inſenſible of the danger of the office I have undertaken, nor of the language I am about to utter. The danger will be my own; but ſervice and advantage will accrue to Herod, if he pleaſe to pay a proper regard to what I ſay. Will you give me leave to aſk, Sir, if you retain your former underſtanding, and the ſenſe of things you heretofore entertained? Where is that greatneſs of mind, that dignity, that reſolution, which carried you through great difficulties in time paſt? Recollect you what is become of your friends and relations? Are they all loſt? For it is impoſſible that I ſhould include in that number, thoſe who can behold the accumulating miſeries of your court and family, once ſo happy, and expreſs no concern for the melancholy change of affairs? Are you totally blind, Sir, to your own intereſt? Cannot you perceive what an unhappy turn your circumſtances are taking? Are you determined on the deſtruction of the children of a wife who was once ſo dear to you, and who have themſelves ſo many virtues to recommend them? Is this, Sir, a time of life for you to think of truſting yourſelf to the direction of an ambitious young man, and to ſubmit to the conduct of thoſe among your relations whom you have heretofore, more than once, doomed to puniſhment for their crimes? Do you not perceive, by the utter ſilence and profound aſtoniſhment of the people, that your own conduct is tacitly condemned, and the fate of your ſons lamented, by the public? And let me inform you, Sir, that with regard to the military in general, officers and common ſoldiers included, they have the utmoſt commiſeration for the fate of the young princes, and are perpetually curſing thoſe to whom they conceive their diſtreſſes are owing."

Tyro and his aſſociates ſent to priſon by Herod.

While Tyro was ſpeaking with reſpect to his maſter's misfortunes, and repreſenting the treachery of the conduct of thoſe who ought to have ſerved him with fidelity, Herod heard him with a tolerable degree of patience: but when he exceeded the bounds of diſcretion, and violated the laws of politeneſs, by the bold, intrepid, and expoſtulatory manner of his diſcourſe, his freedom began to be very diſagreeable. Herod, reſenting the ſuppoſed inſult, demanded to know the names of thoſe officers and ſoldiers in particular, who had ſpoken with the freedom that Tyro had mentioned. Tyro made no ſcruple of giving up their names; on which the king gave immediate orders that the informer, and all the perſons accuſed, ſhould be apprehended and committed to priſon.

Information of Tryphon againſt Tyro, who, with others, are tortured.

This event had no ſooner taken place, than Tryphon, the king's barber, repaired to Herod, to whom he ſaid that Tyro had repeatedly made him offers of money, and promiſed him the friendſhip of Alexander, if, when he went to ſhave the king, he would take an opportunity of cutting his throat. As ſoon as this information was given, Tyro and his ſon, together with the barber, were all put to the torture. Tyro's ſon obſerving the ſeverity of his father's ſufferings, and the fortitude with which he bore them, together with the little hope that there was of a mitigation of his pains, called out to thoſe who tormented them, to take himſelf and his father from the rack, in conſequence of which he would relate all that he knew which might lead to a diſcovery of the truth. On the promiſe of preſent eaſe, he declared that his father had reſolved to murder Herod with his own hands, as he had private acceſs to him; and that he had determined to do this for the ſervice of Alexander, at whatever hazard of his own ſafety. In conſequence of this declaration the father was delivered from the extremity of his torture; but whether the confeſſion that the ſon had made was founded on fact, or only an artifice to obtain preſent eaſe, has always remained a matter of doubt.

Confeſſion of Tyro's ſon.

By this time Herod was come to a reſolution (if he had not formed this reſolution before) to carry the purpoſes of his deſign fully into execution, without entertaining any further doubts on the ſubject, or leaving room for repentance. Wherefore he convened an aſſembly of the people, and ordered that three hundred captains, with Tyro and his ſon, and the barber that had been evidence, ſhould be brought forth. This being done, the barber accuſed them to the multitude, who tore them all to pieces, not leaving a ſingle man alive. With regard to Alexander and Ariſtobulus, they were ſent to Sebaſte, where they were ſtrangled, in conſequence of an order given by their father; after which their bodies were depoſited in a ſepulchre at Alexandrion, near their grandfather on the maternal ſide, and ſeveral others of their anceſtors.

300 officers, with Tyro, and his ſon, killed by the populace.

Alexander and Ariſtobulus ſtrangled.

Remarks of Joſephus on Herod's proceedings.

It may not appear a matter of any great ſurpriſe to a reflecting mind, if an averſion ſo deeply rooted, and of ſuch long continuance, ſhould have rendered Herod inſenſible to all thoſe finer feelings that would have done honour to his humanity; but it is yet doubtful on which party the blame ought to fix: whether it ſhould be imputed to the natural ſeverity of the king's diſpoſition; to his unbounded ambition, that could not not bear the idea of any apparent rival of his power; or whether there might not be ſomething reprehenſible in the conduct of the young princes, who, by a continual courſe of provocation, might have impelled the father to act in ſo implacable a manner. After all that can be ſaid on this ſubject, is not the whole determinable on the principles of that irreſiſtible power which cannot be controuled by human wiſdom? If I were to deliver my private ſentiments, I ſhould ſay, that I think all human actions are determined by a neceſſary chain of conſequences, and over-ruled by that providential power which we diſtinguiſh by the name of Fate, by which all our proceedings are directed; though not in ſo abſolute a manner but that our own endeavours may be allowed to contribute much to the determination of that fate, ſince the freedom of action undoubtedly remains with ourſelves. But this is an affair enveloped in myſtery, of which I ſhall ſay no more, eſpecially as the ſubject is particularly treated of in the books of our laws.

Probable motives of the ſons' conduct.

Let us now inquire into the motives by which the ſons might poſſibly be actuated: perhaps by that heat of blood by which the paſſions of youth are impelled, they might act in too bold and imperious a manner; they might be too ready to liſten to evil reports to their father's prejudice, and too partial judges of his life and conduct. They were probably malicious in the ſentiments they entertained of him, and too free in their converſation, which would of courſe expoſe them to the arts of ſpies and informers, who were ſeeking for every opportunity to procure evidence againſt them. But then, on the contrary, can we conceive any thing more atrocious and inexcuſable than the conduct of Herod, who, without being able to adduce any poſitive proof of a traiterous intention, without evidence to convict them, and even in failure of ſtrong preſumptive evidence that they had conſpired againſt him, could indulge the vehemence of his paſſions to ſuch a degree as to take away their lives? One would imagine that their merit would have argued ſtrongly againſt ſuch a procedure; for they were princes admirably accompliſhed in the perfections of body and mind: they were ſkilful in all the various exerciſes of youth, trained in the art of war, and deeply read in human learning: Alexander, in particular, was uncommonly perfect in theſe qualifications. If Herod could not have been ſatisfied without their being condemned; why did he not baniſh them, or cauſe them to be kept in priſon? If they had been diſpoſed of in either way, he need not have been under apprehenſion of farther treachery; nor need he have ſuſpected that the Romans would have eſpouſed their cauſe, and enabled them to have attacked him with an open force.

Herod's ſeverity cenſured.

The taking away their lives, therefore, with ſuch an impetuous haſte, to gratify his own intemperate frenzy, was an outrage of the moſt impious and tyrannical kind. Nor is any thing to be urged in mitigation of the crime; nor could ignorance or want of experience be pleaded; for Herod was well acquainted with the world, and of an age to have exerciſed the calm dictates of his ſober reaſon. Nor does the long delay in the execution of the intended vengeance, in the leaſt excuſe or palliate the crime; on the contrary, it is rather an aggravation of it: for if the deed had been done during the ſudden impulſe of an impetuous paſſion, ariſing from the preſent ſenſe of ſome atrocious injury, the enormity of the offence would have been in ſome degree extenuated. But when we reflect how long a time he took to conſider on this daring violation of the laws of God and nature, and that at length he determined to perpetrate it, we ſhall be compelled to acknowledge, that the action muſt have ariſen from the moſt abandoned profligacy and depravity of heart. Herod, however, during the remainder of his life, proved its conſiſtency with this melancholy ſpecimen; for he ſhewed no mercy on the reſt of his relations, even thoſe for whom he had formerly entertained the tendereſt affection: but the leſs compaſſion was due to them, becauſe they deſerved the puniſhment they underwent: yet the cruelty of Herod is not the leſs to be cenſured, as will appear in the courſe of the following pages.

Cruelty to his other kindred.

CHAP. I.

Hatred of the People to ANTIPATER. Arts employed by ANTIPATER to advance his Intereſt. He is counter-acted by SALOME, whom HEROD compels to marry ALEXAS. GLAPHYRA, and her Marriage-Portion, ſent back to ARCHELAUS her Father. Certain Contracts diſſolved by HEROD.

Antipater becomes odious to the people.

THE arts of Antipater having at length produced the execrable murder of the brothers, he conceived that he had made a conſiderable progreſs towards his intended deſign on the life of the father: but there were many obſtacles yet in his way; for though his ambition prompted him to proceed in the moſt moſt rapid manner, yet the natural order of things would not yield to the impetuoſity of his deſires. It is true that after the death of the princes, there was no immediate impediment between him and the crown; at leaſt he was freed from all fear or danger of other competitors; but he had one very great difficulty to ſurmount, which was the implacable hatred that the people bore to him; to which was ſuperadded the enmity of the army, which he conſidered as of more conſequence than the other circumſtance, as princes depend upon their troops for a protection and defence againſt the inſurrections ariſing from faction and tumult.

Antipater acts as king, Herod retaining only the name.

He was himſelf, however, the occaſion of theſe misfortunes, by having, with an equal degree of folly and wickedneſs, conſpired the deſtruction of the princes: but if the exerciſe of power would have ſatisfied his ambition, he ought to have been content; for though Herod ſat on the throne, Antipater was the acting governor, all affairs were committed to his management, and he was king in every thing but in name. The very crime for which he ought to have ſuffered death, was deemed an inſtance of his loyalty and regard, as if in taking away the lives of the princes, he had conſulted the honour, welfare, and preſervation of the king: whereas, in fact, in the injury he did the ſons, he gratified his ill-will againſt the father; and his antipathy was of ſo rancorous a kind, that it was principally on account of the father that he entertained ſuch an inveterate malice towards them. In a word, Antipater conceived it would tend to promote his intereſt to complete the deſtruction of every perſon who could either give evidence reſpecting his treaſon, prevent his carrying it into execution, or that might be able to aſſiſt Herod in the fruſtration of his deſigns; and as he was now deeply embarked in the plot, he thought it would be dangerous for him to leave any part of his intended deſign unfiniſhed.

It is a fact that, after the death of Herod, he conſidered the government as his own of courſe; but then he was apprehenſive of the danger that might ariſe from delay, becauſe that if, in the interim, his real deſigns ſhould by any means be made known to his father, his ruin would undoubtedly be completed.

He conciliates the good-will of his father's friends.

For this reaſon he was exceedingly aſſiduous to obtain the good opinion of his father's friends, which he courted by every poſſible civility he could ſhew them, by making preſents of great value, and by loading them with ſuch favours of every kind, as he thought would obviate any impreſſion they might have received to his diſadvantage: and he was particularly attentive to Saturninus, governor of Syria, and his brother, and other friends who reſided at Rome. He even conceived a hope of bringing over Salome to his intereſt. Now Antipater was a perſon of a moſt ſingular good addreſs, and admirably ſkilled in the art of conferring an obligation; beſide that he exceeded almoſt every man exiſting, in a plauſibility of behaviour which diſguiſed the real ſentiments of his mind: yet all the artifice of his conduct was inſufficient to impoſe upon his aunt, Salome, who penetrated the depth of his deſigns; kept an attentive eye on all his motions, and countermined one artifice by another. He ſo managed affairs, that the daughter of Salome, the widow of Ariſtobulus, was eſpouſed to his uncle by the mother's ſide, and the other daughter was married to Callæus; but neither of theſe connections, however artfully contrived, was ſufficient to diſguiſe the wickedneſs of his deſign, or to render him leſs odious than his complicated crimes deſerved he ſhould appear.

Salome conſents to marry Alexas.

During all this time Salome was moſt diſtractedly in love with Syllæus; but Herod recommended her to marry Alexas, in which he was ſeconded by the advice of the empreſs Julia, who was, indeed, very peremptory with her not to act in oppoſition to this advice, unleſs ſhe was determined to forfeit the good opinion of her brother for ever; as he had moſt ſolemnly ſworn, that if ſhe refuſed to accept of this match, he would never afterwards acknowledge her as his ſiſter. Salome having reflected on the affair, acknowledged that the advice they had given ought in reaſon to be complied with, and conſented to give her hand to Alexas.

Herod ſends Glaphyra home to her father.

Soon after this event took place Herod ſent Glaphyra, the widow of his ſon Alexander, and the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, home to her father, and with her he returned the fortune that had been received in marriage, that no complaint might ariſe with reſpect to pecuniary matters: and he gave particular inſtructions that great care ſhould be taken with regard to the education of his grand-children. Now Glaphyra had borne two ſons to Alexander; and Berenice, the daughter of Salome, and wife of Ariſtobulus, had three ſons and two daughters.

He cauſes his grand-children to be eſpouſed.

Herod would frequently addreſs his friends reſpecting theſe children, of whom he would ſpeak with ſingular kindneſs, lamenting the ill fate that had attended his own ſons, and offering prayers to heaven that the children might be prevented from encountering the like misfortunes; that as they grew in years they might increaſe in goodneſs, and live to confeſs the obligations that they were under to their parents. He propoſed that the eldeſt ſon of Alexander ſhould hereafter marry the daughter of his brother Pheroras, and that the eldeſt ſon of Ariſtobulus ſhould wed the daughter of Antipater. He intended to give one of the daughters of Ariſtobulus to the ſon of Antipater, and the other daughter to his own ſon Herod, whom he had by the daughter of the high-prieſt; for polygamy is allowable among our people.

Antipater ſhews his averſion to them.

The chief view that Herod had in theſe intended alliances was founded in motives of pity to the orphan children; ſince he thought that theſe bonds of affinity would induce Antipater to treat them with a greater degree of humanity. But this intention fell ſhort of the propoſed effect, as Antipater now entertained no more regard for for the children than he had heretofore done for their parents. In fact, the tenderneſs of Herod in this particular was ſo far from making a proper impreſſion upon Antipater, that, on the contrary, it increaſed his anger and jealouſy to the higheſt pitch. The greater the degree of favour the king ſhewed to theſe children on the one hand, the greater was Antipater's hatred to them on the other: in fact, he was afraid of what might hereafter happen, when they came to be of an age to aſſert their own rights; eſpecially if they ſhould be aſſiſted by Archelaus, and Pheroras, the tetrarch, whoſe ſon, according to the preſent appearance of things, would probably become the huſband of one of the daughters.

Antipater, likewiſe, ſuffered no ſmall degree of mortification, from the conſideration of the compaſſion the people entertained for the fate of the unfortunate princes; the veneration in which they held their memory; and the rooted antipathy they bore for thoſe whom they conſidered as the authors of their ruin. He knew likewiſe the anxious wiſh of the populace, for an opportunity to expoſe him for his treacherous and murderous practices with regard to his brothers. Nor was he leſs unhappy in mind when he reflected that, according to the preſent ſituation of affairs, his nephews had a very probable chance of acquiring a future ſhare in the government: nor could he deviſe any method to ſecure himſelf, but by prevailing on Herod to ſet aſide the marriage-contracts above-mentioned. He therefore made application for this purpoſe; and, with ſome difficulty, obtained the favour; and likewiſe that the daughter of Ariſtobulus ſhould be given in marriage to himſelf, and the daughter of Pheroras to his ſon: and upon this all the former plans of marriage were totally laid aſide.

Herod diſſolves certain marriage contracts.

Number of his wives and children.

At this time king Herod had no leſs than nine wives: by the firſt he had his ſon Antipater; the ſecond was the daughter of Simon the high-prieſt, who bore him a ſon, that was called by the name of Herod; the daughter of his own brother was the third; the fourth was his couſin german; but by theſe two he had no children; a woman of Samaria was the fifth, by whom he had two ſons, called Antipas and Archelaus, and a daughter named Olympia, who afterwards became the wife of Joſeph, a relation of the king. The ſixth wife was Cleopatra, of Jeruſalem, who was the mother of Herod and Philip, which latter received his education at Rome. Ballas was the name of the ſeventh wife, who made Herod the father of Phaſael; the eighth was named Phædera; and the ninth Elpis, by which laſt he had two daughters, who received the names of Roxana and Salome. With regard to the two other daughters of Herod, the children of Mariamne, and ſiſters of Alexander and Ariſtobulus (thoſe who had been refuſed in marriage by Pheroras), he wedded one of them to Antipater, the ſon of his ſiſter Salome; and the other to the ſon of his brother Phaſael, as hath been already mentioned.

CHAP. II.

The JEWS ſecured in their Profeſſions and the Enjoyment of their Liberties. The Death of ZAMARIS, who leaves a virtuous Family. The Death of JACIMUS, whoſe Son PHILIP is appointed General of the Army by King AGRIPPA.

Herod ſecures himſelf againſt the Trachonites.

AT this time Herod devoted his attention to ſecure the country from the incurſions of the Trachonites; for which purpoſe he came to a reſolution to build a large and extenſive village in the centre of the country; and to fortify it with a ſtrong garriſon, that might equally ſerve for the convenience of ſallying forth on the enemy, or ſecuring that part of the country from their inroads.

Zamaris leaves Babylon;

At the time that Herod was projecting the above ſcheme, a perſon informed him that a certain Jew, named Zamaris, had left the country of Babylon, attended by five hundred horſemen, armed with bows and arrows, near a fifth part of whom were related to him; and that he had marched his troops over the river Euphrates, to ſettle in the country adjacent to Daphne in Syria, where a caſtle named Valatha, not far from Antioch, had been given him by the governor Saturninus, as a place proper for his reſidence.

and is invited by Herod to ſettle in Batanæa.

On receiving this information, Herod ſent to invite Zamaris, and all the people who attended him, to come into his part of the country, promiſing them the poſſeſſion of lands, and all other accommodations, in the diſtrict of Batanæa, which bordered on the land of the Trachonites; together with an exemption from the payment of all duties, taxes and tributes, as well thoſe for their lands, as perſonal taxes, only on the condition of their protecting that quarter of the country againſt the invaſions and inroads of the robbers and plunderers. Zamaris conſidering theſe terms as advantageous, was very well diſpoſed to accept the offer, which he accordingly did; and on the land that Herod ſet apart for his accommodation, he erected a number of forts, and built a town, to which he gave the name of Bathyra. Being ſettled in this ſituation, he not only protected the inhabitants from the incurſions of the Trachonites, but likewiſe maintained the Jews from Babylon to Jeruſalem in the free exerciſe of their profeſſions, agreeable to the practice and duty prevalent among that people.

Zamaris is joined by great numbers of Jews.

Zamaris being thus happily provided for, was joined by immenſe numbers of thoſe among the Jews who made it a point of principle to adhere to the religion and laws of their anceſtors: by this means the country was ſoon peopled to a degree that is ſcarcely to be conceived; and the immunities, rights and advantages above-mentioned, the inhabitants were permitted to enjoy without diſpute or moleſtation, during the whole remaining part of the reign of Herod: it is true, that in the reign of Philip, who was his ſucceſſor, ſome ſmall taxes were laid upon them; but theſe were of very ſhort continuance. In the reign of Agrippa the Great, and in that of his ſon, who ſucceeded him, by the ſame name, the taxes laid on them were very burdenſome; nor were thoſe impoſed by the Romans afterwards more favourable; ſtill, however, their perſonal freedom remained unviolated; of all which more will be ſaid in the ſubſequent parts of this work.

His death, character, children, &c.

The Babylonian, Zamaris, to whom the command above-mentioned had been given by Herod, lived a long life, diſtinguiſhed by the exerciſe of every virtue, and the exertion of every law of honour; and dying, left his children in poſſeſſion of thoſe amiable qualities for which their father had been celebrated. Among theſe children was one named Jacimus, who was a man remarkable for his bravery, and he had the reputation of being one of the moſt accompliſhed perſons of his age. This Jacimus ſerved among the guards of the kings of Babylon; and died at a very advanced age, leaving behind him one ſon, named Philip, for whom king Agrippa conceived a great eſteem, and made him general of his army, in reward of his ſingular valour, and the unexampled integrity of his conduct.

CHAP. III.

The whole Care of the Government devolves on ANTIPATER. The Women devoted to the PHARISEES, refuſe to ſwear Allegiance to the King and to CÆSAR. The PHARISEES fined, and Payment made by the Wife of PHERORAS. The Wife of PHERORAS informed againſt. He is adviſed to part with her, but abſolutely refuſes. HEROD forbids all Communication between ANTIPATER and his Mother.

Herod puts great confidence in Antipater.

WHILE the affairs of Herod were in the ſituation above-deſcribed, the chief management and conduct of the public buſineſs was in effect in the hands of Antipater, for whom Herod entertained the greateſt regard, and placed the utmoſt confidence in his loyalty and affection. This truſt, however, Antipater abuſed in the moſt ſhocking manner: but he had the art of diſguiſing the hypocriſy of his conduct by ſuch crafty and ſpecious pretences, that Herod paid the moſt implicit attention to all he ſaid, taking it for granted that he would not deceive him in a ſingle circumſtance: ſo that the ſubtlety of his conduct did not render him leſs dangerous than the exertion of his power.

Tranſactions between Pheroras and Antipater.

Now, between Pheroras and Antipater there was the utmoſt appearance of a cordial intimacy; the former being deceived, and induced to be on friendly terms with him, by the arts of the women, who were in the faction of Antipater. Now Pheroras did not dare to act in oppoſition to the ſentiments of his wife, his mother in law, or his ſiſter; though in fact he had an utter averſion to them all, on account of the indignities they had heretofore offered to his virgin daughters. But it would have been a point of great imprudence to quarrel with people ſo neceſſary to the principal buſineſs, who were likewiſe acquainted with ſo many ſecrets of importance, and conſequently bound to keep thoſe of each other. Excluſive of all this, Antipater maintained the moſt intimate correſpondence with them, both on his own account and on that of his mother; for between theſe women there was a moſt perfect coincidence both of ſentiments and conduct.

Treacherous combination between the ladies at court.

At this time, however, there were frequent quarrels about trifles, between Pheroras and Antipater; but this happened chiefly at the inſtance of Salome, who was perpetually exciting their jealouſies of each other. Salome was exceedingly well informed of the nature of the plot from the beginning to the end; and had nearly reſolved in her own mind to make a diſcovery to Herod of the whole conſpiracy. Now at this time the conſpirators had obſerved that their meetings were watched, that their correſpondence was ſuſpected to be carried on in a myſterious manner, and that the king was jealous of, and diſpleaſed with their proceedings: wherefore they had a conference together, and reſolved that, for the future, their meetings ſhould not be held in ſo public a manner, but that they would pretend to have diſputed and quarrelled, and would frequently mention each other with diſreſpect in company; but particularly when Herod himſelf was within their hearing, or any other perſon whom they ſuppoſed would carry the news to the king: and this was to be the conſtant rule of their conduct; but the plot was to be privately carried on as if no ſuch agreement had taken place. It hath been before obſerved, that Salome was privy to the whole contrivance, all the ſteps of which ſhe had traced from its beginning to its preſent ſtate, through every part of its progreſs. Her method was, that as ſoon as ſhe had gleaned any intelligence by which ſhe could inflame the quarrel, ſhe carried it immediately to her brother, and made ſuch additions to the tale as her preſent invention could ſupply. She uſed to relate to him every circumſtance of the correſpondence they held; reported the ſubſtance of their ſecret conſultations, and adviſed Herod to take proper ſteps for his ſecurity; for that there could be no doubt but his life was in imminent danger. With regard to their quarrels and opprobrious language when they were in the preſence of other company, ſhe ſaid that theſe were only artifices to blind the eyes of others; for that when they were by themſelves they were extreme good friends, though undoubtedly enemies to thoſe to whom ſhe wiſhed that friendſhip might be kept a ſecret. In a word, what diſcoveries ſhe made loſt nothing in the relation: ſhe carried every circumſtance to her brother; who, by this time, began to think that there was ſome foundation for what she advanced; but Herod concealed his sentiments with great care; nor did he give implicit credit to every thing that his sister said, for he was not unacquainted that her disposition was sufficiently malicious to make an exaggerated report of every thing that she had heard.

Descriptive character of the Pharisees.

The ladies of Herod's court were extremely devoted to a sect of men among the Jews who took a singular pride in what they deemed legal righteousness, and were very ostentatious of being thought more holy than other people. This sect bore the name of Pharisees: they were an assuming and artful set of men, equally remarkable for their cunning and arrogance; and being instigated by no small share of vanity and pride, they made no scruple of affronting kings, and of despising all kinds of regal authority. It may not be improper to give an instance of this. When the whole body of the Jewish people received orders to take an oath of fidelity to Herod and to Cæsar, these people, to the number of above seven thousand, alone refused to comply with the injunction. Some time afterwards a fine was levied upon them for this refusal; upon which the wife of Pheroras paid the money for them. Now it happened that the Pharisees had acquired a reputation for the spirit of prophecy; and the people believed that they received the special assistance of divine revelation: in return, therefore, for the singular favour that had been done them in paying the fine, they propagated a report that the kingdom should be transferred from Herod and his family, to the issue of the princess and her husband Pheroras. This circumstance coming to the knowledge of Salome, she immediately intimated it to the king, and informed him what arts of bribery and corruption had been made use of in order to procure such a prediction.

They refuse to swear allegiance, and are subjected to a fine.

They are reputed to be prophets.

Their predictions.

Some of the Pharisees put to death.

Hereupon a strict search and inquiry was made, in consequence of which several Pharisees were apprehended, and put to death, as having been the chief abettors of the seditious prophecy; and among these was Bagoas the eunuch, and a youth named Carus, who was a particular favourite of Herod, on account of the singular beauty and elegance of his person. Exclusive of these, several persons belonging to Herod's own family were convicted of being concerned in the conspiracy: and these convictions arose from the testimony of the Pharisees themselves. Now, previous to this, the Pharisees had flattered Bagoas that he should be considered as the parent and benefactor of the prince that was hereafter to fill the throne: they predicted too, that the new king should be prosperous in all his undertakings, and that the government should be established in his family by the perpetuity of a race of legal descendants.

The wife of Pheroras accused.

Within a little while after the Pharisees had been tried, convicted and executed, Herod caused a number of his friends to be summoned in council, before whom he exhibited a complaint against the wife of Pheroras, in which it was alledged, that "it was owing to her counsel and advice that his brother had rejected the offer of the royal virgins to him in marriage, in so contemptuous a manner as he had done; that contrary to all law, and in a most unnatural manner, she had, to the utmost of her power, promoted a quarrel betwixt brethren, not only by her words, but by her actions: that she had taken part with the obstinate and rebellious Pharisees, by discharging for them the fine which Herod himself had ordered them to pay: and that she was, in a greater or less degree, concerned in the whole conspiracy." For these reasons Herod was of opinion that Pheroras would but act agreeable to his duty, if he were to dismiss so abandoned a woman, one that had fomented such differences between those who were nearly related: and this he thought ought to be done without farther difficulty or intreaty; especially as affairs were now advanced to such a length, that Herod would never hereafter acknowledge Pheroras for his brother, if he did not disown that woman for his wife.

Herod advises Pheroras to divorce his wife;

Pheroras could not but be very sensibly affected by what Herod advanced on this occasion: but nevertheless he made a public declaration, that though he was willing to pay all possible duty and respect to his prince and brother, yet he could not entertain the least thoughts of abandoning his wife; that nothing in the world should induce him to part with her, and that death itself was preferable to the idea of living without her. This refusal gave great uneasiness to Herod; but for the present he concealed his resentment, and contented himself with enjoining Antipater and his mother not to have any correspondence with Pheroras, and forbidding the ladies of the court to indulge themselves in their accustomed conversations. They readily promised to pay obedience to the order of the king; but nevertheless met privately, and conferred in the usual manner: and Antipater and Pheroras were more frequent in conversation than ever. A report was propagated at this time, that a love-intrigue subsisted between Antipater and the wife of Pheroras; and that their acquaintance and connection was promoted by the mother of Antipater.

which he refuses to comply with.

The offence that Herod had taken at the conduct of Antipater, and the resentment that he had expressed against it, began now to give him great uneasiness; and apprehensive of what might happen, in case the king's anger should increase, he immediately wrote to his friends at Rome to procure him an order to wait upon Cæsar without loss of time. This favour being granted, Herod dismissed Antipater, loaded with presents of great value, and likewise with his last will and testament, in which Antipater was declared his successor; and in case of his death the government was to descend to his son Herod, whose mother was the daughter of the high-priest.

At this period went likewise to Rome Syllæus, the Arabian, who had left unperformed some affairs which Cæsar had commanded him to transact. When Syllæus was at Rome, Antipater accuſed him before Cæſar, in the ſame manner that Nicolaus had heretofore done. He was likewiſe accuſed by Aretas, with having, contrary to his will and command, put to death, at Petra, ſeveral perſons of unqueſtionable character, among whom were Sohemus, a man diſtinguiſhed by the eminence of his virtue, and Tabatus, a ſervant of Cæſar. The following were the particulars of the affair. Among the number of Herod's guards was a certain Corinthian, in whom the king repoſed a very great degree of confidence. Syllæus offered this perſon a conſiderable ſum of money to kill the king, and the affair had ſo far proceeded that they were come to an agreement. Now Syllæus having told the particulars of this intended aſſaſſination to Tabatus, he repaired to the king with the intelligence of it. Hereupon the Corinthian was immediately put to the torture; and being ſtrictly queſtioned reſpecting the deſign, he at length acknowledged it, and charged two Arabians with being concerned in the plot, one of whom was a perſon of very diſtinguiſhed rank, and the other a man in whom Syllæus repoſed the utmoſt confidence. Theſe parties being alſo put to the torture, they acknowledged that they had come thither with a view to urge the Corinthian to carry his intended deſign into execution, and alſo to give him their aſſiſtance if it ſhould be found neceſſary. Informations being taken of all that was ſaid, Herod tranſmitted them to Saturninus, and he ſent them to Rome, where the affair was to be further inquired into, and the merits of it finally determined.

Pheroras retires to his government.

HEROD finding that Pheroras had ſo much tenderneſs for his wife, that he was obſtinately reſolved not to renounce her, gave orders that he ſhould return immediately to his government; and this he did with great readineſs; but was ſo much chagrined at the manner of his being diſmiſſed, that he ſolemnly ſwore he would never come back while the king lived; and he held his reſolution firmly; for Herod being ſoon afterwards taken ill, ſent for Pheroras to pay him a viſit, and receive ſome neceſſary ſecret inſtructions previous to his death: but the latter declined his attendance, ſaying that he was bound by a ſolemn oath, which he could not think of violating. Herod, however, ſtill retained a very tender affection for his brother, as will appear by the following circumſtance; for Pheroras being in his turn ſeized with a fit of ſickneſs, the king went, without the ceremony of an invitation, to pay him a viſit. Pheroras dying of this diſorder, the king iſſued orders that his body ſhould be carried to Jeruſalem, where it was interred in a very diſtinguiſhed manner.

His oath.

Death of Pheroras, and his honourable funeral.

Antipater was at this time at Rome: but this misfortune was productive of great miſchiefs to him; for in a courſe of time the divine juſtice ſummoned him to a full account for the death of his brothers. I ſhall next relate, in the proper order, all the particulars reſpecting this affair, as they will tend to prove an example to mankind; and may ſerve as a caution to after ages, for perſons to conduct themſelves, in every event of life, agreeable to the rules of virtue, and the ſtrict laws of juſtice.

After the death of Pheroras, two of his freemen, of the Trachonite nation, for whom he had conceived a very ſingular regard, made earneſt application to Herod, requeſting that a careful inquiry might be made into the cauſe and manner of their maſter's death; and if it appeared to have been the conſequence of any unfair practices, that ample vengeance might be taken on thoſe to whoſe arts he had fallen a ſacrifice. They acquainted Herod (who paid a very particular attention to all they advanced) that on the evening in which Pheroras was ſeized with his illneſs, he had ſupped with his wife, when a mixed liquor was given him, that ſeemed to have a particularly diſagreeable taſte, and was extremely nauſeous to him on the firſt ſwallowing of it. They ſaid that this was carried to him by an Arabian woman, and that it was diſguiſed under the name of a love-potion; but was, in fact, a moſt ſubtle poiſon; and in the preparation of ſuch draughts theſe women excel all others in the univerſe. On inquiry it appeared that the woman on whom this crime was charged was the intimate friend and confident of Syllæus's miſtreſs, and that the mother and ſiſter of Pheroras's wife had been to her to prepare the poiſon; and that they returned from her but the very day preceding that on which the fatal draught was adminiſtered.

The Trachonites requeſt an inquiry to be made concerning the death of Pheroras.

Death of Pheroras cauſed by poiſon.

Herod was ſo agitated with paſſion at the hearing of this melancholy tale, that he gave immediate orders for a number of women, thoſe who were free, as well as ſlaves, to be put to the torture. They bore their ſufferings for a conſiderable time, and no diſcovery was made; but at length one of them, in the extremity of her pain, made an exclamation to the following purport: "Would to God that the mother of Antipater was now in my ſituation; for that wicked woman hath been the cauſe of this extreme diſtreſs that we ſuffer." Herod conceiving that he had now a clue to guide him in his inquiries, immediately came to a reſolution to ſearch the whole affair to the bottom. In purſuance of this deſign, he learnt every particular of the intrigue, dived into the

the whole myſtery of their management, and acquired a knowledge of the particulars that paſſed at all their ſecret meetings, conſultations and cabals. He now heard the ſubſtance of ſeveral diſcourſes which had paſſed between himſelf and Antipater, which were ſubjects of common converſation among the women, who were even acquainted with the circumſtance of his having given a talent to keep ſecret ſome particular affairs from the knowledge of Pheroras. Theſe female evidences farther mentioned the hatred which Antipater entertained for his father, and that, in converſation with his mother, he would very frequently ſay, "I believe the old fellow will never die." Yet at this period Antipater himſelf was ſo far advanced in years, that if the government had then deſcended to him, he could not have expected any great, or long-continued enjoyment of it: beſides, there were ſo many children and grand-children, that his proſpect of ſucceeding to the throne was at beſt but very remote and uncertain: and, as affairs were at that time ſituated, in caſe himſelf was to die, the right of ſucceeding to the throne would remain with his brother, and not with his ſon. The evidences farther ſaid, that it was a common practice with Antipater to cenſure his father for his cruelty and inhumanity to his own ſons; and ſay that his barbarities went ſuch lengths, that he himſelf was obliged to go to Rome, and Pheroras to retire to his own government, by way of conſulting their perſonal ſafety.

Herod turns Doris, mother of Antipater, out of his palace.

As this account correſponded, in almoſt every particular, with what Herod's ſiſter had heretofore informed him of, he made no farther doubt or ceremony with regard to the giving orders reſpecting Doris, the mother of Antipater, who was now conſidered as convicted of the moſt material part of the treaſon: directions were therefore given that ſhe ſhould be immediately ſtripped of all her jewels, which were of very conſiderable value, and turned out of the palace; and theſe orders were punctually complied with. Reſpecting the women of the family of Pheroras, the king behaved in a more favourable manner to them, in conſequence of the information they had given.

Plot of Antipater to poiſon the king.

No degree of evidence was now wanting againſt Antipater; but that part of the charge reſpecting his conduct which appeared to criminate him in the higheſt degree, and to be the leaſt worthy of forgiveneſs, aroſe from the confeſſion of a Samaritan likewiſe named Antipater, who held an office of truſt under the other Antipater. This man, excluſive of other charges againſt his maſter, declared that he had left a moſt venomous poiſon in the hands of Pheroras, to be adminiſtered to the king during the abſence of Antipater, when leſs ſuſpicion would attend the perpetration of the deed. The informer declared that this poiſon was brought from Egypt, by a perſon named Antiphilius, a friend of Antipater, whoſe uncle Theudion, the brother of Doris, his mother, ſent it to Pheroras, who committed it to the care of his wife.

Examination of the widow of Pheroras.

Hereupon Herod ſent for the widow of Pheroras, in order to examine her reſpecting the particulars of the affair: ſhe confeſſed the circumſtance, and pretended as if ſhe would go and fetch the poiſon; but threw herſelf from one of the galleries of the palace into the court; but happening to fall on her feet, the hurt ſhe received did not prove mortal. As ſoon as ſhe was tolerably well recovered, Herod again ſent for her, and promiſed pardon both to herſelf, and every branch of her family, on condition that they would make an ample diſcovery of the whole truth: but he threatened that, if either through obſtinacy, or any other cauſe whatever, they ſhould ſecrete any part of the intended plot, he would puniſh them in the ſevereſt manner. Hereupon the widow of Pheroras made a ſolemn oath that ſhe would relate the whole affair, with all its circumſtances; nor ſeek to conceal a ſingle particular; and it was the prevailing opinion that ſhe did not falſify her word. The particulars of her ſtory, addreſſed to Herod, were as follows:

Her confeſſion, which is confirmed by others.

"The poiſon in queſtion was brought out of Egypt by Antiphilius, where it had been prepared by a brother of his, who practiſed as a phyſician. It was purchaſed by Antipater, for the purpoſe of deſtroying your majeſty. It was delivered by Theudion to Pheroras, who committed it to my care. Some time afterwards, when my huſband fell ill, he was ſo deeply impreſſed with a ſenſe of your kind and generous behaviour, in the friendly viſit you were kind enough to make him on that occaſion, that he ſent for me to attend him, and addreſſed me as follows: 'Antipater has ſeduced me to be concerned in a moſt horrid and inhuman plot to poiſon both my brother and his father. Now I am impreſſed with ſo deep a ſenſe of the king's unalterable regard and tenderneſs to me, and of my own ſituation as one on the verge of eternity, that I am determined, by the bleſſing of God, not to depart this life loaded with the guilt and infamy of having been concerned in a conſpiracy big with ſuch aggravated enormity: therefore, I charge you, let the poiſon be immediately brought hither and thrown into the fire in my preſence.' On his giving theſe directions, I inſtantly fetched the poiſon, and diſpoſed of it as he had commanded me; excepting only a very ſmall quantity of it, which I reſerved for my own uſe, in caſe it ſhould happen, that after the death of my huſband, I ſhould be reduced to ſuch an unhappy ſituation, as to think of having recourſe to ſo deſperate an alleviator of my pains."

Having ſaid this, ſhe produced the remainder of the poiſon, which was contained in a box, and ſubmitted it to the examination of all preſent. Not long after this, the mother of Antiphilius, and likewiſe one of his brothers, were put to the torture, and confirmed ſome circumſtances that had been advanced by the wife of Pheroras, particularly that reſpecting the box of poiſon. An accuſation was likewiſe exhibited againſt one of the king's wives, who was the daughter of the high-prieſt; but ſhe confeſſed not a ſingle circumſtance. Notwithſtanding ing this, Herod totally disclaimed and discharged her, and struck her son, who was likewise named Herod, out of his will, though he had designed him for his successor, in case of the death of Antipater previous to his own. He likewise deposed from the office of high-priest his father-in-law, Simon, the son of Boethus; and promoted to that dignity, in his stead, Matthias of Jerusalem, the son of Theophilus.

Confession of Bathyllus, and accusation of Archelaus and Philip, sons of Herod.

In the mean time there arrived from Rome, Bathyllus, one of the freemen of Antipater: and this man being put to the torture, acknowledged that he had brought poison to Pheroras, and the mother of Antipater, which was intended to be used in case what had formerly been provided should fail. About this time Herod received a number of letters from Rome: but these were all sent by the contrivance and direction of Antipater, and the management of his friends, whom he gratified by presents, and in other ways, for the share they had in this business. These letters were filled with remarks on the freedom taken on all occasions by Archelaus and Philip, in their conversation respecting Herod, with whom, it was insinuated, they took great liberties respecting the murder of Alexander and Aristobulus, for whose unhappy fate they pretended to have the most generous compassion: and suggesting that themselves were now only summoned back, in order to be treated with the same severity as those who had hitherto fallen sacrifices to the resentment of the king. Now these things (as hath been hinted above) all arose from the contrivance of Antipater, who managed the whole business; and in order to put a plausible face on the affair, wrote complimentary letters on this occasion to Herod. In these letters he insinuated that the young men were of warm dispositions, and therefore, perhaps, the more excusable, though they had not behaved or conversed with so much caution a respect as might have been wished and expected: and the letters contained much other matter to a similar purpose.

Instance of Antipater's unpopularity.

Antipater had sought to obtain a number of friends at court, by writing obliging letters, and distributing to the amount of three hundred talents in presents. Now it was a circumstance deemed very extraordinary, that, in the space of seven months (for the inquiry had been going on during all that time), Antipater should never receive the least intimation of the business in hand: but so great was the care taken to watch and guard all the avenues of the palace, and so universal the ill-will that the people bore to Antipater, that not a man was to be found who chose to risque his own safety, by giving him the necessary information to prevent his destruction.

CHAP. V.

Letters pass between HEROD and ANTIPATER. The latter receives Intelligence of the Death of PHERORAS. ANTIPATER proceeds to SEBASTE, where the People receive him only with Curses and Imprecations.

Herod, in a letter to Antipater, hastens his return home.

LETTERS having been sent to the king from Antipater, intimating that he was on the point of adjusting his business at Rome, and making proper preparations for his return, Herod sent him, by way of answer, a complaisant and artful letter, in which he advised him, by all means, to make what expedition he could towards home, lest, during his absence, any thing should happen that might prove disagreeable to him. This letter contained not a single word that might tend to make him uneasy, other than a few reflections on the conduct of his mother; but he said that all disputes would be easily adjusted on his arrival. Herod's letter was likewise replete with professions of kindness and friendship, apprehending that if Antipater had supposed any artifice had been used, he might have delayed his journey, and then it was doubtful if he might not have made interest at Rome, to have got Herod removed from the government, and himself established in his place.

Antipater is informed of the death of Pheroras.

The letter from Herod came to the hands of Antipater, while he was at Cilicia, on his journey; and when he arrived at Tarentum he received other letters, giving him advice of the death of Pheroras, a circumstance that gave him great uneasiness, not on account of any affection that he bore to the deceased, but because the poisoning of the king, which the other had engaged for, had failed. When he came as far as Celenderis, a city of Cilicia, the guilt of his conscience, or rather the fear of punishment, made him hesitate if he should proceed forwards, or return. The odium that had been cast on his mother's character hurt his mind; and debating with his friends on the situation of affairs, they were divided in opinion how he ought to act. Some thought it would be prudent to wait a while, and see what would be the event; while others conceived it might be right to advance with all possible expedition, as they made not the least doubt but that, on his appearance, he would be able fully to justify his conduct. They urged that it was nothing but his absence that gave his enemies so great an advantage over him, by affording them an opportunity of propagating a number of idle reports. Being determined by those arguments, he continued his journey to Sebaste, the port which Herod had built, at a most enormous expence, in honour of Cæsar.

His ill reception by the people.

The fate of Antipater began now to be predicted by the people in general. He, who when he went from home, was attended by the blessings of the public, the most fervent vows being offered for his prosperity, had not now a single person to bid him welcome, or to pay him the respect that was due to his rank: on the contrary, the multitude combined to heap curses on his head; the people universally imploring Heaven to avenge the death of his brothers by the punishment of the murderer.

JUDAS and MATTHIAS inveigh againſt the Golden Eagle. They, with forty others, taken Priſoners. They juſtify their Conduct, but are ſent in Bonds to JERICHO. MATTHIAS depoſed, and JOZAR advanced in his ſtead. The Ringleaders of the Sedition burnt alive. HEROD ſends for SALOME and ALEXAS. A horrid Order given by HEROD.

Illneſs of Herod, and ſome particulars of his will.

HEROD being taken extremely ill, made his will, and having, through the aſperſions of Antipater, loſt all good opinion of Archelaus and Philip, he appointed, his youngeſt ſon to ſucceed him. He bequeathed a thouſand talents to Cæſar, and five hundred more to Julia the empreſs, his children, friends and freemen. To his ſiſter Salome he bequeathed a large fortune, in conſideration of her unceaſing affection for him; and the reſt of his poſſeſſions, in money, lands and revenues, he left to his ſons and grand-children. Herod was now on the verge of ſeventy years of age, and as his illneſs increaſed greatly, his recovery was deſpaired of: he was exceedingly paſſionate and furious, and his diſpoſition was ſo much ſoured by his illneſs, that it was impoſſible to do any thing which would afford him ſatisfaction. In fact, what gave him the moſt uneaſineſs was his own pride, in conſequence of an idea which he entertained that the people had taken an antipathy to him, and hated him to ſuch a degree as to take ſatisfaction in whatever made him unhappy: and he was rather confirmed in this opinion than otherwiſe, by a diſturbance which happened during his illneſs, occaſioned by the inſtigations and artful management of certain men of eminent diſtinction, who took the lead in the affairs; of which the following are the particulars:

Sedition raiſed by Judas and Matthias.

Among the Jews there were two men who had acquired a ſingular degree of reputation, for their diſtinguiſhed knowledge in general, and their ſingular ſkill in the practice of the law in particular. Theſe perſons were likewiſe very great favourites with the people, in conſequence of the care they took in educating their children in the knowledge and practice of their ſeveral duties, and the profeſſions for which they were intended, to which the preceptors devoted almoſt the whole of their time. The names of theſe men were Judas, the ſon of Sariphæus, and Matthias, the ſon of Margolothus. Theſe two eminent perſons had no ſooner received information that the king's friends deſpaired of his life, than they immediately impreſſed the young men with an idea of ſetting about the buſineſs of reformation: adviſed them to deſtroy all theſe new erections and ſtructures which Herod had cauſed to be built, contrary to the ancient laws of the country; and they aſſured them, that they ſhould infallibly meet with an ample reward, if they approved themſelves valiant champions in defence of the truth: they adviſed them likewiſe to reflect, that all the diſturbances and contentions which had happened in the royal family, as well as the deſperate diſeaſe under which the king laboured, were ſimply denunciations of the divine vengeance againſt him for having violated the antient cuſtoms: and this point was particularly inſiſted on by Judas and Matthias.

They adviſe the people to pull down the golden eagle.

Among others, a ſingular inſtance of ſuperſtitious magnificence was the dedication of a golden eagle, of extraordinary weight, and immenſe value, which was placed over the portal of the temple. Now this being clearly contrary to the directions contained in our laws, which poſitively prohibit the uſe of ſuch ornamental figures in ſuch ſituations, Judas and Matthias adviſed their followers to pull down the eagle, in an addreſs to the following purport: "We confeſs that it will be an enterpriſe attended with ſome danger; but an honourable death is to be preferred to a life of ignominious eaſe. You cannot forfeit your lives in any way that will redound more to your credit, than in the aſſertion of the laws and rites of your country, which will immortalize your names. If this diſtinction be not ſought for, the brave and the ignoble will be equally undiſtinguiſhed in the ſame common grave: wherefore perſons of unſullied honour, and ſuperior virtue, would act well even to court death, which is but a common fate, by ſeeking a proper and glorious opportunity to embrace it; and thus depart from a troubleſome world with ſatisfaction. The dread of mortality, and even the pain of dying are taken away, when a man departs this life in the conſciouſneſs that he has acted a proper part in it, and he at once tranſmits both the fame and the reward of his actions to thoſe that may ſucceed him."

It is deſtroyed by the populace.

This addreſs was no ſooner ended than a report was ſpread of the death of the king; which added to what they had juſt heard, had ſuch an effect upon the people, that they were animated in the higheſt degree, and though is was now noon-day, they got upon the portal, pulled down the eagle, and cut it to pieces with their axes, in the preſence of an immenſe number of ſpectators who were aſſembled in the temple. The news of this outrage had no ſooner reached Herod's commander in chief, than he aſſembled a large body of troops, and haſtened away to the ſpot, to prevent the perpetration of farther miſchief; though, in fact, he found what had happened to be much leſs conſiderable than he had imagined. When he came to the ſpot there was no appearance of an enemy to be ſeen, except a rabble of people might be deemed ſuch, who had neither arms, nor were under diſcipline, and were eaſily diſperſed, on the firſt attack made upon them: the leaders, however, Judas and Matthias, with about forty of their adherents, maintained their ground, as they made it a point of honour not to fly on this occaſion.

Theſe

Judas and Matthias taken into cuſtody, and examined by Herod.

Theſe being immediately taken into cuſtody, were conducted to Herod, who demanded of them how they dared to commit ſuch an outrage upon the ſacred figure of the eagle; on which they made a reply in ſubſtance as follows: "We have for a conſiderable time paſt entertained thoughts of this affair, and having at length come to a reſolution of carrying it into execution, we conceive that we have acted as men of honour and ſpirit ought to have done. As to the deed we have done, it was in aſſertion of the honour of Almighty God, in purſuance of that great teacher whoſe diſciples we are proud to be thought. We beſeech you, Sir, not to deem it an act worthy your aſtoniſhment, if we have given a preference to the laws which were tranſmitted to us by Moſes, and which he received from God himſelf, to any other laws or commands whatſoever. We cannot conceive of ourſelves as ſufferers for any criminal action; but for having done our duty, and obeyed the dictates of our conſciences: and, in a cauſe of this kind, we are ready to ſubmit to death, or to any other puniſhment that may be inflicted." It was evident that in all they ſaid and did reſpecting this matter, there was a perfect correſpondence between their ſentiments and actions, and that they were as ready to abide the conſequence as they had been to tranſact the deed.

They are ſent bound to Jericho.

Soon after this Herod ſent them in bonds to Jericho, where he convened a large aſſembly of the Jews, and being himſelf at this time very much indiſpoſed by illneſs, he was carried into the council-room in a chair, where he made the following ſpeech on the occaſion: "You are not inſenſible of the unabating ardor, and unwearied pains with which I have conſulted the intereſt of the public: you know that at an immenſe charge, I have re-conſtructed the temple, for the accommodation of the people: a work which, in the ſpace of an hundred and twenty-five years, the whole race of the Aſmonæan family were unable to accompliſh. You are appriſed that I did not only rebuild this fabric, but endowed it, and enriched it with ornaments, and preſented it with ample donations, correſpondent with the magnificence of the work: yet at length, when I conceived that, after my deceaſe, my memory would have been preſerved by the diſtinguiſhed ſplendor of my works, and that the good offices I had done would have perpetuated my glory, I am inſulted while living; for benefits conferred, indignities are offered: the people are witneſſes of the affronts given to me at noon day: the gifts and ornaments I have beſtowed on the temple are torn from thence: and ſacrilege is the conſequence of a pre-determined malicious proceeding: but it is not to me ſo much as to God, that the affront is offered."

The principal people of the council, unable to judge how far Herod might be tranſported by the impulſe of his cruelty, thought it the moſt prudent method to ſecure themſelves by an early declaration of their opinion. This they did by averring, that they were wholly innocent of the fact complained of, and, that according to their ſentiments, the rioters merited the ſevereſt puniſhment. This declaration was very pleaſing to the king: but he deprived Matthias of the office of high-prieſt, preſuming that he was concerned in the contrivance, and beſtowed it on his brother-in-law Jozar. While the above-named Matthias exerciſed the pontifical office, it happened on a particular night, preceding a day appointed for faſting, that he dreamt he ſlept with his wife; by which circumſtance he became unqualified for the diſcharge of his duty the next day, on which occaſion his near relation Joſeph, the ſon of Elemus, was commiſſioned to ſupply his place for that day. Herod having deprived Matthias of the office of high-prieſt, iſſued orders that the other Matthias, the principal in the late tumultuous proceedings, ſhould be burnt alive, together with all his aſſociates. There happened to be an eclipſe of the moon on the night theſe orders were carried into execution.

The high-prieſthood taken from Matthias, and given to Jozar.

Herod's illneſs now increaſed to a ſhocking height, and was univerſally deemed to be a judgment on him for the exceſs of his crimes. He had an inward fever which parched him to an exceſſive degree, that it ſeemed as if his inſide was burnt. His appetite was voracious as that of a dog: he was tormented with a cholic, and ulcers in the bowels; his feet and groin were ſwelled with tumours; his ſecret parts were filled with worms, and putrifying; he had a peſtilential and painful tentigo, with cramps, contractions of the nerves, and an aſthma: in a word, ſo extraordinary were his ſufferings, that men of ſkill, philoſophy, and religion, combined in the opinion that he was viſited by the immediate hand of God*. Yet though his pains were as ſevere as his diſorder was hopeleſs of cure, he himſelf was the the only perſon who did not deſpair, but ſtill continued to ſend far and near for freſh phyſicians, and to inquire for new remedies.

Herod's ſevere diſtemper, and the torments attending it.

At length he paſſed over the river Jordan to the hot baths at Callirrhoe, which make their way into the lake of Aſphaltites. Theſe waters are very agreeable in taſte, excluſive of the mineral virtue they poſſeſs. When he was at this place, his phyſicians gave orders that he ſhould be placed up to the ſhoul-

* We need not wonder that the vengeance of heaven ſhould fall uncommonly heavy upon this monſter of barbarity and wickedneſs, when we reflect on the many enormous crimes he had been guilty of during his government; among which we may reckon his murdering, ſoon after the birth of Chriſt, "all the children that were in Bethlehem, and all the coaſts thereof, from two years old and under," Matt. ii. 16. In ſhort, his whole life ſeemed to compoſe one unvaried ſcene of pride, ambition, vice, and cruelty, rendering him deteſtable both to God and men.

ders in a veſſel of oil; which being done, he was ſeized with ſuch a fainting fit, that his attendants, ſuppoſing him to be dead, burſt out into ſuch cries and lamentations, that he was, for the preſent, recovered by the noiſe they made.

Herod by this time began to ſee that he had but flattered himſelf with that continuation of life which was not to be expected; whereupon he ordered a donation of fifty drachmas to be given to each of his ſoldiers, and having directed larger ſums to be diſtributed among his officers and friends, he returned to Jericho: but he had not been long at that place before the wickedneſs of his diſpoſition tempted him to think of taking leave of the world, by an act more dreadful and diabolical than perhaps ever entered into the mind of any other man to conceive. He iſſued a ſummons to all the Jews of the greateſt diſtinction in the country, to attend him at Jericho without loſs of time, and denounced the penalty of death on their omiſſion. Having made their appearance agreeable to the order, he directed that they ſhould all be ſhut up together within the circus, or tilt-yard, without the leaſt inquiry as to their guilt or innocence.

Shocking inſtance of his cruelty when near death.

This being done, he ſent for his ſiſter Salome, and her huſband Alexas, and on their attendance addreſſed them in the following manner. "I am now drawing towards my end. My pains are very great; and I muſt yield to the inevitable ſtroke of death, the fate which is allotted to mankind in general. I muſt acknowledge that it would give me ſome kind of concern, to think that I ſhould be deprived of thoſe funeral honours which is cuſtomary to pay to ſovereign princes. I am not inſenſible what kind of treatment I am to expect at the hands of the Jews. They have deteſted me during my life, and will rejoice to learn the news of my death: but it is yet in the power of you two to afford me ſome ſatisfaction even in my laſt moments: and I think that you owe me this obligation, in return for all the favours I have conferred on you. I therefore beſeech you to attend to the orders I give, and I yet promiſe myſelf one of the moſt honourable funeral ſolemnities by which any prince was ever diſtinguiſhed: the thought even now glads my heart, that at the concluſion of my life there ſhould be a general mourning, in which every tear that is ſhed ſhall proceed from the unfeigned dictates of the heart. That this purpoſe may be effected, I direct that as ſoon as ever my body ſhall be breathleſs, the circus be encompaſſed by ſoldiers, and the word of command being given, let every man within it be put to death. But let no mention be made of my decree till this work be accompliſhed. By the careful performance of this order you will doubly oblige me: in the firſt place by the execution of my will, and in the ſecond by occaſioning a general mourning to celebrate my death." Herod accompanied this ſpeech with inceſſant tears, and beſought Salome and Alexas, by all the ſacred ties of friendſhip, mutual confidence, and conſanguinity, to be punctual and faithful in the diſcharge of what he had committed to their care; and they ſolemnly promiſed him an unreſerved obedience to all his commands.

Reflection on his final act of barbarity.

I am aware that ſome perſons, on recollection of the horrid barbarities of Herod to his neareſt relations in former inſtances, will be of opinion that the ſteps taken may be in ſome meaſure juſtified by the neceſſity of his being cruel in his own defence, to prevent the ill effects of their mutual jealouſies and competitions: but his character, in this laſt act, marks him for one of the moſt unnatural ſavages that ever was diſtinguiſhed by the human form. When he found his life advancing haſtily to a period, he left orders to doom others to deſtruction, taking effectual care that the whole nation ſhould mourn for him, ſince, in obedience to his commands, it muſt happen that at leaſt one in each family would fall a ſacrifice to the rigid order. What adds to the infamy of this proceeding is, that there was no provocation, or injury intended, nor any plauſible reaſon or pretext for the perpetration of it. Among perſons actuated by any ſenſe of religion or the common feelings of humanity, the greateſt enemies are reconciled by the approach of death, and all animoſities are buried in the grave.

Acme put to death at Rome

AT the period that Herod was giving his final orders to his relations, his embaſſadors arrived from Rome, with an anſwer to the letters they carried to Cæſar, the purport of which was in ſubſtance as follows: "That Acme had been put to death by the order of Cæſar, for having held a correſpondence with Antipater, but that the emperor left the death or baniſhment, or other puniſhment, of Antipater to the diſcretion of the king his father." Herod ſeemed to be greatly pleaſed at the conſideration that Acme had received condign puniſhment, and much gratified by the permiſſion to act as he thought proper with his ſon. But the pains of his illneſs ſoon increaſed to a great degree; and in a kind of greedy fit of hunger, he aſked for a knife and an apple, as it was his common cuſtom to pare his own apples, and eat them by degrees, as his inclination demanded them. He was no ſooner ſup-plied with the knife, than he was obſerved to look about him as if he entertained an idea of ſtabbing himſelf; but being attentively watched by his nephew Ahiab, he was prevented from perpetrating the deed juſt as he had lifted his right hand to make the ſtroke; Ahiab ſeizing it, and making a loud exclamation. The noiſe occaſioned by this circumſtance alarmed the court a ſecond time; and the people in general entertained no doubt but that the king was at the point of death.

Antipater being informed of this circumſtance, was confident in his own mind that his father was dead; and as he had no doubt but that he ſhould now procure his liberty, he likewiſe entertained ſanguine hopes of obtaining poſſeſſion of the throne. Impreſſed with this idea, he ſpoke to his keeper to admit of his diſcharge, making him ample offers of gratification, at preſent, and promiſing that he ſhould be preferred when he came to the crown, if he would comply with his requeſt: but the keeper, ſo far from acceding to the terms, went immediately and informed the king of all that had happened. Now

Antipater ſlain by Herod's order.

Herod entertained no ſmall degree of enmity to Antipater before this circumſtance, which however inflamed his paſſions to ſuch a degree, that, though he was in the agonies of death, he ſtarted up in a violent rage, and with the utmoſt bitterneſs of language, and vehemence of action, gave orders to one of his guards to go that inſtant, and diſpatch Antipater, and commanded that his body ſhould be buried in the caſtle of Hyrcania, in a private manner.

Herod appoints Archelaus to ſucceed him.

Herod, before his death, gave orders for an alteration in his will, by which he gave the kingdom to Archelaus; and having in his former will declared that Antipas ſhould ſucceed to the government, he now appointed him tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa. He gave to his ſon Philip, the brother in law of Archelaus, the provinces of Trachon and Gaulon, with thoſe of Batanæa and Panias, under the denomination of a tetrarchy. To his ſiſter Salome he gave Jamnia, Azotus, and Phaſaelis, with fifty thouſand pieces of coined money; and to his other relations he bequeathed caſh or land as legacies. He left ten millions of pieces of ready coin, with gold and ſilver plate, and variety of all kinds of rich furniture to Cæſar; and to the empreſs Julia and her friends five millions in coin. This will being executed, Herod died, in the thirty-ſeventh year after he had been declared king of the Jews by the Romans, thirty-four years after Antigonus had been expelled, and five days after the death of Antipater.

His character

Herod was diſtinguiſhed by the cruelty of his diſpoſition; he was greatly influenced by the violence of his paſſions; arbitrary in his conduct, yet generally ſucceſsful in his undertakings. He aroſe from the condition of a private man to that of a king; he encountered many difficulties, but got through them in an extraordinary manner, and lived to a full age. With regard to his diſturbances with his children and family, though I ſhould deem him unhappy, yet he was far from being ſo in his own opinion, as he generally prevailed againſt all oppoſition.

The leading men in the circus diſcharged.

Salome and Alexas made a point of keeping the death of Herod a profound ſecret, and going immediately to thoſe eminent perſons who were confined in the circus, told them, in the name of the king, that they were at liberty, and might immediately depart and follow their lawful occupations, for there was no farther reaſon to reſtrain their conduct: and this generous device was extremely acceptable to the Jews in general.

The king's death made public.

As it was now deemed proper to make the king's death public, the troops were ordered to aſſemble at the amphitheatre at Jericho, where Herod's letters to the army were read. Theſe contained the moſt liberal acknowledgments of the zeal and fidelity of their paſt ſervices, and they were requeſted to continue the ſame affectionate obedience to Archelaus, who was now appointed to ſucceed to the throne. This being done, Ptolemy, the keeper of the king's ſeal, now read the will of Herod, in which was this particular clauſe, "That the will itſelf was not to be allowed valid, or of force, till it had received the ſanction of Cæſar's approbation." As ſoon as the will was read, the people ſhouted, with loud acclamations of "God ſave king Archelaus!" the officers and ſoldiers uniting in wiſhing him a happy reign, and promiſing that the ſame degree of duty and fidelity which had been paid to his predeceſſor, ſhould be continued to the new king.

Archelaus ſaluted as king.

Pomp and order of Herod's funeral.

It now remained to take proper care of the funeral ſolemnity, and this was the particular buſineſs of Archelaus, who directed that it ſhould be conducted with the utmoſt pomp and grandeur, and determined to appear himſelf in the character of principal mourner. The body was placed on a litter adorned with gold, and embelliſhed with precious ſtones of great value: it was covered with purple, and on the head was a diadem, over which was a crown of gold, and in the right hand was a ſceptre. By the ſide of the corpſe marched the ſons and relations of Herod: Theſe were followed by numbers of ſoldiers in different diviſions: the royal guards going firſt; next to them the troops of Thrace; then the Germans, and after them the Galatians: all of them dreſſed and armed as if going to battle. Theſe were followed by the reſt of the army, each diviſion commanded by its proper officers; and five hundred domeſtics of the court, carrying ſpices and perfumes, brought up the rear. In this funeral pomp they proceeded to Herodium, eight furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem, where the body was interred, according to former orders given for that purpoſe.

Courteous behaviour of Archelaus to the people.

Archelaus having, agreeable to the cuſtom of the country, devoted ſeven days to the celebration of the funeral rites of his father, and the cuſtomary term of mourning

mourning being now ended, he entertained the people assembled on the occasion, and then departed to the temple; where being seated upon a throne of gold, he received the congratulations and good wishes of the public. These he answered in the most affable and respectful manner, saying that he deemed it a proof (after the ill treatment they had received from his father) of their great good-will, that they received him so favourably; and assuring them that he would never forget this instance of their friendship. "For the present (said he) I do not pretend to assume the name of king, as I think that I have no right so to do till Cæsar has ratified my claim by an approbation of the contents of my father's will. The want of Cæsar's authority prevented me from assuming the dignity, when the army at Jericho pressed my acceptance of it, as I was not lawfully invested with the possession: but when the time shall arrive when my title to govern shall admit of no farther dispute, it shall be the business of my life to consult your pleasure and advantage in all things, and to give you occasion to acknowledge that my reign over you is more agreeable than ever you found that of my father."

The modesty and affability of discourse and behaviour by which the new prince appeared to be distinguished, was extremely acceptable to the people, who seemed to rely (as is common in such cases) with the most implicit confidence on the sincerity and veracity of every thing that he said. Indeed such was their apparent confidence in him, that they determined to make an immediate trial of his liberality by a request of various favours. Some of them entreated a remission of taxes, others requested the liberty of their friends, many of whom had been apprehended, and confined a long while in prison, by the command of Herod; and a third sort exclaimed vehemently against several duties and impositions which had been laid on such of the necessaries of life as were brought to the public markets.

He grants their requests.

Archelaus having considered the nature of their demands, and the critical juncture in which they were made, thought it a point of prudence to comply with them all: and after the sacrifice was ended, he invited his friends home with him, where a splendid entertainment was provided.

A factious tumult among the Jews.

AT this period there was a faction of Jews, who, being discontented with the measures of government, used to hold frequent and private meetings, in which they concerted schemes of opposition to the public proceedings. After some consideration they could not fix on any more proper subject of complaint, than the affair of Matthias and his companions, whom Herod had executed for destroying the golden eagle. While the king lived, they were afraid to make any open attempt to vindicate the honour of the reformers, or to justify their conduct: but now he was dead, they were outrageous in their invectives, and clamorous in their abuse, loading his memory with every opprobrious epithet. They would frequently assemble in the most tumultuous manner, demanding that Archelaus should give them satisfaction by a rigorous execution of justice on those friends of Herod who were most instrumental in procuring the death of the reformers; as if the dead could be benefited by punishing the living: and they particularly required that the high-priest whom Herod had promoted should be removed, and some man of character be advanced in his stead.

An officer sent by Archelaus to pacify them.

Archelaus was far from being pleased with this peremptory behaviour; but as he was on the point of departing to Cæsar, for the ratification of his power, and instructions for his conduct, he thought it prudent to accommodate matters on the best terms possible; wherefore he sent a principal officer to try what effect a moderate conduct and reasonable arguments might have on the people; who addressed them as follows:

"This is certainly an improper time to think of revengeful measures. The persons who were punished were lawfully convicted; and your interposition in the present manner is an assumption of power to which you have no right. You will do well to reflect that Archelaus is now on the point of his departure for Rome; and on his return with a ratification of his commission, there is no doubt but that every grievance will be redressed: in the interim it is requisite that you should live in peace and friendship with each other, and not incur the penalties of seditious practices."

The outrageous multitude refuse to hearken to terms.

So violent an opposition was made to this speech, and it was followed by such outrageous exclamations, that the man who should have attempted to quell the tumult, would have done it at the hazard of his life. The multitude said that they had the law in their own hands, and as Herod was dead, they would be revenged for the destruction of those friends whom he had assassinated while living; and they were astonished that any hesitation should be made on this subject. So violent were their passions, that they confounded confounded all ideas of right and wrong, conceived that their preſent humour ought neceſſarily to prevail, and ſeemed to forget the means of conſulting their own ſafety, while they ſought the deſtruction of others. Mean time, the king himſelf, and ſeveral other perſons, made proper application to them, to ſooth their paſſions; but an effect was conſtantly produced contrary to what was wiſhed; they became more violent than ever; and if their numbers had been equal to their ſpirit, a rebellion would have concluded what commenced only in a tumult.

A party of the ſeditious croud into the temple at the paſſover.

At this time the feaſt of the paſſover, or unleavened bread (which is the memorial of the deliverance of the Iſraelites from the land of Egypt), being near at hand, an immenſe number of people more than was uſual, from contiguous as well as more diſtant parts, came up to Jeruſalem, to worſhip God, and offer ſacrifices on the occaſion. A number of factious Jews now crouded into the temple, and there remained, declaring that they would not abandon their ſituation, though they had no other reſource to prevent their ſtarving than begging their bread. It was found that their intentions in taking up this ſituation was to conſole with the multitude for the loſs of their two favourite teachers, Judas and Matthias, and to inſtigate the people to revenge their deaths. This tumult ſeemed to wear a threatening aſpect, when, in fear of ill conſequences, Archelaus ſent an officer, with a party of the guards, to ſuppreſs it in time, before the rebellious diſpoſition had ſpread among the people in general: orders being given, that if any obſtinate reſiſtance was made, the ringleaders of the mutiny ſhould be ſeized, and carried before Archelaus, that they might be puniſhed by way of example to the reſt.

Archelaus ſends a body of forces to reſtrain their rage; and 3000 are cut off.

Immediately on the appearance of the ſoldiers, the factious crew abuſed them in ſo clamorous and outrageous a manner, that the whole multitude ſeeming to be inſpired with a general ſpirit of revenge, aſſailed them with ſtones, and other weapons, and killed them all except the commanding officer, and a few wounded men, who made their eſcape with him. This being done, the people proceeded with their ſacrifices as before. At length the conteſt grew to ſuch a height, that Archelaus was under a neceſſity to ſuppreſs the inſurrection, or he muſt have fallen a victim to its rage: wherefore he ſent all his troops to encounter the rabble, iſſuing particular orders to his cavalry to prevent any ſuccours being ſent in, and to put to the ſword every perſon who ſhould attempt to make his eſcape. Three thouſand of their men were cut off by this body of horſe during the action, and the reſt of them fled to take ſhelter in the adjacent mountains. This conteſt was no ſooner ended than proclamation was made that every man ſhould peaceably return to his own habitation; and notwithſtanding the boaſts of the mutineers, they now appeared to be all happy to ſave themſelves by a compliance with theſe terms; and in the fear of worſe conſequences, they were contented to abandon the celebration of the feſtival.

Departing for Rome, Archelaus appoints Philip to the adminiſtration during his abſence.

Archelaus now departed on his journey to Rome, taking with him his mother and Nicolaus, and Ptolemy; with many others of his friends: the care of the kingdom, and the management of the houſhold being left to his brother Philip during his abſence. Salome and her family were likewiſe of the train, and a number of his other relations, who went under the pretence of uniting their intereſts with his, in order to inſure him the ſucceſſion to the government; but, in fact, their deſign was rather to hinder than to promote his intereſt; for they had come to a previous reſolution to exhibit a complaint againſt him, reſpecting the buſineſs of the temple. However, all the company ſet out together, and when they arrived at Cæſarea they met Sabinus, who was procurator for Cæſar in Syria; and who was travelling with all expedition towards Judæa, to take charge of the money that had belonged to Herod; but Varus happening to meet him on the way, prevented his journey, as he himſelf was going on the ſame buſineſs, Ptolemy having given him an invitation, by the command of Archelaus. Sabinus therefore, in reſpect to Varus, gave himſelf no concern with regard to the forts of Judæa, nor ſealed up their treaſure; but left every thing as he found it, in the poſſeſſion and under the controul of Archelaus, till Cæſar ſhould finally determine on the buſineſs: but ſoon after this, when Archelaus had embarked for Rome, and Varus ſet out on his journey towards Antioch, Sabinus proceeded immediately to Jeruſalem, where he took up his reſidence in the palace, and having ſent orders for the king's officers, civil and military, to attend him, he demanded their keys and their books; but they told him that, by the command of Archelaus, all was made ſecure, for the uſe and emolument of Cæſar, and every article was to remain in the ſtate they received it till Archelaus ſhould return.

Sabinus and Varus meet in Judæa.

Treacherous conduct of Sabinus.

About this period, Antipas, another of the ſons of Herod, ſet out on a voyage to Rome, in the hope of obtaining poſſeſſion of the kingdom for himſelf. Salome exerted her influence to perſuade him to this meaſure, pretending that he had a prior right to the government, ariſing from the tenor of Herod's former will, and inſinuating that the firſt will ought to remain in force. Antipas took with him in this expedition, his mother, and Ptolemy, the brother of Nicolaus; a man who had been, for a long time, the intimate friend of Herod, and was always particularly attached to his party. But the perſon who, above all others, encouraged Antipas to this ambitious purſuit, and who had the greateſt degree of intereſt with him, was Irenæus, a man famous for the arts of perſuaſion, and who had been greatly concerned in the king's buſineſs, and for a long period of time. Other perſons were not wanting in their advice advice to the prince, desiring him to recollect that Archelaus, as his elder brother, had the right of seniority, exclusive of that which had been conferred on him by the will of his deceased father: but the arguments of Irenæus, added to the impulse of his own ambition, bore down all other considerations, and determined him to proceed to Rome. When he arrived at that city, his relations universally joined his interest; not out of any particular regard they had for him, but from an aversion they entertained for Archelaus: though in fact, what they principally wished was the possession of their liberties under a Roman governor: at any rate, however, they conceived that they should be more agreeably governed by Antipas than Archelaus, and for this reason they employed their interest for the former.

Sabinus lodges a complaint against Archelaus.

By this time an information against Archelaus had been presented to Cæsar by Sabinus; and hereupon Archelaus commissioned Ptolemy to present the emperor with a memorial of what he had to urge in his own favour. This memorial contained the foundation of his claim; the heads of his father's will; an account of what cash he left behind him, and with it was sent the ring with which the money was sealed up: Archelaus referring himself, on the whole, to the good pleasure of the emperor. When Cæsar had read these writings, perused the letters of Varus and Sabinus, considered what value Herod had left in money, what the annual revenue of the government amounted to, and what arguments Antipas had urged in behalf of his own claim; he summoned an assembly of his friends to meet in council, and deliberate on the whole matter; and then gave audience to the claimants.

Cæsar calls a council.

The president on this occasion was Caius, the son of Agrippa, by the emperor's daughter Julia, whom Cæsar had adopted. The first person who stood up to speak was Antipater the son of Salome, an admirable orator, and an irreconcileable enemy to Archelaus. He delivered his sentiments in terms to the following purport:

Accusation of Archelaus, before Cæsar, by Antipater the son of Salome.

"I confess I am not a little astonished that Archelaus should be at this time seeking to ratify his title to a kingdom, over which he hath already exercised so absolute and sovereign a power, without having previously applied for, or given himself any concern about the obtaining the ratification or consent of Cæsar. What I refer to is, his late massacre of such a number of the Jews on one of their solemn festivals. If we should, for the sake of argument, allow that the punishment itself was merited, yet that must be considered as murder in an usurper, which, in a lawful prince, would have been but an act of justice. If he took upon him to exercise regal authority without permission obtained from Cæsar, it was an insult to the emperor; and his conduct was yet more atrocious if he presumed to behave in this manner in his character of a private man: so that he has now no right to expect a delegation of power from Cæsar, after he has done what ought to deprive him of the original right of dispensing that power. He has taken on himself, at his own will and pleasure, to change the officers of the army; he has placed himself on the throne, and, as a sovereign prince, has heard and determined causes: he has received public addresses and petitions, and given answers to them: and in all these matters he has acted without that proper warrant or authority which could have been granted to him by no one but Cæsar. Exclusive of all these matters, he likewise discharged from the circus those that were committed thither, and on his own single authority."

Antipater's other charges against Archelaus.

Antipater, on this occasion, made many other objections to the conduct of Archelaus, some of which were undoubtedly true, and others not altogether improbable, if we reflect on his youth, and allow for that ambitious heat by which he might be impelled by a sudden rise to the summit of power and fortune. Among other things to his disadvantage was mentioned the extravagant impropriety of making a sumptuous entertainment on the very night succeeding that of the death of his father; which the people themselves deemed so ungrateful an insult on the memory of so kind a parent, that they were struck with horror on the occasion, and were on the point of breaking into an outrage, from a consideration that he could so far impose on the public, as to personate so perfect a grief in the day-time, and immediately spend the night in all the licence of unbounded riot and luxury.

His appeal to, and recital of matters of fact

Antipater having urged these particulars, continued his speech as follows: "Is it possible that Cæsar can imagine that a man of this wicked turn of mind will evince any greater share of gratitude to the emperor for the possession of a crown, than he has shewn to a father, who has acted so tenderly towards him? What proof could be given of an unfeeling heart, greater than that of singing, feasting, revelling and rejoicing on the death of a parent, as he might have done on the destruction of an enemy? What pretence can this man have to solicit Cæsar to make him a king, after he has already presumed to invest himself with the regal authority, without the emperor's permission? The horrid murders perpetrated in the temple are greatly aggravated by the sacredness of the place in which they were committed; nor less so that they were done on a solemn festival, when strangers and citizens were equally offered up as so many sacrifices to brutal rage: the holy place was filled with human bodies; nor was this atrocious crime committed by a stranger, but by one who had usurped the dominion, and acted as invested with royal power, to give the better countenance to his savage and inhuman proceedings. His father was so well acquainted with his disposition, that he never entertained a thought of him for a successor, while he continued in the possession of his rational faculties: on the contrary, he had devised the government to Antipas, by his former will, made when he was in his full senses, and in perfect health both of mind and body. Or let us but ſuppoſe that the opinion which Herod entertained of Archelaus, was the ſame when he made his former will, as when he made the latter; has he not ſince been guilty of crimes ſufficient to ſhew that he will make an execrable king, ſince he has preſumed to act by a ſelf-delegated power, and has not ſcrupled to murder people, even in the temple, when he was only a private man?" Antipater having ſaid thus much, concluded his diſcourſe by appealing to ſeveral of his relations, who attended on this occaſion, for the truth of what he had advanced.

Nicolaus ſpeaks in the defence of Archelaus.

This ſpeech being ended, Nicolaus ſtood up on the behalf of Archelaus, and argued in the following manner. He ſaid that the tumult in the temple was carried to ſuch a height, that there was no other way of ſuppreſſing it but by the deſtruction of the rioters; and therefore that the blood of thoſe who were ſlain on that occaſion reſted on their own heads: that the behaviour of the rioters might ſeem an act of inſolence to Archelaus; but, in fact, the affront was offered to the authority of Cæſar, when, contrary to the law of nature and nations, and in violation of the ſacredneſs of the place and occaſion, thoſe men were murdered, who were only ſent thither in a regular manner to put an end to the mutiny. "Now (ſaid he) theſe are the men that Antipater (equally void of honour, and deſtitute of ſhame) would ſeek to defend, provided that, in ſo doing, he may but gratify the rancour of his malice againſt Archelaus. It is evident that they who firſt began to offend are to anſwer for the crime, and not they whom neceſſity compelled to take arms in their own defence. With regard to the remainder of the articles that have been charged on Archelaus, the accuſers themſelves are equally blameable with reſpect to them, ſince they themſelves conſented to the very deed againſt which they now complain; excluſive of all which, they have repreſented the affair as much worſe than it really was; through envy to the principal perſon concerned, though he was a near relation, one that had merited every bounty his father could beſtow, and had conferred many favours on the family in general. With regard to the authority of the king's laſt will, I cannot help remarking, not only that he was in his full and perfect ſenſes when he cauſed it to be written, but that ſecond wills, equally with ſecond thoughts, are generally the beſt. One full proof that Herod was deliberate in the making this will, ariſes from his having ſubmitted the validity of it to the determination of Cæſar; and Cæſar poſſeſſes too liberal a mind to think of encouraging an ungrateful behaviour in a ſet of people, who having, during the life-time of Herod, been under innumerable obligations to his bounty, now ſeek, on his death, to deſtroy the effects of his will. It is to be preſumed that Cæſar will give full ſcope to his benevolence in favour of a faithful friend and ally, who ſubmits to his imperial determination with the utmoſt reliance; and not permit that dignity and juſtice by which he has been diſtinguiſhed through the whole world, to be inſulted by envious and calumnious reports. Is Antipater equally ready with us to pay a proper deference to the will and authority of Cæſar? I confeſs it would be no eaſy matter to form a judgment how Herod could be ſo far miſtaken as to the perſon on whom he intended to beſtow the government, and yet ſo perfectly right in the diſpoſition of it."

Archelaus behaves ſubmiſſively before Cæſar, who gives a favourable opinion of him.

As ſoon as Nicolaus had ended his ſpeech, Archelaus caſt himſelf at the feet of Cæſar, who immediately raiſing him from the ground, ſaid, with an air of ſingular humanity and kindneſs, that he had approved himſelf worthy of a crown; which was deemed a kind of tacit acknowledgment of his right to ſovereignty. Cæſar, finding that the young prince was happy in his preſent reception, diſmiſſed the aſſembly, declining for the preſent to give his final reſolution on the buſineſs, and allowing himſelf time to conſider whether he ſhould eſtabliſh Archelaus alone in the government, or divide it among the whole family, ſince they all equally depended upon the imperial bounty.

Sedition and revolt of the Jews.

WHILE the above-mentioned affair remained unſettled, Malthace, the mother of Archelaus, was ſeized with a fit of illneſs, which deprived her of her life. About this time intelligence arrived from Varus, the governor of Syria, that the Jews, who from the time of the departure of Archelaus, had been exceedingly diſpoſed to acts of mutiny, had lately revolted; but that Varus, by ſuddenly attacking them with his troops, before they had time to aſſemble in very great numbers, had the happineſs to ſuppreſs the ſedition; and having puniſhed the principal mutineers neers in an exemplary manner, he returned to Antioch, leaving at Jeruſalem only one legion, to prevent farther commotions.

Sabinus oppoſes them. It appears, however, that this proviſion was inſufficient for the purpoſe: for no ſooner had Varus departed, than Sabinus, the deputy-governor in Syria for Cæſar, thinking the above-mentioned reinforcement would enable him to be at leaſt on equal terms with the multitude, determined to turn his arms againſt the Jews. Thus reſolved, he worried and provoked them in every poſſible inſtance, rendering them impatient of ſuch cruel treatment: he made attacks on many of their caſtles and forts; and under pretence of rendering ſervice to the public, made a general ſearch to diſcover the depoſits of conceaſed treaſure; but his real intentions were to obtain money ſufficient to enrich himſelf.

Diſturbances at the paſſover At this time the feaſt of the paſſover (which is the moſt diſtinguiſhed feſtival kept by our nation) drew nigh; and on this occaſion many thouſands of Jews, from all parts of the country, repaired to Jeruſalem: ſome of them came with an intention of paying their religious adoration, but great numbers were inſpired only by motives of revenge. They aſſembled together, not only from the adjacent country of Judæa, where their ſufferings had been the moſt ſevere, but from Galilee, Jericho and Idumæa, and likewiſe from the towns beyond Jordan, with a reſolution to puniſh the conduct of Sabinus in the moſt exemplary manner. Being aſſembled, they parted their troops into three diviſions, one of which took poſſeſſion of the circus; the ſecond placed themſelves on the north-eaſt ſide of the temple; and the third took their ſtation in the weſt, adjacent to the royal palace. Being thus ſituated, they incloſed the Romans between them, and began to make preparations for the attack.

Sabinus ſends to Varus for relief. This intrepid behaviour of the people furniſhed no ſmall degree of ſurprize to Sabinus, who perceiving that there was no doubt but that they were reſolutely determined either on death or conqueſt, he inſtantly diſpatched meſſengers to Varus for reinforcements, urging that if the expected relief was not immediately ſent, the legion that he had left in the city would be infallibly deſtroyed.

In the interim Sabinus aſcended to the top of a high turret, a part of the caſtle of Phaſael, which was built in honour of the brother of Herod, who was killed in battle by the Parthians. From this place he made ſignals with his hand, that the Romans ſhould ſally forth, and make an attack upon the Jews; inſolently expecting that others would venture their lives in ſupport of meaſures brought about by his avarice, while he was afraid to make one of the number, and take his ſhare of the common danger. Notwithſtanding the unreaſonableneſs of this expectation, the Romans obeyed the orders, and a ſmart engagement enſued. The ſoldiers behaved in a manner that did great honour to their perſonal courage; but the Jews were by no means diſmayed, though their people fell in conſiderable numbers. At length the Jews took poſſeſſion of ſome of the outward galleries of the temple, which having aſcended, their archers and ſlingers annoyed the enemy with ſtones and arrows, appearing in ſafety, rather as ſpectators of the battle than actors in it; for ſuch was their ſituation, that the Romans could not do any execution on them in return. For a conſiderable time the battle was continued under theſe diſadvantages; till at length the Romans made a large fire under the galleries, which being built of wood, the flames ſpread with great rapidity, and ſoon aſcended to the roof; the pitch, wax, and oil, that had been uſed in thoſe parts that were gilt, contributing greatly to the increaſe of the fire, the whole was ſoon in ſuch an univerſal blaze that there was no proſpect of eſcaping: death ſurrounded them on every ſide: great numbers met their fate by the fall of the building, others were put to the ſword on the ground; ſo that, upon the whole, of all thoſe who had taken poſſeſſion of the galleries, not a ſingle perſon eſcaped. Several aſtoniſhed even to diſtraction, devoted themſelves to the flames in mere deſpair: others threw themſelves on the points of their ſwords: a number thought to ſave themſelves by retiring to holes and corners; but theſe were all put to death by the ſoldiers; for being totally unprovided with arms, it was impoſſible they ſhould make any defence. When the fire began to abate, the Romans made their way through the ruins till they came to the place where the ſacred treaſure was depoſited: a great part of which the ſoldiers ſtole and carried off; but Sabinus pretended that not above four hundred talents of the whole booty came to his hands.

The Jews gall the enemy from the temple galleries, which are fired by the Romans, to the great deſtruction of the Jews.

The temple rifled by the Roman ſoldiers.

The diſtreſſes of the Jews were now aggravated in a very high degree; numbers of them having loſt many of their deareſt friends and relations; and all of them having occaſion to lament the ſacrilegious robbery of the temple. Yet notwithſtanding the reaſon they had to abandon themſelves to deſpair, a conſiderable number of the moſt reſolute among them aſſembled together, and ſurrounding the palace, they threatened that they would ſet fire to it without loſs of time, and if any one ſhould attempt to eſcape from the flames, he ſhould be inſtantly put to the ſword; but this vengeance was not to take place, if they would immediately abandon their ſtation, and depart: and they likewiſe promiſed indemnity to Sabinus and all his adherents, if they would inſtantly retire: and the majority of the court was on the ſide of Sabinus.

The place beſet by the Jews, who threaten to burn it.

At this period Rufus and Gratus departed to the Roman intereſt, having with them three thouſand of Herod's ſelect troops, excluſive of a party of horſe that was under the immediate command of Rufus; which afforded a conſiderable and well-timed relief. Still, however, the Jews continued their operations with unceaſing unceaſing ardor: they mined the walls, threatened the enemy, yet adviſed them to depart while there was any degree of ſafety in ſo doing; nor run the riſk of driving to deſperation a people who were reſolved, whatever might be the conſequence, to maintain their liberties inviolate, and to preſerve thoſe laws and rights ſacred which their anceſtors had tranſmitted as their inheritance. Sabinus ſeemed not ill-diſpoſed to have complied with theſe injunctions, but he was afraid to truſt to the promiſes of the Jews, from a conſciouſneſs how ill he had deſerved at their hands: beſides, he thought that the terms which were offered him were too advantageous to be ratified: and for theſe reaſons he reſolved to attempt the maintenance of his preſent poſt, in the hope that Varus might ſend him aſſiſtance before he ſhould be compelled to abandon it.

Commotions in Judæa.

While affairs at Jeruſalem were thus ſituated, many other inſurrections took place in different parts of Judæa, and in the adjacent countries, partly ariſing from motives of revenge, and partly from a view to advantage. On this occaſion a number of forces which Herod had diſbanded, amounting to about two thouſand, aſſembled in a body, under the command of Ahiab, a nephew of Herod, with a reſolution to attack a party of the troops of Archelaus: but Ahiab, not inſenſible that thoſe he had to cope with were veteran ſoldiers, and men of approved valour, did all in his power to avoid coming to action, by retreating to ſecure places, where it was not an eaſy matter to encounter him.

The country harraſſed by Judas a robber.

Nor were theſe the only diſturbances that happened: for Judas, the ſon of Ezekias, the famous robber that formerly gave ſo much trouble to Herod (though in the end he ſubdued him), occaſioned freſh ſcenes of confuſion. This Judas, having put himſelf at the head of a number of deſperate men, whom he had raiſed at Sepphoris, a city of Galilee, cauſed all his adherents to take arms, and made an incurſion into the king's country, where he made ſeizure of the magazines and military ſtores, took poſſeſſion of the money belonging to the king; rendered himſelf an object of terror to the inhabitants; ravaged and deſtroyed the country wherever he came, and at length aſpired even to the regal government: this, however, he did not by the uſual arts of ingratiating himſelf with the people, or by giving any proof of his attachment to the laws of honour (for of theſe he had no idea), but by the wanton perpetration of every miſchief that lay within his power.

Simon, late ſervant of Herod, aſpires to the ſovereignty, and commits great ravages.

During the confuſion occaſioned by this ſtate of public affairs, there came into notice one Simon, heretofore a ſervant of king Herod, who was remarkably diſtinguiſhed by his uncommon ſtrength, the height of his ſtature, and the ſingular grace and comelineſs of his perſon. The vanity and impudence of this man impelled him to aſpire to the crown. He procured a number of guards to attend him, and was every where received as a prince, by the undiſcerning multitude, who ſaluted him with exclamations of "God ſave the king!" In fact, he conſidered himſelf as the moſt fit perſon in the world to be advanced to the regal government. That he might give a proper ſpecimen of his dignity, he began by burning and rifling the palace at Jericho, ravaged ſeveral others of the king's houſes in the ſame manner, and permitted his adherents to make booty of whatever they found therein. Nor would his depredations have ended here, if his career had not been prevented in time; but Gratus, one of the king's captains, who was at that time aſſociated with the Romans, advancing with his troops againſt Simon, a moſt violent and obſtinate engagement happened between them. The forces under the command of Simon, which came from the other ſide of the river Jordan, exhibiting much greater proofs of courage than ſkill in the action, were ſoon routed and cut in pieces: Simon, who attempted to make his eſcape over ſome difficult paſſes, was taken priſoner, on which Gratus gave orders for his being beheaded.

He is routed by Gratus, and loſes his head.

The palace of Amatha burnt by the populace.

This rage for a new mode of government was every where prevalent among the common people. A licentious multitude, not unlike thoſe who followed the fortunes of Simon, burnt to the ground the royal palace of Amatha adjoining to the river Jordan. The people appeared to be univerſally inſpired with a violence of ſentiment that approached even to madneſs; occaſioned principally by the abſence of their king, who by the arguments of reaſon, and the enforcements of law, might have kept them within the bounds of their duty. It is true that foreigners were brought in to reclaim them: but ſo inſatiable was their avarice, and ſo unbounded their pride, that the people at large were only ſufferers by what was intended for their advantage.

Ambitious views, and outrageous acts of Athronges and his brothers.

At this time there appeared a man named Athronges, who was diſtinguiſhed neither by birth, virtue or fortune, being a ſhepherd of the loweſt rank: but he was remarkable for the enormous ſize of his perſon, and the uncommon ſtrength of his limbs. Thus qualified, he ſought to obtain a ſhare in the government, and reſolved to riſk his life that he might acquire to himſelf the prerogative of doing as much miſchief as might be agreeable to his own inclination. Now Athronges had four brothers, neither of which was leſs remarkable than himſelf for bulk and ſtature; and under the command of each of them was a number of ſoldiers, which they deemed an eſſential circumſtance towards obtaining the principal point which they had in view. Great numbers of people flocked to the ſtandards of theſe five brothers: Athronges ſent out his four brethren on different parties, to act as deputies to him, while himſelf acted the part of a ſovereign, ſitting in council with a crown on his head, making reſolutions and iſſuing orders reſpecting affairs of ſtate.

Particulars of their irregularities and cruelty.

This mock monarchy continued for a conſiderable time, during which the royal ſtyle and title were kept up, and he ſeemed to have more obedience paid to him than was requiſite; for Athronges exerciſed unlimited authority, and his decrees were not to be controverted. When the Romans or the king's ſoldiers became ſubject to his will he acted with the utmoſt cruelty, for he was equally an enemy to them both; to the one party for the freedom they had taken during the time of Herod, and to the other on account of injuries of a later date. Animoſities now grew daily to a greater height; one enormity made way for another; the reſentment became implacable; cruelties were committed for the ſake of cruelty, and the deſtruction made with the view to the obtaining of booty was ſo great, that no perſon could poſſeſs his own life in ſafety.

They are all taken, and the tumult ſuppreſſed.

The partizans of Athronges, iſſuing from an ambuſh near Emmaus, attacked a Roman convoy that was bringing corn and arms to the camp, and killed on the ſpot Arius the captain, with about forty of his troops, all men of diſtinguiſhed bravery; and it is probable that the reſt of the forces would have ſhared the ſame fate, if Gratus had not joined them with a party of ſoldiers, and relieved them juſt in the very moment of danger: but, as it was, they were obliged to leave their dead behind them, ſo narrow was their eſcape. The brothers of Athronges and himſelf ſtill kept fighting for a conſiderable time, doing material injury to the Romans, but ſuſtaining much greater themſelves; and in the end they were all taken priſoners in the following manner: One of them was made captive in a battle with Gratus; a ſecond by Ptolemy; Archelaus took the eldeſt into cuſtody; and the other two finding their caſe deſperate, that their men were worn out with toil and ſickneſs, and that they had no hope of redreſs, or proſpect of receiving freſh recruits, at length likewiſe ſurrendered themſelves to Archelaus, who pledged his honour, and took an oath for the performance of certain ſtipulated conditions: but this happened a conſiderable time after the ſurrender of the other brothers.

Confuſed ſtate of Judæa.

While things remained in this ſtate of licentious confuſion, every party of malecontents wiſhed to impoſe kings of their own choice on the public; by which the government was greatly diſturbed, and the Jews, in particular, were perpetually dividing into freſh factions; but things were not altogether ſo unhappily ſituated among the Romans.

Varus prepares to relieve Sabinus.

The intelligence that Sabinus had conveyed to Varus reſpecting the danger of his ſituation, made the latter extremely apprehenſive for the ſafety of the third legion, which was all the force that they had in Syria; wherefore he aſſembled the other two legions, with four troops of horſe, and the auxiliary forces of the king and the tetrarch, and proceeded immediately towards Judæa, to give ſuccour to the beſieged, appointing a rendezvous at Ptolemais, in his way to which he took fifteen hundred men with him from Berytus.

Aretas aſſiſts the Romans.

Excluſive of this reinforcement, Aretas the Patræan (the ſame who through a miſunderſtanding with Herod had gone over to the Romans), furniſhed him with a large body of cavalry and infantry. When all theſe united forces were met together at Ptolemais, Varus deputed a command of part of the army to his ſon, in conjunction with one of his particular friends, directing them to march into Galilee, which is in the neighbourhood of Ptolemais. On this incurſion into the country, the ſon of Varus met with ſome oppoſition; but he was every where ſucceſsful: he took Sepphoris; ſold the inhabitants thereof as ſlaves by public auction, and reduced the city to aſhes. In the mean time Varus proceeded with his army towards Samaria, but he did no injury to that city, as he knew the inhabitants were diſpoſed to acts of loyalty, and of a very peaceable diſpoſition. He now encamped in the village of Arus, which was the property of Pompey: but this village was burnt by the Arabians, who ſought to do every injury to the friends of Herod, in deteſtation of the memory of that prince. The army proceeded to Sampho; but that place, though exceedingly well fortified, was rifled by the Arabians, who afterwards ſet fire to it: in fact, great ravages were made, both by fire and ſword, during the whole of this expedition.

Arus and Sampho burnt by the Arabians.

Varus gave orders for the burning of the city Emmaus, in reſentment on account of a number of his ſoldiers having been there ſlain; but he firſt permitted the inhabitants to quit the city. Proceeding from this place towards Jeruſalem, his army no ſooner came in ſight of that place, than the Jews, who had beſieged the legion ſtationed therein, abandoned their ſituation, and every one began to conſult his own ſafety. Varus cenſured the Jews of Jeruſalem with the utmoſt ſeverity on account of the paſt tranſactions; but they urged in their defence, that the circumſtance happening at a time when ſuch immenſe multitudes of people had crouded to Jeruſalem, the inhabitants had not occaſioned the war, but the ſtrangers; and that the former, ſo far from having acted in oppoſition to the Romans, had run an equal riſk with them in the conſequence of the encounter. With regard to Sabinus, he had left the city privately, and retired towards the ſea-coaſt, ſo that Varus could not by any means get him in his poſſeſſion.

Varus orders Emmaus to be burnt.

Varus puniſhes the moſt guilty ringleaders of ſedition, and pardons many of the rioters.

Things being thus ſituated, Varus ſent meſſengers through the country, to inquire who were the principals in the late revolt; and having convicted a great number on the cleareſt evidence, he cauſed about two thouſand to be executed on this occaſion; but others he pardoned and diſmiſſed. The troops under Varus having, contrary to his intentions, and in the violence of military rage, committed many very unjuſtifiable actions, he now diſmiſſed the greater part of his army, for which he had little farther occaſion. After this, however, being informed that ten thouſand Jews had collected themſelves together, he gave orders that a large detachment ſhould attack them in their quarters; but this attack was unneceſſary; for they delivered themſelves priſoners at diſcretion to Ahiab, without offering ing to make the leaſt reſiſtance. Varus now gave the common people their liberty, and pardoned all the rioters in general, except the principal people concerned in the commotion, among whom were ſome perſons related to Herod, who had engaged in the conteſt, in defiance of regard to their affinity, and the laws of honour and conſcience. The public diſturbances being thus in great meaſure compoſed, Varus returned to Antioch, leaving the ſame legion in garriſon at Jeruſalem that was there before.

The Jews ſend an embaſſy to Cæſar, who gives them audience.

The inſurrection in Judæa was no ſooner ended, than Varus found a freſh ſcene of difficulty by a circumſtance that happened at Rome, of which the following are the particulars. Varus had given permiſſion to the Jews to apply to Cæſar, for leave to live among themſelves, and act according to their own laws. In conſequence hereof fifty of them were joined in a commiſſion to make the neceſſary requeſt, and above eight thouſand more were to ſecond their application. On this occaſion Cæſar gave orders that ſeveral of his particular friends, and other perſons of the greateſt eminence in the city, ſhould attend him in the temple of Apollo, a ſumptuous edifice which himſelf had built. To this place the deputies repaired, followed by a great number of Jews; and Archelaus and his friends likewiſe attended: but the relations of the king knew not how to act in this emergency; for as, on the one hand, they had an utter antipathy to Archelaus, and therefore could not eſpouſe his intereſt, ſo, on the other, it was impoſſible that they ſhould take part with the deputies, without making it apparent to the emperor that they were enemies to a prince to whom themſelves were related. Philip, the brother, likewiſe attended on this occaſion, having, in conſequence of the advice of Varus, come out of Syria, with a view to aſſiſt Archelaus, for whom he entertained the moſt ſingular eſteem and regard. Philip, however, was not at this time deſtitute of hope that if the deputies ſhould ſucceed in their application, and the children of Herod ſhould be adjudged to ſhare in the dignity, he might himſelf obtain a portion of the kingdom.

The Jewiſh embaſſadors accuſe Herod and Archelaus

The deputies began their addreſs by making an humble and earneſt application that, for the future, kings might no longer reign over them, whoſe power was intolerable. They recounted the hiſtory of the iniquity and miſmanagement of Herod, who, they ſaid, though a king in name, was a tyrant in the exerciſe of his power. They urged that he was not only an adept in the vulgar modes of oppreſſion, but artful in new contrivances to improve on the wickedneſs of thoſe who had gone before him. "It would be needleſs (ſaid they) to attempt the making a calculation of the number of lives that have fallen ſacrifices to his inhumanity, ſince they who ſurvived were yet more wretched than others who were deſtroyed; for terror and danger perpetually ſurrounded them, under a maſter devoid of every principle of humanity, who equally diſpoſed of their perſons and fortunes as his humour directed. Wherefore did his vanity inſpire him to laviſh ſuch an uncommon expence on ſtrangers? Why did he repair, rebuild, beautify and enrich ſuch a number of their cities, but that he had deviſed a mode, peculiar to himſelf, of diſtreſſing his own ſubjects in the higheſt degree, in order to gratify his vanity by the applauſe of foreigners; and prided himſelf by making a deſert of what had been a plentiful and flouriſhing country? What numbers of the nobility has he doomed to death, on the ſlighteſt pretences, and in violation of all law and equity, ſimply to reap the advantage of their forfeited eſtates! And has he not received the fortunes of many others as a compenſation for their lives, which he pretended were forfeited? With regard to the collection of the cuſtomary taxes, he could not be ſatisfied with the payment which each perſon made, according to the ſum for which he was taxed, but bribes and farther gratifications muſt be given to collectors and other dependents of the court, as well as to thoſe who were their agents, to prevent their being otherwiſe ill treated. We ſay nothing of the horrid inſults offered equally to virgins and to married women; but chuſe to let them reſt in oblivion, in tenderneſs to the reputation of thoſe that ſuſtained the injury: but, in fact, the moſt ſavage beaſt of the foreſt could not have ruled over us in a more tyrannical manner than Herod did. The misfortunes conſequent on his reign were indiſputably the greateſt that ever were endured by the people of our nation: wherefore they might very reaſonably be permitted to pay their compliments to Archelaus on the death of his father, ſince they were certain that it was impoſſible a worſe prince ſhould ſucceed him. The people too, to ſhew the reſpect they entertained for the ſon, were not leſs forward to promote the funeral honours of the father; and were anxious, by every inſtance of obedience and affection, to teſtify the deſire they had of obtaining the favour of the reigning prince: but it was not long before they had melancholy occaſion to know that Archelaus was the true ſon of ſuch a father: for he was not even eſtabliſhed in his government before he gave them a ſpecimen of what they were hereafter to expect, when they ſhould be wholly at the diſpoſal of his mercy. For the preſent his whole fortune was dependent on the bounty of Cæſar; yet willing to give his new ſubjects an inſtance of his regard to juſtice, his modeſty, and his virtue, he cauſed three thouſand citizens of his own tribe to be ſacrificed, and this even in the temple, with as little remorſe as if they had fallen victims to the rigid laws of their country. It now remains that the public ſhould form an opinion of the inſolence of this wicked man, who with the moſt ſhameleſs effrontery, after having been guilty of committing ſo violent an outrage, can think of charging the crime upon others, and at the ſame time of making pretenſions to the government."

Odious character of Archelaus.

In a word, the deputies concluded what they had to ſay by making a ſhort requeſt

to

to Cæsar, the purport of which was, that he would alter the form of their government, and no longer permit them to live under the oppression of a monarchy: they intreated that they might be annexed to Syria, and ruled by such persons as Cæsar should think proper; saying that it would then be evident whether they were a people who sought to make innovations, and to live in the perpetration of acts of turbulence; or were disposed to obey the laws of order, and to pay a proper deference to the authority of legal government.

Nicolaus pleads in defence of Herod and Archelaus

As soon as the deputies had concluded their address to Cæsar, Nicolaus began to speak in defence of Herod and Archelaus; and what he said was to the following purpose: "I would wish to ask, that if Herod was guilty of all the crimes that have been charged upon him, how it happened that his accusers never thought fit to call him to an account for it during his life-time, when the justice of Cæsar would so readily have afforded them satisfaction? With regard to what is charged on Archelaus, the act was not so properly his own, as impelled upon him by the violence of a turbulent faction, which had first insulted the laws by the most seditious kind of behaviour, and then destroyed those who were delegated to quell the uproar. And to what does the crime of Archelaus amount, more than that, by being at the head of a stronger power, he has suppressed a dangerous insurrection?" Nicolaus now turning to those who had made the complaint, said, "No peace is to be expected during the prevalence of the present spirit of confusion; and while these people are permitted to judge for themselves, and direct as they please, they will never acknowledge that they are satisfied with any grants in their favour."

CHAP. X.

The Generosity of CÆSAR to the Sons of HEROD. The Allotments granted to them severally.

Cæsar's decision respecting the succession.

CÆSAR having heard what arguments were advanced by each party, dismissed the assembly, and having taken a few days for consideration on the business, declared that Archelaus should succeed to the half of Herod's dominion, under the title of an ethnarch, though not of king; but yet that he should come into possession of the kingdom when his merit should entitle him to so honourable a distinction. The other half of the kingdom was divided between the two sons of Herod, Philip and Antipas, the latter being the same who oppcsed Archelaus with regard to the government of the whole. The share allotted to Antipas was the country beyond Jordan, and the district of Galilee, with an annual revenue of two hundred talents. To Philip was given a yearly revenue of one hundred talents, with the lands of Batanæa, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and part of the palace which bore the name of Zenodorus. To Archelaus were given the countries of Judæa, Idumæa and Samaria, to which last Cæsar remitted a fourth part of their duty customarily paid, on the account of the inhabitants having remained loyal, when those of the other districts rebelled. The tower of Straton, with Sebaste, Joppa and Jerusalem, likewise came to his share; but the inhabitants of Gaza, Gadara and Hippon, having conformed to the Grecian mode of living, Cæsar had annexed them to Syria, and they were no longer considered as dependencies on the kingdom. On the whole, six hundred talents was deemed to be the revenue of Archelaus.

His generous allotments to Herod's sons,

This was the adjustment of the patrimony of the sons of Herod. With regard to Salome, Cæsar granted her a palace in Ascalon, within the dominions of Archelaus, exclusive of the cities of Jamnia, Azotus, and Phasaelis, which her brother had bequeathed to her by will, together with five hundred pieces of minted money; so that her whole revenue was estimated at six hundred talents annually. The rest of the legacies which had been left to the relations of Herod, were likewise confirmed to them by Cæsar, agreeable to the tenor of his will. Exclusive of what Herod had bequeathed to his two unmarried daughters, Cæsar made them a present of two hundred and fifty thousand pieces of silver each, and caused marriages to take place between them, and the two sons of Pheroras. But what distinguished the conduct of Cæsar for a generous magnificence beyond every other circumstance, was the division which he made of his own legacy among the sons of Herod, of all which valuable bequest he retained only a few pieces of plate, and these rather as a remembrance of the giver, than from any particular regard he had to the articles bequeathed.

and bountiful grant to Salome.

CHAP. XI.

A JEW personates ALEXANDER the Son of HEROD. He goes to ROME in great State and Splendor. The Imposition is discovered by CÆSAR. The Man, confessing the Cheat, is condemned to the Gallies, and the Person by whose Advice he acted is put to Death.

The Jews imposed on by a spurious Alexander.

ALL matters respecting the will and legacies of Herod being now adjusted, the public attention was engaged by a singular circumstance. There was a young man, of the nation of the Jews, who had been educated at Sidon with a freeman of Rome. Now this young Jew happened to bear so perfect a likeness to Alexander, the son of Herod (whom his father had ordered to be put to death) that they who recollected the former could not discern any difference in their persons. The Jew thinking to make advantage of this circumſtance, would frequently throw out hints that he was related to the royal family; and intimate in an artful manner, that he had ſome proſpect of obtaining the poſſeſſion of the crown.

Method adopted for carrying on the impoſture.

While he was ruminating on this buſineſs, he happened to fall into converſation with an artful man of his own nation and tribe; one who underſtood the nature of court intrigues and contrivances, and was admirably calculated for the carrying on any ſcene of extraordinary wickedneſs. Having deliberated together on the ſubject, the ſubſtance of the ſharper's advice was, that the young fellow ſhould aſſume the name and character of that very Alexander who was ſaid to be dead; and they agreed to propagate the ſtory in this manner: that the perſon to whom the care of the execution of the two brothers (Alexander and Ariſtobulus) had been entruſted, had ſubſtituted two other perſons in their ſtead, and by this means preſerved both their lives. This device not only pleaſed the imagination of the impoſtor, who was happy in the thought of the part he had to act; but the people in general ſeemed to give a ready aſſent to the impoſition; inſomuch that in going to the iſle of Crete, and from thence to that of Melos, the Jews placed the moſt implicit confidence in his ſtory; and to the ſuppoſed credit of his affinity to the royal family, and advanced him ſeveral conſiderable ſums of money. By this time the young adventurer was ſo impreſſed with the idea of his imaginary conſequence, that he formed a hundred romantic ſchemes, and began to conſider whom he would take into his favour, and what places and preferments he would beſtow.

He goes to Rome;

Filled with theſe great, but airy imaginations, he proceeds towards Rome, being accompanied by a number of his new courtiers and adherents. Having reached Puteoli, he had no ſooner landed at that place than immenſe numbers of Jews crouded about him, and all thoſe who had any acquaintance with knowledge of Herod, acknowledged and received him as their king. The credulity of the populace had now ample matter to work on, and was a ſtrong preſumption in its favour; for the likeneſs between this perſon and the prince was ſo very extraordinary, that many of the intimate friends of the latter, on the very firſt ſight of the impoſtor, did not only ſay, but ſwear that he was Alexander, and could not poſſibly be any other perſon.

The Jews reſort to him;

Intelligence of this extraordinary affair being conveyed to Rome, all the Jews in that city came out to meet the ſuppoſed prince, offering praiſes and thankſgivings to heaven, for that Providence which they thought had decreed a deliverance ſo truly ſurpriſing. No expence was ſpared to celebrate his arrival: he was carried in a litter, with the ſtate and magnificence of a prince, and followed by immenſe crouds of people, who ſhouted for joy, and offered up their prayers and vows for his ſafety and proſperity, as is common in caſes of ſuch a nature; but theſe honours took their riſe chiefly from the reſpect they bore to Mariamne, his ſuppoſed mother.

Cæſar examines into his claim;

Cæſar, having reflected on the matter, could not be induced to believe the ſtory, for he thought Herod was not a likely perſon to have been impoſed on in an affair of ſuch importance. However, not to determine too haſtily, he diſpatched a freeman of his, named Celadus, who had been a cotemporary and companion of the two princes, to bring to him the ſuppoſed Alexander, that he might ſee and converſe with him. But when Celadus came to him, he was as much deceived as to his identity as the reſt of the world had been. Notwithſtanding this, however, Cæſar could not be impoſed upon in the affair; for though the two perſons bore as ſtrong a reſemblance to each other as imagination can conceive, yet, upon a clear inſpection, ſome circumſtances were diſcernible in which their perſons diſagreed; particularly with regard to the hands of the ſuppoſititious Alexander, which had become hard and callous through labour; and his ſkin was obſerved to be coarſer than that of perſons generally is who are brought up in all the refinements of court delicacy. Cæſar likewiſe remarked, that the ſuppoſed prince and his tutor agreed exactly in their tale; yet he was ſtill convinced that the whole was an impoſition. He enquired of the youth what was become of his brother Ariſtobulus; and ſince they both obtained their liberty at the ſame time, how it happened that they did not make their appearance together, and put in a joint claim to the crown. To this the impoſtor anſwered, that Ariſtobulus remained at Cyprus, being apprehenſive of danger on the voyage, ſince, if it had happened that they had both been loſt, there would have remained no one of the race of Mariamne; for which reaſon care was taken for the ſafety of Ariſtobulus, to prevent ſuch a contingency.

He expoſtulates with him

The impoſtor continuing poſitively to affirm this, and his coadjutor agreeing with him in every part of the ſtory, Cæſar took the young man into another apartment, and addreſſed him in the following manner. "Remember that it will be at your peril if you impoſe upon me by fallehood; but if you ſpeak the truth, your life ſhall be ſpared. Therefore I deſire that you will immediately inform me who and what you are, and who it was that inſtigated you to this procedure; for you are yet too young to have engaged in ſo diabolical a plan, if you had not been encouraged by the artifice of others."

Detects the impoſition, ſends the pretender to the gallies, and puts his adviſer to death.

When the youth found that he was thus hard preſſed, and that evaſions would no longer anſwer any good purpoſe, he recounted to Cæſar the whole hiſtory of the affair, and gave up his adviſer; and told all the manner of their proceeding. Hereupon Cæſar condemned the adviſer to death; but kept his promiſe with the impoſtor, whom he condemned to the gallies, as he was of a ſtout habit of body, and well able to endure ſuch labour. With regard to the Jews of Melos, they were deemed to have been ſufficiently puniſhed in the expence they had ſuſtained by way of ſupporting the impoſition.

ARCHELAUS, for mal-adminiſtration, baniſhed, and all his Goods confiſcated. Recital of his Dream, which is expounded by SIMON an Eſſene. GLAPHYRA's Dream, reſpecting her former Huſband.

Conduct and tranſactions of Archelaus.

THE ethnarchy having been beſtowed on Archelaus, he took poſſeſſion of it on his return to Judæa; and not long afterwards removed Joazar, the ſon of Boethus, from the office of high-prieſt, having been charged with being concerned with a ſeditious faction; and Archelaus now conferred the office on his brother Eleazar.

The ethnarch now, at a very great expence, rebuilt the palace of Jericho; and of a fine ſtream watering the village of Neara, he conveyed the half to a grove of palm-trees, which he had lately planted in a meadow adjacent thereto. He likewiſe cauſed a new village to be erected, which he denominated Archelais, in imitation of his own name. Soon after this, in oppoſition to the laws of his country, he married Glaphyra, the daughter of king Archelaus, and the widow of his brother Alexander, though intermarriages with the wives of brothers are expreſsly forbidden by the laws of the Jews; and by this wife he had ſeveral children. Eleazar, the high-prieſt, was but a ſhort time in poſſeſſion of that elevated ſtation; for he was depoſed from the office, and Jeſus, the ſon of Sias, appointed in his ſtead.

His ſubjects complain of him to Cæſar, who baniſhes him to Vienne

When Archelaus had held the reins of government about ten years, the principal people among the Jews and Samaritans were ſo greatly diſpleaſed with his mode of adminiſtering public affairs, that they united in an addreſs to Cæſar, complaining of his conduct. They were the more emboldened to make this complaint, becauſe they knew that a too rigorous execution of juſtice was contrary to the will and inclination of Cæſar, who had given him the moſt poſitive commands to rule over his people by the laws of equity, impartiality, and benevolence. When Cæſar became acquainted with this complaint, he ſent for Archelaus, who was his agent at Rome, commanding his attendance without loſs of time, and directing him to go immediately, and bring to him the other Archelaus; without even honouring him with a letter to notify his buſineſs. Archelaus had no ſooner received his commiſſion, than he haſtened into Judæa, where he met with the other Archelaus at an entertainment with his friends, told him the command of Cæſar, and deſired he would inſtantly come with him. On their arrival at Rome, Cæſar heard the charge and defence, and then ſentenced Archelaus to be baniſhed to Vienne, a city of Gaul, and ordered that all his goods ſhould be confiſcated.

Account of his ſingular dream;

Not long before the above-named Archelaus was ſent for to Rome, he had a ſingular dream, the particulars of which he recited to ſeveral of his friends, and which are as follows. He imagined that he beheld ten ears of wheat, all ripe and full, and ſome oxen devouring them. When he awaked, this dream ſo ſtrongly impreſſed his mind, that he could not refrain aſking the meaning of it from ſome perſons who were eminent for their ſkill in the explanation of ſuch kind of myſteries. However, the interpreters differing in ſentiment, Simon, an Eſſene, obtained permiſſion of the reſt, to give his explanation of the above-mentioned dream: and his determination was, that it foretold ſome misfortune that was to happen to Archelaus; for he ſaid that the dreaming of oxen, which are animals deſtined to ſlaviſh labour, implied miſery; and likewiſe a change of affairs, becauſe when the ground was turned up the ſituation and appearance of things were changed. He ſaid that the ten ears of corn ſeemed to intimate an equal number of years, which revolve in a regular courſe; and that it was apparent that the reign of Archelaus was nearly concluded. Thus did Simon explain the above-mentioned dream; and on the fifth day after it happened, Archelaus the agent of Cæſar arrived in Judæa, with orders for the other Archelaus to wait upon the emperor.

and that of his wife Glaphyra, who ſoon after dies.

Glaphyra his wife, the daughter of Archelaus the king, had likewiſe a dream of a ſingular kind. This Glaphyra (as hath been before obſerved) was firſt married to Alexander, the ſon of Herod, and the brother of Archelaus. After her firſt huſband was put to death by the order of his father, ſhe was married to Juba, king of Mauritania; and after his deceaſe ſhe remained a widow with her father in Cappadocia, till Archelaus fell violently in love with, and married her, having firſt diſcharged his former wife, Mariamne. While ſhe was the wife of Archelaus, ſhe had the following dream: Her imagination painted the figure of her firſt huſband, Alexander, advancing towards her: and then, when ſhe intended to have claſped him in her arms, with every demonſtration of love and joy, he began to expoſtulate with her in the following manner: "Alas! Glaphyra, thou haſt verified the old obſervation, that there is no confidence to be placed in women. Was I not the huſband of thy virginity; and had we not children, the pledges of our mutual love? How then couldſt thou ſo far forget the mutual obligations we were under to each other, as to engage in a ſecond marriage; and after that to be wedded a third time, and even then to my brother Archelaus; thus violating the honour of my family in a moſt ſhameful manner? However, our former love ſhall not be forgotten, and it ſhall be my care to deliver thee from the ignominy of this laſt connection." Glaphyra repeated the particulars of this dream to ſeveral of her female acquaintance, and died within a few days after it happened.

CHAP. I.

The Government of SYRIA committed to CYRENIUS. Dreadful Outrages committed by JUDAS, a GAULANITE, and SADDUCUS, a PHARISEE. The burning of the Temple. A fourth Sect set up by JUDAS and SADDUCUS.

Cyrenius made governor of Syria.

AT this period Cæsar sent as a governor into Syria, Cyrenius, a man distinguished by the eminence of his character, a senator of Rome, and one who had arrived at the dignity of a consul, after having gone through all the offices of honour which lead to that eminent station. He was attended by Coponius, the master of horse, who went with him in the character of governor of Judæa; but as Judæa was at this time annexed to Syria, Cyrenius was charged with the business of taxing the people, and likewise directed to seize on the money and effects that had belonged to Archelaus.

The Jews murmur, and excite a rebellion on account of the taxes levied by Cyrenius.

For some time, at first, the Jews were extremely uneasy at this mode of taxation; but they were at length induced to submit to it, and comply without giving any farther trouble, partly by the advice, and partly by the authority of Joazar, the high-priest, and son of Boethus. About this time, one Judas, a Gaulanite, of the city of Gamala, began to distinguish himself. This man combined with a Pharisee, named Sadducus, to entice the people to revolt. They urged that taxes were only badges of slavery; and that it would become the dignity of the whole people to unite in an assertion of their liberty: they said that one fortunate and well-timed stroke would render them independent for ever; and would contribute no less to the security of their possessions than to the advancement of their reputation.

Shocking outrages committed by them.

There were but few arguments necessary to excite the multitude to acts of violence; nor is it in the power of language to describe the havock that was made in the country by these outrageous depredators: friends and enemies were equally robbed and murdered without distinction: massacres and assassinations were dreadfully frequent; and all this was done under the pretence of promoting the common good; of advancing liberty, and securing property; but the fact is, that malice and private interest were the leading motives. While the people were thus mutually seeking the destruction of each other, by all the severities of an intestine war, they were likewise engaged in a foreign war, and had to struggle with all the aggravated calamities of a severe famine; yet, for a considerable time, nothing could put a period to the course of destruction in which they were engaged, till at length a fire seized the temple, and burnt it to the ground.

War and famine follow, and the temple destroyed by fire.

Judas and Sadducus the principal incendiaries.

Such was the unhappy consequence of seeking after new laws and customs, and endeavouring to abolish those established. Judas and Sadducus were the authors of this confusion, who, from a particularity of disposition, were inclined to add a fourth sect to the three former: and the idea of innovation so charmed the multitude, that a great party joined them; which not only occasioned the present disturbances, but laid the foundation of much future calamity: in this place, therefore, it will be proper to treat of those mischievous principles and opinions from which such fatal consequences have arisen.

CHAP. II.

Opinions and Practices of the PHARISEES and SADDUCEES. Mode of Living, and Sentiments of the ESSENES. Their Doctrine and Government. Account of a fourth Sect who were for absolute Liberty.

Different sects among the Jews.

IN ancient times, among the Jews, there were three distinguished sects of religion; known by the names of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes; of each of which it may not be improper to say something in this place, though a farther account of them will be found in my second book of the wars of the Jews.

The Pharisees

The manner of living among the Pharisees is simple and austere: they indulge not in any luxury. They are extremely conscientious ous in an adherence to the dictates of their reason; and listen to their elders without presuming to contradict them, for they pay the highest veneration to their advice. They hold that Fate governs all things; but yet not in so absolute a manner as to exclude the operations of free will: for they say that though God orders and appoints every thing that is done; yet that, in matters which have a regard to good and evil, this does not prevent the concurrence of the will. The immortality of the soul, and a future state of rewards and punishments in another world, form a part of their faith. They say that the righteous will arise to the possession of happiness, and the wicked be condemned to endless chains and darkness. Their reputation was highly advanced among the people, by the propagation of these doctrines; and agreeable to their ideas and advice, all things were transacted in the solemn offices of prayer, and other acts of devotion: so great was the opinion that the people entertained of the equity, temperance, and wisdom of these men.

The Sadducees.

On the other hand, the opinion of the Sadducees was, that the soul and body die at the same time; and that the only obligation people are under, is, to observe the law: with these sentiments, they pride themselves on a right they have to dispute with their teachers on matters of the highest importance. There are but few of these people, but they are generally persons of distinction. Now when these are advanced to bear public offices, they are compelled, though against their sentiments, openly to adopt the opinion of the Pharisees, or otherwise the common people would not permit them to hold their stations.

The Essenes.

The third sort, the Essenes, say that the world is absolutely governed by the providence of God, without any other interference. They acknowledge the immortality of the soul, and say that justice is the chief of all virtues, which they assert by their practice as well as doctrine. They send gifts to the temple, but do not attend in person, as they sacrifice in a way peculiar to themselves, and with a greater degree of religious ceremony. They are singularly strict in their morals, rigid in conversation: husbandry is the only business they follow. They are more distinguished for their love of justice than either the Greeks or Barbarians: and boast of it as a virtue to which they have unceasingly applied. They enjoy their effects in common, knowing no such thing as the distinction of rich and poor. They neither marry nor keep servants; considering marriage as an encroachment on the natural rights of mankind; and the other circumstances as attended with more trouble than convenience; wherefore they rather incline to give assistance to each other, by a mutual interchange of good offices. This is the mode of living among these people, who are deemed to be above four thousand in number. From among their priests they chuse their treasurers and commissaries, who are men of unsullied honour; and it is their business to distribute the fruits of the earth sufficient to feed and support the whole people. On the whole, their living resembles that of the Plisti among the Dacians.

A fourth sect, who disallowed human government.

Judas Galilæus was the founder of the fourth sect of religion, which did not differ in any great degree from that of the Pharisees; principally, indeed, in their holding the maxim of uncontroulable liberty. They asserted that there was no other Lord or superior than God; and rather than call any man by the name of Master, they would expose themselves, and their nearest relations, to any degree of punishment, though ever so severe. But this fact is so well attested, and has been confirmed by such repeated observation and experience, that it is unnecessary to urge any thing in proof of it: besides, no language can convey a tolerably adequate description of the fortitude which these people evinced in their contempt of pain.

Ill-timed cruelties of Gessius Florus.

The animosities mentioned in the former chapter were greatly inflamed by the tyrannical cruelties of Gessius Florus, at that time governor of Judæa; the consequence of which was, that the people at length absolutely revolted from the Romans.

Effects of Archelaus disposed of.

THE forfeited effects and estates of Archelaus having been sold by Cyrenius, he adjusted a mode of taxation, agreeable to the orders he had received. This happened in the thirty-seventh year after the battle of Actium, in which Antony was conquered by Cæsar. At this time a violent insurrection happened among the people, in opposition to Joazar, the high-priest, whom Cyrenius deprived of his dignity, and directed that he should be succeeded by Ananus, the son of Seth.

Ananus made high-priest in the room of Joazar.

Herod and Philip had now taken possession of their tetrarchies, and adjusted affairs in the best manner possible. Herod fortified Sepphoris, encompassed it with a wall, and made it the capital bulwark of Galilee. This being done, he fortified a town, which had borne the name of Betaramphtha; but, ambitious to do honour to the empress, he changed its name to that of Julias. Philip employed himself in enlarging and beautifying Paleas, which was situated at the head of the river Jordan, and he called it by the name of Cæsarea: likewise the village of Bethsaida, on the bank of the lake Gennesareth, which he increased till it was equal in size to a capital city. This place grew populous and rich, and in respect to Julia, the daughter of Cæsar, it likewise received the name of Julias.

Disturbances in the temple.

Previous to this (as hath been remarked) Coponius was sent with Cyrenius into Judæa: and during his government the following disturbance arose. On the feast of the paschal, otherwise called the feast of unleavened bread, it is customary for the priests to set open the doors of the temple after midnight. Now it happened that a number of Samaritans had come privately into the city of Jerusalem, and having waited till the doors were opened, they immediately rushed into the temple, and taking up the bones of the deceased, threw them about into the galleries, and other parts of the building. For the future the priest directed that a better guard should be kept, being warned by the insolence of this proceeding.

Marcus Ambirius succeeds Coponius as governor.

Death of Salome, and her bequests.

Not long after this Coponius returned to Rome, and was succeeded in his government by Marcus Ambivius, during whose administration died Salome, the sister of Herod. She bequeathed to Julia, exclusive of her toparchy, the city of Jamnia, Phasaelis on the plain, and Archelais: together with several plantations of palm trees, famous for the admirable fruit they produced.

Rufus made governor, in whose administration Augustus Cæsar dies.

Ambivius was succeeded by Annius Rufus, during whose administration Augustus departed this life, at the age of seventy-seven years. He had ruled the commonwealth fifty-seven years, six months, and two days, having been an associate with Antony in the government for the space of fourteen years of that time. He the second of the Roman emperors.

Nero succeeds Augustus.

Augustus was succeeded by Tiberius Nero, his son in law, and the son of his wife Livia, being the third emperor of Rome. Now Nero bestowed the government of Judæa on Valerius Gratus, in the place of Annius Rufus. From Gratus appointed governor of Judæa.

Ananus he took the office of high-priest, and bestowed it on Ismael, the son of Fabius, who, in a very short time afterwards was removed, to make way for Eleazar, the son of Ananus, the late high-priest. Eleazar held the office for about a year, when he was deprived of it, and it was bestowed on Simon, the son of Camith; who had likewise possessed it about a twelvemonth, when he was directed to resign it, in favour of Joseph, who was surnamed Caiaphas. At this time Gratus, having been eleven years in possession of the government, returned to Rome, and was succeeded by Pontius Pilate.

Tiberias built by Herod.

Nero was now the particular friend of Herod, the tetrarch, to whose honour the latter built a city, to which he gave the name of Tiberias. He caused this city to be erected near the hot-baths of Emmaus, on the borders of the lake Gennesareth, the most commodious spot of ground in the whole country of Galilee. This city was peopled partly by strangers, and partly by the people of Galilee, some being compelled to go and reside there, and many persons of some distinction fixed on this place for their habitation by choice. It was peopled much sooner than it would have been, because great numbers flocked thither from all parts of the country: persons of all ranks and degrees, down to the meanest; some of whom were thought to be slaves. Several considerable privileges and immunities were bestowed on them by Herod, to encourage them to settle in this place: to some of them he gave houses, and to others lands, that the violation of the laws might be the less regarded: for as the place was filled with sepulchres, and polluted by dead bodies, the inhabitants were deemed unclean for seven days after their residence there.

Phraates, king of Parthia, murdered by his son, who is afterwards destroyed by the people.

About this period Phraataces, the son of Phraates, king of the Parthians, treacherously murdered his father. The circumstances hereof are related in the following manner. Cæsar having sent to Phraates a variety of presents, among the rest was an Italian woman, whose name was Thermusa. Phraates took this woman to his bed, and had by her a son, to whom he gave the name of Phraataces. At length being enamored of her beauty and conversation, he married her, though he had several legitimate children of his own before. Now Thermusa entertained an idea of putting her son in such a situation that he should stand a chance of becoming king of Parthia: but she was conscious that it could not be effected unless the legitimate sons of Phraates were removed out of the way. She therefore applied to her husband on this subject, and he readily agreed to yield to her request; for she was so great a favourite, that he found it impossible to refuse any thing that she asked. The young princes were therefore dispatched to Rome as hostages, and Phraataces was educated at home, as heir-apparent to the throne. But he grew uneasy in his situation; and being impatient to wait for the reversion of a crown, which he thought he might have in possession, he entered into a conspiracy with his mother, to pave an easier way to the government by the murder of the king; and this was accordingly effected: and shrewd suspicions arose, that Phraataces lived in a course of incestuous familiarity with his mother. The consequence was such as might have been expected; for the people were so enraged against Phraataces, for the known murder, and the supposed incest, that, before he had taken possession of the government, an insurrection happened among the people, by whom he was destroyed.

Orodes invited to take the crown of Parthia; but is soon after killed by conspirators.

Now the lascivious conduct of the above-named Thermusa being deemed sufficient to have polluted the blood of Phraates; and the Parthian nobility considering that their nation could not well be governed without a king; they determined termined that they would place any king upon the throne, who was not of the family of the Arſacidæ; and in conſequence of this reſolution, they ſent embaſſadors to invite Orodes to accept of the government. It is true he was of the royal line; but the ſingular cruelty of his diſpoſition had rendered him ſo obnoxious to the people at large, that he was attacked by a band of conſpirators, and killed on the ſpot: the Parthians being always provided with their ſwords. Different accounts have been given as to the way in which he fell: ſome ſay at a ſacrifice, others at a banquet; but the moſt generally received opinion is, that he was hunting when he met with his fate.

The Parthians ſend an embaſſy to Rome, whence Vonones is ſent to take the kingdom.

Hereupon the Parthians ſent an embaſſy to Rome, requeſting that one of their hoſtages might be appointed their ſovereign, to fill the vacancy occaſioned by the late death: and having fixed their choice on Vonones, preferably to the reſt of the brothers, a recommendation was given of him, as a prince every way deſerving of the honour that was offered him, in the command of two of the moſt diſtinguiſhed empires in the univerſe; meaning thoſe of Rome and Parthia. But the Parthians ſoon repented of the choice they had made, he being at once of a proud diſpoſition, and fond of variety. They ſaid they had too much ſpirit to ſubmit to be governed by a ſlave, which was the ſenſe in which they underſtood the word hoſtage; and they were perpetually applying this word to their ſovereign, as a term of reproach. They ſaid he was not a king whom the laws of arms had compelled them to obey; but one who had been impoſed on them, in conſequence of the making a ſcandalous peace. While their paſſions were agitated by the moſt violent emotions, they diſpatched meſſengers to Artabanus, at that time king of the Medes, who was of the family of the Arſacidæ; and he very readily came to them, attended by a numerous army.

Artabanus repulſed by Vonones, who is afterwards totally deſerted.

As the greater part of the people of Parthia yet continued unſhaken in their loyalty, Vonones immediately attacked Artabanus, and drove him back again to his own country: but the latter ſoon procuring a conſiderable re-inforcement to his army, immediately advanced, and attacking Vonones, in a ſecond battle totally routed him, and it was with great difficulty he ſaved his own life, eſcaping into Seleucia with a few horſemen. Artabanus, taking advantage of the confuſion into which he had thrown the Parthians, purſued them with uncommon ardour, committing great ſlaughter; and then retired to Cteſiphon with his victorious troops. The kingdom of Parthia now fell into his poſſeſſion, in right of this conqueſt.

Vonones flies to Armenia, and afterwards delivers himſelf up to Syllanus, governor of Syria.

In the interim Vonones retired into Armenia, having conceived an idea that he ſhould be able to ſubject that country to his dominion: and he directly diſpatched an embaſſy to Gæſar, intreating aſſiſtance to carry this project into execution: but whether the emperor had not ſufficient confidence in his perſonal courage, or whether he himſelf did not think it prudent to diſoblige the Parthians, who at this time threatened to make war upon him, he abſolutely refuſed to comply with the propoſal, and would not afford the leaſt aſſiſtance. This refuſal was fatal to the hopes of Vonones, who likewiſe found that the principal people of Armenia, which bordered on Niphates, all eſpouſed the cauſe of Artabanus. Wherefore, having deliberated on his ſituation, he ſurrendered himſelf to Syllanus, the governor of Syria, who, in conſideration of a former acquaintance that he had with him at Rome, received and entertained him in the moſt diſtinguiſhed manner. Artabanus, having now happily ſettled his affairs, beſtowed the kingdom of Armenia on his ſon Orodes.

Death of Antiochus king of Comogena.

Antiochus, king of Comogena, dying about this time, there enſued, on his deceaſe, a violent diſpute between the principal people and the vulgar: the latter wiſhing to be governed by a king, as they had heretofore been; and the former inclining to reduce the kingdom into the ſtate of a province. Hereupon the ſenate of Rome iſſued a decree, that Germanicus ſhould depart into the eaſt country, to adjuſt the differences that had ariſen; but Providence ordered that this circumſtance ſhould end in the ruin of this excellent prince; for after he had compoſed the commotions in Syria, he fell a ſacrifice to poiſon, through the management of Piſo; as will be related in another part of this work.

Death of Germanicus by poiſon.

Account of planting Standards in JERUSALEM, with the Image of CÆSAR on them. The Author's Teſtimony concerning JESUS CHRIST. DECIUS MUNDUS enamoured of PAULINA. His criminal Intercourſe with her in the Temple, for which the infamous Authors are puniſhed with Death, and himſelf baniſhed.

Images of Cæſar brought by Pilate into Jeruſalem.

A Body of troops having removed from Cæſarea, to take up their winter-quarters in Jeruſalem, Pilate, the governor of Judæa, permitted their bringing a number of ſtandards into the city, on which were the image of Cæſar, in direct contradiction to the laws of the Jews, which expreſsly forbid the uſe of all ſuch emblems and devices: and, for this reaſon, colours with pictures on them had never been brought into the city by any former governor. This general rule was firſt tranſgreſſed by Pilate; and what added to the offence was, that they were brought into the city in the dead of the night, and there planted, unknown to the inhabitants. In the morning, when the citizens obſerved what had been done, they aſſembled in great numbers, and immediately went to Pilate at Cæſarea, requeſting of him that the obnoxious images might be removed removed to another place. They continued several days, in the hope that Pilate would comply with their requeſt; but he was peremptory in his refuſal, pretending that ſuch a requeſt could not be complied with, as it would be an affront to the emperor.

On the Jews' earneſt importunity, and determined conduct, the images are at length removed.

The Jews ſtill continued importunate in their demands; when at length, on the ſeventh day of their attendance, Pilate gave directions to a party of ſoldiers to provide themſelves with their arms, and take their ſtation at an appointed place. This being done, he aſcended a tribunal, which he had ordered to be placed in the circus, as a ſpot the moſt convenient from which to ſurpriſe the people. All this time the Jews thronged about him, urging him to give an anſwer reſpecting the buſineſs that ſo greatly agitated their minds. Hereupon Pilate gave a ſignal to his ſoldiers, and ordered them immediately to advance, and cut the throats of all thoſe who did not depart home, and remain at peace. On this the Jews threw themſelves flat on the ground, and ſtretched out their necks; thereby intimating that the laws of their country were much more dear to them than their lives. This unparalleled inſtance of reſolution had ſuch an effect upon Pilate, that he iſſued immediate orders for the taking down of the images, and that they ſhould be carried back to Cæſarea, from whence they were brought.

By order of Pilate, a great havock is made of the Jews.

At this time Pilate having formed a deſign of bringing to Jeruſalem an aqueduct, from the diſtance of two hundred furlongs from the city, he demanded that money ſhould be advanced from the holy treaſury, to diſcharge the expence of this undertaking. This gave ſuch great offence to the people, that they aſſembled in a body amounting to many thouſands, thinking that the clamour of an outrageous multitude might prevent his carrying his ſcheme into execution. It happened (as it frequently does in popular inſurrections) that among the immenſe number of complainants, there were ſome who abuſed Pilate perſonally, and inſulted him by the moſt opprobrious epithets. Provoked by this circumſtance, he gave directions to a number of his ſoldiers to diſguiſe themſelves in the dreſſes of countrymen, to conceal clubs under their coats, and form a ring about the multitude; intimating likewiſe, that if the former ſcurrilous behaviour ſhould be continued, he would give them a ſignal, on which they ſhould act agreeable to inſtructions they had received. All this was done according to order; and the abuſive language being renewed, Pilate gave the ſignal; on which the ſoldiers began to attack with their clubs, and, in fact, exceeded the commiſſion they had received; for the innocent were equally involved in the calamity with the guilty. The conteſt, however, proved very unequal; for one party being armed, and the other altogether defenceleſs, many of the Jews were killed, great numbers wounded, and the whole body diſperſed, ſo that there was a total end of the inſurrection.

The author's honourable teſtimony concerning Jeſus Chriſt.

About this period there aroſe to notice one JESUS, a man of conſummate wiſdom, IF INDEED HE MAY BE DEEMED A MAN. He was eminently celebrated for his power of working miracles; and they who were curious, and deſirous to learn the truth, flocked to him in abundance. He was followed by immenſe numbers of people, as well Jews as Gentiles. This was that Chriſt whom the princes and great men of our nation accuſed. He was delivered up to the croſs by Pontius Pilate; notwithſtanding which, thoſe who originally adhered to him never forſook him. On the third day after his crucifixion he was ſeen alive, agreeable to the prediction of ſeveral prophets: he wrought a great number of marvellous acts: and there remain, even to this day, a ſect of people who bear the name of CHRISTIANS, who acknowledge this Chriſt for their head.

Relation of a ſcandalous act in the temple of Iſis.

About this time a moſt diſagreeable misfortune befell the Jews: but the account of this I ſhall poſtpone till I have related the particulars of a very ſcandalous tranſaction that happened at Rome, on occaſion of a ſacrifice to Iſis. At the city above-mentioned was a woman equally diſtinguiſhed by her birth and her virtue. Her name was Paulina. She was very rich; beautiful beyond the power of deſcription, and of a deportment ſo modeſt that there was not the ſlighteſt taint on her character. She was the wife of Saturninus, who was a man every way worthy of the poſſeſſion of ſuch a woman.

Decius Mundus enamoured of Paulina.

Now it happened that Decius Mundus, a Roman knight, who was himſelf young and accompliſhed, fell violently in love with Paulina, whoſe rank exempted her from all neceſſity of yielding through the force of money or preſents: but this circumſtance did but ſo much the more inflame the paſſions of Mundus, who proceeded ſo far as to make her an offer of two hundred thouſand drachmas, on the condition of ſleeping one night with her. This offer being rejected with the contempt it deſerved, he found that his paſſion increaſed to ſuch a degree, that life became altogether inſupportable; wherefore he formed a reſolution at once to end his life and paſſion, by ſtarving himſelf to death.

Ide's vile and artful conduct

Now it happened at this time that there was a freed-woman, a ſervant of the father of Mundus, an artful creature, named Ide, who was rather more verſed in intrigue than was conſiſtent with the character of a perſon of reputation. This woman, remarking the behaviour of Mundus, and thinking that the arguments of reaſon would have no weight to influence his conduct, ſhe proceeded in a different manner; encouraged him to hope for a happy iſſue of his paſſion, and ſaid that ſhe did not deſpair of obtaining him the poſſeſſion of Paulina, which ſhe thought might be procured for the ſum of fifty thouſand drachmas.

This

Method whereby she procures a criminal intercourse.

This proposal afforded the highest satisfaction to Mundus, who deposited the money in her hands: but the woman was conscious that Paulina was not to be won by a bribe: wherefore, having considered of the affair, and reflecting on the extreme reverence that she entertained for the goddess Isis, she devised the following contrivance. Having assembled a number of the priests of Isis, she swore them to keep inviolably secret what she had to reveal to them; and the better to insure their compliance, she gave them twenty-five thousand drachmas, and promised them the same sum when the business should be completed: this being a prevailing argument, she related to them the circumstances of the affair, and warmly solicited their interference, to introduce Mundus to the company of Paulina. The temptation was so great, that the priests found they had it not in their power to resist it, and promised their best assistance; in pursuance of which, the eldest of them immediately went to Paulina, and having demanded a private audience, informed her that he waited upon her with a message from the god Anubis, who was violently enamoured of her, and could not refrain from requesting that she would pay him a visit. Paulina made the priest extremely welcome; and was so delighted with the idea of the great honour that was to be conferred on her, that she could not help mentioning to the ladies of her acquaintance the singular regard that was entertained for her by the god Anubis. She likewise recounted the circumstance to her husband; told him that an appointment was already made, and that she should eat and sleep with the god. The husband, having had the most indubitable proofs of the virtue of his wife, seemed very well pleased with a circumstance so much calculated to raise his jealousy.

Mundus effects his purpose in the temple of Isis.

At the time appointed Paulina repaired to the temple, where she supped; and the hour of rest being come, one of the priests locked her into a room, where, in the dark, instead of meeting with the god, she found Mundus, with whom she passed the night, without having the least idea but that she had been honoured by the embraces of Anubis. Early in the morning, before the priests who were in the secret had arisen, Mundus got up, and quitted the temple; and some time afterwards Paulina returned to her husband, to whom she related the story of the honour that had been done her: and she likewise recounted it to her female friends, in terms of grateful rapture. There was something so singular in this affair, that they could scarcely credit it; and yet they hardly knew how to doubt it, from the high character that Paulina had acquired for her inviolate modesty.

Paulina insulted by her lover.

Three days after this extraordinary adventure, Mundus happening by chance to meet the lady, said, "O Paulina! what obligations am I not under to you, for your kindness in saving me the two hundred thousand drachmas with which I would have presented you, and at length complying without a bribe! It is a matter of indifference to me whether you entertain a regard for Mundus or not, so you will but permit him to gratify his passion in the character of Anubis:" and having said this, he departed.

Punishment of the priests and other parties concerned.

When Paulina came to reflect on what had happened, and to consider how vilely she had been tricked out of her virtue, she tore her garments through vexation, related the affair to her husband, and intreated him, by the love he bore her, to procure some punishment to be inflicted on the offenders. Hereupon Saturninus acquainted the emperor of the affair, who having strictly examined into it, gave orders that the priests should be crucified, together with Ide, who was the contriver of the plot, and the principal occasion of its being carried into execution against a woman of such an amiable character. He likewise ordered that the temple of Isis should be pulled down, and her statue thrown into the river Tiber. With regard to Mundus, he was only banished: allowance being made for the force of passion in so young a man. Thus much with regard to the story of Paulina. I now proceed to give an account of the calamities of the Jews at Rome, agreeable to my promise.

Four abandoned JEWS assume the Characters of Doctors of the Law. Complaint of their disorderly Proceedings being made to TIBERIUS, by SATURNINUS, the JEWS are commanded to leave the City. Account of a SAMARITAN Impostor. PILATE routs the SAMARITANS. MARCELLUS appointed Governor of JUDÆA, and PILATE ordered to ROME.

Account of four Jewish impostors.

THERE was at Rome at this time a Jew, of the most infamous character imaginable, who had been compelled to leave his country, to avoid the rigour of the law. Now this man, combining with three others, of characters equally infamous and abandoned, they assumed the appearance of rabbies, read publicly on the laws of Moses, and pretended to expound them to the people. By this conduct they obtained a number of disciples, and among the rest a woman named Fulvia, who was a person of honour and character, and inclined to the profession of Judaism. Now Fulvia having altogether submitted to the authority and discipline of these men, they prevailed on her to entrust them with oblations of gold and purple, for the use of the holy temple at Jerusalem; but as often as they received her bounty they converted it to their own use. Now this abusive practice coming to the knowledge of Fulvia, the wife of Saturninus, she prevailed on her husband to make the affair known to Tiberius;

They defraud Fulvia of much wealth; but, being detected, are expelled from Rome, and great numbers of Jews banished.

rius; in consequence of which the emperor issued orders that all the Jews should immediately leave the city. Of these, four thousand were entered upon the consul's roll, to serve as soldiers, and sent into Sardinia; exclusive of whom there were great numbers who refused to bear arms, on account of their religion; and these were punished by a variety of torments, and then banished; the whole body of the Jews suffering on account of four men of abandoned characters.

A Samaritan deceiver imposes on the credulous.

Nor were the Samaritans, at this time, without their share of misfortunes. It happened that there was a notorious impostor among these people, who by the most ridiculous stories, and extravagant lyes, would frequently assemble a croud about him. This man told the multitude, that if they would but meet him at Mount Gerizim, he would give them a sight of the holy vessels which Moses had buried in that place so many ages ago. Now such was the credulity of these ignorant people, that great numbers of them assembled in arms, and besieged Tirathaba, expecting others to come and join them; on which they determined to go up to the mountain with a large army. But Pilate having intelligence of their proceedings, got together a body of cavalry and infantry, and took possession of the mountain, whence he attacked the Samaritans who had assembled near the village, gave them a total rout, with considerable slaughter; and took and brought off a large number of prisoners; and among this number he ordered those to be beheaded who were men of rank or interest.

His adherents routed by Pilate, and many of them beheaded.

The Samaritans exhibit a complaint against Pilate, who is cited to appear at Rome.

Soon after this defeat, the chief persons among the Samaritans made application to Vitellius, a person of the rank of consul, who was at that time governor of Syria, complaining of the conduct of Pilate, and insisting that he had been guilty of murder. They said that there was no intention of departing from the authority of Rome, by their meeting at Tirathaba; since they meant only to take refuge against the arbitrary conduct of Pilate. Hereupon Vitellius commissioned his friend Marcellus to undertake the office of governor of Judæa, and directed that Pilate should be sent to Rome, to answer, before the emperor, to the complaints that had been brought against him. Pilate had now been possessed of his government ten years; but, on this order, he prepared to depart for Rome: however, Tiberius died before he arrived at that city.

CHAP. VI.

VITELLIUS remits the Duty on Fruits, &c. HYRCANUS builds the Castle ANTONIA. CAIAPHAS deprived of the Office of High-priest, and JONATHAN advanced to it. A Treaty between TIBERIUS and ARTABANUS. Death and Character of PHILIP.

Vitellius honourably received, and his liberality to the Jews.

THE feast of the passover, as it is denominated among our people, now approaching, Vitellius departed into Judæa, and going onward to Jerusalem, the Jews received him with a distinction due to his rank; and he was bountiful enough to remit them the whole of the duty on fruits. He likewise restored to the priests the possession of the pontifical robes and habits, which they deposited in the temple, where they had been kept previous to the castle of Antonia being the place of their reception.

The high-priests deposit their vestments in the castle of Antonia.

Now the first high-priest of the name of Hyrcanus, having erected a castle adjacent to the temple, resided there the greatest part of his time; and in this place, in his own custody, he kept the robes and ornaments of the high-priest, which were to be worn by no one but himself. As often as he changed his habit, he constantly deposited the sacred vestments in that castle; a practice which was followed by his successors for a considerable time. On Herod's accession to the throne, he was so highly delighted with the situation of this place, as well as with its strength and beauty, that he made improvements in it, at a great expence, and gave it the name Antonia, in honour of his worthy friend Antony. In this place Herod found the sacred vestments, and there he caused them to be kept, from an idea which he had conceived that the Jews would be held in obedience as long as he had those in possession. On the same principle Archelaus, his son and successor, acted in the very same manner: and their example was followed by the Romans, after the kingdom was reduced into a province: for these holy habiliments were constantly deposited in a cabinet which was made on purpose for their reception, and kept under the seal of the priests, and the keepers of the sacred treasury; and a lamp constantly burnt before the place, in consequence of directions given to the governor of the castle for that purpose. These vestments used to be regularly delivered by the governor to the high-priest, on the seventh day preceding the three solemn festivals; and the latter having caused them to be made perfectly clean, wore them in the discharge of his office, and on the following day restored them to the place from whence they had been taken: and this was constantly done on the solemn fast, as well as on the three other annual festivals.

Jonathan advanced to the high-priesthood, and Caiaphas deposed.

But now it became the will of Vitellius to discharge the governor from being any way answerable for the care of the pontifical habits, which, in favour of the Jews, he committed to the custody of the priests, who had been the ancient keepers of them. Not long after this he deprived Joseph, called Caiaphas, of the office of high-priest, and bestowed it on Jonathan, the son of the high-priest Ananus: and departed departed to Antioch ſoon after he had made this alteration.

Vitellius concludes a league with Artabanus.

About this time Vitellius received letters from Tiberius, directing him to make a league with Artabanus; for he was apprehenſive that the empire might be endangered, if the latter ſhould make a conqueſt of Armenia: but Vitellius was directed not to ratify the league, unleſs one of the ſons of the king was delivered as an hoſtage. Hereupon Vitellius offered conſiderable ſums of money to the kings of Iberia and Alania, on the condition of their immediately engaging in a war with Artabanus. The people of Iberia could not be induced to lend any farther aſſiſtance to this plan, than to admit the Alanians to a free paſſage through their city, that they might paſs by the Caſpian mountains, and thus obtain eaſy admiſſion into the kingdom of Artabanus.

The Parthians loſe Armenia.

This inroad occaſioned the immediate loſs of Armenia to the Parthians; and this was followed by ſo violent an incurſion into their own country, that moſt of their nobility were deſtroyed, together with the ſon of their king, and ſuch immenſe multitudes of the common people, that the land was in a great degree depopulated by this invaſion. By this time Artabanus began to diſcover that he was betrayed by thoſe in whom he had placed the greateſt degree of confidence; and that Vitellius, by the means of bribes, had induced his friends and near relations to join in a plot for his deſtruction: wherefore, not knowing in whom to place any confidence, leſt, under the maſk of friendſhip, he ſhould be treated in a treacherous manner; and having very good reaſon to believe that perſons of the firſt rank and quality were engaged in the ſcheme againſt him, he inſtantly made his eſcape to the interior provinces, where he met with immediate protection; and an army of the Dahi and Saci coming to his aſſiſtance, he was not only enabled to vanquiſh his enemies, but to recover his kingdom.

Artabanus, after having been betrayed, recovers his kingdom.

Treaty between Tiberius and Artabanus.

On this change in the ſtate of affairs, an alliance with Artabanus was propoſed by Tiberius; and the propoſal being accepted, the two parties conſented to meet, each attended by his guards, to treat of the buſineſs, on the middle of the bridge over the river Euphrates. As ſoon as the treaty was concluded, a moſt ſumptuous and ſuperb entertainment was provided for them both by Herod the tetrarch, in a tent which, at a great expence, had been erected over the ſame river. Not long after this Artabanus ſent his ſon Darius as an hoſtage to Tiberius, together with a number of preſents, among which was one Eleazar, a Jew, known by the name of the giant, remarkable for being of the aſtoniſhing height of ſeven cubits. In a little time Artabanus returned to Babylon, and Vitellius to Antioch.

Herod gives offence to Vitellius.

It was the wiſh of Herod to tranſmit the firſt account of this good news reſpecting the hoſtages; wherefore, without loſs of time, he diſpatched a meſſenger to Tiberius, with all the particulars relating thereto. Some time afterwards Vitellius, a conſular governor, ſent intelligence of the ſame kind to Cæſar, on receiving of which he returned ſimply this anſwer: That he had informed him of nothing new, for that Herod had previouſly acquainted him with every particular. This anticipation of the good news by Herod, gave the utmoſt offence to Vitellius; but he ſtifled his indignation for the preſent, nor took farther notice of the affair till Caius ſucceeded to the government.

Death and character of Philip, Herod's brother.

At this period, which was in the twentieth year of the reign of Tiberius, died Philip, the brother of Herod, after having been tetrarch of Trachonitis, Gaulanites, and Batanæa, for the ſpace of ſeven and thirty years. He was a man diſtinguiſhed by his moderation, and devoted to the quiet enjoyment of his eaſe; his whole life being ſpent within the diſtrict over which he was appointed to preſide. He very ſeldom left his own houſe, and when he did, it was in company with a few ſelect friends; and he had a chair carried after him, which, on particular occaſions, he uſed to convert into a ſeat of juſtice. As it ſometimes happened that he met perſons on the road who had need of his judicial aſſiſtance, it was his cuſtom not to loſe any time, but to hear the cauſe immediately, and to acquit or condemn the party, according to the ſtrength of the evidence. His death happened at Julias, and he was interred with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence, in a monument which he had cauſed to be erected for his reception. As he left no children behind him, the emperor decreed that his eſtate ſhould be annexed to Syria, but on the condition that the country ſhould not be deprived of the tributes hereafter to be raiſed in the tetrarchy.

CHAP. VII.

HEROD the Tetrarch, being married to the Daughter of ARETAS, falls in Love with HERODIAS, and propoſes to marry her, and abandon his preſent Wife. This is diſcovered by the Wife, and reſented by ARETAS, who conquers HEROD in Battle. The Death of JOHN BAPTIST, by Order of HEROD. Account of the Family of HEROD the Great.

Herod and Aretas engaged in war, and the cauſes of their diſagreement.

AT this period a war took place between Herod and Aretas king of Petra, occaſioned by the following circumſtance. Herod the tetrarch had been for a conſiderable time married to the daughter of Aretas; but having buſineſs that called him to Rome, in his way thither he viſited Herod, his brother-in-law, who was grandſon of Simon, the high-prieſt, by the daughter's ſide. While on this viſit he became violently enamoured of Herodias, the wife of his brother, and the daughter of Ariſtobulus, their brother; and she was also sister of Agrippa, who was afterwards king. Impelled by the force of his passion, he proposed to marry her when he should return from Rome, and to part with the daughter of Aretas; and on this condition the match was mutually agreed on.

Herod's wife betrays to Aretas her husband's design to marry Herodias.

This contract being made, he pursued his voyage to Rome, and having dispatched his business there, returned to the place of his own residence. In the interim his wife, having obtained some information of what had passed between him and Herodias, told him in a manner that could not give him the least cause of suspicion, that she should be happy if he would but permit her to pass a little time at Machæras, which was a castle on the borders of the dominions of Aretas. Now Herod, not having the least idea of her real intention, readily consented to the journey. It is to be remarked that Machæras, being a place devoted to the wife's father, every thing was properly prepared for her farther journey: immediately on her arrival the governor of the palace furnished her with Arabian guards, who lost no time in conveying her from place to place, till at length she arrived at the palace of her father, where she related to him the particulars of the new connection that had been formed by Herod.

Herod's army routed by Aretas.

Great uneasiness arose from this circumstance, and as, previously thereto, there had been a dispute between the parties respecting the boundaries of some lands in Gamala, and as two armies were already in the field, for the purpose of adjusting this difference, the above affair was made a pretext for an immediate battle, in which Herod's party was utterly routed: but this was principally owing to the treachery of a number of deserters, who were at this time in the pay of Herod, after having abandoned the cause of Philip. Herod lost no time in acquainting Tiberius with the particulars of the above affair, who being enraged at the conduct of Aretas, directed Vitellius to make war on him immediately, and either to send his head, or to bring him prisoner to Rome.

Particulars relating to John the Baptist, and his doctrines.

It was at this time the prevailing opinion among the Jews, that the above disaster was a proof of the vengeance of Heaven against Herod and his army, on account of John, surnamed the Baptist, whom this tetrarch had caused to be inhumanly murdered. Now the Baptist had not been guilty of any crime. His custom was, to exhort the Jews to the love and practice of every virtue: he principally insisted on their lives being regulated by the rules of piety and justice; urged the necessity of regeneration by baptism and a new life; and insisted, that it was not by abstaining from any particular offence, but by a constant course of goodness, that they could receive the benefit of such regeneration.

He is held in great veneration and esteem.

The Baptist had now acquired great credit and authority among the people, by the holiness of his life; and this was evident by the number of his disciples, and the veneration they entertained for his doctrine. In fact, they seemed to be so totally devoted to his will, as to be altogether under his influence; insomuch that Herod was jealous lest his high degree of reputation should tempt them to revolt. To prevent, therefore, the dreaded consequences, he determined on his destruction before he could have an opportunity of perpetrating any act of mischief; rather than wait the event, and repent after the act was committed. Urged by this consideration, he dispatched him to Machæras (the place above-mentioned) as a prisoner, directing that he should be immediately put to death; and the sentence was executed agreeable to the instructions; but the impiety of the deed was followed by an almost immediate divine vengeace on Herod; agreeable to the idea of the Jews, that he had been punished for spilling the blood of that holy man.

The Baptist imprisoned and put to death by Herod.

Vitellius marches towards Judæa.

At this time Vitellius was making preparations for the war in Arabia, and was actually on his march towards Petra, having under his command two legions of horse and foot of the Roman auxiliaries. When he had got as far as Ptolemais, and was on the point of crossing Judæa, he was met by the principal people of the country, who most earnestly solicited him that he would take a different route; for that the Jewish law was insulted, and their religion profaned, by the images that the Romans usually carry in their colours. This reason had its proper weight with the general, who directed that his army should march about, by the way of a large plain; and in the mean time he took with him Herod the tetrarch, and several other friends, and went up to Jerusalem, to offer public worship, on occasion of a solemn festival which was then approaching. He made three days stay in this city, during which time he was treated with all possible marks of honour and respect; and while he remained there, he deprived Jonathan of the office of high-priest, and conferred it on his brother Theophilus: and on the fourth day he received letters which announced the death of Tiberius, whereupon he caused the people to swear allegiance to his successor, Caius Caligula; and this being done, he gave orders for the recall of his troops, and directed that they should go into winter quarters; the change in the government having determined him to put a period to the war; and after this he returned to Antioch.

He arrives at Jerusalem, and deposes Jonathan the high-priest.

The event of Vitellius's proceedings said to be foretold by wizards.

A tradition is current, that when this expedition of Vitellius was talked of, Aretas consulted the wizards and fortune-tellers, respecting what should be the issue of the affair; and that the answer which he received was to the following purpose: "That the army then on the march should never arrive at Petra; for that either one of the princes should die, or he that commanded the army, or the person that was deputy in the command, or the party against whom the war was levied."

At

Account of Herod the Great.

At this period Agrippa, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, had been at Rome about a year, having matters of great importance to tranſact with Cæſar. But before I ſay any thing farther of him, it will be proper that I mention ſomething with regard to Herod and his family; ſince in them is exhibited a ſingular inſtance of the wiſdom and power of the providence of God. In the caſe of Herod, we ſhall ſee that the having a numerous family, the poſſeſſion of a ſplendid fortune, with royal power and dignity, are of no avail, without the more valuable poſſeſſions of piety and juſtice: ſince there was ſcarcely any remains of the very large family of Herod in the ſpace of a hundred years. This conſideration is ſufficient to humble the pride of the arrogant, and to raiſe the contemplation of the virtuous man, on the wonderful advancement of Agrippa, who, from a private ſtation, contrary to all human expectation, was raiſed to a degree of power ſo very extraordinary.

His family and progeny.

I have heretofore mentioned ſomething of this affair in the general, but ſhall now deſcend to particulars. By Mariamne, the daughter of Hyrcanus, Herod the Great had two daughters; one of them was named Salampſo, who was married to Phaſael, the ſon of Phaſael, elder brother to the king, by the conſent of the father. The name of the other daughter was Cypros, who was married to Antipater, Herod's nephew, by his ſiſter Salome.

Salampſo had five children by Phaſael, viz. three ſons, Antipater, Herod, and Alexander; and two daughters, Alexandra and Cypros; the former of whom married Timius, a nobleman of the iſle of Cypros, and died childleſs; and the latter was married to Agrippa, the ſon of Ariſtobulus. Cypros bore to Agrippa two ſons and three daughters. The ſons were named Agrippa and Druſus, the laſt of whom died while he was under age; and the daughters were called Berenice, Mariamne, and Druſilla. Agrippa the father was educated under the care of his grandfather Herod the Great, as were likewiſe Herod and Ariſtobulus, and alſo Berenice, who was the daughter of Salome and Coſtabarus. At this time the children of Ariſtobulus were infants, when their father, and his brother Alexander (as hath been before noted), were put to death by the command of Herod. On their advancement to years of maturity, this Herod, the brother of Agrippa, wedded Mariamne, the daughter of Olympias (who was daughter of king Herod), and of Joſeph, the brother of Herod; and of this marriage Ariſtobulus was born. Now Ariſtobulus, Agrippa's third brother, was married to Jotape, the daughter of Sampſigeram, king of Emeſenes; and by her he had a daughter, born deaf, who received the name of her mother. The above is a liſt of the children of the three brothers: their ſiſter, Herodias, was married to Herod, the ſon of Herod the Great, by his wife Mariamne, the daughter of Simon the high-prieſt; and of this marriage was born Salome; but after her birth, Herodias, in defiance of all the laws of honour and conſcience, did not heſitate to take, for her ſecond huſband, Herod the tetrarch of Galilee, though ſhe was wife to his brother by the father's ſide; and had likewiſe a former huſband living at the time of this ſecond marriage. The daughter, Salome, was married to Philip, the ſon of Herod the tetrarch of Trachonitis, who died without iſſue: after which ſhe was married to Ariſtobulus, the ſon of Herod, and brother of Agrippa; and three ſons were born of this marriage; viz. Herod, Agrippa, and Ariſtobulus. Thus much with regard to the family of Phaſael and Salampſo.

To Antipater Cypros bore a daughter, which took her own name, and who was married to Alexas Selcius, the ſon of Alexas, by whom he had one daughter, likewiſe named Cypros. Herod and Alexander (as hath been mentioned) were the brothers of Antipater, and died without children. Now Alexander, the ſon of Herod the king (the ſame who was put to death by his father), had two children, named Alexander and Tigranes, by Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia.

The above-named Tigranes died without iſſue: he was king of Armenia, and the ſame who had an accuſation brought againſt him by the Romans. Alexander had likewiſe a ſon named Tigranes, after his uncle, who was promoted by Nero to be king of Armenia. He had alſo a ſon named Alexander, who was married to Jotape, the daughter of Antiochus king of Comagena, and was advanced by Veſpaſian to the dignity of king of Leſis in Gilitia. The family of Alexander ſoon departed from the laws and cuſtoms of the Jews, and embraced thoſe of the Greeks. There were no children left by the reſt of the daughters of Herod the Great. Thus having given an account of the poſterity of this prince, down to the reign of Agrippa, I ſhall in the next place recount the hiſtory of Agrippa himſelf, together with that variety of providential incidents, which in the end advanced him to ſo diſtinguiſhed a ſtation.

Agrippa's exaltation and profuſion.

SOME ſmall time previous to the death of Herod the Great, Agrippa reſiding at Rome, and being often in the family of the emperor, became a very great favourite of his ſon Druſus, and alſo obtained the good opinion of Antonia, the wife of the elder Druſus, through the intereſt of his mother Berenice, for whom Antonia had a moſt particular eſteem. Agrippa was by nature rather inclined to extravagance; but during the life of his mother, he reſtrained himſelf within ſome reaſonable bounds; her death at length making him maſter of his own conduct, he began to give expenſive treats, and make profuſe and coſtly preſents, particularly to the dependents and domeſtics of the court, where it was that he hoped to raiſe his fortune. By theſe means he involved himſelf in debt to ſuch a degree, that he could no longer make his appearance at Rome; beſides, at this time, Tiberius having the misfortune to loſe his ſon, he could not now endure the ſight of any of the favourites of Druſus, leſt he ſhould be reminded of the loſs he had ſuſtained.

He retreats to Maltha, where he abandons himſelf to melancholy.

Agrippa having thus ſquandered his money, and deſtroyed his reputation, by the irregularity of his conduct; and his creditors being anxious with him to diſcharge their demands, which it was not in his power to do, he returned to Judæa; and when there, ſeeing no hope of retrieving his fortune, and bluſhing for the folly he had been guilty of, he retreated to Maltha, a caſtle in Idumæa, having conceived an intention that, in that place, he would put an end to an exiſtence that was no longer ſupportable. Cypros obſerving the deſponding humour of her huſband, and remarking that his melancholy ſeemed to forebode the moſt fatal conſequences, exerted her utmoſt endeavours to prevent the misfortune which ſhe dreaded; and particularly wrote to her ſiſter Herodias a circumſtantial account of the calamitous ſituation in which he lived; and moſt earneſtly urged her, by all the ties of honour and conſanguinity, to afford him ſome immediate relief: ſhe ſaid that ſhe did every thing that was in her own power, and hoped that her example would be followed by her ſiſter.

Herodias intereſts herſelf in his behalf, and obtains a penſion for him.

Herodias was ſo much affected by this repreſentation, that ſhe joined with her huſband in ſending a meſſage, deſiring that Agrippa would attend them; when they gave him a penſion, and beſtowed on him the government of Tiberias, for his immediate ſupport: but Herod did not long continue in this generous diſpoſition, nor was Agrippa very well contented with his preſent ſituation. Now it happened that, on a certain time, when they were drinking at Tyre, Herod made many ungenerous reflections on Agrippa, on account of his poverty, and intimated, among other things, that he was ſupported by his bounty.

Being inſulted by Herod, he applies to Flaccus, who favourably receives him.

This inſult was too great to be borne by one of Agrippa's ſpirit; he therefore repaired to viſit Flaccus, an old particular friend of his when at Rome, who was at that time governor of Syria. Flaccus received him in the moſt free and hoſpitable manner: but at this time Ariſtobulus, the brother of Agrippa, was a viſitor in the ſame houſe: the former was his enemy, though his brother: yet Flaccus divided his favours and civilities indifferently between them, as if no animoſity had ſubſiſted. Ariſtobulus, however, urged by the moſt implacable malice, ſtill kept up the quarrel, and would not reſt till he had inſpired Flaccus with a bad opinion of Agrippa, which was effected in the following manner: The inhabitants of Damaſcus, and thoſe of Sidon, had a violent diſpute between them, reſpecting the boundaries of their territories, and Flaccus was fixed upon to hear and determine the cauſe. Now the people of Damaſcus, being informed that Flaccus and Agrippa were on terms of the utmoſt intimacy, thought it would be a ſtroke of good policy previouſly to engage the intereſt of Agrippa, by bribing him with a ſum of money. The bargain being made, and promiſes of mutual ſecrecy given, Agrippa exerted all his intereſt for the people of Damaſcus againſt thoſe of Sidon.

He incurs the hatred of his brother Ariſtobulus, and is rejected by Flaccus.

Now Ariſtobulus, having diſcovered that Agrippa had received a bribe to tranſact this buſineſs, went to the governor, and complained of the conduct of his brother; and Flaccus, examining into the merits of the affair, and finding proof againſt Agrippa, diſmiſſed him from his favour, and left him to ſeek a ſupport in the beſt manner he was able. Hereupon Agrippa went back to Ptolemais; and being in abſolute want of the neceſſaries of life, he came to a reſolution to return into Italy. Thus diſtreſſed, he gave directions to Marſyas, a freed-man of his, to apply to the brokers, to raiſe a ſum of money, on any terms whatever, to anſwer his preſent demand. In conſequence of theſe directions Marſyas went to Protus, a freed-man of Berenice (the mother of Agrippa, his late patroneſs, who, by her laſt will, had recommended him to the ſervice of Antonia); and propoſed to him to advance a ſum of money to Agrippa, on the ſecurity of his own bond. Protus ſaid that he was already in his debt: yet Marſyas prevailed upon him to lend twenty thouſand attic drachmas, on the ſecurity above mentioned; but of this ſum he gave no more to Agrippa than ſeventeen thouſand five hundred pieces, retaining the other two thouſand five hundred to himſelf, for the trouble taken in procuring this advance: nor was Agrippa in circumſtances to diſpute about this extortion.

His deceitful conduct towards Herennius.

As ſoon as he was poſſeſſed of this money, Agrippa proceeded to Anthedon, where he met with a ſhip calculated for his ſervice, and made preparations for going to ſea: but Herennius Capito, the procurator of Jamnia, hearing of this circumſtance, ſent a number of ſoldiers to him, to demand the payment of three hundred thouſand pieces of ſilver, the property of the king, which he had borrowed when he was at Rome. This circumſtance occaſioned ſome little delay in Agrippa's proceeding; but he amuſed the ſoldiers with fair promiſes, and, when night came on, cut his cable, and ſlipped out to ſea, ſteering his courſe courſe towards Alexandria. On his arrival at that city, he made application to Alexander, the principal officer of the revenue, requeſting that he would lend him two hundred thouſand pieces of money on his bond. To this the officer replied, "With regard to yourſelf, I have not faith enough in you to credit you with ſuch a ſum; but your wife appears to be a woman of exemplary character and amiable deportment; and ſhe ſhall have the money if ſhe will give her ſecurity for it." In this manner the matter was ſettled; and Cypros becoming bound for the ſum wanted, Alexander furniſhed Agrippa with five talents on the ſpot, and gave him letters of credit, to receive the reſt at Puteoli; for he was unwilling to truſt the whole ſum with him at once, leſt he ſhould apply it to improper purpoſes. By this time Cypros was convinced that there was no poſſibility of preventing her huſband's proceeding; wherefore ſhe and her children went over land to Judæa.

Goes to Rome, and is kindly received by Tiberius.

When Agrippa arrived at Puteoli, he ſent a letter to Tiberius Cæſar, who was then at Capreæ, informing him that he had come ſo far to pay his humble reſpects to him; and requeſting his permiſſion to wait on him. Tiberius did not heſitate to ſend him an anſwer replete with kindneſs, in which he informed him that he ſhould be happy to ſee him at Capreæ. Thither Agrippa went, and on his arrival Tiberius received him with open arms, and welcomed him to the palace, where he entertained him in the moſt generous and hoſpitable manner, thereby proving his ſincerity when he gave him the invitation. But on the following day letters to Tiberius arrived from Herennius Capito, complaining of the conduct of Agrippa, and ſtating, "That when he demanded payment of a bond for three hundred thouſand pieces which had been long ſince due to the emperor, Agrippa departed in a ſecret manner, ſo that the money would probably be loſt."

Being charged by Herennius with a defraud, he is diſmiſſed the court.

This conduct was ſo highly offenſive to Tiberius, that he commanded the officers of his bed-chamber not to permit Agrippa to depart till the debt was diſcharged. On the contrary, Agrippa did not ſeem to remark the diſpleaſure of the emperor, but immediately applied to Antonia, mother of Germanicus and Claudius, who was afterwards advanced to the ſovereign power. To her he related his diſtreſſes, and told her that he was likely to loſe the favour of the emperor, for want of the above-mentioned three hundred thouſand pieces: whereupon ſhe lent him the money, in honour of the memory of Berenice, and the mutual friendſhip they had entertained for each other; excluſive of which, Agrippa had been the companion and play-fellow of her ſon Claudius, almoſt from his earlieſt infancy. Having received this money, he diſcharged his debt, and was reinſtated in the favour of Tiberius. This conduct had ſuch an effect on the emperor, that he committed his grandſon, Tiberius Nero, the ſon of Druſus, to the care and government of Agrippa, requeſting that he would be conſtantly in his company, and regulate his whole conduct. Agrippa, however, had ſo ſtrong an idea of his obligations to Antonia, that he paid his principal attention and reſpect to her grandſon Caius, for whom the people in general had the higheſt eſteem, not only reſpecting his perſonal virtues, but on account of the reverence which they entertained for the memory of his father, Germanicus. At this period a Samaritan, one of Cæſar's freed-men, lent Agrippa a million of pieces, with part of which he diſcharged his debt to Antonia, and employed the remainder in paying the expence incurred by his attendance on Caius, with whom he had now contracted the utmoſt friendſhip.

Suſpicious words ſpoken by him, and heard by Eutychus.

It happened that on a particular day Caius and Agrippa were riding out in a chariot, without any other company, when Tiberius became the ſubject of converſation; on which Agrippa exclaimed, "From my heart I wiſh it would pleaſe God that Caius was in his place!" Now Eutychus, a freed-man of Agrippa, who at that time drove the carriage, heard theſe words ſpoken; but took no notice of them for the preſent. Some little time afterwards Eutychus was charged with robbing Agrippa, and carrying off ſome of his cloaths. The man was really guilty of the offence; and was apprehended, and carried before Piſo, the governor of the place, to undergo an examination. Among other queſtions, Piſo aſked him how it happened that he ran away; to which he replied, "That the life of Tiberius was in danger, and he was going to make a diſcovery of the plot." On this declaration he was ſent bound to Capreæ, where Tiberius ſtill kept him in chains: for the emperor, in all affairs of ſtate, was certainly the moſt dilatory man that ever exiſted. Embaſſadors could not obtain an audience of him without a tedious delay; nor would he nominate people to ſucceed to governments of provinces, till he had certain knowledge of the death of the former poſſeſſors. It was his cuſtom, likewiſe, to permit priſoners to remain a long time unexamined; and when his friends aſked the reaſon of this ſingular conduct, he would addreſs them in the following manner:

Dilatory diſpoſition of Tiberius.

Reaſons given by Tiberius for his delays.

"If I were too eaſy of acceſs, and gave too ready an admiſſion to embaſſadors, I ſhould find that they who were ſpeedily received, would be ſpeedily diſmiſſed; and that others would ſoon be ſent to ſupply their places; ſo that by this mode of proceeding, I ſhould be perpetually embarraſſed by giving freſh audiences; and a great part of my life would be ſpent in the receiving and diſmiſſing of embaſſadors. With regard to officers, when they are once fixed in their ſtations, it is more advantageous to the ſubject to retain them, than change them for others; for covetouſneſs is the vice of magiſtrates: now perſons who imagine they hold their offices during their good behaviour, will be leſs rapacious than they who expect to be ſpeedily diſmiſſed. I will illuſtrate this matter to you by reciting an ancient fable.—A wounded man lay by the ſide of a road, unable to help himſelf, while numbers of flies ſwarmed on his ſores, and gave him no ſmall degree of uneaſineſs. A man of humanity happening to paſs that road, expreſſed his readineſs to drive them away, and relieve the poor man from his ſufferings:—By no means, cried he; leave them in their preſent ſituation; for theſe flies, when their hunger is ſatisfied, do not torment me nearly as much as a new ſet would do, that may come half ſtarved. Now this is preciſely the caſe between ſubjects and newly appointed magiſtrates, who are to be conſidered only as freſh flies, come to ſuck the blood of the people."

It is unneceſſary to adduce any other proof of this being the true character of Tiberius, than the circumſtance of his appointing only Gratus, and his ſucceſſor Pilate, to be governors of Judæa, during a reign of twenty-two years: and he governed the other parts of his empire in the ſame manner. The reaſon that he aſſigned for the not bringing of priſoners to a ſpeedy trial, was, that their ſufferings might be ſo much the more tedious, as a puniſhment for their former offences; ſince protracted torments were worſe than death.

Antonia deſired by Agrippa to ſolicit an hearing for Eutychus.

Eutychus being kept ſo long in chains was evidently the conſequence of this diſpoſition of Tiberius: but the emperor at length coming from Capreæ to Tuſculanum, diſtant only one hundred furlongs from Agrippa, he requeſted Antonia to ſolicit that Eutychus might be examined, that what he had to ſay againſt his patron might be known at once. Now Tiberius entertained a ſingular reſpect for Antonia, partly on account of affinity, for ſhe was his ſiſter-in-law, and the widow of Druſus; and partly for her ſteady virtue, in refuſing a ſecond marriage in the prime of her life, to which ſhe had been earneſtly preſſed by Auguſtus himſelf. In fact, her whole life exhibited a pattern of the moſt exemplary virtue. Excluſive of the above conſiderations, Tiberius was under perſonal obligations to Antonia, which he could not forget; ſince her wiſdom, fidelity, and diligence, had ſaved his life from the deſperate machinations of Sejanus; for he was poſſeſſed of great power and credit, a captain of the guards, and had engaged in the conſpiracy a number of the moſt eminent ſenators, many of Cæſar's freed-men, ſeveral of the favourites at court, and ſome of the military officers. The eſcape, therefore, of Tiberius was rather extraordinary, and the effects of the treaſonable intention were evidently defeated by the reſolute induſtry of Antonia; for no ſooner was ſhe informed of the horrid intention, than ſhe wrote down a narrative of all the particulars of the plot, as they came to her knowledge, and ſent them, from time to time, to Tiberius at Capreæ, by the hands of Pallas, who was an approved and confidential ſervant of the emperor: and in conſequence of this diſcovery, the confederacy and thoſe concerned in it being made known, Sejanus and his accomplices received the reward due to their demerits.

The conſpiracy of Sejanus diſcovered to Cæſar by Antonia.

It may be preſumed that if Antonia's merit was great with Tiberius before ſhe had rendered him this piece of ſervice, it was much greater afterwards: ſo that when, at the requeſt of Agrippa, ſhe had repeatedly urged the emperor to hear the charge of Eutychus, he could not refuſe to comply with her ſolicitations: but he addreſſed her to the following purport: "If this man has reported falſehoods reſpecting Agrippa, he has been already ſufficiently puniſhed in the length of his impriſonment: but let Agrippa beware how he proſecutes this matter with too great a degree of rigour; leſt, on a clear inveſtigation of the affair, the puniſhment he intends for Eutychus ſhould fall on his own head." Antonia reported the contents of this ſpeech to Agrippa; but the more earneſt ſhe was in adviſing him to decline all farther thoughts of proſecution, the more reſolved he ſeemed to have the matter determined by a full examination.

Tiberius endeavours to evade the examination of Eutychus.

When ſhe found that he refuſed to be adviſed, ſhe took an opportunity, when the emperor was paſſing by in a chair, after dinner, with Caius and Agrippa walking before him, to advance immediately to Tiberius, with a repeated requeſt that Eutychus might be brought to an immediate examination; on which he addreſſed her in the following manner: "I call heaven to witneſs, that what I am now about to conſent to, is contrary to my own inclination, and merely in compliance with your urgent requeſt." Having ſaid this, he gave orders to Macro, who had ſucceeded Sejanus as captain of the guards, to direct that Eutychus ſhould be immediately brought before him.

Cæſar yields reluctantly to the ſolicitations of Antonia.

The priſoner having made his appearance, Tiberius interrogated him in the following manner: "What have you to alledge againſt your patron, Agrippa, to whoſe bounty you owe the poſſeſſion of your freedom?" To this Eutychus made anſwer; "One day, as I was driving Caius and Agrippa in a chariot, and ſitting at their feet in the diſcharge of my duty, I heard the ſubſtance of the converſation that paſſed between them; and, among other things, I particularly recollect that Agrippa addreſſed Caius in the following manner: "Devoutly do I wiſh that the old man was but ſafely depoſited in the grave, and you were left governor of the world; for if he was departed, you might eaſily diſpoſe of his grandchild, Tiberius; and excluſive of the general advantage that would ariſe to mankind from this circumſtance, I might reaſonably hope to ſhare in the particular bleſſing of the revolution."

Examination of Eutychus, before Tiberius, and his charge againſt Agrippa.

There wanted nothing to induce Tiberius to give credit to this information; and he was inexpreſſibly chagrined to think, that after he had committed the education of his grandſon, Tiberius, to the particular care of Agrippa, he ſhould totally neglect that important charge, and devote his whole time

The emperor incenſed againſt Agrippa, orders him to be put in chains.

time to an attendance on Caius. The emperor, therefore, turning about to Macro, cried "Put him in chains;" but Macro, not knowing who it was that he meant (for he could not think of such a circumstance respecting Agrippa), hesitated a while, till he should be more fully informed of his intentions. In the interim Tiberius took a walk in the circus, and observing that Agrippa was still at liberty, he again called to Macro, and said, "Have I not given orders for the putting that man in chains?" To this Macro cried "What man?" Agrippa said, "Tiberius."

He is committed to prison.

Hereupon Agrippa had recourse to the humblest supplications and intreaties, beseeching Tiberius, by the regard he entertained for the memory of his son, who had conferred on him the honour of his acquaintance, and on account of the services he had been happy enough to render his grandson Tiberius, that he would grant him his pardon. But his solicitations had no effect; for he was immediately dragged away to prison by the guards, in his robes of honour, as they found him. Now the weather being remarkably sultry, and Agrippa ready to perish through the intenseness of thirst, he observed one Thaumastus, a servant to Caius, who had a pitcher of water in his hand, and requested that he would give him a draught of it. Thaumastus readily complied with this request; and when Agrippa had quenched his thirst, he addressed his benefactor in the following manner: "Since you, Thaumastus, have been so generous as to confer this obligation on me during my present disgraceful situation, with the same readiness that you formerly served me in a more elevated station of life, be assured that you shall never have cause to repent the liberality of your present conduct: for you may depend upon my word of honour, that as soon as my present difficulties shall be overcome, I will make use of my utmost interest with Caius, that you shall be restored to your liberty." And Agrippa was afterwards as good as his promise; for no sooner was he advanced to the crown, than he begged Caius would make him a present of Thaumastus, to whom he gave his freedom, and entrusted him with the management of his affairs; and when his death approached, he recommended him to his son and daughter, Agrippa and Bernice, advising that he might continue in the same situation during the remainder of his life; and this he did, with credit to himself, and possessing the esteem of all who knew him.

His gratitude to Thaumastus, a slave.

Prediction in consequence of an owl's perching on Agrippa's head.

While Agrippa was standing, bound with chains, with other prisoners, before the palace, leaning in a melancholy manner against a tree, an owl perched thereon; which being observed by a German prisoner, he asked a soldier who was the person dressed in purple; and being told that he was a Jew of the first distinction, he begged the soldier would let him approach him, for he wished to know some things respecting his country. This request being complied with, and an interpreter being allowed, the German addressed Agrippa to the following effect: "I perceive, young gentleman, that you are dejected by this sudden and amazing change in your fortune: yet it is not in your power to conceive, nor will you easily credit, how very near your deliverance approaches, under the special care and protection of that providence which is your peculiar guard. I now invoke all the gods which are worshipped either by your nation or ours, by whose permission we are thus imprisoned, to witness, that I say not this to flatter you with idle hopes by which you will be deceived; for I am not insensible that such prognostications, if the event should not prove answerable to the prophecy, are productive of more injury than service. But I conceive it to be my duty, at whatever risk to myself, to inform you, that you will see such a surprising turn of affairs, as will elevate you from this distressful situation, and place you on such a summit of honour and power, that you will become the envy of those who have heretofore affected either to despise or pity you. The remainder of your days will be prosperous, and your good fortune will be possessed by children whom you will leave behind you.—I now intreat your particular attention to what I have farther to say. When you shall again behold this bird, you shall die at the end of five days from that time. Thus much I am commissioned by Heaven to give you to understand by this auspicious omen. What I declare is founded in fact, and I tell you the simple truth, that you may not be borne down by the weight of your present afflictions; but be happy in the prospect of future events. All I have farther to desire of you is, that when you shall find these predictions verified by the event, you will not be unmindful of your fellow prisoners; but procure the freedom of those you may leave in this place." When Agrippa heard this prophecy of the German, it appeared to him altogether as ridiculous, as it did afterwards wonderful when it came to be accomplished.

Antonia's distress on account of Agrippa, and her successful intercession in his behalf.

During this time Antonia was exceedingly unhappy on account of the hard treatment of her friend; and conceiving that the inflexibility of the disposition of Tiberius was such, that the making of application or intercession to him would but be a mere loss of time, she therefore took a different method; and applied to Macro to render his confinement as easy to him as possible, by directing that he should be attended by soldiers of a civil and humane disposition, that he should constantly sit down at table with the officer in whose immediate custody he was; that he should be permitted the use of the bath daily, and that the visits of his friends and freemen should be admitted. All these favours were granted: whereupon he was visited by his friend Silas: and Marsyas and Stychus, two of his freed-men, constantly conveyed to him the food of which he was most fond; and under pretence of carrying blankets to sell, they supplied him with those articles on which to repose in the night; the soldiers, agreeable to the hints they had received from from Macro, making no oppoſition to theſe proceedings.

Tiberius, ſeized with a violent illneſs, orders his adopted children to be brought to him.

At the expiration of about ſix months from the commencement of Agrippa's impriſonment, Tiberius, on his return from Capreæ, was attacked with an illneſs that was at firſt but ſlight; but which gradually increaſing, he grew worſe till his life was deſpaired of. When he came to perceive that there were no hopes of his recovery, he diſpatched Evodus, his favourite freed man, to bring his children to him early on the following day, to take a final leave of their dying parent. When I ſpeak of his children, I mean thoſe he had adopted; for Druſus, his only ſon, was deceaſed: but Tiberius, the ſon of that Druſus, was yet living, as was Caius, the ſon of his brother Germanicus, who by this time was arrived at the years of maturity, and was a youth diſtinguiſhed by his learning, and by every other excellent qualification. He was a very great favourite with the people, on account of the reſpect they entertained for the memory of the virtues of his father, who was a prince ſingularly diſtinguiſhed by the modeſty of his deportment, and the eaſe of his converſation, never pretending to that ſuperiority which was undoubtedly his due. A character thus eminently diſtinguiſhed could not fail to attract the favour of the ſenate and people, and of the provinces in general, which owed him many obligations for the repeated good offices he had conferred. In fact, his death was not celebrated with ſo much outward pomp and mourning, as by a ſincere ſorrow, and tears that flowed from the real impulſe of the heart. The people in general lamented the death of this prince with ſuch an unfeigned grief, as if each man had wept for the deceaſe of his own father. Caius was highly advantaged in the public opinion by the reputation of Germanicus; but particula among the ſoldiers, who were ready, at the firſt call, to devote their lives to do him any kind of ſervice.

Caius and Germanicus univerſally beloved.

Tiberius implored the gods to direct him concerning a ſucceſſor.

Orders having been given by Tiberius, that Evodus ſhould bring his ſons to him early in the morning, the emperor offered up a prayer to the gods of his country, that he might be directed, by ſome particular ſignal, which of the two he ſhould make choice of for his ſucceſſor; yet privately wiſhing that Tiberius might be diſtinguiſhed by the happy omen: however, he did not dare venture to make a prejudication in a matter of ſuch high importance, but thought proper firſt to conſult his oracle. Wherefore he determined that he would be governed by this circumſtance, that the young prince who ſhould firſt wait upon him in the morning ſhould ſucceed him in the government. Having formed this reſolution, he gave particular orders to the tutor of his grandchild, to bring the youth to him by day-break, not entertaining a doubt but that the gods would declare in favour of Tiberius; but the event proved the contrary; for the emperor ſending out Evodus, as ſoon as day-light appeared, to ſee if the young princes were at the door, and to bring into the palace the firſt he ſaw, he found Caius alone, informed him that he muſt wait on his father, and immediately introduced him. Now it happened that Tiberius, being unappriſed of the intention of the emperor, had ſtayed to breakfaſt, and thus miſſed the favourable opportunity.

He propoſes an omen, which is fruſtrated, in favour of Caius.

The emperor was aſtoniſhed when Caius entered the room, and wondered at that providence which had defeated his deſign in the diſpoſal of the government, by thus ſettling it in a way totally contrary to what he had intended. Nor did he deem the preſent diſappointment of his expectations the worſt circumſtance attending the affair; for he did not conſider the loſs of the empire as of equal conſequence with the perſonal ſafety of his grandchild: ſince, where the acquiring of dominion is the object, the queſtion will be decided by force: ambition is deaf to the calls of humanity, and where there is a rivalſhip for power, the ruin of one party is generally deemed the ſecurity of the other.

Tiberius addicted to fortune-tellers and aſtrologers.

Now Tiberius paid great regard to the predictions of fortune-tellers, judicial aſtrologers, and people of that kind; and he acted, in a great degree, purſuant to their advice and direction. Happening one day to look upon Galba, he turned about to ſome friends who ſtood near him, and ſaid, "That man will be emperor of Rome." It muſt be confeſſed that not one of the Roman emperors ever had ſuch faith in prognoſtications as Tiberius; yet ſome of his ideas were not altogether abſurd. Nothing, however, made a deeper impreſſion on his mind than the late determination reſpecting the two princes, which had ſuch an effect on him, that he already conſidered his grandſon in the light of a man doomed to deſtruction; and what aggravated his wretchedneſs was, that himſelf was only blameable for that inquiſitiveneſs of diſpoſition which deſtroyed the peace of his own mind: whereas he might have lived at his eaſe, and in perfect freedom, without ſeeking to know the hidden counſels of providence, and deſtroying his repoſe by perpetual inquiries into the knowledge of future events: but this anxiety to know what in nature muſt be hidden from him, was the curſe of his diſpoſition.

His charge to Caius.

Being diſappointed in the wiſh that he had formed reſpecting the ſucceſſion, he was but ill diſpoſed to congratulate the future emperor on the good fortune that awaited him; yet, as on this occaſion it was neceſſary that ſomething ſhould be ſaid, he addreſſed the fortunate prince in the manner following: "It is unneceſſary, my ſon Caius, for me to inform you, that Tiberius is more nearly allied to me in blood than you are; yet I now commit the government of the Roman empire into your hands, in conſequence of having conſulted the will of the gods, and debated on the affair in my own mind. But I command you, that in the exerciſe of the power with which you are inveſted, you conſtantly conſtantly remember the obligations you are under to him who beſtowed it on you; and that your gratitude to your patron be teſtified by every poſſible inſtance of affection and regard to your brother Tiberius. All that I have to requeſt of you, in grateful acknowledgment of the honour I have now conferred (for, next to Heaven, it is owing to me), is that you will in every particular treat him with the utmoſt kindneſs, ſince he is equally endeared to me by nature and affection. I would likewiſe wiſh to remark to you, that it is no leſs your intereſt than your duty to comply with the injunctions I have given: for on the life and happineſs of your brother, the dignity and ſecurity of your ſituation will, in a great meaſure, depend; and your unhappineſs will ſpeedily ſucceed the day of his death. The ſituation of a ſovereign prince is equally dangerous and uncertain: he ſtands on a giddy and ſlippery elevation: nor will the divine vengeance fail to follow any actions he may be guilty of, in violation of the laws of nature and conſanguinity."

Caius promiſes obedience, but afterwards deſtroys his brother Tiberius.

Tiberius having thus made his laſt addreſs to Caius, he promiſed a punctual and exact obedience to every article of his commands; but he did not intend that his actions ſhould correſpond with his words; for no ſooner did he come into the poſſeſſion of power than he cauſed his brother to be put to death (as Tiberius had foreſeen); but within a few years he himſelf loſt his life by aſſaſſination.

Death and character of Tiberius.

In a few days after Tiberius had declared Caius his ſucceſſor, he departed this life, having reigned twenty-two years, five months, and thirteen days. Caius, who ſucceeded him, was the fourth in the liſt of the Roman emperors. The firſt news of the death of Tiberius afforded the higheſt ſatisfaction to the Romans; but they ſcarcely dared give credit to the report; for though the confirmation of this news was the firſt wiſh of their hearts, and there was nothing in the world which they would not have freely given to be aſcertained of the truth; yet they were afraid of even ſeeming to believe the report, or of evincing the happineſs they felt on receiving the intelligence, before they were certain of the fact; for ſo great a number of ſpies and informers were ſtationed in different places, that it might have been very dangerous for a man to declare his ſentiments. Tiberius was of a moſt fierce and tyrannical diſpoſition, and behaved to the nobility with a rigour never before experienced. His animoſities were not known to have any other foundation than in the influence of the preſent turn of his mind; and his cruelties were frequently carried to ſuch a horrid length, that death from his hands was often deemed an act of mercy. It was therefore neceſſary for the people to appear cautious how they credited the news which they wiſhed, as a miſtake might have been attended with ſo much danger.

Marſyas informs Agrippa of the emperor's death.

As ſoon as Marſyas, the freed-man of Agrippa, received information of the death of the emperor, he inſtantly hurried away with the good news to his patron, who was then going to bathe, and whiſpered him, in the Hebrew language, "The lion is dead." Agrippa immediately comprehended his meaning, and exclaimed, "How is it poſſible that I ſhould requite thee for this favour, and the many other obligations thou haſt conferred on me, provided that thy preſent intelligence ſhould prove true!" The officer, to whoſe cuſtody Agrippa had been committed, obſerving in what a hurry Marſyas delivered his meſſage, and how well pleaſed the priſoner was with the news, immediately conjectured that the intelligence was of the ſatisfactory kind, and therefore deſired Agrippa to inform him of the particulars. At firſt he made ſome kind of heſitation; but on being urged to diſcover what he knew, he related the plain matter of fact. The officer having congratulated him on the good news, invited him to partake of an elegant ſupper: but while they were in the midſt of their entertainment, a meſſenger arrived with an account that Tiberius was out of danger, and would ſoon arrive in town.

On a rumour to the contrary, Agrippa is more ſeverely treated.

This intelligence aſtoniſhed the officer in the higheſt degree; and being apprehenſive that his life muſt pay the forfeit for his having rejoiced with a priſoner on the news of the death of Tiberius, he puſhed Agrippa violently from his ſeat, and exclaimed in a rage, "Is it thus that you ſeek to impoſe upon me by lyes and artifices; and could you find no other perſon to amuſe with a pretended ſtory of the death of Cæſar? Depend upon it, that you ſhall pay ſeverely for the liberties that you have taken." Saying this, he directed that he ſhould be put in chains, and more cloſely watched than he was before. Agrippa having paſſed the night in this ſituation, the report of Cæſar's death prevailed in the morning, and the people offered ſacrifices of joy on the event.

Caius releaſes Agrippa, and confers many honours on him.

Soon after this report, two letters were brought from Caius, one to the ſenate, informing them that he was appointed ſucceſſor to Tiberius; and another to Piſo, governor of the city, to the ſame effect. Theſe letters ordered that Agrippa ſhould be diſcharged from priſon, and allowed to live in his former houſe; ſo that, though ſtill in a kind of cuſtody, he was eaſed of all fearful apprehenſions, and conſidered himſelf as in a ſtate of enlargement. Soon afterwards Caius came to Rome, and brought with him the body of Tiberius, which was interred in a moſt ſumptuous manner. The emperor would inſtantly have diſcharged Agrippa, but this was oppoſed by Antonia; not for want of affection to the party, but that ſhe thought it would be rather indecent to haſten the diſcharge; and, as Tiberius had committed the priſoner, would be deemed a kind of inſult on his memory. In a few days, however, Caius ſent for him to his palace, and having given directions that he ſhould be ſhaved and properly dreſſed, he cauſed a crown to be put on his head, as ſucceſſor to the tetrarchy which had been poſ-ſeſſed by Philip: he likewiſe created him king, beſtowed on him the tetrarchy of Lyſania, and gave him a chain of gold of the ſame weight as that of iron which he had worn in priſon. Marcellus was now ſent as governor of Judæa by Caius.

When Caius Cæſar was in the ſecond year of his reign, Agrippa intreated his permiſſion to retire into his own country to adjuſt his private affairs, promiſing to return at a limited time. It was matter of aſtoniſhment to his countrymen to behold Agrippa with a crown on his head; as he appeared a ſingular inſtance of the inſtability of fortune, and the fluctuation of human affairs, having ſo ſoon changed his ſituation from one exceſs to the other. Some of them conſidered him as a wiſe and fortunate man, who could ſo firmly ſupport himſelf againſt all difficulties; while others were ſo aſtoniſhed at the revolution that had happened, that they could ſcarcely credit the evidence of their own ſenſes.

CHAP. IX.

HERODIAS envies her Brother, and adviſes her Huſband to ſolicit Favours for himſelf. HEROD accuſed of Conſpiracies. He acknowledges his Guilt, is removed from his Government, and condemned to perpetual Exile. CÆSAR offers a Favour to HERODIAS, which ſhe refuſes to accept of, and is ordered into Baniſhment with her Huſband. The Moderation of CAIUS, and his ſubſequent Arrogance.

Envy of Herodias to Agrippa, and the cauſe of it.

HERODIAS (ſiſter of Agrippa, and wife of Herod, the tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa, the country beyond Jordan) was exceedingly chagrined at the great ſucceſs of Agrippa. She could not endure the idea that her brother, who ſo lately had been obliged to abſcond from his creditors, ſhould now be ſo greatly advanced above her huſband, in honour, rank, and dignity. The pride of her ſpirit gave her infinite mortification, when ſhe beheld him dreſſed in all the pomp of royalty, ſhewing himſelf to the people who ſurrounded him in crouds. This ſight, and the ideas that it occaſioned, raiſed ſo much of envy in her mind, that ſhe was anxious for her huſband to repair immediately to Rome, and ſolicit the emperor to confer equal honours on him. "I ſhould be inexpreſſibly wretched (cried ſhe) to behold my huſband, who was the ſon of a king, and who, by his own perſonal qualifications, and in conſequence of the affections of the people, had ſo good a right to ſucceed to the throne, ſtand tamely looking on, with perfect indifference, while the ſon of Ariſtobulus, at once a bankrupt and a criminal, who has undergone the rigour of the law, is promoted to a throne." Then turning to her huſband, ſhe ſaid, "If you could patiently ſubmit to live to this period, below the dignity of your family, certainly no time is now to be loſt in doing credit to the name of your father, nor ought you longer to think of ranking beneath an abject wretch, who, not long ſince, was ſupported by your bounty. Never let it be ſaid, that, while you had every advantage of fortune and reputation on your ſide, Agrippa, borne down by the weight of his neceſſities, ſhould have an opportunity of ſuperſeding you in the means of advancing his fortune. It will ill become the dignity of Herod to acknowledge the ſuperiority of that man whom his own bounty has kept from ſtarving. Therefore, I intreat you, without heſitation, or regard to the expence that may attend the expedition, we immediately depart together for Rome: money has no farther value than in the ſatisfaction it procures us from the having diſpoſed of it in a proper manner."

Herod, after much perſuaſion from Herodias, conſents to apply to Caius for favours.

Herod was of a diſpoſition calculated to indulge himſelf in his eaſe; nor had he formed any favourable opinion of the court of Rome; wherefore he endeavoured all he could to divert his wife from her intention, thinking that abſtaining from the journey would be the ſafeſt proceeding; but in proportion as he was for declining, ſhe was for purſuing the plan; and urged him in ſo importunate a manner, that he was at length obliged to comply with her requeſt; on which they proceeded together towards Rome, with a ſplendid retinue. Now Agrippa, having taken care to be informed of all their motions, had laid a plan for the counteracting their deſigns. Having prepared letters, and preſents for the emperor, he kept his freed-man, Fortunatus, ready to ſail for Rome, as ſoon as it ſhould be known that Herod was put to ſea; with particular inſtructions for his conduct on his arrival.

He meets Fortunatus, Agrippa's ſpy, at Puteoli.

Fortunatus having a favourable paſſage, arrived at Puteoli at the ſame time that Herod did; but it happened that the emperor was now at Baiæ, a ſmall town in Compagne; five furlongs from Puteoli, a place diſtinguiſhed by its royal palaces; as the emperors who frequented the hot baths, either for health or pleaſure, were ambitious of excelling each other in the ſplendor and elegance of their buildings. When Herod arrived here, he paid his reſpects to Caius; and Fortunatus, almoſt in the ſame moment, delivered his letters, which the emperor having read, found they contained two charges againſt Herod; the firſt of which was, his being concerned in the conſpiracy of Sejanus againſt Tiberius; and the other, taking part with Artabanus, the Parthian, againſt Caius; in proof of which Agrippa urged that he had then a magazine of arms for ſeventy thouſand men.

The emperor, on hearing the articles of accuſation againſt Herod, deprives him of his government.

Caius, inflamed at this news, inſtantly aſked Herod if he was thus formidably provided; nor could he deny ſo indiſputable a fact. The emperor ſought for no farther proof of his treaſonable deſigns; but immediately deprived him of his government, and ſeized on his money, both which he gave to Agrippa, as a reward for the diſcovery he had made. Herod he doomed to perpetual exile at Lyons, a capital city of France; but with regard regard to Herodias, who was ſiſter to Agrippa, he permitted her to retain all her private property, not dooming her to a ſhare in her huſband's misfortunes, ſaying, he would treat her with lenity for the ſake of her brother. When Herodias heard this determination, ſhe addreſſed Caius, ſaying, "You have decreed like a magnanimous emperor; permit me to behave like an obedient wife. It will be out of my power to enjoy the effects of your liberality; for I cannot deem it juſt or honourable to abandon my huſband in his diſtreſs, after having partaken of all the advantages of his more auſpicious fortune." Caius was exceedingly offended at this dignity of mind in a woman, and conſidering her behaviour as an affront to himſelf, he ſeized her effects, and ordered that ſhe ſhould be baniſhed and confined with her huſband. Thus was Herodias ſubjected to the vengeance of heaven, as a puniſhment for the envy ſhe had entertained towards her brother; and Herod was thus afflicted in conſequence of having taken her advice in the proſecution of a malicious act.

Caius begins to rule well, but ſoon after ſhamefully degenerates.

During the two firſt years of the reign of Caius, his government was directed by the rules of prudence and moderation, and was equally acceptable to the people at Rome and in the provinces; but, after that period, his arrogance and vanity increaſed to ſuch a degree, that he became intoxicated with his power, conſidered himſelf as ſomething more than mortal, blaſphemed the gods, aſſumed the ſtate of a deity, and demanded that divine honours ſhould be paid him.
